TO THE MOST HIGH AND MIGHTIE PRINCESSE ELIZABETH, BY THE GRACE OF GOD, OF ENGLAND, FRANCE, AND IRELAND QVEENE, DEFENDER OF THE FAITH, &c.

NDER hope of your Highneſſe gracious and accuſtomed fauour, I haue preſumed to preſent here vnto your Maieſtie, Plutarkes liues tranſlated, as a booke fit to be protected by your Highneſſe, and meete to be ſet forth in Engliſh. For who is fitter to giue countenance to ſo manie great ſtates, then ſuch an high and mightie Princeſſe? who is fitter to reuiue the dead memorie of their fame, then ſhe that beareth the liuely image of their vertues? who is fitter to authorize a worke of ſo great learning and wiſedome, then ſhe whom all do honour as the Muſe of the world? Therefore I humbly beſeech yor Maieſtie, to ſuffer the ſimpleneſſe of my tranſlation, to be couered vnder the mpleneſſe of your Highneſſe protection. For, moſt gracious Soueraigne, though this booke be no booke for your Maieſties ſelfe, who are meeter to be the hiet ſtorie, then a ſtudent therein, and can better vnderſtand it in Greeke, then ny man can make it Engliſh: yet I hope the common ſort of your ſubiects, ſhal hot onely profit themſelues hereby, but alſo be animated to the better ſeruice f your Maieſtie. For among all the prophane bookes that are in reputation at thi day, there is none (your Highnes beſt knowes) that teacheth ſo much honor, lue, obedience, reuerence, zeale, and deuotion to Princes, as theſe liues of Plutake do. How many examples ſhall your ſubiects reade here, of ſeuerall perſons, nd whole armies, of noble and baſe, of yong and old, that both by ſea and land, t home and abroade, haue ſtrained their wits, not regarding their ſtates, ventute their perſons, caſt away their liues, not onely for the honour and ſafetie, bualſo for the pleaſure of their Princes?

Th well may the Readers thinke, if they haue done this for heathen Kings, what ſhuld we do for Chriſtian Princes? If they haue done this for glorie, what ſhould e do for Religion? If they haue done this without hope of heauen, what ſhould we do that looke for immortalitie? And ſo adding the incouragemen of theſe examples, to the forwardneſſe of their owne diſpoſitions: what ſeruic is there in warre, what honour in peace, which they will not be readie to do, fo their worthie Queene?

And therefore that your Highneſſe may giue grace to the booke, and th booke may do his ſeruice to your Maieſtie: I haue tranſlated it out of Frenc, and do here moſt humbly preſent the ſame vnto your Highneſſe, beſeechi your Maieſtie with all humilitie, not to reiect the good meaning, but to pardo the errours of your moſt humble and obedient ſubiect and ſeruant, who praych God long to multiplie all graces and bleſſings vpon your Maieſtie. VVritten te ſixteenth day of Ianuarie. 1579.

Your Maieſties moſt humble and obedient ſeruant,

Thomas North.

TO

To the Reader.

THE profit of ſtories, and the praiſe of the Author, are ſufficiently declared by Amiot, in his Epiſtle to the Reader: ſo that I ſhall not need to make manie words thereof. And indeed if you will ſupplie the defects of this tranſlation, with your owne diligence and good vnderſtanding: you ſhall not need to truſt him, you may proue your ſelues, that there is no prophane ſtudie better then Plutarke. All other learning is priuate, fitter for Vniuerſities then Cities, fuller of contemplation then experience, more commendable in ſtudents themſelues, then profitable vnto others. Whereas ſtories are fit for euerie place, reach to all perſons, ſerue for all times, teach the liuing, reuiue the dead, ſo farre excelling all other bookes, as it is better to ſee learning in Noblemens liues, then to reade it in Philoſophers writings. Now for the Author, I will not denie but loue may deceiue me, for I muſt needs loue him with whom I haue taken ſo much paine: but I beleeue I might be bold to affirme, that he hath written the profitableſt ſtorie of all Authors. For all other were faine to take their matter, as the fortune of the countries whereof they wrote fell out: But this man being excellent in wit, learning, and experience, hath choſen the ſpeciall acts of the beſt perſons, of the famouſeſt nations of the world. But I will leaue the iudgement to your ſelues. My onely purpoſe is to deſire you to excuſe the faults of my tranſlation, with your owne gentleneſſe, and with the opinion of my diligence and good intent. And ſo I wiſh you all the profit of the booke. Fare ye well. The foure and twentieth day of Ianuarie. 1579.

THOMAS NORTH.

Amiot to the Readers.

THE reading of bookes which bring but a vaine and vnprofitable pleasure to the Reader, is iustly misliked of wise and graue men. Againe, the reading of such as do but onely bring profit, and make the Reader to be in loue therewith, and do not ease the paine of the reading by some pleasantnesse in the same: do seeme somewhat harsh to diuers delicate wits, that cannot tarie long vpon them. But such bookes as yeeld pleasure and profit, and do both delight and teach, haue all that a man can desire why they should be vniuersally liked and allowed of all sorts of men, according to the common saying of the Poet Horace:

That he which matcheth profit with delight,
Doth winne the prize in euerie point aright.

Either of these yeeld his effect the better, by reason the one runneth with the other, profiting the more because of the delight, and delighting the more because of the profit. This commendation (in my opinion) is most proper to the reading of stories, to haue pleasure and profit matched together, which kind of delight and teaching, meeting in this wise arme in arme, hath more allowance then any other kind of writing or inuention of man. In respect whereof it may be reasonably auowed, that men are more beholding to such good wits, as by their graue and wise writing haue deserued the name of Historiographers, then they are to any other kind of writers: because an historie is an orderly register of notable things said, done, or happened in times past, to maintaine the continuall remembrance of them, and to serue for the instruction of them to come.

And like as memorie is as a store-house of mens conceits and deuises, without the which the actions of the other two parts should be vnperfect, and well-neare vnprofitable: so may it also be said, that an historie is the verie treasurie of mans life, whereby the notable doings and sayings of men, and the wonderfull aduentures and strange cases, (which the long continuance of time bringeth forth) are preserued from the death of forgetfulnesse. Hereupon it riseth that Plato the wise saith, that the name of historie was giuen to this recording of matters, to stay the fleeting of our memorie, which otherwise would be soone lost, and retaine litle. And we may well perceiue how greatly we be beholding vnto it, if we do no more but consider in how horrible darknesse, and in how beastly and pestilent a quagmire of ignorance we should be plunged: if the remembrance of all the things that haue bene done, and haue happened before we were borne, were vtterly drowned and forgotten. Now therefore I will ouerpasse the excellencie and worthinesse of the thing it selfe, forasmuch as it is not onely of more antiquitie then anie other kind of writing that euer was in the world, but also was vsed among men, before there was anie vse of letters at all: because that men in those dayes deliuered in their life times the remembrance of things past to their successors, in songs, which they caused their children to learne by heart, from hand to hand, as is to be seene yet in our dayes by the example of the barbarous people that inhabite the new-found lands in the West, who without any records of writings, haue had the knowledge of things past, wel-neare eight hundred yeares afore. Likewise I leaue to discourse, that it is the surest, safest, and durablest monument that men can leaue of their doings in this world, to consecrate their names to immortalitie. For there is neither picture, nor image of marble, nor arch of triumph, nor pillar, nor sumptuous sepulcher, that can match the durablenesse of an eloquent historie, furnished with the properties which it ought to haue. Againe, I mind not to stand much vpon this, that it hath a certaine troth in it, in that it alwayes professeth to speake truth, and for that the proper ground thereof is to treate of the greatest and highest things that are done in the world: insomuch that (to my seeming) the great profit thereof is as Horace saith, that it is commonly called the mother of troth and vprightnesse, which commendeth it so greatly, as it needeth not elsewhere to seeke any authoritie, or ornament of dignitie, but of her verie selfe. For it is a certaine rule and instruction, which by examples past, teacheth vs to iudge of things present, and to foresee things to come: so as we may know what to like of, and what to follow: what to mislike, and what to eschue. It is a picture, which (as it were in a table) setteth before our eyes the things worthie of remembrance that haue bene done in old time by mightie nations, noble Kings and Princes, wise Gouernours, valiant Captaines, and persons renowmed for some notable qualitie, representing vnto vs the manners of strange nations, the lawes and customes of old time, the particular affaires of men, their their consultations and enterprises, the meanes that they haue vsed to compasse them withall, and their demeaning of themselues when they were come to the highest, or throwne downe to the lowest degree of state. So as it is not possible for any case to rise either in peace or warre, in publike or priuate affaires, but that the person which shall haue diligently read, well conceiued, and throughly remembred histories, shall find matter in them whereat to take delight, and counsell whereby to resolue himselfe to take a part, or to giue aduice vnto others, how to choose in doubtfull and dangerous cases that which may be for their most profit, and in time to find out to what point the matter will come if it be well handled: and how to moderate himselfe in prosperitie, and how to cheare vp and beare himselfe in aduersitie. These things it doth with much greater grace, efficacie, and speed, then the bookes of morall Philosophie do: forasmuch as examples are of more force to moue and instruct, then are the arguments and proofes of reason, or their precise precepts, because examples be the verie formes of our deedes, and accompanied with all circumstances. Whereas reasons and demonstrations are generall, and tend to the proofe of things, and to the beating of them into vnderstanding: and examples tend to the shewing of them in practise and execution, because they do not onely declare what is to be done, but also worke a desire to do it, as well in respect of a certaine naturall inclination which all men haue to follow examples, as also for the beautie of vertue, which is of such power, that wheresoeuer she is seene, she maketh her selfe to be loued and liked. Againe, it doth things with greater weight and grauitie, then the inuentions and deuises of the Poets: because it helpeth not it selfe with anie other thing then with the plaine truth, whereas Poetrie doth commonly inrich things by commending them aboue the starres and their deseruing, because the chiefe intent thereof is to delight. Moreouer, it doth things with more grace and modestie then the ciuill lawes and ordinances do: because it is more grace for a man to teach and instruct, then to chastise or punish. And yet for all this, an historie also hath his manner of punishing the wicked, by the reproch of euerlasting infamie, wherewith it defaceth their remembrance, which is a great meane to withdraw them from vice, who otherwise would be leudly and wickedly disposed. Likewise on the contrarie part, the immortall praise and glorie wherewith it rewardeth wel-doers, is a verie liuely and sharpe spurre for men of noble courage and gentleman-like nature, to cause them to aduenture vpon all manner of noble and great things. For bookes are full of examples of men of high courage and wisedome, who for desire to continue the remembrance of their name by the sure and certaine record of histories, haue willingly yeelded their liues to the seruice of the common-weale, spent their goods, sustained infinite paines both of bodie and mind in defence of the oppressed, in making common buildings, in stablishing of lawes and gouernements, and in the finding out of arts and sciences necessarie for the maintenance and ornament of mans life: for the faithfull registring whereof, the thanke is due to histories. And although true vertue seeke no reward of her commendable doings like a hireling, but contenteth her selfe with the conscience of her well doing: yet notwithstanding I am of opinion, that it is good and meete to draw men by all meanes to good doing, and good men ought not to be forbidden to hope for the honour of their vertuous deedes, seeing that honour doth naturally accompanie vertue, as the shadow doth the bodie. For we commonly see, that not to feele the sparkes of desire of honour, is an infallible signe of a base, vile, and cloinish nature: and that such as account it an vnnecessarie, needlesse, or vnseemely thing to be praised, are likewise no doers of any things worthie of praise, but are commonly men of faint courage, whose thoughts extend no further then to their liues, whereof also they haue no further remembrance, then is before their eyes. But if the counsell of old men be to be greatly esteemed, because they must needes haue seene much by reason of their long life: and if they that haue trauelled long in strange countries, and haue had the managing of manie affaires, and haue gotten great experience of the doings of this world, are reputed for sage, and worthie to haue the reynes of great gouernements put into their hands: how greatly is the reading of histories to be esteemed, which is able to furnish vs with more examples in one day, then the whole course of the longest life of any man is able to do? Insomuch that they which exercise themselues in reading as they ought to do, although they be but young, become such in respect of vnderstanding of the affaires of this world, as if they were old and gray headed, and of long experience. Yea though they neuer haue remoued out of their houses, yet are they rduertised, informed, and satisfied of all things in the world, as well as they that haue shortned their liues by innumerable trauels and infinite daungers, in running ouer the whole earth that is inhabited: whereas on the contrarie part, they that are ignorant of the things that were done and come to passe before they were borne, continue still as children, though they be neuer so aged, and are but as strangers in their owne natiue countries. To be short, it may be truly ſaid, that the reading of hiſtories is the ſchoole of wiſedome, to faſhion mens vnderſtanding, by conſidering aduiſedly the ſtate of the world that is paſt, and by marking diligently by what lawes, manners, and diſcipline, Empires, Kingdomes, and dominions, haue in old time bene ſtabliſhed, and afterward maintained and increaſed: or contrariwiſe chaunged, diminiſhed, and ouerthrowne. Alſo we reade, that whenſoeuer the right ſage and vertuous Emperour of Rome, Alexander Seuerus, was to conſult of anie matter of great importance, whether it concerned warres or gouernement: he alwayes called ſuch to counſell, as were reported to be well ſeene in hiſtories. Notwithſtanding I know there are that will ſtand againſt me in this point, and vphold that the reading of hiſtories can ſerue to ſmall purpoſe, or none at all, towards the getting of skill: becauſe skill conſiſteth in action, and is ingendred by the verie experience and practiſe of things, when a man doth well marke and throughly beare away the things that he hath ſeene with his eyes, and found true by proofe, according to the ſaying of the auncient Poet Afranius:

My name is Skill, my Syre Experience hight,
And Memorie bred and brought me foorth to light.

Which thing was meant likewiſe by the Philoſopher that ſaid, that the hand is the inſtrument of skill. By reaſon whereof it commeth to paſſe (ſay they) that ſuch as ſpeake of mattters of gouernement and ſtate, but ſpecially of matters of warre by the booke, ſpeake but as booke-knights, as the French prouerbe termeth them, after the manner of the Grecians, who call him a booke Pilot, which hath not the ſure and certaine knowledge of the things that he ſpeakes of: meaning thereby, that it is not for a man to truſt to the vnderſtanding which he hath gotten by reading, in things that conſiſt in the deed doing, where the hand is to be ſet to the worke: no more then the often hearing of men talke and reaſon of painting, or the diſputing vpon colours, without taking of the penſill in hand, can ſtand a man in anie ſtead at all to make him a good painter. But on the contrarie part, manie haue proued wiſe men and good Captaines, which could neither write nor reade. Beſides this, they alleage further, that in matters of warre, all things alter from yeare to yeare: by meanes whereof the ſleights and pollicies that are to be learned out of bookes, will ſerue the turne no more then mines that are blowne vp. According whereunto Cambyſes telleth his ſonne Cyrus in Xenophon, that like as in Muſicke the neweſt ſongs are commonly beſt liked of for once, becauſe they were neuer heard afore: So in the warres, thoſe pollicies that neuer were practiſed afore, are thoſe that take beſt ſucceſſe, and commonly haue the beſt effect, becauſe the enemies do leaſt doubt of them. Neuertheleſſe I am not he that will maintaine that a wiſe Gouernour of a common-weale, or a great Captaine can be made of ſuch a perſon, as hath neuer trauelled out of his ſtudie, and from his bookes: howbeit that which Cicero writeth of Lucius Lucullus, is true, that when he departed out of Rome as Captaine generall and Lieutenant of the Romaines, to make warre againſt King Mithridates, he had no experience at all of the warres, and yet afterward he beſtowed ſo great diligence in the reading of hiſtories, and in conferring vpon euerie point with the old Captaines and men of long experience whom he caried with him, that by the time of his comming into Aſia, where he was indeed to put his matters in execution, he was found to be a verie ſufficient Captaine, as appeared by his deedes: inſomuch that by thoſe wayes, cleane contrarie to the common order of warre, he diſcomfited two of the moſt puiſſant and greateſt Princes that were at that time in the Eaſt. For his vnderſtanding was ſo quicke, his care ſo vigilant, and his courage ſo great, that he needed no long training, nor groſſe inſtruction by experience. And although I graunt there haue bene diuerſe Gouernours and Captaines, which by the onely force of nature (furthered by long continued experience) haue done goodly and great exploites: yet can it not be denied me, but that if they had matched the gifts of nature with the knowledge of learning, and the reading of hiſtories, they might haue done much greater things, and they might haue become much more perfect. For like as in euerie other cunning and skill wherein a man intendeth to excell: ſo alſo to become a perfect and ſufficient perſon to gouerne in peace and warre, there are three things of neceſſitie required, namely, nature, art, and practiſe. Nature (in the caſe we treate of) muſt furniſh vs with a good mother wit, with a bodie well diſpoſed to endure all manner of trauell, and with a good will to aduance our ſelues: Art muſt giue vs iudgement and knowledge, gotten by the examples and wiſe diſcourſes that we haue read and double read in good hiſtories: and Practiſe will get vs readineſſe, aſſuredneſſe, and the eaſe how to put things in execution. For though Skill be the ruler of doing the deede, yet it is a vertue of the mind which teacheth a man the meane point betweene the two faultie extremities of too much and too litle, wherein the commendation of all doings conſiſteth. And whoſoeuer he is that goeth about to attaine to it by the onely triall of experience, and

Three things neceſſarie for a Magiſtrate, or Captaine.

and had rather learne it at his owne coſt, then at another mans: he may well be of the number of thoſe that are touched by this auncient Prouerbe, which ſaith, Experience is the ſchoole-miſtris of fooles: becauſe mans life is ſo ſhort, and experience is hard and dangerous, ſpecially in matters of warre, wherein (according to the ſaying of Tamachus the Athenian Captaine) a man cannot fault twice, becauſe the faults are ſo great that moſt commonly they bring with them the ouerthrow of the ſtate, or loſſe of the liues of thoſe that do them. Therefore we muſt not tarie for this wit that is wonne by experience, which coſteth ſo deare, and is ſo long in comming, that a man is oft times dead in the ſeeking of it before he haue attained it, ſo as he had need of a ſecond life to employ it in, becauſe of the ouerlate comming by it. But we muſt make ſpeed by our diligent and continuall reading of hiſtories both old and new, that we may enioy this happineſſe which the Poet ſpeaketh of:

A happie wight is he that by miſhaps
Of others, doth beware of afterclaps.

By the way, as concerning thoſe that ſay that paper will beare all things: if there be anie that vnworthily take vpon them the name of Hiſtoriographers, and do deface the dignitie of the ſtorie for hatred or fauour, by mingling anie vntruth with it: that is not the fault of the hiſtorie, but of the men that are partiall, who do abuſe that name vnworthily, to couer and cloake their owne paſſions withall, which thing ſhall neuer come to paſſe, if the writer of the ſtorie haue the properties that are neceſſarily required in a ſtorie-writer, as theſe: That he ſet aſide all affection, be voide of enuie, hatred, and flatterie: that he be a man experienced in the affaires of the world, of good vtterance and iudgement, to diſcerne what is to be ſayd and what to be left vnſayd, and what would do more harme to haue it declared, then do good to haue it reproued or condemned: foraſmuch as his chiefe drift ought to be to ſerue the common-weale, and that he is but as a regiſter to ſet downe the iudgements and definitiue ſentences of Gods Court, whereof ſome are giuen according to the ordinarie courſe and capacitie of our weake naturall reaſon, and other ſome go according to Gods infinite power and incomprehenſible wiſedome, aboue and againſt all diſcourſe of mans vnderſtanding, who being vnable to reach the bottome of his iudgements, and to find out the firſt motions and grounds thereof, do impute the cauſe of them to a certaine fortune, which is nought elſe but a fained deuiſe of mans wit, dazeled at the beholding of ſuch brightneſſe, and confounded at the gazing of ſo bottomeleſſe a deepe: howbeit, nothing commeth to paſſe nor is done without the leaue of him that is the verie right and truth it ſelfe, with whom nothing is paſt or to come, who knoweth and vnderſtandeth the verie originall cauſes of all neceſſitie. The conſideration whereof teacheth men to humble themſelues vnder his mightie hand by acknowledging that there is one firſt cauſe which ouerruleth nature, whereof it commeth, that neither hardineſſe is alwayes happie, nor wiſedome alwayes ſure of good ſucceſſe. Theſe ſo notable commodities are euerie where accompanied with ſingular delight, which proceedeth chiefly of diuerſitie and noueltie wherein our nature delighteth, and is greatly deſirous of: becauſe we hauing an earneſt inclination towards our beſt proſperitie and aduancement, it goeth on ſtill, ſeeking in it euerie thing which it taketh to be goodly, or good in this world. But foraſmuch as it findeth not wherewith to content it ſelfe vnder the cope of heauen, it is ſoone wearie of the things that it had earneſtly deſired before, and ſo goeth on wandering in the vnskilfulneſſe of her likings, whereof ſhe neuer ceaſeth to make a continuall changing vntill ſhe haue fully ſatisfied her deſires, by attaining to the laſt end, which is to be knit to her chiefe felicitie, where is the full perfection of all goodlineſſe and goodneſſe. This liking of varietie cannot be better releeued, then by that which is the finder out and the preſeruer of time, the father of all noueltie, and meſſenger of antiquitie. For if we find a certaine ſingular pleaſure, in hearkening to ſuch as be returned from ſome long voyage, and do report things which they haue ſeene in ſtrange countries, as the maners of people, the natures of places, and the faſhions of liues, differing from ours: and if we be ſometime ſo raviſhed with delight and pleaſure at the hearing of the talke of ſome wiſe, diſcreete, and well ſpoken old man, from whoſe mouth there floweth a ſtreame of ſpeech ſweeter then honie, in rehearſing the aduentures which he hath had in his greene and youthfull yeares, the paines that he hath endured, and the perils that he hath ouerpaſſed, ſo as we perceiue not how the time goeth away: how much more ought we to be raviſhed with delight and wondering, to behold the ſtate of mankind, and the true ſucceſſe of things, which antiquitie hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the world, as the ſetting vp of Empires, the ouerthrow of Monarchies, the riſing and falling of Kingdomes, and all things elſe worthie admiration, and the ſame liuely ſet forth in the faire, rich, and true table of Eloquence? And that ſo liuely, as in the verie reading of them we ſee our minds to be ſo touched by them, not as though the things were alreadie done and past, but as though they were euen then presently in doing, and we find our selues caried away with gladnesse and griefe through feare or hope, well neare as though we were then at the doing of them: whereas notwithstanding we be not in anie paine or daunger, but onely conceiue in our minds the aduersities that other folkes haue endured, our selues sitting safe with our contentation and ease, according to those verses of the Poet Lucretius:

It is a pleasure for to sit at ease
Vpon the land, and safely for to see How other folkes are tossed on the seas,
That with the blustring winds turmoiled be.
Not that the sight of others miseries
Doth any way the honest heart delight,
But for because it liketh well our eies,
To see harmes free that on our selues might light.

Also it is seene that the reading of histories doth so hold and allure good wits, that diuers times it not onely maketh them to forget all other pleasures, but also serueth verie fitly to turne away their griefes, and sometimes also to remedie their diseases. As for example, we find it written of Alphonsus King of Naples, that Prince so greatly renowned in Chronicles for his wisedome and goodnesse, that being sore sicke in the citie of Capua, when his Phisitions had spent all the cunning that they had to recouer him his health, and he saw that nothing preuailed: he determined with himselfe to take no moe medicines, but for his recreation caused the storie of Quintus Curtius, concerning the deeds of Alexander the great, to be read before him: at the hearing whereof he tooke so wonderfull pleasure, that nature gathered strength by it, and ouercame the waywardnesse of his disease. Whereupon, hauing soone recouered his health, he discharged his Phisitions with such wordes as these: Feast me no more with your Hippocrates and Galene, sith they can no skill to helpe me to recouer my health: but well fare Quintus Curtius that could so good skill to helpe me to recouer my health. Now if the reading and knowledge of histories be delightfull and profitable to all other kind of folke: I say it is much more for great Princes and Kings, because they haue to do with charges of greatest weight and difficultie, to be best stored with giftes and knowledge for the discharge of their duties: seeing the ground of stories is, to treate of all manner of high matters of state, as warres, battels, cities, countries, treaties of peace and alliances, and therefore it seemeth more fit for them, then for anie other kind of degrees of men: because they being bred and brought vp tenderly, and at their ease, by reason of the great regard and care that is had of their persons (as meete is for so great states to haue) they take not so great paines in their youth for the learning of things as behoueth those to take which will learne the noble auncient languages, and the painefull doctrine comprehended in Philosophie. Againe, when they come to mans state, their charge calleth them to deale in great affaires, so as there remaineth no exercise of wit more conuenient for them, then the reading of histories in their owne tongue, which without paine is able to teach them euen with great pleasure and ease, whatsoeuer the painefull workes of the Philosophers concerning the gouernement of common-wealths can shew them, to make them skilfull in the well ruling and gouerning of the people and countries that God hath put vnder their subiection. But the worst is, that they euer (or for the most part) haue such manner of persons about them as seeke nothing else but to please them by all the wayes they can, and there are verie few that dare tell them the truth freely in all things: whereas on the contrarie part, an historie flattereth them not, but layeth open before their eyes the faults and vices of such as were like them in greatnesse of degree. And therefore Demetrius Phalerius (a man renowmed aswell for his skill in the good gouernement of a common-weale, as for his excellent knowledge otherwise) counselled Ptolomie, first King of Ægypt after the death of Alexander the great, that he should often and diligently reade the bookes that treated of the gouernement of Kingdomes, because (sayd he) thou shalt find manie things there, which thy seruants and familiar friends dare not tell thee. Moreouer this is another thing, that such great personages cannot easily trauell out of the bounds of their dominions, to go view strange countries as priuate persons do: because the ielousie of their estate, and the regard of their dignitie, requires that they should neuer be in place where another man might commaund them. And oftentimes for want of hauing seene the countries, and knowne the people and Princes that are their neighbours, they haue aduentured vpon attempts without good ground: to auoide the which, the instruction they may haue by the reading of histories, is one of the easiest and fittest remedies that can be found. And though there were none other cause then onely this last, surely it ought to induce

Princes

Princes to the often and diligent reading of histories, wherein are written the heroicall deedes of wise and valiant men, specially of Kings that haue bene before them, the consideration whereof may cause them to be desirous to become like them, specially which were of stately and noble courage: because the seedes of Princely vertues that are bred with themselues, do then quicken them vp with an emulation towards those that haue bene or are equall in degree with them, aswell in respect of nobleneſſe of bloud, as of greatneſſe of ſtate, ſo as they be loth to giue place to anie perſon, and much leſſe can find in their hearts to be out-gone in glorie of vertuous doings. Whereof innumerable examples might be alleaged, if the thing were not ſo well knowne of it ſelfe, that it were much more against reaſon to doubt of it, than needfull to prooue it. Therefore a man may truly conclude, that an hiſtorie is the ſchoole-miſtris of Princes, at whoſe hand they may without paine, in way of paſtime, and with ſingular pleaſure learne the moſt part of the things that belong to their office. Now, according to the diuerſitie of the matter that it treateth of, or the order and manner of writing that it vſeth, it hath ſundrie names giuen vnto it: But yet among the reſt there are two chiefe kinds. The one, which ſetteth downe mens doings and aduentures at length, is called by the common name of an hiſtorie: the other, which declareth their natures, ſayings, and manners, is properly named their liues. And although the ground of them both do cloſe verie neare in one, yet doth the one reſpect more the things, and the other the perſons: the one is more common, and the other more priuate: the one concerneth more the things that are without the man, and the other the things that proceed from within: the one the euents, the other the conſultations: betweene the which there is oftentimes great oddes, according to this anſwer of the Perſian Siramnes, to ſuch as maruelled how it came to paſſe, that his deuiſes being ſo politicke had ſo vnhappie ſucceſſe: It is (quoth he) becauſe my deuiſes are wholly from my owne inuention, but the effects of them are in the diſpoſition of fortune and the King. And ſurely among all thoſe that euer haue taken vpon them to write the names of famous men, the chiefe prerogatiue, by the iudgement of ſuch as are cleareſt ſighted, is iuſtly giuen to the Greeke Philoſopher Plutarke, borne in the citie of Chæronea in the countrey of Bœotia, a nobleman, perfect in all rare knowledge, as his workes may well put men out of doubt, if they liſt to reade them through, who all his life long, euen to his old age, had to deale in affaires of the common-weale, as he himſelfe witneſſeth in diuers places, ſpecially in the treatiſe which he intituled, Whether an old man ought to meddle with the gouernement of a common-weale or not: and who had the hap and honour to be ſchoole-maiſter to the Emperour Traian, as is commonly beleeued, and as is expreſly pretended in a certaine Epiſtle ſet before the Latine tranſlation of his matters of ſtate, (which to ſay the truth) ſeemeth in my iudgement to be ſomewhat ſuſpitious, becauſe I find it not among his workes in Greeke, beſides that it ſpeaketh as though the booke were dedicated to Traian, which thing is manifeſtly diſprooued by the beginning of the booke, and by diuers other reaſons. Yet notwithſtanding becauſe me thinkes it is ſagely and grauely written, and well beſeeming him: I haue ſet it downe here in this place, Plutarke vnto Traian ſendeth greeting. I know well that the modeſtie of your nature was not deſirous of Soueraignetie, though you haue alwayes indeuoured to deſerue it by your honourable conuerſation: by reaſon whereof you haue bene thought ſo much the worthier of it, as you haue bene found the further off from all ambition. And therefore I do now reioyce in your vertue and my fortune, if it be ſo great as to cauſe you to adminiſter that thing with iuſtice, which you haue obtained by deſert. For otherwiſe I am ſure you haue put your ſelfe in hazard of great daungers, and me in perill of ſlanderous tongues, becauſe that Rome cannot away with a wicked Emperour, and the common voice of the people is alwayes wont to caſt the faults of the ſchollers in the teeth of their ſchoole-maiſters: as for example: Seneca is railed vpon by ſlanderous tongues, for the faults of his ſcholler Nero: the ſcapes of Quintilians young ſchollers are imputed to Quintilian himſelfe: and Socrates is blamed for being too mild to his hearers. But as for you, there is hope you ſhall do all things well enough, ſo you keepe you as you are. If you firſt ſet your ſelfe in order, and then diſpoſe all other things according to vertue, all things ſhall fall out according to your deſire. I haue ſet you downe the meanes in writing, which you muſt obſerue for the well gouerning of your common-weale, and haue ſhewed vnto you of how great force your behauiour may be in that behalfe. If you thinke good to follow thoſe things, you haue Plutarke for the director and guider of your life: if not, I proteſt vnto you by this Epiſtle, that your falling into daunger to the ouerthrow of the Empire, is not by the doctrine of Plutarke. This Epiſtle witneſſeth plainely that he was the ſchoole-maiſter of Traian, which thing ſeemeth to be auowed by this writing of Suidas: Plutarke being borne in the citie of Cheronea in Bœotia, was in the time of the Emperour Traian, and ſomewhat before. But Traian honoured him with the dignitie of Conſulſhip, and commaunded the officers and magistrates that were throughout all the countrey of Illyria, that they should not do anie thing without his counsell and authoritie. So doth Suidas write of him. And I am of opinion, that Traian being so wise an Emperour, would neuer haue done him so great honour, if he had not thought himselfe greatly beholding to him for some speciall cause. But the thing that maketh me most to beleeue it true, is, that the same goodnesse and iustice appeared to be naturally imprinted in most of Traians sayings and doings, whereof the patterne and mould (as a man might terme it) is cast and set downe in Plutarkes Morals, so as men may perceiue expresly, that the one could well skill to performe rightly, that which the other had taught wisely. For Dion writeth, that among other honours which the Senate of Rome gaue by decree vnto Traian, they gaue him the title of the Good Emperour. And Eutropius reporteth that euen vnto his time, when a new Emperour came to be receiued of the Senate, among the cries of good handsell, and the wishes of good lucke that were made vnto him, one was: Happier be thou then Augustus, and better then Traian. Howsoeuer the case stood, it is verie certaine that Plutarke dedicated the collection of his Apothegmes vnto him. But when he had liued a long time at Rome, and was come home againe to his owne house, he fell to writing of this excellent worke of Liues, which he calleth Parallelon, as much to say, as a coupling or matching together, because he matcheth a Grecian with a Romaine, setting downe their liues each after other, and comparing them together, as he found anie likenesse of nature, conditions, or aduentures betwixt them, and examining what the one of them had better or worser, greater or lesser then the other: which things he doth with so goodly and graue discourse euerie where, taken out of the deepest and most hidden secrets of morall and naturall Philosophie, with so sage precepts and fruitfull instructions, with so effectuall commendation of vertue, and detestation of vice, with so manie goodly allegations of other authors, with so manie fit comparisons, and with so manie high inuentions: that the booke may better be called by the name of the Treasurie of all rare and perfect learning, then by anie other name. Also it is said, that Theodorus Gaza, a Grecian of singular learning, and a worthie of the auncient Greece, being asked on a time by his familiar friends (which saw him so earnestly giuen to his studie that he forgot all other things) what author he had leuerest to choose, if he were at that point that he must needes choose some one to hold him to alone, did answer, that he would choose Plutarke: because that if they were all put together, there was no one both so profitable, and so pleasant to reade, as he. Sossius Senecio to whom he dedicateth his worke, was a Senatour of Rome, as witnesseth Dion, who writeth that the three persons whom Traian most loued and honoured, were Sossius, Parma, and Celsus, insomuch that he caused images of them to be set vp. True it is that he wrote the liues of manie other men, which the spitefulnesse of the time hath bereft vs of, among which he himselfe maketh mention of the liues of Scipio Africanus, and Metellus Numidicus. And I haue read a litle Epistle of a sonne of his, whose name is not expressed, copied out of an old copie in the Librarie of S. Marke in Venice, wherein he writeth to a friend of his, a register of all the bookes that his father made: and there among the couples of liues, he setteth downe the liues of Scipio and Epaminondas, and lastly the liues of Augustus Cæsar, of Tiberius, of Caligula, of Claudius, of Nero, of Galba, of Vitellius, and of Otho. But hauing vsed all the diligence that I could in searching the chiefe Libraries of Venice and Rome, I could neuer find them out. Onely I drew out certaine diuersities of readings, and manie corrections, by conferring the old written copies with the printed bookes: which haue stood me in great stead to the vnderstanding of manie hard places: and there are a great number of them which I haue restored by coniecture, by the iudgement and helpe of such men of this age, as are of greatest knowledge in humane learning. Yet for all this, there remaine some places vnamended, howbeit verie few, because some lines were wanting in the originall copies, whereof (to my seeming) it was better for me to witnesse the want by marking it with some starre, then to guesse at it with all aduenture, or to adde anie thing to it. Now finally, if I haue ouershot my selfe in anie thing, as it is verie easie to do in so hard and long a worke, specially to a man of so small abilitie as I am: I beseech the Readers, to vouchsafe for my discharge, to admit the excuse which the Poet Horace giueth me, where he saith:

A man may well be ouerseene
In workes that long and tedious beene.

Specially sith that of so manie good men, and men of skill, as haue heretofore set hand to the translating of it, there was neuer yet anie one found that went through with it in anie language, at least-wise that I haue seene or heard of: and that such as haue enterprised to translate it, specially into Latine, haue euidently witnessed the hardnesse thereof, as they may easily perceiue which list to

conferre

conferre their translations with mine. Neuertheleſſe if it ſo fortune that men find not the ſpeech of this tranſlation ſo flowing, as they haue found ſome other of mine, that are abroad in mens hands: I beſeech the readers to conſider, that the office of a fit tranſlator, conſiſteth not onely in the faithfull expreſsing of his authors meaning, but alſo in a certaine reſembling and ſhadowing out of the forme of his ſtile, and the maner of his ſpeaking: vnleſſe he will commit the error of ſome painters, who hauing taken vpon them to draw a man liuely, do paint him long where he ſhould be ſhort, and groſſe where he ſhould be ſlender, and yet ſet out the reſemblance of his countenance naturally. For how harſh er rude ſoeuer my ſpeech be, yet am I ſure that my tranſlation will be much eaſier to my countrimen, then the Greeke copy is, euen to ſuch as are beſt practiſed in the Greeke tongue, by reaſon of Plutarchs peculiar maner of inditing, which is rather ſharpe, learned, and ſhort, then plaine, poliſhed, and eaſie. At the hardeſt, although I haue not compaſſed my matters ſo happily as ye could haue wiſhed and deſired: yet do I hope that your Lordſhips in reading it will hold the parties good will excuſed, which hath taken ſuch paines in doing of it to profite you. And if my labour be ſo happy, as to content you: God be praiſed for it, which hath giuen me the grace to finiſh it.

THE LIVES OF THE NOBLE GREEKES AND ROMAINES, THE

MOST OF THEM COMPARED TOGETHER

by that graue learned Philoſopher and Hiſtoriographer

PLVTARCH of Chæronea.

Theſeus.

LIKE as the hiſtoriographers which do ſet forth the deſcription of the earth in figure (my friend Soſſius Senecio) are wont to place in the lowermoſt part of their mappes, the farre diſtant regions vnknowne vnto them, and to marke in the margent ſuch like notes and reaſons as theſe: beyond theſe countries are nothing but deepe dry ſands without water, full of fowle ill fauoured venimous beaſts, or much mudde vnnauigable, or SCYTHIA forſaken for cold, or elſe the ſea froſen with Iſe. Euen ſo in this my hiſtorie, I could ſpeake of ſtrange things, and more ancient, and further off from mens memorie. But herein I haue compared the liues of ſome noble men, the one with the other, hauing followed all thoſe times, whereof the monuments remaine yet ſo whole, that men may ſpeake of verie great likelihood, or rather write a verie troth. What hath bene written before, is but of ſtrange faynings, and full of monſtrous fables, imagined and deuiſed by Poets, which are altogether vncertaine, and moſt vntrue. Howbeit hauing heretofore ſet forth the liues of Lycurgus (which eſtabliſhed the lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and of king Numa Pompilius, me thought I might with reaſon alſo aſcend vnto the time of Romulus, ſithens I was come ſo neare vnto his time. Wherefore hauing long debated with my ſelfe what Æſchilus the Poet ſaid:

Soſſius Senecio a Senatour of Rome.

What champion may with ſuch a man compare?
or who (thinke I) ſhall be againſt him ſet?
Who is ſo bold? or who is he that dare defend his force, in ſuch encounter met?

In the end I reſolued, to compare him which did ſet vp the noble and famous citie of ATHENS, vnto him which founded the glorious and inuincible citie of ROME. Wherein I would haue wiſhed, that the fables of her antiquity had bene ſet out ſo in our writings, that we might yet haue graced them with ſome apparance of hiſtoricall narration. But if by chance in ſome places they range a little too boldly out of the bounds or limites of true apparance, and haue no maner of conformity with any credibleneſſe of matter: the readers in curteſie muſt needs hold me excuſed, accepting in good part that which may be written, and reported, of things ſo extreamely old and ancient. Now ſurely me thinkes, that Theſeus in many things was much like vnto Romulus. For being both begotten by ſtealth, and out of lawfull matrimony, they were both bruted to be borne of the ſeede of gods.

Theſeus and Romulus very like.

Both valiant were, as all the world doth know.

Both were very wiſe, and ſtrong beſides of body. The one of them built ROME, and the other the citie of ATHENS, two of the moſt noble cities of the world. The one and the other were rauiſhers of women: and neither the one nor the other could auoide the miſchiefe of quarell and contention with their friends, and to defile themſelues with the bloud of their neareſt kinſemen. Moreouer, they ſay that both the one and the other in the end, did get the hate and ill will of their citizens. At the leaſt if we beleeue thoſe things which are left written, and carry greateſt ſhow of troth, Theſeus of his fathers ſide, was deſcended of the right linage of Erichtheus the great, and of the firſt inhabitants which occupied the countrey of ATTICA, the which ſince were called AVTOCTHONES, as much to ſay, as borne of themſelues. For there is no memory, or other mention made, that they came out of any other countrey then that. And of his mothers ſide he came of Pelops, who was in his time the mightieſt king of all the countrey of PELOPONNESVS, not ſo much for his goods and riches, as for the number of children which he had. For his daughters which were many in number, he beſtowed them on the greateſt Lords of all the countrey: his ſonnes alſo, which likewiſe were many, he diſperſed into euery city and free towne, finding meanes to make them gouernours and heads of the ſame. Pitheus, grandfather to Theſeus on the mother ſide, was one that founded the little city of TROEZEN, and was reputed to be one of the beſt learned and wiſeſt men of his time. But the knowledge and wiſedome, which only caried eſtimation at that time, conſiſted altogether in graue ſentences & morall ſayings. As thoſe are, which wan the Poet Heſiodus ſuch fame for his booke intituled, The workes and daies: in the which is read euen at this preſent, this goodly ſentence, which they father vpon Pitheus:

The linage of Theſeus.

Pelops King of Peloponneſus.

Pitheus, the grandfather of Theſeus. The wiſedome of Pitheus.

Thou ſhalt performe, thy promiſe and thy pay to hired men, and that without delay.

And this doth Ariſtotle the Philoſopher himſelfe teſtifie: and the Poet Euripides alſo, calling Hippolitus the ſcholler of the holy Pitheus, doth ſufficiently declare of what eſtimation he was. But AEgeus deſiring (as they ſay) to know how he might haue children, went vnto the city of DELPHES to the Oracle of Apollo: where, by a Nunne of the temple, this notable propheeie was giuen him for an anſwer. The which did forbid him to touch or know any woman, vntill he was returned againe to ATHENS. And becauſe the words of this prophecy were ſomewhat darke, and hard, he returned by the city of TROEZEN, to tell it vnder Pitheus. The words of the prophecy were theſe:

AEgeus the father of Theſeus.

O thou which art a gemme of perfect grace, plucke not the tappe out of thy truſty tunne:
Before thou do, returne vnto thy place in Athens towne, from whence thy race doth runne.

Pitheus vnderſtanding the meaning, perſwaded him, or rather cunningly by ſome deuice deceiued him, in ſuch ſort, that he made him to lye with his daughter called AEthra. AEgeus, after he had accompanied with her, knowing that ſhe was Pitheus daughter with whom he had lyen, and doubting that he had gotten her with child: left her a ſword and a paire of ſhoes, the which he hid vnder a great hollow ſtone, the hollowneſſe whereof ſerued iuſt to receiue thoſe things which he layd vnder it, and made no liuing creature priuie to it but her alone, ſtraightly charging charging her, that if ſhe happened to haue a ſonne, when he were come to mans eſtate, and of ſtrength to remoue the ſtone, and to take thoſe things from vnder it which he left there: that ſhe ſhould then ſend him vnto him by thoſe tokens, as ſecretly as ſhe could, that no body elſe might know of it. For he did greatly feare the children of one called Pallas, the which lay in waite and ſpiall by all the meanes they could to kill him, onely of deſpight becauſe he had no children, they being fifty brethren, and all begotten of one father. This done, he departed from her. And AEthra within few moneths after was deliuered of a goodly ſonne, the which from that time was called Theſeus: and as ſome ſay, ſo called, becauſe of the tokens of knowledge his father had layed vnder the ſtone. Yet ſome others write, that it was afterwards at ATHENS when his father knew him, and auowed him for his ſonne. But in the meane time, during his infancie and childhood, he was brought vp in the houſe of his grandfather Pitheus, vnder the gouernement and teaching of one called Connidas, his ſchoolemaiſter: in honour of whom the ATHENIANS to this day do ſacrifice a weather, the day before the great feaſt of Theſeus, hauing more reaſon to honour the memory of this gouernour, then of a Silanion and of a Parrhaſius, to whom they do honour alſo, becauſe they painted and caſt moulds of the images of Theſeus. Now there was a cuſtome at that time in GREECE, that the young men after their infancie and growth to mans ſtate, went vnto the city of DELPHES, to offer part of their haires in the temple of Apollo. Theſeus alſo went thither as other did: and ſome ſay that the place where the ceremony of this offering was made, hath euer ſince kept the old name (and yet continueth) Theſeia. Howbeit he did not ſhaue his head but before onely, as Homer ſaith, like the faſhion of the ABANTES in old time: and this manner of ſhauing of haires, was called for his ſake, Theſeida. And as concerning the ABANTES, in troth they were the very firſt that ſhaued themſelues after this faſhion: neuertheleſſe they learned it not of the ARABIANS, as it was thought of ſome, neither did they it after the imitation of the MISSIANS. But becauſe they were warlike and valiant men, which did ioyne neere vnto their enemie in battell, and aboue all men of the world were skilfulleſt in fight hand to hand, and would keepe their ground: as the Poet Archilochus witneſſeth in theſe verſes:

The Pallantides.

Pallas had fifty ſonnes.

VVhy Theſeus was ſo called.

The Abantes.

They vſe no ſlings in foughten fields to haue, nor bended bowes: but ſwords and trenchant blades.
For when fierce Mars beginneth for to raue
in bloudy field: then euery man inuades
His fierceſt foe, and fighteth hand to hand, then do they deedes, right cruell to recompt.
For in this wiſe, the braue and warlike band
do ſhew their force which come from Negrepont.

The cauſe why they were thus ſhauen before, was, for that their enemies ſhould not haue the vauntage to take them by the haires of the head while they were fighting. And for this ſelfe ſame conſideration, Alexander the great commaunded his captaines to cauſe all the MACEDONIANS to ſhaue their beards: becauſe it is the eaſieſt hold (and readieſt for the hand) a man can haue of his enemie in fighting, to hold him faſt by the ſame. But to returne to Theſeus. AEthra his mother had euer vnto that time kept it ſecret from him, who was his true father. And Pitheus alſo had giuen it out abroad, that he was begotten of Neptune, becauſe the TROEZENIANS haue this god in great veneration, and do worſhip him as patron and protectour of their city, making offerings to him of their firſt fruites: and they haue for the marke and ſtampe of their mony, the three piked mace, which is the ſigne of Neptune, called his Trident. But after he was come to the prime and luſtineſſe of his youth, and that with the ſtrength of his body he ſhewed a great courage, ioyned with a naturall wiſdome, and ſtaiedneſſe of wit: then his mother brought him to the place where this great hollow ſtone lay, and telling him truly the order of his birth, and by whom he was begotten, made him to take his fathers tokens of knowledge, which he had hidden there, and gaue him counſell to go by ſea to ATHENS vnto him. Theſeus eaſily lift vp the ſtone, and tooke his fathers tokens from vnder it: Howbeit he aunſwered plainely, that he would not go by ſea, notwithſtanding that it was a great deale the ſafer way, and that his mother and grandfather both had inſtantly intreated him, becauſe the way by land from TROEZEN to ATHENS was very daungerous, all the wayes being beſet by robbers and murderers. For the world at that time brought foorth men, which for ſtrongneſſe in their armes, for ſwiftneſſe of feete, and for a generall ſtrength of the whole body, did farre paſſe the common force of others, and were neuer weary for any labour or trauell they tooke in hand. But for all this, they neuer employed theſe gifts of nature to any honeſt or profitable thing, but rather delighted villanouſly to hurt and wrong others: as if all the fruite and profite of their extraordinary ſtrength had conſiſted in cruelty, and violence onely, and to be able to keepe others vnder and in ſubiection, and to force, deſtroy, and ſpoyle all that came to their hands. Thinking that the more part of thoſe which thinke it a ſhame to do ill, and commend iuſtice, equity, and humanity, do it of faint cowardly hearts, becauſe they dare not wrong others, for feare they ſhould receiue wrong themſelues: and therefore, that they which by might could haue vantage ouer others, had nothing to do with ſuch quiet qualities. Now Hercules, trauelling abroad in the world, draue away many of thoſe wicked theeuiſh murderers, and ſome of them he ſlue and put to death, other as he paſſed through thoſe places where they kept, did hide themſelues for feare of him, and gaue place: in ſo much as Hercules, perceiuing they were well tamed and brought low, made no further reckoning to purſue them any more. But after that by fortune he had ſlaine Iphitus with his owne hands, and that he was paſſed ouer the ſeas into the country of LYDIA, where he ſerued Queene Omphale a long time, condemning himſelfe vnto that voluntary paine, for the murther he had committed. All the Realme of LYDIA during his abode there, remained in great peace and ſecurity from ſuch kind of people. Howbeit in GREECE, and all thereabouts, theſe old miſchiefes began againe to renew, growing hotter and violenter then before: becauſe there was no man that puniſhed them, nor that durſt take vpon him to deſtroy them. By which occaſion, the way to go from PELOPONNESVS to ATHENS by land was very perillous. And therefore Pitheus declaring vnto Theſeus, what manner of theeues there were that lay in the way, and the outrages and villanies they did to all trauellers and wayfaring men, ſought the rather to perſwade him thereby to take his voyage along the ſeas. Howbeit in mine opinion, the fame and glory of Hercules noble deedes, had long before ſecretly ſet his heart on fire, ſo that he made reckoning of none other but of him, and louingly harkened vnto thoſe which would ſeeme to deſcribe him what manner of man he was, but chiefly vnto thoſe which had ſeene him, and bene in his company, when he had ſayd or done any thing worthy of memory. For then he did manifeſtly open himſelfe, and he felt the like paſſion in his heart, which Themiſtocles long time afterwards endured, when he ſayd: that the victory and triumph of Miltiades would not let him ſleepe. For euen ſo, the wonderfull admiration which Theſeus had of Hercules courage, made him in the night that he neuer dreamed but of his noble actes and doings, and in the day time, pricked forwards with emulation and enuie of his glory, he determined with himſelfe one day to do the like, and the rather, becauſe they were neere kinſemen, being coſins remooued by the mothers ſide. For AEthra was the daughter of Pitheus, and Alcmena (the mother of Hercules) was the daughter of Lyſidices, the which was halfe ſiſter to Pitheus, both children of Pelops and of his wife Hippodamia. So he thought he ſhould be vtterly ſhamed and diſgraced, that Hercules trauelling through the world in that ſort, did ſeeke out thoſe wicked theeues to rid both ſea and land of them: and that he, farre otherwiſe, ſhould flye occaſion that might be offered him, to fight with them that he ſhould meete on his way. Moreouer, he was of opinion, he ſhould greatly ſhame and diſhonour him, whom fame and common bruite of people reported to be his father: if in ſhunning occaſion to fight, he ſhould conuey himſelfe by ſea, and ſhould carry to his true father alſo a paire of ſhooes, (to make him knowne of him) and a ſword not yet bathed in bloud. Where he ſhould rather ſeeke cauſe, by manifeſt token of his worthy deedes, to make knowne to the world, of what noble bloud he came, and from whence he was deſcended. With this determination, Theſeus holdeth on his purpoſed iourney, with intent to hurt no man, yet to defend himſelfe, and to be reuenged of thoſe which would take vpon them to aſſault him. The firſt therefore whom he ſlue within the territories of the city of EPIDAVRVM, was a robber called Periphetes. This robber vſed for his ordinarie weapon to carry a clubbe, and for that cauſe he was commonly ſurnamed Corynetes, that is to ſay, a clubbe carier. So he firſt ſtrake at Theſeus to make him ſtand: but Theſeus fought ſo luſtily with him, that he killed him. Whereof he was ſo glad, and chiefly for that he had won his club, that euer after he caried it himſelfe about with him, as Hercules did the Lyons skinne. And like as this ſpoyle of the Lyon did witneſſe the greatneſſe of the beaſt which Hercules had ſlaine: euen ſo Theſeus went all about, ſhewing that this club which he had gotten out of anothers hands, was in his owne hands inuincible.

inuincible. And ſo going on further, in the ſtreights of PELOPONNESVS he killed another, called Sinnis ſurnamed Pityocamtes, that is to ſay, a wreather or bower of pine apple-trees: whom he put to death in that ſelfe cruell manner that Sinnis had ſlaine many other trauellers before. Not that he had experience thereof, by any former practiſe or exerciſe: but onely to ſhew, that cleane ſtrength could do more, then either art or exerciſe. This Sinnis had a goodly faire daughter called Perigouna, which fled away, when ſhe ſaw her father ſlaine: whom he followed and ſought all about. But ſhe had hidden her ſelfe in a groue full of certaine kinds of wild pricking ruſhes called Stæbe, and wild ſparage, which ſhe ſimply like a child intreated to hide her, as if they had heard, and had ſenſe to vnderſtand her: promiſing them with an oath, that if they ſaued her from being found, ſhe would neuer cut them downe, nor burne them. But Theſeus finding her, called her, and ſware by his faith he would vſe her gently, and do her no hurt, nor diſpleaſure at all. Vpon which promiſe ſhe came out of the buſh, and lay with him, by whom ſhe was conceiued of a goodly boy, which was called Menalippus. Afterwards Theſeus maried her vnto one Deioneus, the ſonne of Euritus the Oechalian. Of this Menalippus, the ſonne of Theſeus, came Ioxus: the which with Ornytus brought men into the Countrie of CARIA, where he built the Citie of IOXIDES. And hereof commeth that old auncient ceremony, obſerued yet vnto this day by thoſe of IOXIDES, neuer to burne the briers of wild ſparage, nor the Stæbe, but they haue them in ſome honour and reuerence. Touching the wild ſauage Sowe of Crommyon, otherwiſe ſurnamed Phæa, that is to ſay, ouergrowne with age: ſhe was not a beaſt to be made light account of, but was very fierce, and terrible to kill. Theſeus notwithſtanding taryed for her, and killed her in his iourney, to the end it ſhould not appeare to the world, that all the valiant deedes he did, were done by compulſion, and of neceſſity: adding thereto his opinion alſo, that a valiant man ſhould not onely fight with men, to defend himſelfe from the wicked: but that he ſhould be the firſt, to aſſault and ſlay wild hurtfull beaſtes. Neuertheleſſe others haue written, that this Phæa was a woman robber, a murderer, and naught of her body, which ſpoyled thoſe that paſſed by the place called CROMMYONIA, where ſhe dwelt: and that ſhe was ſurnamed a Sow, for her beaſtly brutiſh behauiour, and wicked life, for the which in the end ſhe was alſo ſlaine by Theſeus. After her he killed Sciron, entring into the territories of MEGARA, becauſe he robbed all trauellers by the way, as the common report goeth: or as others ſay, for that of a cruell, wicked, and ſauage pleaſure, he put foorth his feete to thoſe that paſſed by the ſea ſide, and compelled them to waſh them. And then when they thought to ſtowpe to do it, he ſtill ſpurned them with his feete, till he truſt them headlong into the ſea: ſo Theſeus threw him headlong downe the rockes. Howbeit the writers of MEGARA impugning this common report, & deſirous (as Simonides ſaith) to ouerthrow it that had continued by preſcription of time: did maintaine that this Sciron was neuer any robber, nor wicked perſon, but rather a purſuer and puniſher of the wicked, & a friend and a kinſman of the moſt honeſt, & iuſteſt men of GREECE. For there is no man but will confeſſe, that Æacus was the moſt vertuous man among the GRECIANS in his time, and that Cychreus the SALAMANIAN is honoured and reuerenced as a god at ATHENS: and there is no man alſo but knoweth, that Peleus & Telamon were men of a ſingular vertue. Now it is certaine, that this Sciron was the ſonne in law of Cychreus, father in law of Æacus, and grandfather to Peleus & of Telamon, the which two were the children of Endeida, the daughter of the ſayd Sciron, and of his wife Chariclo. Alſo it is not very likely, that ſo many good men would haue had affinitie with ſo naughtie and wicked a man: in taking of him, and giuing him that, which men loue beſt of all things in the world. And therefore the Hiſtoriographers ſay, that it was not the firſt time, when Theſeus went vnto ATHENS, that he killed Sciron: but that it was many dayes after, when he tooke the city of ELEVSIN, which the MEGARIANS held at that time, where he deceiued the gouernour of the city called Diocles, and there he ſlue Sciron. And theſe be the obiections the MEGARIANS alledged touching this matter. He ſlue alſo Cercyon the ARCADIAN, in the city of ELEVSIN, wreſtling with him. And going a little further, he ſlue Damaſtes, otherwiſe ſurnamed Procruſtes, in the city of HERMIONIA: and that by ſtretching of him out, to make him euen with the length and meaſure of his beds, as he was wont to do vnto ſtrangers that paſſed by. Theſeus did that after the imitation of Hercules, who puniſhed tyrants with the ſelfe ſame paine and torment, which they had made others ſuffer. For euen ſo did Hercules ſacrifice Buſiris. So he ſtifled Antheus in wreſtling. So he put Cycrus to death, fighting with him man to man. So he brake Termerus head, from whom this prouerbe of Termerus euill came, which continueth yet vnto this day: for this Termerus did vse to put them to death in this sort whom he met: to iolle his head against theirs. Thus proceeded Theseus after this selfe manner, punishing the wicked in like sort, iustly compelling them to abide the same paine and torments, which they before had vniustly made others abide. And so he held on his iourney vntill he came to the riuer of CEPHISVS, where certaine persons of the house of the Phytalides were the first which went to meete him, to honour him, and at his request they purified him according to the ceremonies vsed at that time: and afterwards hauing made a sacrifice of propitiation vnto their gods, they made him great cheare in their houses: and this was the first notable entertainement he found in all his iourney. It is supposed he arriued in the city of ATHENS, the eight day of the moneth of Iune, which then they called Cronius. He found the common-wealth turmoiled with seditions, factions, and diuisions, and particularly the house of AEgeus in very ill tearmes also, because that Medea (being banished out of the City of CORINTH) was come to dwell in ATHENS, and remained with AEgeus, whom she had promised by vertue of certaine medicines to make him to get children. But when she heard tell that Theseus was come, before that the good king AEgeus (who was now become old, suspitious, and affraid of sedition, by reason of the great factions within the city at that time) knew what he was, she perswaded him to poyson him at a feast which they would make him as a stranger that passed by. Theseus failed not to go to this prepared feast whereunto he was bidden, but yet thought it not good to disclose himselfe. And the rather to giue AEgeus occasion and meane to know him: when they brought the meate to the boord, he drew out his sword, as though he wold haue cut withall, & shewed it vnto him. AEgeus seeing it, knew it straight, & forthwith ouerthrew the cup with poyson which was prepared for him: & after he had enquired of him, and asked things, he embraced him as his son. Afterwards in the common assembly of the inhabitants of the city, he declared, how he auowed him for his son. Then all the people receiued him with exceeding ioy, for the renowne of his valiantnesse and manhood. And some say, that when AEgeus ouerthrew the cup, the poyson which was in it, fell in that place, where there is at this present a certaine compasse inclosed all about within the temple, which is called Delphinium. For euen there in that place, in the old time, stood the house of AEgeus: in witnes wherof, they cal yet at this present time the image of Mercury (which is on the side of the temple looking towards the rising of the sunne) the Mercury gate of AEgeus. But the PALLANTIDES, which before stood alwayes in hope to recouer the Realme of ATHENS, at the least after AEgeus death, becausse he had no children: when they saw that Theseus was knowne, & openly declared for his son and heire, & successor to the Realme, they were not able any longer to beare it, seeing that not only AEgeus (who was but the adopted sonne of Pandion, and nothing at all of the bloud royall of the Erictheides) had vsurped the kingdom ouer thē, but that Theseus also should enioy it after his death. Whereupon they determined to make warre with them both, & deuiding themselues into two parts, the one came openly in armes with their father, marching directly towards the city: the other lay close in ambush in the village GARGETTVS, meaning to giue charge vpon them in two places at one instant. Now they brought with them an Herauld borne in the towne of AGNVS, called Leos, who bewrayed vnto Theseus the secret & deuice of all their enterprise. Theseus vpon this intelligence went forth, & did set on those that lay in ambush, & put them all to the sword. The other which were in Pallas company vnderstanding thereof, did breake and disperse themselues incontinently. And this is the cause (as some say, why those of Pallena do neuer make affinity nor mariage with those of AGNVS at this day. And that in their towne when any proclamation is made, they neuer speake these words which are cried euery where else through out the whole countrey of ATTICA, Acouete Leos, (which is as much to say, as Harken, ô people) they do so extreamely hate this word Leos, for that it was the Heraulds name which wrought them that treason. This done, Theseus who would not liue idly at home and do nothing, but desirous therewithall to gratifie the people, went his way to fight with the bull of Marathon, the which did great mischiefes to the inhabitants of the countrey of TETRAPOLIS. And hauing taken him aliue, brought him through the city of ATHENS to be seene of all the inhabitants. Afterwards he did sacrifice him vnto Apollo Delphias. Now concerning Hecale, who was reported to haue lodged him, and to haue giuen him good entertainement, it is not altogether vntrue. For in the old time, those townes and villages thereabouts did assemble together, and made a common sacrifice which they called Hecalesion, in the honour of Iupiter Hecalian, where they honoured this old woman, calling her by a diminutiue name, Hecalena:

Hecalena: becauſe that when ſhe receiued Theſeus into her houſe, being then but very yong, ſhe made much of him, and called him by many pretie made names, as old folkes are wont to call yong children. And foraſmuch as ſhe had made a vow to Iupiter to make him a ſolemne ſacrifice, if Theſeus returned ſafe from the enterpriſe he went about, and that ſhe died before his returne: in recompence of the good cheare ſhe had made him, ſhe had that honor done vnto her by Theſeus commandement, as Philochorus hath written of it. Shortly after this exploite, there came certaine of King Minos ambaſſadours out of CRETA, to aske attribute, being now the third time it was demaunded, which the ATHENIANS payed for this cauſe. Androgeus, the eldeſt ſonne of King Minos, was ſlaine by treaſon within the countrey of ATTICA: for which cauſe Minos purſuing the reuenge of his death, made very hote and ſharpe warres vpon the ATHENIANS, and did them great hurt. But beſides all this, the goddes did ſharpely puniſh and ſcourge all the country, aſwell with barrenneſſe and famine, as alſo with plague & other miſchiefes, euen to the drying vp of their riuers. The ATHENIANS perceiuing theſe ſore troubles and plagues, ranne to the oracle of Apollo, who anſwered them that they ſhould appeaſe Minos, and when they had made their peace with him, that then the wrath of the goddes would ceaſe againſt them, and their troubles ſhould haue an end. Whereupon the ATHENIANS ſent immediatly vnto him, and intreated him for peace: which he graunted them, with condition that they ſhould be bound to ſend him yearely into CRETA, ſeuen yong boyes, and as many yong girles. Now thus farre, all the Hiſtoriographers do very well agree: but in the reſt not. And they which ſeeme furtheſt off frō the troth, do declare, that when theſe yong boyes were deliuered in CRETA, they cauſed them to be deuoured by the Minotaure within the Labyrinth: or elſe that they were ſhut within this Labyrinth, wandring vp and downe, and could find no place to get out, vntill ſuch time as they died, euen famiſhed for hunger. And this Minotaure, as Euripides the Poet ſayth, was

A corps combin'd, which monſtrous might be deem'd:

But Philochorus writeth, that the CRETANS do not confeſſe that, but ſay that this Labyrinth was a gaile or priſon, in the which they had no other hurt, ſauing that they which were kept there vnder lock and key, could not flie nor ſtart away: and that Minos had in the memorie of his ſonne Androgeus, inſtituted games and playes of priſe, where he gaue vnto them that wan the victorie, thoſe yong children of ATHENS, the which in the meane time notwithſtanding were carefully kept and looked vnto in the priſon of the Labyrinth: and that at the firſt games that were kept, one of the Kings captaines called Taurus, who was in beſt credite with his maiſter, wanne the priſe. This Taurus was a churliſh, and naughtie natured man of condition, and very hard and cruell to theſe children of ATHENS. And to verifie the ſame, the Philoſopher Ariſtotle himſelf, ſpeaking of the common wealth of the BOTTIEIANS, declareth very well, that he neuer thought that Minos did at any time cauſe the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but ſayth, that they poorely toyled in CRETA, euen to crooked age, earning their liuing by true and paineful ſeruice. For it is written, that the CRETANS (to ſatisfie an old vow of theirs which they had made of ancient time) ſent ſometime the firſt borne of their children vnto Apollo in the citie of DELPHES: and that amongeſt them they alſo mingled thoſe which were deſcended of the ancient priſoners of ATHENS, and they went with them. But becauſe they could not liue there, they directed their iourney firſt into ITALIE, where for a time they remained in the realme of PVGLIA, and afterwards from thence went into the confines of THRACIA, where they had this name of BOTTIANS. In memorie wherof, the daughters of the BOTTIEIANS in a ſolemne ſacrifice they make, do vſe to ſing the foote of this ſong: Let vs to ATHENS go. But therby we may ſee how perillous a thing it is, to fall in diſpleaſure and enmity with a citie, which can ſpeake well, & where learning & eloquence doth floriſh. For euer ſince that time, Minos was alwaies blaſed & diſgraced throghout all the Theaters of ATHENS. The teſtimonie of Heſiodus, who calleth him the moſt worthy King, doth nothing helpe him at all, nor the praiſe of Homer, who nameth him Iupiters familiar friend: becauſe the tragical Poets got the vpper hand in diſgracing him, notwithſtāding all theſe. And vpon their ſtages where all the Tragedies were plaid, they ſtill gaue forth many ill fauoured words, & foule ſpeeches of him: as againſt a mā that had bin moſt cruel & vnnatural. Yet moſt mē think, that Minos was the King which eſtabliſhed the laws: & Radamanthus the iudge & preſeruer of them, who cauſed the ſame alſo to be kept and obſerued. The time now being come about for paiment of the third tribute, when they came to compell the fathers which had children not yet

maried, to giue them to be put forth to take their chance and lot: the citizens of ATHENS began to murmur against AEgeus, alledging for their grieues, that he who onely was the cause of all this euill, was only alone exempted from this griefe. And that to bring the gouernement of the Realme, to fall into the hands of a stranger his bastard, he cared not though they were bereft of all their naturall children, and were vnnaturally compelled to leaue and forsake them. These iust sorrowes and complaints of the fathers, whose children were taken from them, did pierce the heart of Theseus, who willing to yeeld to reason, and to runne the selfe same fortune as the citizens did: willingly offered himselfe to be sent thither, without regard taking to his happe or aduenture. For which, the citizens greatly esteemed of his courage and honourable disposition, and dearly loued him for the good affection he seemed to beare vnto the communalty. But AEgeus hauing vsed many reasons and perswasions to cause him to turne, and stay from his purpose, and perceiuing in the end there was no remedie but he would go: he then drew lots for the children which should go with him. Hellanicus notwithstanding doth write, that they were not those of the citie which drew lots for the children they should send, but that Minos himselfe went thither in person and did chuse them, as he chose Theseus the first, vpon conditions agreed betweene them: that is to wit, that the ATHENIANS should furnish them with a ship, and that the children should shippe and imbarke with him, carying no weapons of warre: and that after the death of the Minotaure, this tribute should cease. Now before that time, there was neuer any hope of returne, nor of safety of their children, therefore the ATHENIANS alwayes sent a ship to conuey their children with a blacke saile, in token of assured losse. Neuertheless Theseus putting his father in good hope of him, being of a good courage, and promising boldly that he would set vpon this Minotaure: AEgeus gaue vnto the maister of the ship a white saile, commanding him that at his returne he should put out the white saile if his sonne had escaped, if not, that then he should set vp the blacke saile, to shew him a farre off his vnluckie and vnfortunate chaunce. Simonides notwithstanding doth say, that this saile which AEgeus gaue to the maister, was not white, but red, died in graine, and of the colour of Scarlet: and that he gaue it him to signifie a farre off, their deliuery and safety. This maister was called Phereclus Amarsiadas, as Simonides sayth. But Philocorus writeth, that Sirus the SALAMANIAN gaue to Theseus a maister called Nausitheus, and another marriner to tackle the sayles, who was called Phæas: because the ATHENIANS at that time were not greatly practised to the sea. And this did Scirus, for that one of the children on whom the lot fell was his nephew: and thus much the chappels do testifie, which Theseus built afterwards in honour of Nausitheus, and of Phæas, in the village of Phalerus, ioyning to the temple of Scirus. And it is said moreouer, that the feast which they call Cybernesia, that is to say, the feast of Patrons of the shippes, is celebrated in honour of them. Now after the lots were drawne, Theseus taking with him the children allotted for the tribute, went from the pallace to the temple called Delphinion, to offer vp to Apollo for him and for them, an offering of supplication which they call Hiceteria: which was an oliue bough hallowed, wreathed about with white wolle. After he had made his prayer, he went downe to the sea side to imbarke, the sixt day of the moneth of March: on which day at this present time they do send their young girles to the same temple of Delphinion, there to make their prayers and petitions to the goddes. But some say, that the oracle of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES had answered him, that he should take Venus for his guide, and that he should call vppon her to conduct him in his voyage: for which cause he did sacrifice a goate vnto her vpon the sea side, which was found suddenly turned into a ramme, and that therefore they surnamed this goddesse Epitragia, as one would say, the goddesse of the ramme. Furthermore, after he was arriued in CRETA, he slue there the Minotaure (as the most part of auncient authours do write) by the meanes and helpe of Ariadne: who being fallen in fansie with him, did giue him a clue of threed, by the helpe whereof she taught him, how he might easily wind out of the turnings and crancks of the Labyrinth. And they say, that hauing killed this Minotaure, he returned backe againe the same way he went, bringing with him those other young children of ATHENS, whom with Ariadne also he carried afterwards away. Pherecides sayth moreouer, that he brake the keeles or bottomes of all the shippes of CRETA, because they should not sodainely set out after them. And Demon writeth, that Taurus (the captaine of Minos) was killed in a fight by Theseus, euen in the very hauen mouth as they were ready to shippe away, and hoise vp saile. Yet Philochorus reporteth, that king Minos hauing set vp the games, as he was wont to doe yearely yearely in the honour and memorie of his ſonne, euery one began to enuy captaine Taurus, becauſe they euer looked that he ſhould carrie away the game and victorie, as he had done other yeares before: ouer and aboue that, his authoritie got him much ill will and enuy, becauſe he was proud and ſtately, and had in ſuſpition that he was great with Queene Paſiphaë. Wherfore when Theſeus required he might encounter with Taurus, Minos eaſily granted it. And being a ſolemne cuſtome in CRETA, that the women ſhould be preſent, to ſee theſe open ſports and fights, Ariadne being at theſe games amongſt the reſt, fell further in loue with Theſeus, ſeeing him ſo goodly a perſon, ſo ſtrong, and inuincible in wreſtling, that he farre exceeded all that wreſtled there that day. King Minos was ſo glad that he had taken away the honor from captaine Taurus, that he ſent him home franke & free into his country, rendring to him al the other priſoners of ATHENS: and for his ſake, clearely releaſed and forgaue the citie of ATHENS the tribute, which they ſhould haue payed him yearely. Howbeit Clidemus ſearching out the beginning of theſe things to the vtmoſt, reciteth them very particularly, and after another ſort. For he ſayth, about that time there was a generall reſtaint throughout all GREECE, reſtraining all manner of people to beare ſayle in any veſſell or bottome, wherein there were aboue fiue perſons, except onely Iaſon, who was choſen captaine of the great ſhippe Argus, and had commiſſion to ſayle euery where, to chaſe and driue away rouers and pyrates, and to ſcoure the ſeas throughout. About this time, Dædalus being fled from CRETA to ATHENS in a little Barke, Minos contrarie to this reſtraint, would needes follow him with a fleete of diuerſe veſſelles with owers, who being by force of weather driuen with the coaſt of SICILE, fortuned to die there. Afterwardes his ſonne Deucalion, being maruellouſly offended with the ATHENIANS, ſent to ſummon them to deliuer Dædalus vnto him, or elſe he would put the children to death, which were deliuered to his father for hoſtages. But Theſeus excuſed himſelfe, and ſayd he could not forſake Dædalus, conſidering he was his neare kinſeman, being his couſin-germaine, for he was the ſonne of Meropę, the daughter of Erichtheus. Howbeit by and by he cauſed many veſſelles ſecretly to be made, part of them within ATTICA ſelfe in the village of Thymetades, farre from any high wayes: and part of them in the citie of TROEZEN, by the ſufferance of Pitheus his grandfather, to the end his purpoſe ſhould be kept the ſecretlier. Afterwardes when all his ſhippes were readie, and rigged out, he tooke ſea before the CRETANS had any knowledge of it: in ſo much as when they ſaw them a farre off, they did take them for the barkes of their friendes. Theſeus landed without reſiſtance, and tooke the hauen. Then hauing Dædalus, and other baniſhed CRETANS for guides, he entred the city ſelfe of GNOSVS, where he ſlue Deucalion in a fight before the gates of the Labyrinth, with all his guard and officers about him. By this meanes the kingdome of CRETA fell by inheritance into the hands of his ſiſter Ariadne. Theſeus made league with her, and carried away the young children of ATHENS which were kept as hoſtages, and concluded peace and amitie betweene the ATHENIANS and the CRETANS: who promiſed, and ſware, they would neuer make warres againſt them. They report many other things alſo touching this matter, and ſpecially of Ariadne: but there is no troth nor certaintie in it. For ſome ſay, that Ariadne hung her ſelfe for ſorrow, when ſhe ſaw that Theſeus had caſt her off. Other write, that ſhe was tranſported by mariners into the Ile of NAXOS, where ſhe was married vnto OEnarus, the prieſt of Bacchus: and they thinke that Theſeus left her, becauſe he was in loue with another, as by theſe verſes ſhould appeare:

Hereas the MEGARIAN ſayth, that theſe two verſes in olde time were among the verſes of the Poet Heſiodus, howbeit Piſiſtratus tooke them away: as he did in like manner adde theſe other heere in the deſcription of the helles in Homer, to gratifie the ATHENIANS.

Other hold opinion, that Ariadne had two children by Theſeus: the one of them was named OEnopion, and the other Staphylus. Thus amongſt others the Poet Ion writeth it, who was borne in the Ile of CHIO, and speaking of this city, he sayth thus:

O Enopion which was the sonne of worthy Theseus, did cause men build this stately towne, which now triumpheth thus.

Now what things are found seemely in Poets fables, there is none but doth in manner sing them. But one Paenon borne in the city of AMATHVNTA, reciteth this cleane after another sort, and contrary to all other: saying, that Theseus by tempest was driuen with the Ile of CYPRVS, hauing with him Ariadne, which was great with child, and so sore sea sicke, that she was not able to abide it. In so much as he was forced to put her a land, and himselfe afterwards returning abourd hoping to saue his ship against the storme, was forthwith compelled to loose into the sea. The women of the country did curteously receiue and intreate Ariadne: and to cõfort her againe (for she was maruellously out of hart, to see she was thus forsaken) they counterfeited letters, as if Theseus had written them to her. And when her groning time was come, and she to be layed, they did their best by all possible meanes to saue her: but she died notwithstanding in labour, & could neuer be deliuered. So she was honorably buried by the Ladies of CYPRVS. Theseus not long after returned thither againe, who tooke her death maruellous heauily, and left money with the inhabitants of the country, to sacrifice vnto her yearly: and for memory of her, he caused two little Images to be molten, the one of copper, & the other of siluer, which he dedicated vnto her. This sacrifice is done the second day of Septẽber, on which they do yet obserue this ceremony: they do lay a young child vpon a bed, which pitifully crieth and lamenteth, as women trauelling with child. They say also, that the AMATHVSIANS do yet call the groue where her Tombe is set vp, the wood of Venus Ariadne. And yet there are of the NAXIANS, that report this otherwise: saying, there were two Minoes, and two Ariadnees, whereof the one was maried to Bacchus in the Ile of NAXOS, of whom Staphylus was borne: and the other the yongest, was rauished and caried away by Theseus, who afterwards forsooke her, & she came into the Ile of NAXOS with her nurce, called Corcyna, whose graue they do shew yet to this day. The second Ariadne died there also, but she had no such honour done to her after her death, as to the first was giuen. For they celebrate the feast of the first with all ioy and mirth: where the sacrifices done in memory of the second, be mingled with mourning and sorrow. Theseus then departing from the Ile of CRETA, arriued in the Ile of DELOS, where he did sacrifice in the temple of Apollo, and gaue there a litle Image of Venus, the which he had gotten of Ariadne. Then with the other young boyes that he had deliuered, he danced a kind of daunce, which the DELIANS keepe to this day, as they say: in which there are many turnes and returnes, much after the turnings of the Labyrinth. And the DELIANS call this manner of daunce, the crane, as Dicaarcus sayth. And Theseus daunced it first about the altar, which is called Ceraton, that is to say, horne-staffe: because it is made and builded of hornes only, all on the left hand well and curiously set together without any other binding. It is sayd also, that he made a game in this Ile of DELOS, in which at the first was giuen to him that ouercame, a braunch of palme for reward of victorie. But when they drew neare the coast of ATTICA, they were so ioyfull, he and his maister, that they forgate to set vp their white saile, by which they should haue giuen knowledge of their health and safety vnto AEgeus. Who seeing the blacke saile a farre off, being out of all hope euer more to see his sonne againe, tooke such a griefe at his heart, that he threw himselfe headlong from the toppe of a clyffe, and killed himselfe. So soone as Theseus was arriued at the port named Phalerus, he performed the sacrifices which he had vowed to the gods at his departure: and sent an Herauld of his before vnto the citie, to carry newes of his safe arriuall. The Herauld found many of the city mourning the death of King AEgeus. Many other receiued him with great ioy, as may be supposed. They wold haue crowned him also with a garland of flowers, for that he had brought so good tidings, that the children of the city were returned in safety. The Herauld was content to take the garland, yet would he not in any wise put it on his head, but did wind it about his Heraulds rod he bare in his hand, and so returneth forthwith to the sea, where Theseus made his sacrifices. Who perceiuing they were not yet done, did refuse to enter into the temple, and stayed without for troubling of the sacrifices. Afterwards all ceremonies finished, he went in and told him the newes of his fathers death. Then he and his company mourning for sorrow, hasted with speed towards the city. And this is the cause, why to this day, at the feast called Oscophoria (as who would say the feast of boughes) the Herauld hath not his head but his rod only crowned with flowers, and why the assistants also after the sacrifice done, do make such cries and exclamations: Ele, leuf, iou, iou, iou: whereof the first, is the cry and voyce they commonly vse one to another to make haste, or else it is the foote of some song of triumph: and the other is the cry and voyce of men as it were in feare and trouble. After he had ended the obsequies and funerals for his father, he performed also his sacrifices vnto Apollo, which he had vowed the seuenth day of the moneth of October, on which they arriued at their returne into the city of ATHENS. Euen so the custome which they vse at this day to seeth all manner of pulse, commeth of this: that those which then returned with Theseus, did seeth in a great brasse pot all the remaine of their prouision, and therewith made good cheere together. Euen in such sort as this, came vp the custome to carry a branch of oliue, wreathed about with wooll, which they call Iresione: because at that time they caried boughes of supplication, as we haue told ye before. About which they hang all sorts of fruites: for then barrennesse did ceasse, as the verses they sang afterwards did witnesse.

Howbeit there are some which will say, that these verses were made for the Heraclides, that is to say, those that descended from Hercules: which flying for their safety and succour vnto the ATHENIANS, were entertained and much made of by them for a time. But the most part hold opinion, they were made vpon the occasion aforesayd. The vessell in which Theseus went and returned, was a galliot of thirty owers, which the ATHENIANS kept vntill the time of Demetrius the Phalerian, alwayes taking away the old peeces of wood that were rotten, and euer renewing them with new in their places. So that euer since, in the disputations of the Philosophers, touching things that increase, to wit, whether they remaine alwaies one, or else they be made others: this galliot was alwayes brought in for example of doubt. For some maintained, that it was still one vessell: others to the contrary defended it was not so. And they hold opinion also, that the feast of boughes which is celebrated at ATHENS at this time, was then first of all instituted by Theseus. It is sayd moreouer, that he did not carry all the wenches vpon whom the lots did fall, but chose two faire young boyes, whose faces were sweete and delicate as maidens be, that otherwise were hardie, and quicke spirited. But he made them so oft bathe themselues in hote bathes, and keepe them in from the heate of the Sunne, and so many times to wash, annoint, and rub themselues with oyles, which serue to supple and smooth their skins, to keepe fresh and faire their colour, to make yellow and bright their haires: and withall did teach them so to counterfeit the speech, countenance and fashion of young maides, that they seemed to be like them, rather then yong boyes. For there was no maner of difference to be perceiued outwardly, and he mingled them with the girles, without the knowledge of any man. Afterwards when he was returned, he made a procession, in which both he and the other young boyes were apparelled then, as they be now, which carry boughes on the day of the feast in their hands. They carry them in the honour of Bacchus and Ariadne, following the fable that is told of them: or rather because they returned home iust at the time and season, when they gather the fruit of those trees. There are women which they call Deipnophores, that is to say, supper cariers, which are assistants to the sacrifice done that day, in representing the mothers of those, vpon whom the lots did fall, because they in like sort brought them both meate and drinke. There they tell tales, for so did their mothers tattle to their children, to comfort and encourage them. All these particularities were written by Demon the historiographer. There was moreouer a place chosen out, to build him a temple in: and he himselfe ordained, that those houses which had payed tribute before vnto the king of CRETA, should now yearely thenceforth become contributories towards the charges of a solemne sacrifice, which should be done in the honor of him: and he did assigne the order and administration of the same, vnto the house of the Phytalides, in recompence of the curtesie which they shewed him when he arriued. Furthermore, after the death of his father AEgeus, he vndertooke a maruellous great enterprise. For he brought all the inhabitants of the whole prouince of ATTICA, to be within the citie of ATHENS, and made them all one corporation, which were before dispersed into diuerse villages, and by reason thereof were very hard to be assembled together, when occasion was offered to establish any order concerning the common state. Many times also they were at variance together, and by the eares, making warres one vpon another. But Theseus tooke the paines to go from village to village, and from familie to familie, to let them vnderſtand the reaſons why they ſhould conſent vnto it. So he found the poore people and priuate men, readie to obey and follow his will, but the rich, and ſuch as had authoritie in euery village, all againſt it. Neuertheleſſe he wanne them, promiſing that it ſhould be a common wealth, and not ſubiect to the power of any ſole prince, but rather a popular ſtate. In which he would onely reſerue to himſelfe the charge of the warres, and the preſeruation of the lawes: for the reſt, he was content that euery citizen in all and for all ſhould beare a like ſway and authoritie. So there were ſome that willingly graunted thereto. Other who had no liking thereof, yeelded notwithſtanding for feare of his diſpleaſure and power which then was very great. So they thought it better to conſent with good will, vnto that he required: then to tarry his forcible compulſion. Then he cauſed all the places where iuſtice was miniſtred, and all their halles of aſſembly to be ouerthrowne and pulled downe. He remoued ſtraight all iudges and officers, and built a towne houſe, and a counſaile hall, in the place where the citie now ſtandeth, which the ATHENIANS call ASTY, but he called the whole corporation of them, ATHENS. Afterwards he inſtituted the great feaſt and common ſacrifice for all of the countrey of ATTICA, which they call Panathenæa. Then he ordained another feaſt alſo vpon the ſixteenth day of the moneth of Iune, for all ſtrangers which ſhould come to dwell in ATHENS, which was called Metœcia, and is kept euen to this day. That done, he gaue ouer his regall power according to his promiſe, and began to ſet vp an eſtate or pollicie of a common wealth, beginning firſt with the ſeruice of the gods. To know the good ſucceſſe of his enterpriſe, he ſent at the verie beginning to the oracle of Apollo in DELPHES, to enquire of the fortune of this citie: frō whence this anſwer was brought vnto him.

Therefore ſhew thou, a valiant conſtant mind,
And let no care, nor carke thy heart diſpleaſe.
For like vnto a bladder blowne with wind
Thou ſhalt be toſt, vpon the ſurging ſeas.
Yet let no dint, of dolours thee diſeaſe.
For why? thou ſhalt, nor periſh nor decay,
Nor be orecome, nor yet be caſt away.

It is found written alſo, that Sibylla afterwardes gaue out ſuch a like oracle ouer the citie of ATHENS.

The bladder blowne may fleete vpon the fludde,
But cannot ſinke, nor ſticke in filthie mudde.

Moreouer, becauſe he would further yet augment his people, and enlarge his citie, he entiſed many to come and dwell there, by offering them the ſelfe ſame freedome and priuiledges, which the naturall borne citizens had. So that many iudge, that theſe words which are in vſe at this day in ATHENS, when any open proclamation is made, All people, Come ye hither: be the ſelfe ſame which Theſeus then cauſed to be proclaimed, when he in that ſort did gather a people together of all nations. Yet for all that, he ſuffered not the great multitude that came thither tagge and ragge, to be without diſtinction of degrees and orders. For he firſt deuided the Noblemen, from husbandmen and artificers, appointing the Noblemen as Iudges and Magiſtrates to iudge vpon matters of Religion, and touching the ſeruice of the gods: and of them alſo he did chuſe rulers, to beare ciuill office in the common-weale, to determine the law, and to tell all holy and diuine things. By this meanes he made the Noblemen and the two other eſtates equall in voyce. And as the Noblemen did paſſe the other in honour: euen ſo the artificers exceeded them in number, and the husbandmen them in profit. Now that Theſeus was the firſt who of all others yeelded to haue a common-weale or popular eſtate (as Ariſtotle ſaith) and did giue ouer his regall power: Homer ſelfe ſeemeth to teſtifie it, in numbring the ſhips which were in the GRÆCIANS army before the citie of TROIA. For amongeſt all the GRÆCIANS, he onely calleth the ATHENIANS people. Moreouer Theſeus coyned money, which he marked with the ſtampe of

of an oxe, in memory of the Bull of Marathon, or of Taurus, the captaine of Minos, or elſe to prouoke his citizens to giue themſelues to labour. They ſay alſo that of this money they were ſince called Hecatombœon, and Decabœon, which ſignifieth worth a hundred oxen, and worth ten oxen. Furthermore hauing ioyned all the territorie of the city of MEGARA, vnto the countrey of ATTICA, he cauſed that notable foure ſquare pillar to be ſet vp for their confines within the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, and engraued thereupon this ſuperſcription, that declareth the ſeparation of both the countries which confine there together. The ſuperſcription is this:

Hecatombœon, Decabœon.

Where Titan doth begin, his beames for to diſplay, euen that way ſtands Ionia, in fertile wiſe alway:
And where againe he goeth, adowne to take his reſt,
there ſtands Peloponneſus land, for there I compt it weſt.

It was he alſo which made the games called Iſthmia, after the imitation of Hercules, to the end that as the GRECIANS did celebrate the feaſt of games called Olympia, in the honour of Iupiter, by Hercules ordinance: ſo, that they ſhould alſo celebrate the games called Iſthmia, by his order and inſtitution, in the honor of Neptune. For thoſe that were done in the ſtraights in the honour of Melicerta, were done in the night, and had rather forme of ſacrifice or of a myſterie, then of games and open feaſt. Yet ſome will ſay, that theſe games of Iſthmia were inſtituted in the honor and memory of Sciron, and that Theſeus ordained them in ſatisfaction of his death: becauſe he was his coſin germaine, being the ſonne of Canethus, and of Heniocha the daughter of Pitheus. Other ſay that it was Sinnis and not Sciron, and that for him Theſeus made theſe games, and not for the memory of the other. Howſoeuer it was, he eſpecially willed the CORINTHIANS, that they ſhould giue vnto thoſe that came from ATHENS to ſee their games of Iſthmia, ſo much place to ſit downe before them (in the moſt honorable part of the feaſt place) as the ſaile of their ſhippe ſhould couer, in the which they came from ATHENS: thus do Hellanicus and Andron Halicarnaſſeus write hereof. Touching the voyage he made by the ſea Maior, Philochorus, and ſome other hold opinion, that he went thither with Hercules againſt the AMAZONES: and that to honour his valiantneſſe, Hercules gaue him Antiopa the AMAZONE. But the more part of the other Hiſtoriographers, namely Hellanicus, Pherecides, & Herodotus, do write, that Theſeus went thither alone, after Hercules voyage, & that he tooke this AMAZONE priſoner, which is likelieſt to be true. For we do not find that any other who went this iourney with him, had taken any AMAZONE priſoner beſides himſelf. Bion alſo the Hiſtoriographer, this notwithſtanding ſaith, that he brought her away by deceit and ſtealth. For the AMAZONES (ſaith he) naturally louing men, did not flie at all when they ſaw them land in their countrey, but ſent them preſents, and that Theſeus entiſed her to come into his ſhip, who brought him a preſent: and ſo ſoone as ſhe was aboord, he hoyſed his ſaile, and ſo caried her away. Another Hiſtoriographer Menecrates, who wrote the hiſtory of the city of NICEA, in the country of BYTHINIA, ſaith: that Theſeus hauing this AMAZONE Antiopa with him, remained a certaine time vpon thoſe coaſts, & that amongſt other he had in his company three yonger brethren of ATHENS, Euneus, Thoas, & Solois. This laſt, Solois, was maruellouſly in loue with Antiopa, and neuer bewrayed it to any of his other companions, ſauing vnto one with whom he was moſt familiar, and whom he truſted beſt: ſo that he reported this matter vnto Antiopa. But ſhe vtterly reiected his ſute, though otherwiſe ſhe handled it wiſely and curteouſly, and did not complaine to Theſeus of him. Howbeit the yong man deſpairing to enioy his loue, tooke it ſo inwardly, that deſperatly he leapt into the riuer, and drowned himſelfe. Which when Theſeus vnderſtood, and the cauſe alſo that brought him to this deſperation and end, he was very ſory, and angry alſo. Whereupon he remembred a certaine Oracle of Pythia, by whom he was commanded to build a city in that place in a ſtraunge countrey, where he ſhould be moſt ſory, and that he ſhould leaue ſome that were about him at that time, to gouerne the ſame. For this cauſe therefore he built a city in that place, which he named PYTHOPOLIS, becauſe he had built it onely by the commaundement of the Nunne Pythia. He called the riuer in the which the young man was drowned, Solois, in memorie of him: and left his two brethren for his deputies and as gouernours of this new city, with another gentleman of ATHENS, called Hermus. Hereof it commeth, that at this day the PYTHOPOLITANS call a certaine place of their city, Hermus houſe. But they faile in the accent, by putting it vpon the laſt ſyllable: for in pronouncing it ſo, Hermus ſignifieth Mercury. By this meanes they do transferre the honour

The cause of the warres of the Amazones against the Athenians.

due to the memorie of Hermus, vnto the god Mercurie. Now heare what was the occasion of the warres of the AMAZONES, which me thinkes was not a matter of small moment, nor an enterprise of a woman. For they had not placed their campe within the very city of ATHENS, nor had not fought in the very place it selfe (called PNYCE) adioyning to the temple of the Muses, if they had not first conquered or subdued all the country thereabouts: neither had they all come at the first, so valiantly to assaile the city of ATHENS. Now, whether they came by land from so farre a country, or that they passed ouer an arme of the sea, which is called Bosphorus Cimmericus, being frosen as Hellanicus saith: it is hardly to be credited. But that they camped within the precinct of the very city it selfe, the names of the places which continue yet to this present day do witnesse it, and the graues also of the women which died there. But so it is, that both armies lay a great time one in the face of the other, ere they came to battell. Howbeit at the length Theseus hauing first made sacrifice vnto Feare the goddesse, according to the counsell of a prophecy he had receiued, he gaue them battel in the moneth of August, on the same day, in the which the ATHENIANS do euen at this present solemnise the feast, which they call Boedromia. But Clidemus the Historiographer, desirous particularly to write all the circumstances of this encounter, saith that the left point of their battell bent towards the place which they call AMAZONION: and that the right point marched by the side of CHRYSA, euen to the place which is called PNYCE, vpon which, the ATHENIANS comming towards the temple of the Muses, did first giue their charge. And for proofe that this is true, the graues of the women which died in the first encounter, are found yet in the great streete, which goeth towards the gate Piraica, neere vnto the chappell of the litle god Chalcodus. And the ATHENIANS (saith he) were in this place repulsed by the AMAZONES, euen to the place where the images of Eumenides are, that is to say of the furies. But on the other side also, the ATHENIANS comming towards the quarters of Palladium, Ardettus, and Lucium, draue backe their right point euen to within their campe, and slue a great number of them. Afterwards, at the end of foure moneths, peace was taken betweene them by meanes of one of the women called Hyppolita. For this Historiographer calleth the AMAZONE which Theseus maried, Hyppolita, and not Antiopa. Neuertheless, some say that she was slaine (fighting on Theseus side) with a dart, by another called Molpadia. In memory whereof, the pillar which is ioyned to the temple of the Olympian ground, was set vp in her honour. We are not to maruell, if the history of things so auncient, be found so diuersely written. For there are also that write, that Queene Antiopa sent those secretly which were hurt then into the city of CALCIDE, where some of them recouered, and were healed: and others also died, which were buried neare to the place called AMAZONION. Howsoeuer it was, it is most certaine that this warre was ended by agreement. For a place adioyning to the temple of Theseus, doth beare record of it, being called Orcomosium: because the peace was there by solemne oath concluded. And the sacrifice also doth truly verifie it, which they haue made to the AMAZONES, before the feast of Theseus, long time out of minde. They of MEGARA also do shew a tombe of the AMAZONES in their city, which is as they go from the market place, to the place they call Rhus: where they find an auncient tombe, cut in fashion and forme of a losenge. They say that there died other of the AMAZONES also, neere vnto the city of CHÆRONEA, which were buried all alongst the litle broke passing by the same, which in the old time (in mine opinion) was called Thermodon, and is now named Hæmon, as we haue other places written in the life of Demosthenes. And it seemeth also, that they did not passe through THESSALY, without fighting: for there are seene yet of their tombes all about the city of SCOTVSA, hard by the rockes, which be called the dogs head. And this is that which is worthy memory (in mine opinion) touching the warres of these AMAZONES. How the Poet telleth that the AMAZONES made warres with Theseus to reuenge the iniury he did to their Queene Antiopa, refusing her, to marry with Phædra: and for the murder which he telleth that Hercules did, that me thinkes is altogether but deuice of Poets. It is very true, that after the death of Antiopa, Theseus maried Phædra, hauing had before of Antiopa a sonne called Hyppolytus, or as the Poet Pindarus writeth, Demophon. And for that the Historiographers do not in any thing speake against the tragicall Poets, in that which concerneth the ill happe that chaunced to him, in the persons of this his wife and of his sonne: we must needes take it to be so, as we find it written in the Tragedies. And yet we find many other reports touching the mariages of Theseus, whose beginnings had no great good honest ground, neither fell out their ends very fortunate: and yet for all that they haue made no Tragedies of them, neither neither haue they bene played in the Theaters. For we reade that he tooke away Anaxo, the TROEZENIAN, and that after he had killed Sinnis and Cercyon, he tooke their daughters perforce: and that he did also marry Peribœa the mother of Aiax, and afterwards Pherebœa, and Ioppa the daughter of Iphicles. And they blame him much also, for that he so lighty forsooke his wife Ariadne, for the loue of AEgles the daughter of Panopæus, as we haue recited before. Lastly, he tooke away Hellen: which rauishment filled all the Realme of ATTICA with wars, & finally was the very occasion that forced him to forsake his country, & brought him at the length to his end, as we wil tell you hereafter. Albeit in his time other Princes of GREECE had done many goodly and notable exploits in the wars, yet Herodotus is of opinion, that Theseus was neuer in any one of them: saiuing that he was at the battell of the Lapithæ against the Centauri. Others say to the contrary, that he was at the iourney of Cholchide with Iason, and that he did helpe Meleager to kill the wild Bore of Calydonia: from whence (as they say) this Prouerbe came: Not without Theseus. Meaning that such a thing was not done without great helpe of another. Howbeit it is certaine that Theseus selfe did many famous acts, without aide of any man, and that for his valiantnesse this Prouerbe came in vse, which is spoken: This is another Theseus. Also he did helpe Adrastus king of the ARGIVES, to recouer the bodies of those that were slaine in the battell, before the city of THEBES. Howbeit it was not, as the Poet Euripides sayth, by force of armes, after he had ouercome the THEBANS in battell: but it was by composition. And thus the greatest number of the most auncient writers do declare it. Furthermore, Philochorus writeth, that this was the first treaty that euer was made to recouer the dead bodies slaine in battell: neuertheless we do reade in the histories and gestes of Hercules, that he was the first that euer suffered his enemies to carry way their dead bodies, after they had bene put to the sword. But whosoeuer he was, at this day in the village of ELEVTHERES, they do show the place where the people were buried, and where Princes tombes are seene about the city of ELEVSIN, which he made at the request of Adrastus. And for testimony hereof, the tragedy Æschilus made of the ELEVSINIANS, where he causeth it to be spokē euen thus to Theseus himselfe, doth clearely ouerthrow the petitioners in Euripides. Touching the friendship betwixt Pirithous and him, it is sayd it began thus. The renowne of his valiancy was maruellously blowne abroad through all GREECE, & Pirithous desirous to know it by experience, went euen of purpose to inuade his country, and brought away a certaine booty of oxen of his taken out of the country of MARATHON. Theseus being aduertised thereof, armed straight, and went to the rescue. Pirithous hearing of his cōming, fled not at all, but returned backe suddenly to meet him. And so soone as they came to see one another, they both wondred at each others beauty & courage, and so had they no desire to fight. But Pirithous reaching out his hand first to Theseus, said vnto him; I make your selfe iudge of the damage you haue sustained by my inuasion, and with all my hart I will make such satisfaction, as it shall please you to assesse it at. Theseus then did not only release him, of all the damages he had done, but also requested him he wold become his friend, and brother in armes. Hereupon they were presently sworne brethren in the field: after which oath betwixt them, Pirithous maried Deidamia, & sent to pray Theseus to come to his mariage, to visite his country, and to make mery with the Lapithæ. He had bidden also the Centauri to the feast: who being drunke, committed many lewd parts, euen to the forcing of women. Howbeit the Lapithæ chastised them so well, that they slue some of them presently in the place, & draue the rest forwards out of the country by the helpe of Theseus, who armed himselfe, and fought on their side. Yet Herodotus writeth the matter somewhat contrary, saying that Theseus went not at all vntill the war was well begun: and that it was the first time that he saw Hercules, and spake with him neere vnto the city of TRACHINA, when he was then quiet, hauing ended all his farre voyages, and greatest troubles. They report that this meeting together was full of great cheere, much kindnesse, and honorable entertainement betweene them, and great curtesie was offered to each other. Neuertheless me thinkes we should giue better credite to those writers that say they met many times together, and that Hercules was accepted and receiued into the brotherhood of the mysteries of ELEVSIN, by the meanes of the countenance and fauour which Theseus showed vnto him: and that his purification also was thereby allowed of, who was to be purged of necessitie of all his ill deedes and cruelties, before he could enter into the company of those holy mysteries. Furthermore, Theseus was fiftie yeares old when he tooke away Hellen and rauished her, which was very young, and not of age to be maried, as Hellanicus sayth. By reason whereof, some seeking to hide the rauishment of her as a haynous fact, do report it was not he, but one Idas and Lynceus that caried her away, who left her in his cuſtodie and keeping: and that Theſeus would haue kept her from them, and would not haue deliuered her to her brethren Caſtor and Pollux, which afterwards did demaund her againe of him. Others againe ſay it was her owne father Tyndarus, who gaue her him to keepe, for that he was affraide of Enarſphorus the ſonne of Hippocoon, who would haue had her away by force. But that which commeth neareſt to the troth in this caſe, and which indeede by many authors is teſtified, was in this ſort. Theſeus and Pirithous went together to the citie of LACEDÆMON, where they took away Hellen (being yet very yong) euen as ſhe was dauncing in the temple of Diana ſurnamed Orthia: and they fled for life. They of LACEDÆMON ſent after her, but thoſe that followed went no further then the citie of TEGEA. Now when they were eſcaped out of the country of PELOPONNESVS, they agreed to draw lots together, which of them two ſhould haue her, with condition that whoſe lot it were to haue her, he ſhould take her to his wife, and ſhould be bound alſo to help his companion to get him another. It was Theſeus hap to light vpon her, who caried her to the citie of APHIDNES, becauſe ſhe was yet too yong to be maried. Whither he cauſed his mother to come to bring her vp, & gaue his friend called Aphidnus the charge of them both, recommēding her to his good care, & to keep it ſo ſecretly, that no body ſhould know what was become of her. Becauſe he would do the like for Pirithous (according to the agreement made betwixt them) he went into EPIRVS with him to ſteale the daughter of Aidoneus, king of the MOLOSSIANS, who had ſurnamed his wife Proſerpina, his daughter Proſerpina, and his dogge Cerberus, with whom he made them fight which came to aske his daughter in mariage, promiſing to giue her to him that ſhould ouercome his Cerberus. But the king vnderſtanding that Pirithous was come, not to requeſt his daughter in mariage, but to ſteale her away, he tooke him priſoner with Theſeus: and as for Pirithous, he cauſed him preſently to be torne in peeces with his dogge, and ſhut Theſeus vp in cloſe priſon. In this meane time there was one at ATHENS called Meneſtheus, the ſonne of Peteus: which Peteus was the ſonne of Orneus, and Orneus was the ſonne of Erictheus. This Meneſtheus was the firſt that began to flatter the people, and did ſeeke to winne the fauour of the communaltie, by ſweete entiſing words: by which deuice he ſtirred vp the chiefeſt of the citie againſt Theſeus (who indeed long before began to be weary of him) by declaring vnto them how Theſeus had taken from them their royalties and ſigniories, and had ſhut them vp in ſuch ſort within the walles of a citie, that he might the better keepe them in ſubiection and obedience in all things, after his will. The poore inferiour ſort of people, he did ſtirre vp alſo to rebellion, perſwading them that it was no other then a dreame of libertie which was promiſed them: and how contrariwiſe they were clearely diſpoſſeſſed and throwne out of their own houſes, of their temples, and from their naturall places where they were borne, to the end onely, that in liew of many good and louing Lordes which they were wont to haue before, they ſhould now be compelled to ſerue one only head, and a ſtrange Lord. Euen as Meneſtheus was very hote about this practiſe, the warre of the Tyndarides fell out at that inſtant, which greatly furthered his pretence. For theſe Tyndarides (to wit the children of Tyndarus) Caſtor and Pollux, came down with a great army, againſt the city of ATHENS: & ſome ſuſpect ſore that Meneſtheus was cauſe of their comming thither. Howbeit at the firſt entrie they did no hurt at all in the country, but onely demanded reſtitution of their ſiſter. To whom the citizens made anſwer, that they knew not where ſhe was left: and then the brethren began to make ſpoile, and offer warre indeed. Howbeit there was one called Academus, who hauing knowledge (I cannot tell by what meane) that ſhe was ſecretly hidden in the citie of APHIDNES, reuealed it vnto them. By reaſon wherof the Tyndarides did alwaies honor him very much, ſo long as he liued, and afterwards the LACEDÆMONIANS, hauing oft burnt & deſtroyed the whole country of ATTICA throughout, they would yet neuer touch the Academie of ATHENS for Academus ſake. Yet Dicearchus ſayth, that in the armie of the Tyndarides there were two ARCADIANS, Echedemus and Marathus, and how of the name of one of them, it was then called the place of Echedemie, which ſithence hath bene called Academia: and after the name of the other, there was a village called MARATHON, becauſe he willingly offered himſelf to be ſacrificed before the battell, as obeying the order and commandement of a prophecie. So they went and pitched their campe before the citie of APHIDNES, and hauing wonne the battell, and taken the citie by aſſault, they razed the place. They ſay that Alycus, the ſonne of Sciron was ſlaine at this field, who was in the hoaſt of the Tyndarides, and that after his name, a certaine quarter of the territorie of MEGARA was called Alycus, in the which his bodie was Howbeit it is not likely to be true, that Theſeus being there, the city of APHIDNES, and his mother alſo were taken. But when it was wonne they of ATHENS began to quake for feare, and Meneſtheus counſelled them to receiue the Tyndarides into the city, and to make them good cheere, ſo they would make no wars but vpon Theſeus, which was the firſt that had done them the wrong and iniury: & that to all other elſe they ſhould ſhew fauour & good will. And ſo it fell out. For when the Tyndarides had all in their power to do as they liſted, they demanded nothing els but that they might be receiued into their corporation, & not to be reckoned for ſtrangers, no more then Hercules was: the which was granted the Tyndarides, and Aphidnus did adopt them for his children, as Pylius had adopted Hercules. Moreouer they did honour them as if they had bene gods, calling them Anaces. Either becauſe they ceaſed the wars, or for that they ordered themſelues ſo well, that their whole army being lodged within the city, there was not any hurt or diſpleaſure done to any perſon: but as it became thoſe that haue the charge of any thing, they did carefully watch to preſerue the good quiet thereof. All which this Greeke word Anacos doth ſignifie, whereof perchance it comes that they call the kings Anactes. There are others alſo who hold opinion that they were called Anaces, becauſe of their ſtarres which appeared in the aire. For the ATTICAN tongue ſaith, Anacas, and Anecathen: where the common people ſay Ano, and Anothen, that is to ſay, aboue. Yet there are other who as well reiect theſe two verſes, and maintaine they are not Homers: as alſo they reproue all that is reported of Munychus. To wit, that Laocide being priuily conceiued of him by Demophon, he was brought vp ſecretly by Æthra within TROIA. But Heſter the hiſtorien in his thirteenth of his hiſtories of ATTICA, maketh a recitall farre contrary to other, ſaying: that ſome hold opinion, that Paris Alexander was ſlaine in battell by Achilles and Patroclus in the country of THESSALY, neare to the riuer of Sperchius, & that his brother Hector tooke the city of TROEZEN, from whence he brought away Æthra: in which there is no maner of apparance or likelihood. But Ædoneus king of the MOLOSSIANS, feaſting Hercules one day as he paſſed through his Realme, deſcended by chance into talke of Theſeus and of Pirithous, how they came to ſteale away his daughter ſecretly: and after told how they were alſo puniſhed. Hercules was maruellous ſory to vnderſtand that one of them was now dead, and the other in danger to dye; and thought with himſelfe that to make his mone to Ædoneus, it would not helpe the matter: he beſought him only that he would deliuer Theſeus for his ſake. And he granted him. Thus Theſeus being deliuered of his captiuity, returned to ATHENS, where his friends were not altogether kept vnder by his enemies: & at his returne he did dedicate to Hercules all the temples, which the city had before cauſed to be built in his owne honour. And where firſt of all they were called Theſea, he did now ſurname them all Herculea, excepting foure, as Philochorus writeth. Now when he was arriued at ATHENS, he would immediatly haue commaunded and ordered things as he was wont to do: but he found himſelfe troubled much with ſedition, becauſe thoſe who had hated him of a long time, had added alſo to their old cankred hate, a diſdaine and contempt to feare him any more. And the common people now were become ſo ſtubborne, that where before they would haue done all that they were commanded, and haue ſpoken nothing to the contrary: now they looked to be borne with, and flattered. Whereupon Theſeus thought at the firſt to haue vſed force, but he was forced by the faction and contention of his enemies to let all alone, and in the end, deſpairing he ſhould euer bring his matters to paſſe to his deſire, he ſecretly ſent away his children vnto the Ile of EVBOEA, to Elphenor the ſonne of Chalcodus. And himſelfe, after he had made many wiſhes and curſes againſt the ATHENIANS, in the village of GARGETTVS, in a place which for that cauſe to this day is called Arateriod, (that is to ſay, the place of curſings) he did take the ſeas, and went into the Ile of Scyros, where he had goods, and thought alſo to haue fonnd friends. Lycomedes raigned at that time, and was king of the Ile, vnto whom Theſeus made requeſt for ſome land, as intending to dwell there: albeit ſome ſay that he required him to giue him aide againſt the Athenians. Lycomedes, were it that he doubted to entertaine ſo great a perſonage, or that he did it to gratifie Meneſtheus: caried him vp to the high rockes, fayning as though he would from thence haue ſhewed him all his country round about. But when he had him there, he threw him downe headlong from the top of the rockes to the bottome, and put him thus vnfortunately to death. Yet other write, that he fell downe of himſelfe by an vnfortunate chaunce, walking one day after ſupper as was wont to do. There was no man at that time that did follow or purſue his death, but Meneſtheus quietly remained king of Athens: and the children of Theſeus, as priuate ſouldiers followed Elphinor in the warres of Troia. But after the death of Meneſtheus, who died in the iourney to Troy, Theſeus ſonnes returned vnto Athens, where they recouered their ſtate. Sithence there were many occaſions which moued the Athenians to reuerence and honor him as a demy God. For in the battell of Marathon, many thought they ſaw his ſhadow and image in armes, fighting againſt the barbarous people. And after the warres of the Medes (the yeare wherein Phædon was gouernour of Athens) the Nunne Pithia anſwered the Athenians, who had ſent to the Oracle of Apollo: that they ſhould bring backe the bones of Theſeus, & putting them in ſome honorable place, they ſhould preſerue and honor them deuoutly. But it was a hard matter to find his graue: and if they had found it, yet had it bin a hard thing to haue brought his bones away, for the malice of thoſe barbarous people which inhabited that Ile: which were ſo wild and fierce, that none could trade or liue with them. Notwithſtanding Cimon hauing taken the Iland (as we haue written in his life) and ſeeking his graue: perceiuing by good hap an eagle pecking with her beake, and ſcraping with her clawes in a place of ſome prety height: ſtraight it came into his mind (as by diuine inſpiration) to ſearch and digge the place, where was found the tombe of a great body, with the head of a ſpeare which was of braſſe, and a ſword with it. All which things were brought to Athens by Cimon in the admirall gally. The Athenians receiued them with great ioy, with proceſſions and goodly ſacrifices, as if Theſeus himſelfe had bene aliue, and had returned into the city againe. At this day all theſe relickes lye yet in the middeſt of the city, neare to the place where the young men do vſe all their exerciſes of body. There is free liberty of acceſſe for all ſlaues and poore men (that are afflicted and purſued, by any mightier themſelues) to pray and ſacrifice in remembrance of Theſeus: who while he liued was protectour of the oppreſſed, and did curteouſly receiue their requeſts and petitions that prayed to haue aide of him. The greateſt and moſt ſolemne ſacrifice they do vnto him, is on the eight day of October, in which he returned from Creta, with the other young children of Athens. Howbeit they do not leaue to honour him euery eight day of all other moneths, either becauſe he arriued from Troezen at Athens the eight day of Iune, as Diodorus the Coſmographer writeth: or for that they thought that number to be meeteſt for him, becauſe the bruite ranne he was begotten of Neptune. They do ſacrifice alſo to Neptune, the eight day of euery moneth, becauſe the number of eight is the firſt cube made of euen number, and the double of the firſt ſquare: which doth repreſent a ſtedfaſtneſſe immoueable, properly attributed to the might of Neptune, whom for this cauſe we ſurname Aſphalius, and Gæiochus, which by interpretation doth ſignifie: the ſafe keeper, and the ſtayer of the earth.

THE LIFE OF Romulus.

THE Hiſtoriographers do not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cauſe the great name of the citie of ROME (the glory whereof is blowne abroad through all the world) was firſt giuen vnto it. For ſome thinke that the Pelaſgians, after they had ouercome the greateſt part of the world, and had inhabited and ſubdued many nations, in the end did ſtay themſelues in that place where it was new builded: & for their great ſtrength and power in armes, they gaue the name of ROME vnto the city, as ſignifying power in the Greeke tongue. Other ſay, that after the taking and deſtruction of TROIA, there were certaine TROIANS which ſauing themſelues from the ſword, tooke ſuch veſſels as they found at aduenture in the hauen, and were by winds put to the THVSCANE ſhore, where they anckered neare vnto the riuer of Tyber. There their wiues being ſo ſore ſea ſicke, that poſſibly they could not any more endure the boiſtrous ſurges of the ſeas: it happened one of them among the reſt (the nobleſt and wiſeſt of the company) called Roma, to counſell the other women of her companions to ſet their ſhips a fire, which they did accordingly. Wherewith their husbands at the firſt were maruellouſly offended. But afterwards, being compelled of neceſſitie to plant themſelues neare vnto the citie of PALLANTIVM, they were appeaſed when they ſaw things proſper better then they hoped for, finding the ſoile there fertile, and the people their neighbours ciuill and gentle in entertaining them. Wherefore amongeſt other honours they did to requite this Lady Roma, they called their city after her name, as from whom came the originall cauſe of the building and foundation thereof. They ſay, that from thence came this cuſtome continuing yet to this day at ROME, that the women ſaluting their kinſefolkes and husbands do kiſſe them in the mouth, for ſo did theſe TROIAN Ladies to pleaſe their husbands, and to winne them againe, after they had loſt their fauours, and procured their diſpleaſures with burning of their ſhippes. Other ſay that Roma was the daughter of Italus, and of Lucaria, or elſe of Telephus the ſonne of Hercules, and of the wife of AEneas: other ſay of Aſcanius, the ſonne of AEneas, who named the city after her name. Other hold opinion, that it was Romanus (the ſonne of Vlyſſes and of Circe) that firſt founded ROME: other will ſay that it was Romus the ſonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes ſent thither from TROIA. Other write that it was one Romis a tyran of the LATINES, who draue the THVSCANS out of thoſe parts: which departing out of THESSALY, went firſt of all into LYDIA, and afterwards from LYDIA into ITALIE. And furthermore, they who thinke that Romulus (as indeed it carieth best likelihood) was he that gaue the name to the citie, do not agree about his aunceſtors. For ſome of them write, that he was the ſonne of AEneas and of Dexithea the daughter of Phorbus, and that he was brought into ITALY of a litle child with his brother Remus: and that at that time the riuer of Tyber being ouerflowne, all other ſhips were caſt away, ſauing the ſhippe in which the two litle boyes were, which by great good happe came to ſtay a vpon a very plaine euen ground on the banke: and becauſe the children beyond all hope were ſaued by this meanes, therefore the place was afterwards called ROMA. Other ſay that Roma the daughter of the firſt Troian Lady was maried vnto Latinus the ſon of Telemachus, by whom ſhe had Romulus. Other write, that it was AEmilia, the daughter of AEneas and of Lauinia, which was gotten with child by the god Mars. Other tel a tale of Romulus birth, nothing true nor likely. For it is ſayd that there was ſometime a king of ALBA named Tarchetius, a very wicked and cruell man, in whoſe houſe through the permiſſion of the gods, appeared ſuch a like viſion: that there roſe vp in the harth of his chimney the forme and faſhion of a mans priuy member, which continued there many dayes. And they ſay, that at that time there was in THVSCANE an oracle of Thetis, from whom they brought vnto this wicked king Tarchetius ſuch an aunſwer: that he ſhould cauſe his daughter yet vnmaried to haue carnall company with the ſtraunge thing, for ſhe ſhould beare a ſonne, that ſhould be famous for his valiancie, for ſtrength of body, and his happy ſucceſſe, wherein he ſhould exceede all men of his time. Tharchetius told this oracle vnto one of his daughters, and willed her to entertaine this ſtraunge thing: but ſhe diſdaining to do it, ſent one of her wayting women to vndertake the entertainement. But Tarchetius was ſo mad at this, that he cauſed them both to be taken to put them to death: howbeit the goddeſſe Veſta appeared to him in his ſleepe in the night, and charged him he ſhould not do it. Whereupon he did command them to make him a peece of cloth in the priſon, with promiſe that they ſhould be maried when they had finiſhed it. Theſe poore maides toiled at it all the liue long day, but in the night there came other (by Tarchetius commandement) that did vndoe all they had done the day before. In the mane time, this waiting woman that was got with child by this ſtraunge thing, was deliuered of two goodly boyes or twins: whom Tarchetius gaue vnto one Teratius, with expreſſe commandement he ſhould caſt them away. This Teratius caried them vnto the banke of the riuer: thither came a ſhe Wolfe and gaue them ſucke, and certaine birds that brought little crummes and put them in their mouthes, vntill a ſwine-heard perceiuing them, & wondring at the ſight, did boldly go to the children, and tooke them away with him. Theſe infants being thus preſerued, after they were come to mans ſtate, did ſet vpon Tarchetius and ſlue him. One Promathion an Italian writer, deliuereth this ſtory thus. But the report that carieth beſt credite of all, and is allowed of by many writers, commeth from Diocles Peparethian, (whom Fabius Pictor followeth (in many things) who was the firſt that put forth this ſtory among the GRECIANS, and ſpecially the chiefeſt points of it. Though this matter be ſomewhat diuerſely taken, yet in effect the ſtory is thus. The right line and bloud of the kings of ALBA deſcended from AEneas, by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne: and the Kingdome fell in the end betweene two brethren, Numitor and Amulius. They agreed by lot to make diuiſion betweene them, whereof the one to haue the Kingdome, and the other all the gold, ſiluer, ready money, goods and iewels brought from TROIA. Numitor by his lot choſe the Realme for his portion: Amulius hauing all the gold and treaſure in his hands, did find himſelfe thereby the ſtronger, and ſo did eaſily take his Realme from him. And fearing leaſt his brothers daughter might haue children which one day might thruſt him out againe, he made her a Nunne of the goddeſſe Veſta, there to paſſe her dayes in virginitie, and neuer to be maried: (ſome call her Rhea, other Syluia, and other Ilia) neuertheleſſe not long after ſhe was found with child, againſt the rule and profeſſion of the Veſtall Nunnes. So nothing had ſaued her from preſent death, but the petition of Antho the daughter of king Amulius, who intreated her father for her life: yet notwithſtanding ſhe was ſtraightly locked vp, that no body could ſee her, nor ſpeake with her, leaſt ſhe ſhould be brought to bed without Amulius knowledge. In the end ſhe was deliuered of two faire boyes and maruellous great twinnes: which made Amulius more affraid then before. So he commaunded one of his men to take the two children, and to throw them away, and deſtroy them. Some ſay that this ſeruants name was Fauſtulus: other thinke it was he that brought them vp. But whoſoeuer he was, he that had the charge to throw them away put them in a trough, and went towards the riuer with intention to throw them in. Howbeit he found it riſen ſo high, and

and running ſo ſwiftly, that he durſt not come neare the waters ſide, and ſo they being in the trough, he layd them on the banke. In the meane time the riuer ſwelling ſtill, and ouerflowing the banke, in ſuch ſort that it came vnder the trough, did gently lift vp the trough, and caried it vnto a great plaine, called at this preſent Cermanum, and in the old time Germanum (as I take it) becauſe the ROMAINES called the brothers of father and mother, Germani. Now there was neare vnto this place a wild fig-tree which they called Ruminalis, of the name of Romulus, as the moſt part thought: or elſe becauſe the beaſts feeding there, were wont to come vnder the ſame in the extreame heate of the day, and there did ruminate, that is chew their cudde in the ſhadow: or perhaps becauſe that the two children did ſucke the teate of the Wolfe, which the ancient LATINES call RVMA, and they at this day do yet call the goddeſſe on whom they cry out to giue their children ſucke, RVMILIA. And in their ſacrifices to her they vſe no wine, but offer vp milke and water mingled with hony. To theſe two children lying there in this ſort, they write, there came a ſhe Wolfe and gaue them ſucke, and a Hitwaw alſo which did helpe to nouriſh and keepe them. Theſe two beaſts are thought to be conſecrated to the god Mars, and the LATINES do ſingularly honour and reuerence the Hitwaw. This did much helpe to giue credite to the words of the mother, who affirmed ſhe was conceiued of thoſe two children, by the god Mars. Howbeit ſome thinke ſhe was deceiued in her opinion: for Amulius that had her maidenhead, went to her all armed, and perforce did rauiſh her. Other hold opinion that the name of the nurſe which gaue the two children ſucke with her breaſts, gaue occaſion to common report to erre much in this tale, by reaſon of the double ſignification thereof. For the LATINES do call with one ſelfe name ſhe Wolfes Lupas, and women that giue their bodies to all commers: as this nurſe the wife of Fauſtulus (that brought theſe children home to her houſe) did vſe to do. By her right name ſhe was called Acca Laurentia, vnto whom the ROMAINES do ſacrifice yet vnto this day: and the Prieſt of Mars doth offer vnto her, in the moneth of Aprill, the ſhedding of wine and milke accuſtomed at burials, and the feaſt it ſelfe is called Laurentia. It is true that they honor alſo another Larentia for like occaſion. The clerke or ſexten of Hercules temple, not knowing one day how to driue away the time as it ſhould ſeeme: of a certaine liuelineſſe and boldneſſe, did deſire the god Hercules to play at dice with him, with condition that if he did winne, Hercules ſhould be bound to ſend him ſome good fortune: and if it were his lucke to loſe, then he promiſed Hercules he would prouide him a very good ſupper, and would beſides bring him a faire gentlewoman to lye withall. The conditions of the play thus rehearſed, the ſexten firſt caſt the dice for Hercules, and afterwards for himſelfe. It fell out that Hercules wan, and the ſexten meaning good faith, & thinking it very meete to performe the bargaine that himſelfe had made, prepared a good ſupper, and hired this Laurentia the courtiſan, which was very faire, but as yet of no great fame to come to it. Thus hauing feaſted her within the temple, and prepared a bed ready there, after ſupper he locked her into the temple, as if Hercules ſhould haue come indeed and lyen with her. And it is ſayd for troth, that Hercules came thither, and commanded her in the morning ſhe ſhould go into the market place, and ſalute the firſt man ſhe met, & keepe him euer for her friend. Which thing ſhe performed, and the firſt man ſhe met was called Tarrutius, a man of great yeares, and one that had gathered together maruellous wealth and riches. He had no children at all, neither was he euer maried. He fell acquainted with this Laurentia, and loued her ſo dearely, that ſhortly after chancing to dye, he made her heire of all he had: whereof ſhe diſpoſed afterwards by her laſt will and teſtament, the beſt and greateſt part vnto the people of ROME. Moreouer it is reported alſo, that ſhe now being growne to be famous and of great honor (as thought to be the lemman of a god) did vaniſh away ſuddenly in the ſelfe ſame place, where the firſt Laurentia was buried. The place at this day is called Velabrum: becauſe the riuer being ouerflowne, they were oftentimes compelled to paſſe by bote to go to the market place, and they called this maner of ferrying ouer, Velatura. Other ſay, that thoſe tumblers and common players, which ſhewed ſundry games and paſtimes to win the fauor of the people, were wont to couer that paſſage ouer with canuaſſe clothes and veiles, by which they go from the market place to the liſtes or ſhew place where they run their horſes, beginning their race euen at that place: and they call a veile in their tongue, Velum. This is the cauſe why the ſecond Laurentia is honored at ROME. Fauſtulus chiefe neat-heard to Amulius, tooke vp the two children, and no body knew it, as ſome ſay: or as other report (and likeſt to be true) with the priuity and knowledge of Numitor, Amulius brother, who ſecretly furniſhed them with mony that brought vp the two yong children. is ſayd alſo they were both conueyed vnto the city of the GABIANS, where they were brought vp at ſchoole, and taught all other honeſt things, which they vſe to teach the ſonnes and children of good and Noble men. Further they ſay they were named Remus and Romulus, becauſe they were found ſucking on the teates of a Wolfe. Now the beauty of their bodies did preſently ſhew, beholding onely but their ſtature and maner of their countenances, of what nature and linage they were: and as they grew in yeares, their manly courage increaſed maruellouſly, ſo as they became ſtoute and hardy men, in ſo much as they were neuer troubled or aſtonied at any danger that was offered them. Howbeit it appeared plainly that Romulus had more wit and vnderſtanding then his brother Remus. For in all things wherin they were to deale with their neighbours, either concerning hunting, or the bounds and limites of their paſtures: it was eaſily diſcerned in him, that he was borne to command, and not to obey. For this cauſe they were both exceedingly beloued of their companions, & of thoſe which were their inferiors. As for the kings heardmen, they paſſed not much for them, ſaying that they were euen like themſelues, and ſo ſeemed not to care a pinne for their anger or diſpleaſure, but wholly gaue themſelues to all gentlemanly exerciſes and trades, thinking to liue idly and at eaſe without trauell, was neither comely nor conuenient: but to exerciſe and harden their bodies with hunting, running, purſuing murderers and theeues, and to helpe thoſe which were oppreſſed with wrong and violence, ſhould be credite and commendation to them. By reaſon whereof, in very ſhort time they grew to great fame and renowne. And it fell out by chance there aroſe ſome ſtrife and variance betweene the heardmen of Amulius, and the heardmen of Numitor: in ſo much as thoſe that were Numitors, caried away by force ſome cattell of the others. The other ſide would not beare that, but purſued faſt after, and beating them wel-fauoredly, they made them take their legges, and brought backe againe the greateſt part of the cattell they had caried away with them. Whereat Numitor ſtormed maruellouſly, but yet his men ſeemed to make but little account of it, and purpoſing reuenge, they gathered about them a good company of vacabounds (that had neither home nor reſting place) and certaine fugitiue bondmen which they entiſed ill-fauouredly, incouraging them to ſteale away from their maiſters. Thus one day whileſt Romulus was buſie about ſome ſacrifice (being a deuoute man and religious, and well giuen to ſerue the gods, and to learne to diuine and tell beforehand what things ſhould happen and come to paſſe) it happened the heardmen of Numitor to meete Remus very ſlenderly accompanied: ſo they fell vpon him ſuddenly: blowes were dealt roundly on both ſides, and men were hurt on either part. Howbeit Numitors men in the end proued the ſtronger part, & did take Remus by force, & caried him ſtraight before Numitor, alledging many cõplaints and matters againſt him. Numitor durſt not puniſh him of his owne authority, becauſe he feared his brother Amulius, who was ſomewhat terrible: but went vnto him, and earneſtly beſought him to do him iuſtice, and not to ſuffer him being his owne brother, to receiue ſuch iniury of his men. There was not a man in the city of ALBA, but did greatly miſlike the iniury done to Numitor: and ſpake it openly, that he was no perſon to be offered ſuch a wrong. In ſo much as Amulius moued herewith, did deliuer Remus into his hands, to puniſh him as he thought good. Whereupon Numitor caried him home with him. But when he had him in his houſe, he began to conſider better of him, with admiration how goodly a yong man he was, how in height and ſtrength of body he paſſed all the reſt of his people: and perceiuing in his face an aſſured conſtancy, and bold ſtedfaſt courage that yeelded not, nor was abaſhed for any danger he ſaw towards him: and hearing alſo the report of his actes and manhood to be aunſwerable to that he ſaw: (being chiefly moued in mine opinion, by ſome ſecret inſpiration of the gods, which ordaine the depth of great matters) began partly by coniecture, and partly by chaunce to take a conceit of him. So he asked him what he was, and who was his father and mother: ſpeaking to him in a more gentle wiſe, and with a friendlier countenance then before, to make him the bolder to anſwer, & be of better hope. Remus boldly anſwered him; Truly I will not hide the troth from thee, for thou ſeemeſt to be more worthy to be King then thy brother Amulius. For thou enquireſt, and heareſt firſt before thou condemneſt: and he condemneth before he examine or heare the parties. Vntill now, we thought we had bene the children of two of the Kings ſeruants, to wit of Fauſtulus and of Laurentia: I ſay we, becauſe my brother and I are two twins. But ſeeing we are now falſely accuſed vnto thee, and by malicious ſurmiſed tales are wrongfully brought in danger of our liues: we intend to diſcouer our ſelues, and to declare ſtraunge things vnto thee, whereof the preſent perill we now ſtand in, ſhall plainly proue proue the troth. Men ſay that we haue bene begotten miraculouſly, foſtered and giuen ſucke more ſtraungely, and in our tender yeares were fed by birds and wild beaſts, to whom we were caſt out as a pray. For a Wolfe gaue vs ſucke with her teates, and an Hitwaw (they ſay) brought vs little crummes, and put them in our mouthes, as we lay vpon the banke by the riuer, where we were put in a trough that at this day remaineth whole, bound about with plates of copper, vpon the which are ſome letters engrauen halfe worne out, which peraduenture one day will ſerue for ſome tokens of knowledge (vnprofitable for our parents) when it ſhall be too late, and after we are dead and gone. Numitor then comparing theſe words, with the age the young man ſeemed to be of, and conſidering well his face: did not reiect the hope of his imagination that ſmiled on him, but handled the matter ſo, that he found meanes to ſpeake ſecretly with his daughter, notwithſtanding at that time ſhe was kept very ſtraightly. Fauſtulus in the meane time hearing that Remus was priſoner, and that the king had deliuered him already into the hands of his brother Numitor to do iuſtice, went to pray Romulus to helpe him, and told him then whoſe children they were: for before he had neuer opened it to them but in darke ſpeeches, and glawncing wiſe, and ſo much as ſufficed to put them in ſome hope. So Fauſtulus taking the trough with him at that time, went vnto Numitor in great haſte, as maruellouſly affraide for the preſent daunger he thought Remus in. The Kings ſouldiers which warded at the gates of the city, began to gather ſome ſuſpition of Fauſtulus maner of comming: and he made himſelfe to be the more ſuſpected, being queſtioned with about the cauſe of his repaire thither, that he faltred in his words: beſides, they eſpied his trough which he caried vnder his cloke. Now amongſt the warders, there was by chaunce one that was the man to whom the children were committed to be caſt away, and was preſent when they were left on the banke of the riuer to the mercy of fortune. This man knew the trough by and by, as well by the faſhion, as by the letters grauen vpon it: who miſtruſted ſtraight that which was true indeed. So he did not neglect the thing, but went forthwith to the King to tell him the matter, and led Fauſtulus with him to haue him confeſſe the troth. Fauſtulus being in this perplexity, could not keepe all cloſe vpon examination, but did vtter out ſomewhat of the matter, and yet he told not all. For he plainely iuſtified the children were aliue: yet he ſayd they were farre from the city of Alba, where they kept beaſts in the fields. And as for the trough, he was going to carry it to Ilia, becauſe ſhe had diuerſe times prayed him to let her ſee and feele it: to the end ſhe might be more aſſured of her hope, who promiſed her that one day ſhe ſhould ſee her children againe. So it chanced vnto Amulius at that time, as it commonly doth vnto thoſe that are troubled, and do any thing in feare or anger, as a man amazed thereat, to ſend one preſently (who in all other other things was a very honeſt man, but a great friend of his brother Numitors) to aske him if he had heard any thing that his daughters children were aliue. This perſon being come to Numitors houſe, found him ready to embrace Remus, who fell to be witneſſe thereof, and of the good hap diſcouered vnto Numitor: whereupon he perſwaded him how to ſet vpon his brother, and to diſpatch the matter with ſpeed. So from that time forwards, he tooke their part. On the other ſide alſo the matter gaue them no leiſure to deferre their enterpriſe, although they had bene willing: for the whole caſe was ſomewhat blowne abroade. So Romulus then got ſtraight a power, & drew very neare the city, and many of the citizens of Alba went out to ioyne with him, who either feared or hated Amulius. Now Romulus power which he brought (ouer and beſides thoſe citizens) was a good number of fighting men, and they were deuided by hundreds, and euery hundred had his captaine who marched before his band, carying litle bundels of graſſe or of boughes tied to the end of their poles. The Latines call theſe bundels Manipulos, whereof it commeth that yet at this day in an army of the Romaines, the ſouldiers which are all vnder one enſigne, are called Manipulares. So Remus ſtirring vp thoſe that were within the city, and Romulus bringing in men from without, the tyrant Amulius fell in ſuch feare and agony, that without prouiding any thing for his ſafety, they came vpon him ſuddenly in his pallace, and ſlue him. Thus you heare how neare Fabius Pictor and Diocles Peparethian do agree in reciting the ſtory, who was the firſt in mine opinion that wrote the foundation of the city of Rome: howbeit there are that thinke they are all but fables and tales deuiſed of pleaſure. But me thinkes for all that, they are not altogether to be reiected or diſcredited, if we will conſider fortunes ſtrange effects vpon times, and of the greatneſſe alſo of the Romaine empire: which had neuer atchieued to her preſent poſſeſſed power and authority, if the gods had not from the beginning bene workers of the ſame, and if there had not alſo bene ſome ſtraunge cauſe, and wonderfull foundation. Amulius being now ſlaine as before, and after that all things were appeaſed, and reduced to good order againe: Remus and Romulus would not dwell in the city of ALBA, being no Lords thereof, nor alſo would be Lords of it, ſo long as their grandfather by the mothers ſide was aliue. Wherefore after they had reſtored him to his eſtate, and had done the honour and duty they ought vnto their mother, they purpoſed to go & build a city in thoſe places where they had bene firſt brought vp, for this was the honeſteſt colour they could pretend for their departing from ALBA. Peraduenture they were enforced ſo to do whether they would or not, for the great number of baniſhed men, and fugitiue ſlaues which were gathered together by them for their ſtrength, who had bene vtterly loſt and caſt away, if they had bene once diſcharged by them. Therefore it was of neceſſity that they ſhould dwell by themſelues, ſeparated in ſome place, to keepe his number together and in ſome order. For it is true that the inhabitants of the city of ALBA would not ſuffer ſuch baniſhed perſons and runagates to be mingled amongeſt them, nor would receiue them into their city to be free among them. All which appeareth ſufficiently: firſt, becauſe they tooke away women by force: and ſo not of inſolency, but of neceſſity, when they found no man that would beſtow any of them. It is manifeſt alſo they did greatly honour and make much of the women they had taken away before. Furthermore, when their city began a little to be ſetled, they made a temple of refuge for all fugitiues & afflicted perſons, which they called the temple of the god Aſylæus: where there was ſanctuarie and ſafety for all ſorts of people that repaired thither, and could get into the temple: for whom it was alledged, they could not deliuer any bondman to his maiſter, nor detter to his creditor, nor murtherer to the Iuſtice that was fled thither for ſuccour, becauſe the oracle of Apollo the Delphian had expreſſely enioyned them to graunt ſanctuarie to all thoſe that would come thither for it. So by this meanes in ſhort ſpace their city flouriſhed, and was repleniſhed, where at the firſt foundation of it, they ſay there was not aboue one thouſand houſes, as more at large hereafter ſhall be declared. When they came now to the building of their city, Romulus and Remus the two brethren fell ſuddenly at a ſtrife together about the place where the city ſhould be builded. For Romulus built ROME, which is called foure ſquare, and woulds needes it ſhould remaine in the place which he had choſen. Remus his brother choſe another place very ſtrong of ſituation, vpon mount Auentine, which was called after his name Remonium, and now is called Rignarium. Notwithſtanding, in the end they agreed betweene themſelues, this controuerſie ſhould be decided by the flying of birds, which do giue a happy diuination of things to come. So being ſet in diuerſe places by themſelues to make obſeruation, ſome ſay that there appeared vnto Remus ſixe, and to Romulus twelue vulters. Other ſay that Remus truly ſaw ſixe, and Romulus feigned from the beginning that he ſawe twiſe as many: but when Remus came to him, then there appeared twelue indeed vnto Romulus, and this is the cauſe why the ROMAINES at this day in their diuinations and ſouthſayings of the flying of birds, do maruellouſly obſerue the flying of the vulters. It is true which the hiſtoriographer Herodotus Ponticus writeth; that Hercules reioyced much when there appeared a vulter to him, being ready to begin any enterpriſe. For it is the foule of the world that doth leaſt hurt, and neuer marreth nor deſtroyeth any thing that man doth ſow, plant or ſet: conſidering that ſhe feedeth on carion only, and doth neuer hurt nor kill any liuing thing. Alſo ſhe doth not pray vpon dead fowle, for the likeneſſe that is betweene them: where the eagles, the dukes and the ſakers, do murther, kill, and eate thoſe which are of their owne kind. And yet as AEſchylus ſayth,

Needes muſt that fowle accompted be moſt vile,
moſt rauening, and full of filthy mind,
Which doth himſelfe, continually defile,
by praying ſtill vpon his proper kind.

Moreouer, other birds are alwayes (as a man would ſay) before our eyes, and do daily ſhew themſelues vnto vs: where the vulter is a very rare bird, and hardly to be ſeene, and men do not eaſily find their ayries. Which hath giuen ſome occaſion to hold a falſe opinion, that the vulters are paſſagers, and come into theſe parts out of ſtraunge countries. The prognoſticators alſo thinke, that ſuch things which are not ordinarie, and but ſeldome ſeene, be not naturall, but miraculouſly ſent by the gods to prognoſticate ſomething. When Remus knew how his brother had mocked him, he was verie angrie with him. And when Romulus had caſt a ditch, as it were for the wall about his city, Remus did not only ſcorne it, but hindered alſo his worke, and in

in the end for a mockerie leapt ouer his wall. To conclude, he did ſo much, that at the laſt he was ſlaine there by Romulus own hands, as ſome ſay: or as other hold opinion, by the hands of one of his men which was called Celer. In this fight they ſlue Fauſtulus, and Pliſtimus alſo his brother, who had holpen him to bring vp Romulus. Howſoeuer the matter fell out, this Celer abſented himſelfe from ROME, and went into the country of THVSCANE. And they ſay, that men which are quick & ready vpon a ſodaine, took their names euer after vpon him, & were called Celeres. As amongſt other, Quintus Metellus after the death of his father, hauing in very few daies made the people of ROME to ſee a combat offencers (called Gladiatores) fighting at the ſharpe, they ſurnamed him Celer, for that the ROMAINES maruelled how he could prepare his things in ſo ſhort a time. Furthermore, Romulus hauing now buried his brother, & his other two bringers vp (called foſter fathers) in the place they cal Remonia, began then to build & lay the foundation of his citie, ſending for men out of THVSCANE, who did name and teach him particularly all the ceremonies he had to obſerue there, according to their lawes and ordinances as a great holy myſterie. And firſt of all they made a round ditch in the place called at this day Comitium, into which they did caſt their chiefeſt and beſt things, which men vſe lawfully for good, and naturally as moſt neceſſary. After that they did throw alſo into it, a little of the earth, from whence euery man came, and mingled theſe all together. This ditch in their ceremonies is called the World, in Latine Mundus, euen the ſelfeſame name the Latines call the Vniuerſall. About this ditch they did trace the compaſſe of the citie they would build, euen as one would draw a circle about a center. This done, the founder of the citie taketh a plough, to which he faſtned a culter or plough ſhare of braſſe, and ſo yoaked in the plough an oxe and a cow, he himſelfe holding the plough did make round about the compaſſe of the citie a deep furrow. Thoſe which followed him, had the charge to throw the turues of earth inward into the citie, which the plough ſhare raiſed vp, and not to leaue any of them turned outward. The furrow thus caſt vp was the whole compaſſe of their wal, which they call in Latine Pomærium, by ſhortning of the ſyllables, for poſt murum: to wit, after wall. But in the place where they determined to make a gate, they did take off the plough ſhare, and draw the plough, with leauing a certaine ſpace vnbroken vp: whereupon the ROMAINES thinke all the compaſſe of their walles holy and ſacred, except their gates. For if their gates had bene hallowed and ſanctified, they would haue had a conſcience through them to haue brought in, or caried out of the city, any things neceſſary for the life of man, that had not bene pure and cleane. Now they beleeue certainly, that this ceremonie of the foundation of their citie was made the one & twenty of Aprill: becauſe the ROMAINES do yet keep that day holy day, & cal it the feaſt of the natiuity of their country. On which day they did not in old time ſacrifice any thing that had life, as eſteeming that day (which was the natiuitie of their citie) to be moſt meet to be kept cleane and pure from being polluted or defiled with any bloud. Notwithſtanding before ROME was builded, they had another feaſt called the ſhepheards or heardmens holy day, which they did celebrate vpon the ſame day, & called it Palilia. Now at this day the beginnings of the moneths with the ROMAINES is cleane contrary to the GRECIANS: yet for al this, they hold opinion for certainty that the day on which Romulus foũded his citie, was aſſuredly that which the GRECIANS cal Triacada: that is to ſay, the thirtieth day. On which there was ſeen an eclypſe of the Moone, which they ſuppoſe was obſerued by the Poet Antimachus (borne in the city of TEOS) in the thirteenth yeare of the ſixt Olympiad. Likewiſe in the time of Marcus Varro (as a learned man, & one that had read as much of auncient ſtories as any ROMAINE) there was a friend of his called Tarutius, a great Philoſopher and Mathematician, who being giuen to the calculation of Aſtronomie for the delight of ſpeculation only, wherein he was thought moſt excellent: it did fall out that Varro gaue him this queſtion, to ſearch out what houre and day the natiuitie of Romulus was, who gathered it out by certaine accidents, as they do in the reſolutions of certaine Geometricall queſtions. For they ſay, that by the ſelfe ſame ſcience, one may tell before of things to come, and to happen to a man in his life, knowing certainely the hower of his natiuitie: and how one may tell alſo the hower of his natiuitie, when by accidents they know what hath happened to him all his life. Tarutius did the queſtion that Varro gaue him. And hauing throughly conſidered the aduentures, deedes, and ieſts of Romulus, how long he liued, and how he died: all which being gathered and conferred together, he did boldly iudge for a certainty, that he was conceiued in his mothers wombe, in the firſt yeare of the ſecond Olympiad, the three and twentith day of the moneth which the ÆGYPTIANS call Chæac, and now is called December, about three of the clocke in the morning, in which houre there was a whole eclypse of the Sun: & that he was borne into the world, the 21. of the moneth of Thoth, which is the moneth of September, about the rising of the Sun. And that ROME was begun by him on the ninth day of the moneth which the ÆGYPTIANS call Pharmuthi, and answereth now to the moneth of Aprill, betweene two and three of the clocke in the morning. For they will say that a citie hath his reuolution and his time of continuance appointed, as well as the life of a man: & that they knew by the situation of the stars, the day of her beginning & foundatiō. These things and such other like, peraduenture will please the Readers better, for their strangenesse and curiositie, then offend or mislike them for their falsehood. Now after that he had founded his citie, he first and formost did diuide in two companies all those that were of age to cary armour. In euery one of these companies there were three thousand footemen, and three hundred horsemen: and they were called Legions, because they were sorted of the chosen men that were pickt out amongst all the rest for to fight. The remaine after these was called Populus, which signifieth the people. After this, he made a hundred councellours of the best and honestest men of the citie, which he called Patricians: and the whole company of them together he called Senatus, as one would say, the counsell of the ancients. So they were called Patricians, as some will say, the counsell of the fathers lawfull children, which few of the first inhabitans could shew. It may be, some will say this name was giuen thē of Patrocinium, as growing of the protection they had by the sanctuarie of their citie, which word they vse at this day in the selfe same signification: as one that followed Euander into ITALY, was called Patron, because he was pitifull, and releeued the poore and little children, and so got himselfe a name for his pity and humanitie. But me thinkes it were more like the troth to say, that Romulus did call them so, because he thought the chiefest men should haue a fatherly care of the meaner sort: considering also it was to teach the meaner sort that they should not feare the authority of the greater, nor enuy at their honors they had, but rather in all their causes should vse their fauour and good will, by taking them as their fathers. For euen at this present, strangers call those of the Senate, lords or captaines: but the naturall ROMAINES call them, Patres Conscripti, which is a name of fatherhead & dignitie without enuy. It is true, that at the beginning they were only called Patres, but sithence, because they were many ioyned vnto the first, they haue bene named Patres Conscripti, as a man should say, fathers of record together: which is the honourablest name he could haue deuised to make a differēce betwixt the Senators & the people. Furthermore, he made a difference between the chiefer citizens, and the baser people, by calling the better sort Patroni, as much to say, as defenders: & the meaner sort Clientes, as you would say, followers, or men protected. This did breed a maruellous great loue & good wil among them, making the one much beholding to the other, by many mutuall curtesies & pleasures: for the Patrons did help the Clients to their right, defended their causes in iudgemēt, did giue vnto them counsel, & did take al their matters in hand. The Clients again enterchangeably humbled themselues to their patrons, not only in outward honor & reuerence towards them, but otherwise did help them with mony to marry and aduance their daughters, or else to pay their debts and credite, if they were poore or decayed. There was no law nor magistrate that could compell the patron to be a witnes against his client: nor yet the client to witnes against his patron. So they increased, and continued all other rights & offices of amitie & friendship together, sauing afterwards they thought it a great shame & reproch for the better, and richer, to take reward of the meaner & poorer. And thus of this matter we haue spoken sufficiently. Moreouer, foure moneths after the foundation of the citie was laid, Fabius writeth, there was a great rauishment of women. There are some which lay it vpon Romulus, who being then of nature warlike, & giuen to prophecies and answers of the gods, foretold that his citie should become very great & mighty, so as he raised it by wars, & increased it by armes: & he sought out this colour to do mischiefe, & to make war vpon the SABYNES. To proue this true, some say he caused certain of their maids by force to be taken away, but not past 30. in number, as one that rather sought cause of wars, then did it for need of mariages: which me thinks was not likely to be true, but rather I iudge the contrarie. For seeing his citie was incontinently replenished with people of all sorts, whereof there were very few that had wiues, and that they were men gathered out of all countries, and the most part of them poore & needy, so as their neighbors disdained them much, & did not looke they would long dwell together: Romulus hoping by this violent taking of their maides & rauishing thē, to haue an entry into alliance with the SABYNES, & to entise thē further to ioyne with them in mariage, if they did gently intreat these wiues they had gotten, enterprised this this violent taking of their maides, and rauiſhing of them in ſuch ſort. Firſt he made it to be commonly bruted abroad in euery place, that he had found the altar of a god hidden in the ground, & he called the name of the god, Conſus: either becauſe he was a god of counſel, wherupon the ROMAINES at this day in their tongue call Conſilium, which we cal counſel: & the chiefe magiſtrates of their citie Conſules, as we ſay counſellers. Other ſay it was the altar of the god Neptune, ſurnamed the patron of horſes. For this altar is yet at this day within the great liſtes of the city, and euer couered and hidden, but when they vſe the running games of their horſe race. Other ſay, becauſe counſell euer muſt be kept cloſe and ſecret, they had good reaſon to keepe the altar of this god Conſus hidden in the ground. Now other write, when it was opened, Romulus made a ſacrifice of wonderfull ioy, and afterwades proclaimed it openly in diuers places, that at ſuch a day there ſhould be common playes in ROME, and a ſolemne feaſt kept of the god Conſus, where all that were diſpoſed to come ſhould be welcome. Great numbers of people repaired thither from all parts. He himſelfe was ſet in the chiefeſt ſeate of the ſhow place, apparelled faire in purple, and accompanied with the chiefe of his citie about him. And there hauing purpoſed this rauiſhment you haue heard of, he had giuen the ſigne before: that the ſame ſhould begin, when he ſhould riſe vp and fold a plaite of his gowne, and vnfold the ſame againe. Hereupon his men ſtood attending with their ſwordes: who ſo ſoone as they perceiued the ſigne was giuen, with their ſwordes drawne in hand, and with great ſhouts and cries, ranne violently on the maides and daughters of the SABYNES to take them away and rauiſh them, and ſuffered the men to runne away, without doing them any hurt or violence. So ſome ſay, there were but thirtie rauiſhed, after whoſe names were called the thirty linages of the people of ROME. Howbeit Valerius Antias writeth, that there were fiue hundred & ſeuen & twentie: and Iuba, ſixe hundred foureſcore and three. In the which is ſingularly to be noted for the commendation of Romulus, that he himſelfe did take then but only one of the maides, named Herſilia: that afterwards was the onely cauſe and mediation of peace betwixt the SABYNES and the ROMAINES. Which argueth plainely, that it was not to do the SABYNES any hurt, nor to ſatiſie any diſordinate luſt, that they had ſo forcibly vndertaken this rauiſhment: but to ioyne two peoples together, with the ſtraighteſt bonds that could be betweene men. This Herſilia as ſome ſay, was married vnto one Hoſtilius, the nobleſt man at that time amongſt the ROMAINES: or as others write, vnto Romulus himſelfe, which had two children by her. The firſt was a daughter, and her name was Prima, becauſe ſhe was the firſt: the other was a ſon, whom he named Aollius, becauſe of the multitude of people he had aſſembled together in his city, and afterwards he was ſurnamed Abillius. Thus Zenodotus the TROEZENIAN writeth, wherein notwithſtanding there be diuers that do contrarie him. Among thoſe which rauiſhed then the daughters of the SABYNES, it is ſaid there were found certaine meane men carrying away a maruellous paſſing faire one. Theſe met by chance on the way certaine of the chiefe of the citie, who would haue taken her by force from them, which they had done, but that they began to cry, they carried her vnto Talaſsius, who was a yong man maruellouſly well beloued of euery bodie. Which when the others vnderſtood, they were exceeding glad, and they commended them: inſomuch as there were ſome which ſodainly turned backe againe, and did accompanie them for Talaſsius ſake, crying out aloud, and often on his name. From whence the cuſtome came, which to this day the ROMAINES ſing at their mariages, Talaſsius, like as the GRECIANS ſing Hymeneus. For it is ſayd he was counted very happie that he met with this woman. But Sextius Syllu a CARTHAGINIAN borne, a man very wiſe, and well learned, told me once it was the crie & ſigne which Romulus gaue to his men, to begin the rauiſhment: whereupon thoſe which carried them away, went crying this word Talaſsius, & that frō thence the cuſtome hath continued, that they ſing it yet at their mariages. Neuertheleſſe the moſt part of authors, ſpecially Iuba, thinkes it is a warning to remember the new married women of their worke, which is to ſpinne, which the GRECIANS call Talaſsia, the Italian word at that time being not mingled with the Greeke. And if it be true the ROMAINES vſed this terme of Talaſsia, as we of GRECE do vſe, we might by coniecture yeeld another reaſon for it, which ſhould carrie a better likelihood and proofe. For when the SABYNES after the battell had made peace with the ROMAINES, they put in an article in fauour of the women in the treatie, that they ſhould not be bound to ſerue their husbands in any other worke but in ſpinning of wooll. Euer ſince this cuſtome hath growne, that thoſe which giue their daughters in mariage, and thoſe who leade the bride, and ſuch as are preſent at the wedding, ſpeake in ſport to the new maried wife, laughing, Talaſsius: in token that they do not leade the bride for any other worke or seruice, but to spin wooll. Thereof this hath bene the vse to this day, that the bride doth not of her self come ouer the threshold of her husbands doore, but she is hoised pretily into the house: because the SABYNE women at that time were so lift vp, and caried away by force. They say also, that the manner of making the shed of the new wedded wiues haire, with the yron head of a laueling, came vp then likewise: this storie being a manifest token that these first mariages were made by force of armes, and as it were at the swords point: as we haue written more at large in the booke, wherein we render and shew the causes of the ROMAINES fashions and customes. This rauishment was put in execution about the eighteenth day of the moneth called Sextilis, and now named August: on which day they yet celebrate the feast they call Consalia. Now the SABYNES were good men of warre, and had great numbers of people, but they dwelt in villages, and not within inclosed walles: being a thing fit for their noble courages that did feare nothing, and as those who were descended from the LACEDÆMONIANS. Neuertheless they seeing themselues bound and tied to peace by pledges and hostages, that were very neare allied vnto them, & fearing their daughters should be ill intreated, sent ambassadors to Romulus, by whom they made reasonable offers & perswasions, that their daughters might be deliuered vnto them againe, without any force or violence, and then afterwards, that he would cause them to be asked in mariage of their parents, as both reason & law would require. To the end that with good wil & consent of al parties, both peoples might contract amity & alliance together. Wherunto Romulus made answer, he could not restore the maids which his people had taken away & maried: but most friendly he praied the SABYNES to be contented with their alliance. This answer being returned, & not liked, whilst the princes & cõmunaltie of the SABYNES were occupied in consultatiõ, & about the arming of thẽselues: Acron king of the CENINENSES (a man exceeding couragious & skilful in the wars, & one that from the beginning mistrusted the ouer bold & stout enterprises that Romulus was likely to attempt, considering the late rauishment of the SABYNES daughters, & how he was already greatly dreaded of his neighbours, & somewhat vntollerable, if he were not chastised and brought lower) first began to inuade him with a puissant army, & to make hot & violent wars vpon him. Romulus on the other side prepared also, & went forth to meet him. When they were come so neare together that they might see one another, they sent defiãce to ech other, & praied that they two might fight man to man amidst their armies, & neither of theirs to stir a foot. Both of them accepted of it, & Romulus making his praier vnto Iupiter, did promise, & made a vow: that if he did giue him the victory to ouercome, he wold offer vp to him the armor of his enemie, which he did. For first he slue Acron in the field, & afterwards gaue battell to his men, & ouerthrew them also. Lastly he tooke his citie, where he did no hurt nor yet displeasure to any, sauing that he did command thẽ to pull down their houses, & destroy thẽ, & to go dwell with him at ROME: where they should haue the self same rights & priuiledges which the first inhabitãts did enioy. There was nothing more enlarged the citie of ROME, then this maner of pollicy, to ioyne alwaies vnto it those she had ouercome & vanquished. Romulus now to discharge his vow, and in such sort that his offering might be acceptable to Iupiter, and pleasant to his citizens to behold: did cut down a goodly straight grown yong oke, which he lighted on by good fortune, in the place where his camp did lie: the same he trimmed & did set forth after the maner of victorie, hanging & tying all about it in faire order, the armour & weapons of king Acron. Then he girding his gowne to him, and putting vpon his long bush of haire, a garland of lawrel, laid the yong oke vpon his right shoulder, and he first marched before towards his city, and sung a royall song of victorie, all his armie following him in armes vnto the citie in order of battel: where his citizens receiued him in all passing wise and triumph. This noble and stately entry euer since hath giuen them minds in such sort, and in statelier wise to make their triumph. The offering of this triumph was dedicated to Iupiter surnamed Feretrian: because the Latine word Ferire, signifieth to hurt and kill: and the praier Romulus had made, was, he might hurt & kill his enemie. Such spoiles are called in Latine, Spolia opima: therfore saith Varro, that opes signifie riches. Howbeit me thinks it were more likely to say, that they were so named of this word Opus, which betokeneth a deed, because he must needs be the chiefe of the armie, that hath slaine with his owne hands the Generall of his enemies, and that must offer the spoiles called Spolia opima, as you would say, his principall spoiles and deeds. This neuer happened yet but to three Romaine captaines only: of the which Romulus was the first, who slue Acron king of the CENINENSES. Cornelius Cossus was the second, who killed Tolumnius, the general of the THVSCANS. Clodius Marcellus

Marcellus was the third, who slue Britomartus, king of the GAVLES, with his owne hands. And for the two last, Cossus and Marcellus, they made their entry into the city, carying their triumphes vpon charets triumphant: but Romulus did not so. Therefore in this point Dionysius the historiographer hath erred, writing that Romulus did enter into ROME vpon a charret triumphant. For it was Tarquinius Priscus the son of Demaratus, who first did set out triumphes in so stately and magnificent show. Other hold opinion it was Valerius Publicola, who was the first that euer entred vpon triumphant charret. Concerning Romulus, his statues are yet to be seene in ROME, carying his triumph a foote. After this ouerthrow & taking of the CENINENSES, the inhabitants of the cities of FIDENA, CRVSTVMERIVM, & ANTEMNA, rose all together against the ROMAINES whiles the other SABYNES also were a preparing themselues. So they fought a battell, in which they tooke the ouerthrow: & left their cities to the spoile of Romulus, their lands to be giuē where he thought good, & themselues to be caried to ROME. Romulus then did giue their lands among his citizens, except those lands which did belong to the fathers of the maidens that they had taken away & rauished. For he was contented that the fathers of them should keepe still their lands. By and by the other SABYNES stomaking thereat, did chuse them a generall called Tatius, and so went with a puissant army toward the city of ROME, whereunto to approch at that time it was very hard, the castle or keepe of their city being seated where at this day the Capitoll standeth, within which there was a great garrison, whereof Tarpeius was captaine, & not his daughter Tarpeia, as some will say, who set out Romulus as a foole. But Tarpeia the captaines daughter, for the desire she had to haue all the gold bracelets which they did weare about their armes, sold the fort to the SABYNES, & asked for reward of her treason, all they did weare on their left armes. Tatius promised them vnto her: & she opened them a gate in the night, by the which she did let all the SABYNES into the castle. Antigonus thē was not alone, who said, he loued those which did betray, & hated them that had betrayed: nor yet Cæsar Augustus, who told Rymitalces the THRACIAN, that he loued treason, but he hated traytors. And it is a common affection which we beare to wicked persons, whilest we stand in need of them: not vnlike for all the world to those which haue need of the gall and poyson of venimous beasts. For when they find it, they are glad, & take it to serue their turne: but after their turne is serued, & they haue that they sought, they hate the cruelty of such beasts. So played Tatius at that time. For when he was gotten into the castle, he commanded the SABYNES (for performance of his promise he had made to Tarpeia) they should not sticke to giue her all they ware on their left armes, & to do as he did: who taking from his owne arme first, the bracelets which he ware, did cast it to her, & his target after. And so did all the rest in like sort, in so much as being borne downe to the ground by the weight of bracelets & targets, she died as pressed to death vnder her burden. Neuertheless Tarpeius selfe was atteinted, & condemned also of treason, by Romulus order, as Iuba saith, it is set forth by Sulpitius Galba. They that write now otherwise of Tarpeia, saying she was the daughter of Tatius, generall of the SABYNES, & was forced by Romulus to lye with him, & how she was punished in this sort by her owne father after her said treason committed: those I say, amongst whom Antigonus is one, are not to be credited. And the Poet Simylus also doth dote most, who saith Tarpeia sold the Capitoll not to the SABYNES, but to the king of GAVLES, with whom she was in loue: as in these verses doth appeare:

Tarpeia, that mayde of foolish minde,
which neere vnto the Capitoll did dwell (In feruent flames, of beastly loue beblind, wherewith the king of Gaules did make her swell) Caused stately Rome surprised for to bee
by enemies, as euery man may see.
And so through hope of his fidelity betrayed her Syre, with all his family.

And a litle after, in speaking of the manner of her death, he saith also:

Yet lo: the Gaules, those worthy men of might threw her not downe, into the waues of Po,
But from their armes, wherewith they wont to fight they cast their shields vpon her bodie so,
That she surprest with such an heauy waight,
(Ah wofull maide) to death was smoothred straight.

This maiden therefore being buried in the ſame place, the whole hill was called afterwards Tarpeius after her name, which continued vntill Tarquinius the King did dedicate all the place to Iupiter: for then they caried her bones into ſome other place, and ſo it loſt her name. Vnleſſe it be that rocke of the Capitoll, which at this preſent time they call Rupes Tarpeia, from the top whereof they were wont in old time to throw downe headlong all wicked offenders. When the SABYNES now had gotten this hold, Romulus being exceeding wrath, ſent them a defiance, and bad them battell if they durſt. Tatius ſtraight refuſed not, conſidering if by miſchance they were diſtreſſed, they had a ſure refuge to retire vnto. The place between the two armies where the fight ſhould be, was all round about enuironed with little hilles. So as it was plaine, the fight could not be but ſharpe and dangerous, for the diſcõmodiouſneſſe of the place, where was neither ground for any to flie, nor yet any ſpace for any long chaſe, it was of ſo ſmall a compaſſe. Now it fortuned by chance, the riuer of Tyber had ouerflowne the bankes a few daies before, and there remained in it a deeper mud then men would haue iudged, becauſe the ground was ſo plaine, and was euen where the great market place of ROME ſtandeth at this day. They could diſcerne nothing thereof by the eye, becauſe the vpper part of it was cruſted, whereby it was the more ready for them to venter vpon, and the worſe to get out, for that it did ſinke vnderneath. So the SABYNES had gone vpon it, had not Curtius danger bene, which by good fortune ſtayed them. He was one of the nobleſt and valianteſt men of the SABYNES, who being mounted vpon a courſer, went on a good way before the army. This courſer entring vpon the cruſted mudde, and ſinking withall, began to plunge and ſtruggle in the mire: whereat Curtius proued a while with the ſpurre to ſtirre him, and get him out, but in the end ſeeing it would not be, he left his backe, and ſaued himſelfe. The ſame very place to this day is called after his name, Lacus Curtius. The SABYNES thẽ ſcaping thus this danger, began the battell. The fight did grow very cruell, and endured ſo a great while, the victory leaning no more to the one ſide then to the other. There died in a ſmall ſpace a great number of men, amongeſt whom Hoſtilius was one, who as they ſay was the husband of Herſilia, and grandfather to Hoſtilius that was king of ROMAINES after Numa Pompilius. Afterwards there were (as we may thinke) many other encounters and battels betweene them: howbeit they make mention of the laſt aboue al the reſt, wherein Romulus had ſo ſore a blow on his head with a ſtone, that he was almoſt felled to the ground, in ſo much as he was driuen to retire a litle out of the battell. Vpon which occaſion the ROMAINES gaue backe alſo, and drew towards mount Palatine, being driuen out of the plaine by force. Romulus began now to recouer of the blow he had receiued, and ſo returned to giue a new onſet, and cried out all he might to his ſouldiers to tary, and ſhew their face againe to their enemie. But for all his lowd crying, they left not flying ſtill for life, and there was not one that durſt returne againe. Wherupon Romulus lifting vp his hands ſtraight to heauen, did moſt feruently pray vnto Iupiter, that it would pleaſe him to ſtay the flying of his people, and not ſuffer the ROMAINES glorie thus to fall to their vtter deſtruction, but to repaire it by his fauour againe. He had no ſooner ended his prayer, but diuerſe of his men that fled, began to be aſhamed to flie before their King, and a ſudden boldneſſe came vpon them, and their feare therewithall vaniſhed away. The place they firſt ſtayed in was, whereas now is the temple of Iupiter Stator, which is as much to ſay, as Iupiter the ſtayer. Afterwards gathering themſelues together againe, they repulſed the SABYNES euen to the place they cal now Regia, & vnto the temple of the goddeſſe Veſta: where both the battels being prepared to giue a new charge, there did fall out before them, a ſtrange and vncredible thing to ſee, which ſtayed them they fought not. For of the SABYNE women whom the ROMAINES had rauiſhed, ſome ranne of the one ſide, other of the other ſide of the battels, with lamentations, cries, and ſhowts, ſtepping betweene their weapons, and among the ſlaine bodies on the ground, in ſuch ſort that they ſeemed out of their wits, and caried as it were with ſome ſpirits. In this manner they went to find out their fathers and their husbands, ſome carying their ſucking babes in their armes, other hauing their haire looſe about their eyes, and all of them calling, now vpon the SABYNES, now vpon the ROMAINES, with the genteleſt names that could be deuiſed: which did melt the hearts of both parties in ſuch ſort, that they gaue backe a little, and made them place betweene both the battels. Then were the cryes and lamentations of euery one plainely heard. There was not a man there but it pitied him, as well to ſee them in that pitifull caſe, as to heare the lamentable words they ſpake: adding to their moſt humble petitions and requeſts that could be any way imagined, paſſing wiſe perſwaſions and reaſons to induce them to a peace. For what offence (ſayd they) or what what displeasure haue we done to you, that we should deserue such an heape of euils, as we haue already suffered, and yet you make vs beare? we were as you know violently (and against all law) rauished by those, whose now we remaine. But our fathers, our brethren, our mothers and friends haue left vs with them so long, that processe of time, and the straightest bonds of the world, haue tied as now so fast to them, whom mortally before we hated, that we are constrained now to be slighted thus, to see them fight, yea and to lament and dye with them, who before vniustly tooke vs from you. For then you came not to our rescue when we were virgins vntouched, nor to recouer vs from them when they wickedly assaulted vs, poore soules: but now ye come to take the wiues from their husbands, and the mothers from their litle children. So as the helpe ye thinke to giue vs now doth grieue vs more, then the forsaking of vs was sorrowfull to vs then. Such is the loue they haue borne vnto vs, and such is the kindnesse we beare againe to them. Now, if ye did fight for any other cause then for vs, yet were it reason ye should let fall your armes for our sakes (by whom you are made grandfathers and fathers in law, cosins and brothers in law) euen from those against whom you now bend your force. But if all this war began for vs, we hartily beseech you then that you will receiue vs with your sons in law, and your sons by them, and that you will restore vnto vs our fathers, our brethren, our kinsefolks & friends, without spoyling vs of our husbands, of our children, and of our ioyes, and thereby make vs wofull captiues and prisoners in our minds. These requests and perswasions by Hersilia, and other the SABYNE women being heard, both the armies stayed, and held euery body his hand, and straight the two generals imparled together. During which parle they brought their husbands and their children, to their fathers and their brethren. They brought meate and drinke for them that would eate. They dressed vp the wounds of them that were hurt. They caried them home with them to their houses. They shewed them how they were mistresses there with their husbands. They made them see how greatly they were accompted of and esteemed; yea how with a wedlocke loue and reputation they were honoured. So in the end peace was concluded betweene them, wherein it was articled, that the SABYNE women which would remaine with their husbands should tarry still, and be exempted from all worke or seruice (as aboue recited) saue only spinning of woll. And that the SABYNES and ROMAINES should dwell together in the city, which should be called ROMA, after Romulus name: and the inhabitants should be called Quirites, after the name of the city of Tatius king of the SABYNES, and that they should raigne and gouerne together by a common consent. The place where this peace was concluded, is called yet to this day Comitium: because that Coire, in the Latin toung signifieth to assemble. So the city being augmẽted by the one halfe, they did chuse of the SABYNES another hundred new PATRICIANS, vnto the first hundred of the ROMAINES that were chosen before. Then were the Legions made of 6000. footmen, & 600. horsmen. After they deuided their inhabitants into three Tribes, wherof those that came of Romulus, were called Ramnenses after his name: those that came of Tatius we called Tatienses after his name: & those that were of the third stocke, were called Lucerenses, as from the Latin word Lucus, called with vs a groue in English, because thither great nũber of people of all sorts did gather, which afterwards were made citizens of ROME. The very word of Tribus (which signifieth bands, wards, or hundreds) doth witnesse this beginning of ROME from wards or hundreds. For hereupon the ROMAINES call those at this day, their Tribunes, which are the chiefe heads of the people. But euery one of these principall wards had afterwards ten other particular wards vnder them, which some thinke were called after the names of the thirty SABYNE women that were rauished: but that seemeth false, because many of them carry the names of the places they came from. Howbeit at that time many things were stablished & ordained in honour of women: as to giue them place, the vpper hand in meeting them, the vpper hand in streetes: to speake no fowle or dishoneſt word before them, no man to vnray himselfe, or shew naked before them: that they should not be called before criminall Iudges sitting vpõ homicides & murderers: that their childrẽ should weare about their necks a kind of Iewell, called Bulla, fashioned in maner like these water bubbles that rise vpon the water when it beginneth to raine: & that their gownes should be garded with purple. Now the two kings did not straight confer together so soone as any occasion of businesse was offered them, but either of them did first counsell alone with his hundred Senators, & afterwards they did all assemble together. Tatius dwelt in the place where now is the temple of Iuno Moneta: Romulus in the place called at this present, the staires of the faire banke, then the descent of mount Palatine, as they go to the show place or great listes, where they say was sometime the holy cornell tree, whereof they make so great account. Romulus one day desirous to proue his strength, threw (as it is sayd) a dart from mount Auentine toward mount Palatine. The staffe whereof was of a cornell tree: and the Iron of it entred so deepe into the ground being a lusty fat soyle, that no man could pull it out, although many proued it, and did the best they could. The ground being very good and fit to bring foorth trees, did so nourish the end of this staffe, that it tooke roote, and began to spread branches: so that in time it became a faire great cornell tree, which the successours of Romulus did inclose with a wall, and did keepe and worship it as a very holy thing. If by chaunce any went to see it, and found it looked not fresh and greene, but like a tree withered and dried away for lacke of moisture: he went away straight as one affraide, crying to all he met (and they with him went crying still) in euery place, water, water, as it had beene to haue quenched a fire. Then ranne they thither out of all quarters with vessels of water, to water and moist the tree. In the time of Caius Cæsar, who caused the staires about it to be repaired: they say the labourers raising the place, and digging about this cornell tree, did by negligence hurt the rootes of the same in such sort, as afterwards it dried vp altogether. Now the SABYNES receiued the moneths after the manner of the ROMAINES, whereof we haue written sufficiently in the life of Numa. Romulus againe vsed the SABYNES shields: and both he and his people chaunged the fashion of their armour and weapons they vsed. For the ROMAINES before did carry litle shields after the fashion of the ARGIVES. As for either of their holy dayes and sacrifices, they kept them both altogether, and did not take away any of them, which either the one or the other people obserued before, but they added thereunto some other new. As that which they call Matronalia, which was instituted in honour of the women, because by their meanes peace was concluded. And that also of Carmentalia, in the honour of Carmenta, whom some suppose to be the goddesse of fate or destiny, because she hath rule and power ouer the natiuities of men, by reason whereof, the mothers call vpon her often, and reuerence her very much. Other say she was the wife of Euander the ARCADIAN, who being a propheteesse inspired by the god Phœbus, gaue the Oracles in verse, whereupon she was surnamed Carmenta, because that Carmina in Latin signifie verses: for it is of certainty that her proper name was Nicostrata. Howbeit there are some which giue another manner of deriuation and interpretation of this word Carmenta, which is the likelier to be true: as if they would say, Carens mente: which signifieth wanting wit, for the very fury that taketh them when they are inspired with the propheticall spirit. For in Latine Carere betokeneth to lacke: and Mens, signifieth wit. As for the feast of Palilia, we haue told of it before: but the feast of Lupercalia, considering the time of celebrating thereof, it seemeth it is ordeined for a purification. For it is celebrated on the vnfortunate dayes of the moneth of Februarie, which are called the purging dayes. The dayes in the old time on which they did celebrate the same, were called Februata. But the proper name of the feast, is as much to say, as the feast of Wolues. Wherefore it seemeth to be a feast of great antiqnity, and instituted by the ARCADIANS which came in with Euander: albeit the name of Wolues is as common to the females, as the males, and so it mighr perhaps be called, by reason of the Wolfe that brought vp Romulus. For we see those which runne vp and downe the city that day, and they call Luperci, do begin their course in the very place where they say Romulus was cast out. Howbeit many things are done, wherof the originall cause were hard now to be coniectured. For goates about a certaine time of the yeare, are killed, then they bring two yong boyes, Noble mens sons, whose foreheads they touch with the knife bebloudied with the bloud of the goates that are sacrificed. By & by they dry their foreheads with woll dipped in milke. Then the yong boyes must laugh immediatly after they haue dried their foreheads. That done, they cut the goates skins, & make thongs of thē, which they take in their hands, & run with thē all about the city starke naked (sauing they haue a cloth before their secrets) & so they strike with these thongs all they meet in their way. The yong wiues do neuer shun them at al, but are well cōtented to be striken with thē, beleeuing it helpeth them to be with child, and also to be easily deliuered. There is another thing yet in this feast, that these LVPERCIANS which runne about the citie, do also sacrifice a dogge. Concerning this feast, the Poet named Butas doth write somewhat in his elegies, where shewing the occasion of the fond customes and ceremonies of the ROMAINES, he doth say that Romulus after that he had slaine Amulius, did runne straight with great ioy to the very place where the Wolfe gaue him and his brothher sucke, in memorie of which running, he saith this feast of Lupercalia was celebrated: and that the noble mens younger sonnes do runne through the citie, striking ſtriking & laying on thē which they meet in their way with their goat thongs, in tokē that Remus & Romulus ran from ALBA vnto that place, with their drawn ſwords in their hands. And that the touching of their forehead with a bloudy knife, is in remēbrance of the danger they ſtood in at that time to haue bene ſlaine. Laſt of all, the drying of their foreheads with wooll dipped in milk, is in memory of the milk they ſucked of the Wolues. But Caius Acilius writeth, that Remus & Romulus before ROME was built, did happen to loſe their beaſts on a day, and after they had made certain prayers vnto Faunus for the finding of thē, they ran here & there ſtark naked as they went a ſeeking of thē, for feare they ſhold haue bin troubled with ouermuch heat & ſweating. And this is the cauſe he ſaith, why the LVPERCIANS do at this day run about naked. And if it be true, they make this ſacrifice for a purging, a man might ſay they might offer vp a dog for that purpoſe, like as the GRECIANS in their ſacrifices of purgation, do vſe to carry out all their dogs. And in many places they do obſerue this ceremony, to driue out the dogs, which they call Periſcylaciſmes. Otherwiſe, if it be of a thankfulnes to the Wolfe that gaue Romulus ſuck, & ſaued him frō periſhing, that the ROMAINES do ſolemnize this feaſt: it is not impertinent they ſhold ſacrifice a dog, becauſe he is an enemy to the Wolues. Vnleſſe a man would ſay it was to puniſh this beaſt, which troubleth & letteth the LVPERCIANS when they run. Some ſay alſo it was Romulus, who firſt inſtituted it a religion to keep holy fire, & that firſt ordained holy virgins, which are called Veſtales: other do aſcribe it to Numa Pompilius. Notwithſtanding it is moſt certain otherwiſe, that Romulus was a very deuout man, & greatly skilful in telling of things to come by the flying of birds: for which cauſe he did ordinarily cary the augurs crooked ſtaffe, called in latin Lituus. It is a rod crooked at the end, wherwith the augurs or ſoothſaiers whē they ſit down to behold the flying of birds, do point out & mark the quarters of the heauen. They carefully kept it within the pallace: howbeit it was loſt in the time of wars with the GAVLES, when the city of ROME was taken. Afterwards when theſe barbarous people were chaſed & driuē out, it was found again (as it is ſaid) all whole, within a great hill or heape of aſhes, hauing no manner of hurt, where all things elſe about it had bin conſumed & marred with the fire. He is ſaid to haue made certaine lawes, among which there is one that ſeemeth ſomwhat hard, which is: that the man is ſuffered to put away his wife, & in ſome caſe to giue her nothing: & like libertie is not giuen to the wife to put away her husband. As if ſhe may be proued to haue conſented to the poiſoning of her children, or to haue counterfeited her husbands keys, or to haue cōmitted adultery. But if he put her away for any other cauſe, then the one halfe of the goods is adiudged to the wife, & the other moity to the goddeſſe Ceres: & he that putteth away his wife after this ſort, is cōmanded further to ſacrifice to the goddes of the earth. This alſo was notable in Romulus, who hauing ordained no pain nor puniſhment for parricides (that is, for thoſe that kil their parents) called yet al murther parricide, to ſhew how deteſtable that murder was; and as for parricides, he thought it vnpoſſible. And it ſeemed a great while, he had reaſon to think ſo, that ſuch wickednes wold neuer happē in the world. For in 600. yeres together it was not knowne that any man in ROME cōmitted ſuch an offence: and the firſt parricide with them was Lucius Oſtius, after the wars of Hannibal. But enough touching this matter. Furthermore in the firſt yeare of the raign of Tatius, ſome of his kinſemen & friends met by chance on the way certaine ambaſſadors, coming from the city of LAVRENTVM vnto ROME, whō they ſet vpon, & meant to haue robbed thē. The ambaſſadors reſiſting thē, & not willing to deliuer their mony, they made no more a do, but ſlue thē. This hainous deed being thus cōmitted, Romulus was of opinion they ſhold be executed openly in the high way for example. But Tatius deferred it ſtill from day to day, & did alwaies excuſe the matter vnto him, which was the only cauſe they fell out one with the other. For in all things elſe, they caried themſelues as honeſtly as might be the one to the other, ruling and gouerning together, with a common cōſent & good accord. But the parents and kinſefolkes of thoſe who were murdered, when they ſaw they could haue no iuſtice becauſe of Tatius: watched him one day as he ſacrificed with Romulus, in the city of Lauiniū, & ſtabbed him in, without offering Romulus any violence, but rather praiſed him for a good & righteous prince. Romulus cauſed the body of Tatius to be ſtraight taken vp, & buried him very honorably in mount Auentine, about the place now called Armiluſtriū. Further he neuer ſhewed any countenance to reuenge his death. There are ſome Hiſtoriographers that write, that thoſe of the city of Laurentum being afraid at this murder, did deliuer forthwith to Romulus the murderers of the ambaſſadours. He notwithſtanding did let them go againe, ſaying: one murther was requited by another. This gaue ſome occaſion of ſpeech to thinke, he was glad he was rid of his cõpanion: yet the Sabynes neither ſtirred nor rebelled for all this, but ſome of thẽ were afraid of him for the great loue they bare him, other for his power he was of, & other for the honor they gaue him as a god, continuing ſtill in dutie & obedience towards him. Diuers ſtrangers alſo had Romulus valiancie in great honor: as amongſt other, thoſe who then were called the ancient Latines, which ſent ambaſſadors to him to make league & amitie with him. He deuiſed to take the city of FIDENA which was nere neighbor to ROME. Some ſay he took it vpon a ſuddẽ, hauing ſent before certaine horſmen to breake downe the hookes & hinges with force, which the gates hang by: & himſelf came after with the reſt of his armie, & ſtale vpon them, before the city miſtruſted any thing. Other write that the FIDENATES firſt inuaded his countrie, and foraged vnto the very ſuburbes of ROME, where they did great harme: & how Romulus laid an ambuſh in their way as they returned home, & ſlue a great number of them. When he took their citie, he did not raze it, but made a colony of it, (as a place to ſend the ouer-increaſe of ROME vnto) whither he ſent afterwards two thouſand fiue hundred ROMAINES to inhabit there: & it was on the 13. day of April, which the ROMAINES call the Ides of the ſame moneth. Not long after there roſe ſuch a great plague in ROME, that men died ſuddenly, and were not ſicke: the earth brought forth no fruit: bruite beaſts deliuered no increaſe of their kind: there rained alſo drops of bloud in ROME, as they ſay. In ſo much as beſides the euils men felt in this extremity, they fell in a maruellous feare of the wrath of the gods. Afterwards perceiuing the like hapned to the inhabitants of LAVRENTVM, then euery man iudged it was the very vengeance & heauie hand of the gods: who plagued and puniſhed theſe two cities for the murder committed vpon Tatius, and the ambaſſadors that were killed. Wherupon the murderers of both ſides were apprehended & executed: & theſe plagues by & by ceaſed both in the one and the other city. Romulus beſides, did purifie the cities with certaine ſacrifices that he deuiſed, which they keepe ſtill at this day, at the gate called Ferentina. But before the plague ceaſed, the CAMERINES came to aſſault the ROMAINS, and had ouercome all the countrie, ſuppoſing they ſhould not be able to withſtand thẽ, becauſe they had bene ſo ſore troubled with the plague. Yet notwithſtanding, Romulus ſet vpon them with his armie, & wan the field of them, in which conflict there were ſlaine about ſixe thouſand men. After the battell done, he tooke their citie, and conueyed to ROME the one halfe of the inhabitants that remained. After this he ſent twiſe as many ROMANES as there were naturall CAMERIANS left at CAMERINE, to dwell there among them. This was done the 1. day of Auguſt: ſo great was the multitude of the inhabitants of ROME that had increaſed in 16. yeares from the firſt foundation of the citie. Among other ſpoiles he got there, he carried away a charret of braſſe with foure horſes, which he cauſed to be ſet vp in the temple of Vulcan, and his owne ſtatue vpon it, and victorie crowning him with a garland triumphant. His power being growne thus great, his weake neighbours did ſubmit themſelues vnto him, being contented to liue in peace by him. His ſtronger neighbours were afraid of him, and enuied much his greatneſſe, and did take it no good pollicie to ſuffer him thus to riſe in the face of the world, and thought it meet ſpeedily to daunt his glorie, and clippe his wings. The firſt of the THVSCANES that bent their power againſt him, were the VEIANS, who had a great countrey, and dwelled in a ſtrong and mightie citie. To picke a quarrell to him, they ſent to haue redeliuered to them the citie of FIDENA, which they ſaid belonged vnto them. This was thought not onely vnreaſonable, but a thing worthie laughing at, conſidering that all the while the FIDENATES were in warre & dinger, the THVSCANES neuer came to their aide, but had ſuffered them to be ſlaine, & then came to demaund their lands and tenements, when other had poſſeſſion of them. Therefore Romulus hauing giuen them an anſwere full of mockerie, and deriſion, they deuided their power into two armies, and ſent the one againſt them of FIDENA, and with the other they marched towards ROME. That which went againſt the citie of FIDENA, preuailed, and killed there two thouſand ROMAINES: the other was ouerthrowne & diſcomfited by Romulus, in which there died eight thouſand VEIANS. Afterwards, they met againe ſomewhat nere the citie of the FIDENATES, where they fought a battell: and all did confeſſe, the chiefeſt exploit was done by Romulus owne hands that day, who ſhewed all the skill and valiantnes that was to be looked for in a worthie captaine. It ſeemed that day, he farre exceeded the common ſort of men, in ſtrength of bodie & feates of armes. Neuertheles that which ſome ſay, is hardly to be credited: and to be plaine, is out of all compaſſe of beliefe and poſſibilitie. For they write, there were 14. thouſand men ſlaine at that battell, and that more then halfe of them were ſlaine by Romulus owne hands: and

& the rather, for that euery man iudgeth it a vaine bragge and oſtentation which the MESSENIANS report of Ariſtomenes, who offered in ſacrifice to the gods three hundred beaſtes of victorie, as for ſo many LACEDÆMONIANS himſelf had ſlaine in the battell. Their armie being thus broken, Romulus ſuffered them to flye who by ſwiftnes could ſaue themſelues, & marched with all his power in good array towards their city. The citizens then conſidering their late great loſſe and ouerthrow, would not hazard the danger of withſtanding him, but went out all together, & made their humble petition and ſute for peace. All was granted them for a hundred yeares, ſaue they ſhould forgo their territorie called Septemagium, that was the ſeuenth part of their countrie: and yeeld to the ROMAINES all their ſalt houſes by the riuers ſide, & deliuer fiftie of their chiefeſt citizens for their pledges. Romulus made his entrie & triumph into ROME for them, the day of the Ides of October, which is the fifteenth day of the ſame moneth, leading in his triumph many priſoners taken in thoſe wars: & among other, the generall of the VEIANS, a very ancient man who fondly behaued himſelfe in his charge, and ſhewed by his doings, that his experience was farre ſhort for his yeares in the warres. And from thence it commeth, when they offer to the gods to giue thankes for this victorie, that euen at this day, they bring to the Capitol through the market place, an olde man apparelled in a purple robe, and with a Iewell called Bulla about his neck, which the gentlemens young children weare about their neckes: and a herauld goeth hard by him, crying, who büieth who, the SARDIANIANS? becauſe they hold opinion the THVSCANES are come of the SARDIANIANS, & the very citie of VEIES ſtandeth in the countrie of THVSCANE. This was the laſt warre that Romulus had offered him: after which he could not beware of that which is wont to happen almoſt to all thoſe, who by ſudden proſperitie, and fortunes ſpeciall fauour, are raiſed to high and great eſtate. For truſting to proſperitie and good ſucceſſe of his actes, he began to grow more ſtrange and ſtately, and to carrie a ſowrer countenance then he was wont to do before: leauing to be after his old maner, a courteous & gracious prince: and gaue himſelfe in faſhions to be ſomewhat like a tyrant, both for his apparell, and ſtately port and maieſtie that he caried. For he ware euer a coate of purple in graine, and vpon that, a long robe of purple colour: and gaue audience, ſitting in a wide chaire of eſtate, hauing euer about him young men called Celeres, as we would ſay, ſlights for their ſwiftnes and ſpeed in executing of his commandements. Other there were that went before him, who caried as it were tipſtaues in their hands, to make the people giue roome, and had leather thongs about their middle to bind faſt ſtreight, all the prince ſhould command. Now in old time the LATINES ſaid, Ligare was to bind: but at this preſent they ſay Alligare, from whence it commeth that the vſhers and ſergeants are called Lictores. Howbeit me thinkes it were more likely to ſay, they had put to a c, and that before they were called Litores, without a c. For they be the very ſame which the GRECIANS call Liturgos, and be in Engliſh, miniſters or officers: and at this day, Leitos, or Leos, in the GREEKE toung ſignifieth the people. Romulus now after his grandfather Numitor was dead at the citie of ALBA, and that the Realme by inheritance fell to him: to winne the fauour of the people there, turned the Kingdome to a Common weale, and euery yeare did chuſe a new magiſtrate to miniſter iuſtice to the SABYNES. This preſident taught the noble men of ROME to ſeek & deſire to haue a free eſtate, where no ſubiect ſhould be at the commandement of a King alone, & where euery man ſhold command & obey as ſhold be his courſe. Thoſe which were called Patricians in ROME, did meddle with nothing, but had only an honorable name & robe, and were called to counſell rather for a faſhion, then to haue their aduice or counſell. For when they were aſſembled together, they did only heare the Kings pleaſure & cõmandemẽt, but they might not ſpeake one word, & ſo departed: hauing no other preheminence ouer the cõmon wealth, ſauing they were the firſt that did know what was don. Al other things therby did grieue thẽ leſſe. But when of his owne meere authority, & as it were of himſelf, he would as pleaſed him, beſtow the conquered lands of his enemies to his ſoldiers, & reſtore again to the VEIANS their hoſtages as he did: therein plainly appeared, how great iniurie he did to the Senate. Wherupon the Senatours were ſuſpected afterwards that they killed him, when within few daies after it was ſaid, he vaniſhed away ſo ſtrangely, that no man euer knew what became of him. This was on the ſeuẽth day of the moneth now called Iuly, which then was named Quintilis, leauing no manner of certaintie els of his death that is knowne, ſaue onely of the day & the time when he vaniſhed, as we haue ſaid before. For on that day, the ROMAINES do at this preſent many things, in remẽbrance of the misfortune which happened to them then. It is no maruell, the certaintie of his death was not knowne: ſeeing Scipio Africanus was found after ſupper dead in his houſe, and no man could tell, nor yet did know how he died. For ſome ſay that he fainted and died ſodainly being of weake complexion. Other ſay he poiſoned himſelfe: other thinke his enemies did get ſecretly in the night into his houſe, and ſmothered him in his bed. Yet they found his bodie layd on the ground, that euery bodie might at leiſure conſider, if they could find or coniecture the manner of his death. Howbeit Romulus vaniſhed away ſodainely, there was neither ſeene peece of his garments, nor yet was there found any part of his body. Therfore ſome haue thought that the whole Senatours fell vpon him together in the temple of Vulcan, and how after they had cut him in peeces, euery one caried away a peece of him, folded cloſe in the skirt of his robe. Other thinke alſo, this vaniſhing away was not in the temple of Vulcan, nor in the preſence of the Senatours onely: but they ſay that Romulus was at that time without the citie, neare the place called the goates marſh, where he made an oration to the people, and that ſodainely the weather chaunged, and ouercaſt ſo terribly, as it is not to be told nor credited. For firſt, the Sunne was darkened as if it had bene very night: this darkeneſſe was not in a calme or ſtill, but there fell horrible thunders, boiſterous winds, and flaſhing lightnings on euery ſide, which made the people runne away, and ſcatter here and there, but the Senatours kept ſtill cloſe together. Afterwards when the lightning was paſt and gone, the day cleered vp, and the element waxed faire as before: then the people gathered together againe, and ſought for the King, asking what was become of him. But the noble men would not ſuffer them to enquire any further after him, but counſelled them to honour and reuerence him as one taken vp into heauen: and that thenceforth in ſtead of a good King, he would be vnto them a mercifull and gracious god. The meaner ſort of people (for the moſt part of them) took it well, and were very glad to here thereof, and went their way worſhipping Romulus in their hearts, with good hope they ſhould proſper by him. Howbeit ſome ſeeking out the troth more eagerly did cumber ſore, and troubled the PATRICIANS, accuſing them, that they abuſed the cõmon people with vaine & fond perſwaſions, whilſt thẽſelues in the meane time had murdered the king with their owne hands. While things were thus in hurly burly, ſome ſay there was one Iulius Proculus, the nobleſt of all the PATRICIANS, being eſteemed for a maruellous honeſt man, & known to haue bene very familiar with Romulus, and came with him from the city of ALBA: that ſtepped forth before all the people, and affirmed (by the greateſt and holieſt othes a man might ſweare) that he had met Romulus on the way, farre greater and fairer, then he had ſeen him euer before, and armed all in white armour, ſhining bright like fire: whereat being affraide in that ſort to ſee him, he asked him yet: O King, why haſt thou thus left and forſaken vs, that are ſo falſely accuſed and charged to our vtter diſcredite and ſhame, by thy vaniſhing? To whom Romulus gaue this aunſwer. Proculus, it hath pleaſed the gods from whom I came, that I ſhould remaine amongeſt men ſo long as I did: and now hauing built a city, which in glory and greatneſſe of empire ſhall be the chiefeſt of the world, that I ſhould returne againe to dwell with them, as before, in heauen. Therefore be of good comfort, and tell the ROMAINES, that they exerciſing proweſſe and temperancie, ſhall be the mightieſt and greateſt people of the world. As for me, tell them I will hencefoorth be their god, protector, and patron, and they ſhall call me Quirinus. Theſe words ſeemed credible to the ROMAINES, aſwell for the honeſtie of the man that ſpake vnto them, as for the ſolemne othes he made before them all. Yet I wote not how, ſome celeſtiall motion, or diuine inſpiration helped it much: for no man ſaid a word againſt it. And ſo all ſuſpition and accuſation laid aſide, euerie man began to call vpon Quirinus, to pray vnto him, and to worſhip him. Truly this tale is much like the tales that the GRECIANS tell of Ariſteas the Proconneſian, and of Cleomedes the Aſtypalæian. For they ſay, that Ariſteas died in a fullers worke-houſe, and his friends comming to carrie away his bodie, it fell out they could not tell what became of it: and at that inſtant there were ſome which came out of the fields, and affirmed they met and ſpake with him, and how he kept his way towards the citie of CROTONA. It is ſaid alſo that Cleomedes was more then a man naturally ſtrong & great, and therewithall mad, & furious haſtie. For after many deſperate parts he had playd, he came at the laſt on a day into a ſchoole-houſe full of little children, the roofe whereof was borne with one pillar, which he did hit with ſo terrible a blow of his fiſt, that he brake it the middeſt, ſo as the whole roofe fell and daſhed the poore children in peeces. The people ranne ſtraight after him to take him; but he threw himſelfe forthwith into a cheſt, and pulled the lid vpon him. He held it ſo faſt downe, that many ſtriuing together all they could to open it, they were not able once to ſtirre it. Wherupon they brake the cheſt all all in peeces, but they found the man neither quicke nor dead. Whereat they were maruellously amazed, and sent to Apollo Pythias, where the propheteſſe anſwered them in this verſe:

The 17. day of July an vnfortunate day to the Romaines. The death of Scipio Africanus.

Cleomedes the laſt of the demy gods.

The report goeth alſo that Alcmenes corſe did vaniſh away, as they caried it to buriall, and how in ſtead thereof they found a ſtone layd in the beere. To conclude, men tell many other ſuch wonders, that are farre from any apparance of troth: onely becauſe they would make men to be as gods, and equall with them in power. It is true, that as to reproue and deny diuine power, it were a lewd and wicked part: euen ſo to compare earth and heauen together, it were a meere folly. Therefore we muſt let ſuch fables go, being moſt certaine that as Pindarus ſayth it is true:

Alcmenes body vaniſhed out of the beere.

Each liuing corps, muſt yeeld at laſt to death,
and euery life muſt leeſe his vitall breath:
The ſoule of man, that onely liues on hie,
and is an image of eternitie.

The ſoule eternall.

For from heauen it came, and thither againe it doth returne, not with the body, but then ſooneſt, when the ſoule is furtheſt off and ſeparated from the body, and that ſhe is kept holy, and is no more defiled with the fleſh. It is that the Philoſopher Heraclitus meant, when he ſayd: The dry light, is the beſt ſoule which flieth out of the body, as lightning doth out of the cloud: but that which is ioyned with the body being full of corporall paſſions, is a groſſe vapor, darke and maſſie, and cannot flame, ariſe or ſhoote out like lightning. We muſt not beleeue therefore, that the bodies of noble and vertuous men, do go vp together with their ſoules into heauen, againſt the order of nature. But this we are certainely to beleeue, that by the vertues of their ſoules (according to diuine nature and iuſtice) they do of men become ſaints, and of ſaints halfe gods, and of halfe gods, entier and perfect gods: after that they are perfectly (as it were by ſacrifices of purgation) made cleane and pure, being deliuered from all paine and mortality, and not by any ciuill ordinance, but in troth and reaſon, they receiue a moſt happy and glorious end. Now touching Romulus ſurname, which afterwards was called Quirinus: ſome ſay that it ſignifieth as much as warlike: other thinke he was ſo called becauſe the Romaines themſelues were called Quirites. Other write, that men in old time did call the point of a ſpeare, on the dart it ſelfe, Quiris: by reaſon whereof the image of Iuno ſurnamed Quiritides, was ſet vp with an iron ſpeare, and the ſpeare which was conſecrated in the Kings pallace, was called Mars. Furthermore it is an vſe amongſt men, to honor them with a ſpeare or dart, which haue ſhewed themſelues valiant in the wars: and that for this cauſe Romulus was ſurnamed Quirinus, as who would ſay, god of the ſpeares & wars. There was ſince built a temple vnto him, in the hill called Quirinus, and ſo named of him. The day whereon he vaniſhed, is called the flying of the people, or otherwiſe the Nones of the goates. For on that day, they go out of the city to do ſacrifice in the place called the Fenne, or the goates marſh: and the Romaines call a goate, Capra. As they go thus together, they call with lowd ſhowtes and cryes vpon diuerſe Romaines names, as Marcus, Cneus, and Gaius, in token of the flying that was then: & that they called one another backe againe, as they ran away in great feare & diſorder. Howbeit other ſay, that it is not done to ſhew the running away, but to ſhew their ſpeed and diligence, and referre it to the ſtory. Now after the Gavles that had taken Rome were expulſed by Camillus, the city was ſo weakned, that they could ſcant recouer their force & ſtrēgth againe: wherfore many of the Latines ioyning together, went with a great mighty army, vnder the conduct of Liuius Poſthumius, to warre againſt the Romaines. This Poſthumius brought his campe as neere the city of Rome as he could, and ſent to the Romaines by a trumpet to let them vnderſtand, how the Latines were deſirous by new mariages, to reſtore their old ancient amity and kindred that was neere hand decayed betweene them: & therefore if the Romaines would ſend them a conuenient number of their daughters and yong widowes to mary with them, they would haue peace, as they had before time with the Sabynes, vpon the like occaſion. The Romaines hereat were ſore troubled, thinking that to deliuer their women in ſuch ſort was no better, then to yeeld and ſubmit themſelues to their enemies. But as they were thus perplexed, a waiting maide called Philotis (or as other call her, Tutola) gaue them counſell to do neither the one nor the other, but to vſe a pollicy with them, by meanes whereof they ſhould ſcape the danger of the warres, and ſhould alſo not be tied nor bound by any pledges. The deuiſe was, they ſhould ſend to the Latines her ſelfe, and a certaine number of their faireſt bond-maydes, trimmed vp like gentlewomen and the beſt citizens daughters, and that in the night ſhe would lift them vp a burning torch in the aire, at which ſigne they ſhould come armed, and ſet vpon their enemies as they lay aſleepe. This was brought to paſſe: and the LATINES thought verily they had bene the ROMAINES daughters. Philotis failed not in the night to lift vp her ſigne, and to ſhew them a burning torch in the top of a wild fig-tree: and did hang certaine couerlets & clothes behind it, that the enemies might not ſee the light, and the ROMAINES contrariwiſe might diſcerne it the better. Thereupon ſo ſoone as the ROMAINES ſaw it, they ran with all ſpeed, calling one another by their names, and iſſued out of the gates of the city with great haſt: and ſo tooke their enemies vpon a ſudden, and ſlue them. In memory of which victory, they do yet ſolemnize the feaſt called the Nones of the goates, becauſe of the wild fig-tree called in Latine Caprificus. And they do feaſt the womē without the city, vnder ſhadows made of the boughes of fig-trees. The waiting maides, they run vp and downe, and play here and there together. Afterwards they ſeeme to fight, & throw ſtones one at another, as then they did when they holpe the ROMAINES in their fight. But few writers do auow this tale, becauſe it is on the day time that they call ſo each other by their names, and that they go to the place which they call the goates marſh, as vnto a ſacrifice. It ſeemeth this agreeth better with the firſt hiſtory when they called one another by their names in the night, going againſt the LATINES: vnleſſe peraduenture theſe two things after many yeares happened vpon one day. Furthermore, they ſay Romulus was taken out of the world, when he was foure and fiftie yeares of age, and had raigned eight and thirty yeares by accompt.

THE COMPARISON OF Theſeus with Romulus.

THVS haue we declared all things of Theſeus and Romulus worthy memory. But to compare the one with the other, it appeareth firſt that Theſeus of his owne voluntarie will, without compulſion of any (when he might with ſafety haue raigned in the city of TROEZEN, and ſucceeded his grandfather in no ſmall kingdome) did deſire of himſelfe, and rather ſought meanes to aſpire to great things: and that Romulus on the other ſide, to deliuer himſelfe from bondage and ſeruitude that lay ſore vpon him, and to eſcape the threatned puniſhment which ſtill did hang ouer his head, was certainely compelled (as Plato ſaith) to ſhew himſelfe hardy for feare: who ſeeing how extreamly he was like to be hādled, was of very force cōſtrained to ſeeke aduenture, & hazard the enterpriſe of attaining high & great things. Moreouer the chiefeſt act that euer he did was, when he ſlue one only tyrant of the city of ALBA called Amulius: where Theſeus in his iourney only, as he trauelled, gaue his mind to great enterpriſes, and ſlue Sciron, Scinnis, Procruſtes, & Corynetes. And by ridding them out of the world, he deliuered GRECE of all thoſe cruell tyrants, before any of thoſe knew him whom he had deliuered from them. Furthermore, he might haue gone to ATHENS by ſea, & neuer needed to haue trauelled, or put himſelfe in danger with theſe robbers, conſidering he neuer receiued hurt by any of them: whereas

Romulus could not be in safety whileſt Amulius liued. Hereupon it may be alledged, that Theſeus vnprouoked by any priuate wrong or hurt receiued, did ſet vpon theſe deteſtable theeues & robbers: Remus and Romulus contrariwiſe, ſo long as the tyrant did them no harme, did ſuffer him to oppreſſe and wrong all other. And if they alledge theſe were noble deeds, and worthy memorie: that Romulus was hurt fighting againſt the SABYNES, and that he ſlue king Acron with his owne hands, & that he had ouercome & ſubdued many of his enemies: then for Theſeus on the other ſide may be obiected, the battel of the CENTAVRI, the wars of the AMAZONS, the tribute due to the king of CRETA: & how he ventured to go himſelfe thither with the yong boyes & wenches of ATHENS, as willingly offering himſelfe to be deuoured by a cruell beaſt, or els to be ſlaine & ſacrificed vpō the tombe of Androgeus, or to become bondſlaue & tied in captiuity to the vile ſeruice of cruell men & enemies, if by his courage & manhood he could not deliuer himſelfe. This was ſuch an act of magnanimity, iuſtice & glory, & briefly of ſo great vertue, that it is vnpoſſible truly to be ſet out. Surely me thinkes the philoſophers did not ill define loue, when they ſaid ſhe was a ſeruitour of the gods, to ſaue yong folkes, whom they thought meete to be preſerued. For, the loue of Ariadne was in mine opinion the worke of ſome god, & a meane purpoſely prepared for Theſeus ſafety. Therfore the woman is not to be reproched nor blamed for the loue ſhe bare Theſeus, but rather it is much to be wondred at, that euery man and woman in like wiſe did not loue him. And if of her ſelfe ſhe fell in loue with him, I ſay (and not without cauſe) ſhe afterwards deſerued to be beloued of a god, as one that of her owne nature loued valiantneſſe & honor, & entertained men of ſingular value. But both Theſeus & Romulus being naturally giuen to rule & raigne, neither the one nor the other kept the true forme of a king, but both of them did degenerate alike: the one changing himſelfe into a popular man, the other to a very tyrant. So that by ſundry humors, they both fell into one miſchiefe and error. For a prince aboue all things muſt keepe his eſtate: which is no leſſe preſerued by doing nothing vncomely, as by doing all things honorably. But he that is more ſeuere or remiſſe then he ſhould be, remaineth now no more a king or a prince, but becommeth a people-pleaſer, or a cruell tyrant: & ſo cauſeth his ſubiects to deſpiſe or hate him. Yet me thinkes the one is an error of too much pitty and baſeneſſe: and the other of too much pride and cruelty. But if we may not charge fortune with all miſchances happening vnto men, but that we ought to conſider in them the diuerſities of maners and paſſions, ſeeing anger is vnreaſonable, & wrath raſh and paſſionate: then can we not cleare the one, nor excuſe the other of extreme rage and paſſion, in the fact committed by the one againſt his brother, and by the other againſt his naturall ſon. Howbeit the occaſion and beginning of anger doth much excuſe Theſeus, who moued with the greateſt cauſe that might be, was put into ſuch choller and paſſion. But if Romulus variance with his brother had proceeded of any matter of counſell, or cauſe of the common-weales: there is none ſo ſimple to thinke, that his wiſdome would ſo ſuddenly haue ſet vpon him. Where as Theſeus in contrary maner killed his ſon, prouoked by thoſe paſſions that few men can auoide: to wit, loue, iealouſie, and falſe report of his wife. Moreouer Romulus anger went to the effect, wherof the iſſue fell out very lamentable: Theſeus anger ſtretched no further, thē to rough words, and old folkes curſes in their heate. For it ſeemeth, curſed fortune, & naught elſe, was the cauſe of his ſons only miſhap, as foreſpoken and wiſhed for ſomewhat by his father. Theſe be the ſpeciall things may be alledged for Theſeus. But for Romulus this was a notable thing in him. Firſt his beginning being very low and meane, and his brother and he taken for bondmen, & the children of hogheards, before they were themſelues all free, they ſet at liberty in maner all the LATINES, winning at one inſtant many titles of glory and honour: as deſtroyers of their enemies, defenders of their parents, Kings of nations, founders of new cities, and no ouerthrowers of the old, where as Theſeus of many habitations and houſes made onely one, and did ouerthrow and plucke downe diuerſe ſtates, bearing the names of ancient kings, princes, & halfe gods of ATTICA. All theſe alſo did Romulus afterwards, & compelled his enemies whom he had ouercome, to deſtroy their owne houſes, and to come and dwell with their conquerours. And in the beginning, he neuer changed nor increaſed any city that was built before, but built himſelfe a new city out of the ground, getting all together, land, country, kingdome, kindred & mariages, without loſing or killing any man: and to the contrary, rather he did good to many poore vacabonds, who had neither countrey, lands, nor houſes, and deſired nothing elſe but to make a people amongſt them, and to become citizens of ſome city. Alſo Romulus bent not himſelfe to follow theeues and robbers, but ſubdued by force of armes many mighty and puiſſant people: he tooke cities, and triumphed ouer kings and princes which he had vanquiſhed in battell. And touching the murder of Remus, it is not certainly knowne of whoſe hands he died. The moſt part of authors do charge other with the death of him. But it is certaine that Romulus deliuered his mother from apparant death, and reſtored his grandfather to the royall throne of AEneas, who before was depoſed and brought from a king to ſeruile obedience, without any regard of honor or dignity; to whom he did many moe great pleaſures and ſeruices. Beſides he neuer offended him willingly, no not ſo much as ignorantly. Contrarily I thinke Theſeus, who failing by negligence to put out his white ſaile at his returne, cannot be cleared of parricide, how eloquent an oration ſoeuer could be made for his excuſe: yea though it were before the moſt fauorable iudges that could be. Wherefore an ATHENIAN verie well perceiuing that it was no hard thing to excuſe and defend ſo fowle a fault, doth faine that the good old man AEgeus hauing newes brought him that his ſonnes ſhip was at hand, did run in ſo great haſt to his caſtell, to ſee his ſon arriue a far off, that as he ran, his foot hit againſt ſomething, and ouerthrew him: as though he had none of his people about him, or that neuer a man ſeeing him run ſo haſtily to the ſea ſide, did make haſte to attend & waite vpon him. Furthermore, Theſeus faults touching women and rauiſhments, of the twaine, had the leſſe ſhadow and colour of honeſty. Becauſe Theſeus did attempt it very often: for he ſtole away Ariadne, Antiope, & Anaxo the TROEZENIAN. Againe, being ſtepped in yeares, and at later age, and paſt mariage, he ſtole away Helen in her minority, being nothing neere to conſent to marry. Then his taking of the daughters of the TROEZENIANS, of the LACEDÆMONIANS, & the AMAZONS (neither contracted to him, nor comparable to the birth and linage of his owne country which were at ATHENS; and deſcended of the noble race and progeny of Erichtheus, and of Cecrops) did giue men occaſion to ſuſpect that his womanniſhneſſe was rather to ſatiſfie luſt, then of any great loue. Romulus now in a contrary maner, when his people had taken 800. or therabouts, of the SABYNE women to rauiſh them: kept but only one for himſelfe that was called Herſilia, as they ſay, and deliuered the reſt to his beſt and moſt honeſt citizens. Afterwards by the honor, loue, and good entertainement that he cauſed them to haue & receiue of their husbands, he changed this violent force of rauiſhment, into a moſt perfect bond and league of amity: which did ſo knit and ioyne in one theſe two nations, that it was the beginning of the great mutual loue which grew afterwards betwixt thoſe two peoples, and conſequētly of the ioyning of their powers together. Furthermore, time hath giuen a good teſtimony of the loue, reuerence, conſtancy, kindneſſe, and all matrimoniall offices that he eſtabliſhed by that meanes, betwixt man and wife. For in two hundred and thirty yeares afterwards, there was neuer man that durſt forſake or put away his wife, nor the wife her husband. And as among the GRECIANS, the beſt learned men, & moſt curious obſeruers of antiquities do know his name, that was the firſt murderer of his father and mother: euen ſo all the ROMAINES knew what he was, which firſt durſt put away his wife. It was one called Spurius Caruilius, becauſe his wife was barren & had no children. The effects alſo do agree with the teſtimony of the time. For the realme was common vnto the kings of both nations, & through the alliance of theſe mariages that began firſt of rauiſhments, both nations liued peaceably, & in equality, vnder one ciuil pollicy, and well gouerned common weale. The ATHENIANS contrariwiſe, by Theſeus mariages, did get neither loue nor kinred of any one perſon, but rather they procured wars, enmities, & the ſlaughter of their citizens, with the loſſe in the end of the city of APHIDNES: & yet very hardly, & by the mercy of their enemies (whom they honored as gods) they eſcaped for him, the danger which the TROIANS ſuffered afterwards, for the ſelfe act done by Alexander Paris. So it fell out at the laſt, that his mother was not onely in danger, but euen feelingly ſuffered like miſery and captiuitie, which Hecuba did afterwards, when ſhe was forſaken of her ſonne: vnleſſe peraduenture thoſe things that they write of the impriſonment and captiuity of Æthra, be found falſe, and but fables, as for the fame and memory of Theſeus were behouefull, that both it, & many other things alſo, were of no more troth nor likelihood. That which they write of Romulus diuinements, maketh great difference betweene him and Theſeus. For Romulus in his birth was preſerued by the maruellous fauour of the gods: Theſeus to the contrary, was begotten againſt the gods will, as appeared plainely by the aunſwer of the Oracle to Ægeus, that he ſhould not meddle with any woman in ſtraunge and foraine countrey.

THE LIFE OF Lycurgus.

A Man cannot ſpeake any thing at all of Lycurgus, who made the lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, but he ſhall find great contrariety of him amongſt the hiſtoriographers. For, of his parentage and trauell out of his countrey, of his death and making of lawes, of his forme of gouernement, and order of executing the ſame, they haue written diuerſly. And yet aboue all things, concerning him, they agree worſt about the time he liued in. For ſome of them (and Ariſtotle is of that number) will needes haue him to haue bene in the time of Iphytus, and that he did helpe him to ſtabliſh the ordinance that all warres ſhould ceaſe during the feaſt of the games Olympicall: for a teſtimony whereof, they alledge the copper coyte which was vſed to be throwne in thoſe games, and had found grauen vpon it, the name of Lycurgus. Other compting the dayes and time of the ſucceſſion of the kings of LACEDÆMON (as Eratoſthenes, & Apollodorus) ſay he was many yeres before the firſt Olympiades. Timæus alſo thinketh there were two of this name, and in diuerſe times: howbeit the one hauing more eſtimation then the other, men gaue this Lycurgus the glory of both their doings. Some ſay the eldeſt of the twaine, was not long after Homer: and ſome write they ſaw him. Xenophon ſheweth vs plainely he was of great antiquitie: ſaying he was in the time of the Heraclides, who were neareſt of bloud by deſcent to Hercules. For it is likely Xenophon meant not thoſe Heraclides, which deſcended from Hercules ſelfe: for the laſt kings of SPARTA were of Hercules progeny, as well as the firſt. Therefore he meaneth thoſe Heraclides, which doubtleſſe were the firſt and neareſt before Hercules time. Neuertheleſſe though the hiſtoriographers haue written diuerſly of him, yet we will not leaue to collect that which we find written of him in auncient hiſtories, and is leaſt to be denied, and by beſt teſtimonies moſt to be proued. And firſt of all, the Poet Simonides ſayth, his father was called Prytanis and not Eunomus: and the moſt part do write the pedegree otherwiſe, as well of Lycurgus ſelfe, as of Eunomus. For they ſay, that Patrocles the ſonne of Ariſtodemus begate Sous, and Sous begate Eurytion, and Eurytion begate Prytanis, and Prytanis begate Eunomus, and Eunomus begat Polydectes of his firſt wife, and Lycurgus of the ſecond wife, called Dianaſſa: yet Euthychidas another writer, maketh Lycurgus the ſixt of deſcent in the right line from Polydectes, and the eleuenth after Hercules. But of all his aunceſters, the nobleſt was Sous, in whoſe time the citie of SPARTA ſubdued the ILOTES, made them ſlaues, and did enlarge and increaſe their dominion, with the lands and poſſeſſions they had got by conqueſt of the ARCADIANS. And it is ſayd, that Sous himſelfe being on a time ſtraightly beſieged by the CLITORIANS, in a hard

dry ground, where no water could be found, offered them thereupon to reſtore all their lands againe that he had gotten from them, if he and all his company did drinke of a fountaine that was there not farre off. The CLITORIANS did grant vnto it, and peace alſo was ſworne betweene them. Then he called all his ſouldiers before him, and told them if there were any one amongſt them that would refraine from drinking, he would reſigne his kingdome to him: howbeit there was not one in all his company that could (or would) forbeare to drinke, they were ſo ſore a thirſt. So they all dranke hartily except himſelfe, who being the laſt that came downe, did no more but a litle moyſt his mouth without, and ſo refreſhed himſelfe, the enemies ſelues ſtanding by, and dranke not a drop. By reaſon whereof, he refuſed afterwards to reſtore their lands he had promiſed, alledging they had not all dronke. But that notwithſtanding, he was greatly eſteemed for his acts, and yet his houſe was not named after his owne name: but after his ſonnes name Eurytion, they of his houſe were called Eurytionides. The reaſon was, becauſe his ſonne Eurytion to pleaſe the people, did firſt let fall and giue ouer, the ſole and abſolute power of a king. Whereupon there followed afterwards maruellous diſorder and diſſolution, which continued a great time in the city of SPARTA. For the people finding themſelues at liberty, became very bold and diſobedient: and ſome of the kings that ſucceeded, were hated euen to death, becauſe they would perforce vſe their auncient authority ouer the people. Other, either to win the loue and good-wils of the people, or becauſe they ſaw they were not ſtrong inough to rule them, did giue themſelues to diſſemble. And this did ſo much increaſe the peoples looſe and rebellious minds, that Lycurgus owne father being king, was ſlaine among them. For one day, as he was parting a fray betweene two that were fighting, he had ſuch a wound with a kitchin knife, that he dyed: and left his Realme to his eldeſt ſonne Polydectes, who dyed alſo ſoone after, and without heire of his body as was ſuppoſed. In ſo much as euery man thought Lycurgus ſhould be king: and ſo he tooke it vpon him, vntill it was vnderſtood that his brothers wife was young with child. Which thing ſo ſoone as he perceiued, he publiſhed openly, that the Realme belonged to the child that ſhould be borne, if it were a ſonne. After this he gouerned the Realme, but as the kings lieutenant and regent. The LACEDÆMONIANS call the regents of their kings that are left within age, Prodicos. Lycurgus brothers widdow did ſend, & let him ſecretly vnderſtand, that if he would promiſe to marry her when he ſhould be king, that ſhe would come before her time, and either miſcary or deſtroy that ſhe went with. Lycurgus deteſtably abhorring this brutiſh and ſauage vnnaturalneſſe of the woman, did not reiect her offer made him, but ſeemed rather to be very glad, then to diſlike of it. Neuertheleſſe he ſent her word againe, ſhe ſhould not need to try maſteries, with drinkes and medicines to make her come before her time: for in ſo doing, ſhe might bring her ſelfe in danger, and be caſt away for euer. Howbeit he aduiſed her to go her full time, and to be brought a bed in good order, & then he would find meanes inough to make away the child that ſhould be borne. And ſo with ſuch perſwaſions he drew on this woman to her full time of deliuery. But ſo ſoone as he perceiued ſhe was neere her time, he ſent certaine to keepe her, and to be preſent at her labour, commaunding them that if ſhe were brought a bed of a daughter they ſhould leaue her with the woman: and if it were a ſonne they ſhould forthwith bring it to him, in what place ſoeuer he was, and what buſineſſe ſoeuer he had in hand. It chanced that ſhe came euen about ſupper time, & was deliuered of a ſonne. As he was ſitting at the table with the other magiſtrates of the city, his ſeruants entred the hall, and preſented to him the litle babe, which he tenderly tooke in his armes: and ſayd openly to them that were preſent: behold my Lords of SPARTA, here is a king borne vnto vs. And ſpeaking theſe words, he layd him downe in the kings place, and named him Charilaus, as much to ſay as the ioy of the people. Thus he ſaw all the lookers on reioycing much, and might heare them praiſe and extoll his ſincerity, iuſtice, and vertue. By this meanes he raigned onely as king but eight moneths; from thenceforth he was taken and eſteemed ſo iuſt and ſincere a man among the citizens, that there were moe that willingly obeyed him for his vertue, then for that he was the kings regent, or that he had the gouernement of the whole Realme in his hands. Notwithſtanding there were ſome that bare him diſpleaſure and malice, who ſought to hinder and diſgrace his credite, and chiefly the friends and kinred of the kings mother: whoſe power and honour were thought much impaired by Lycurgus authoritie: in ſo much, as a brother of hers called Leonidas, entring boldly into great words with him on a day, did not ſticke to ſay to his face: I know for a certaintie one of theſe dayes thou wilt be king: meaning thereby to bring him in ſuſpition with the citizens. Which thing thing though Lycurgus neuer meant, yet of a ſubtill and crafty wit, Leonidas thought by giuing out ſuch words, that if the young King happened to dye in his minoritie naturally, it would be miſtruſted that Lycurgus had ſecretly made him away. The Kings mother alſo gaue out ſuch like ſpeeches, which in the end did ſo trouble him, with the feare he had, what euent might fall out thereof, that he determined to depart his countrey, and by his abſence to auoide the ſuſpition that therein might grow vppon him any way. So he trauelled abroade in the world as a ſtraunger, vntill his nephew had begotten a ſonne who was to ſucceed him in his kingdome. He hauing with this determination taken his iourney, went firſt of all into CRETA, where he diligently obſerued and conſidered the manner of their liuing, the order of the gouernement of their Common-weale, and euer kept company with the beſt, and euer was conferring with the moſt learned. There he found very good lawes in his iudgement, which he noted of purpoſe to carry home to his countrey, to ſerue when time ſhould come. He found there other lawes alſo, but of them he made no reckoning. Now there was one man that aboue the reſt was reputed wiſe and skilfull in matters of ſtate and gouernement, who was called Thales: with whom Lycurgus did ſo much by intreaty, and for familiar friendſhip, that he perſwaded him to go with him vnto SPARTA. This Thales was called the Poet Harper, whereupon he had that title and name: but in effect he ſang all that the beſt and ſufficienteſt gouernours of the world could deuiſe. For all his ſongs were goodly ditties, wherein he did exhort and perſwade the people to liue vnder obedience of the law, in peace and concord one with the other. His words were ſet out with ſuch tunes, countenance and accents, that were ſo full of ſweetneſſe, harmonie, and peircing, that inwardly it melted mens hearts, and drew the hearers of a loue to like the moſt honeſt things, and to leaue all hatred, enmitie, ſedition, and diuiſion, which at that time raigned ſore among them. So as it may be ſayd, he it was that prepared the way for Lycurgus, whereby he afterwards reformed and brought the LACEDÆMONIANS vnto reaſon. At his departing out of CRETA, he went into ASIA, with intent (as it is ſayd) to compare the manner of life and pollicy of thoſe of CRETA (being then very ſtraight and ſeuere) with the ſuperfluities and vanities of IONIA: and thereupon to conſider the difference betweene their two manners and gouernements, as the Phiſition doth, who to know the whole and healthfull the better, doth vſe to compare them with the ſicke and diſeaſed. It is very likely it was there, where he firſt ſaw Homers workes, in the hands of the heires and ſucceſſours of Cliophylus: and finding in the ſame, as well many rules of pollicy, as the great pleaſure of poets faining, he diligently copied it out, and made a volume thereof to carry into GRECE. It is true there was much fame abroad of Homers poeſies among the GRECIANS, howbeit there were few of them brought together, but were ſcattered here and there in diuerſe mens hands, in pamphlets and peeces vnſewed and without any order: but the firſt that brought them moſt to light among men, was Lycurgus. The ÆGYPTIANS ſay, that he was in their countrey alſo, and that hauing found there one notable ordinance among other, that their ſouldiers & men of warre were ſeparated from the reſt of the people, he brought the practiſe of it into SPARTA: where ſetting the marchants, artificers and labourers euery one apart by themſelues, he did eſtabliſh a noble Common wealth. So the ÆGYPTIAN hiſtoriographers, and ſome others alſo of GRECE do write. He was alſo in AFRICKE, and in SPAINE, and as farre as INDIA, to conferre with the wiſe men there, that were called the Philoſophers of INDIA. I know no man that hath written it, ſauing Ariſtocrates, that was Hipparchus ſonne. The LACEDÆMONIANS wiſhed for him often when he was gone, and ſent diuerſe and many a time to call him home: who thought their Kings had but the honour and title of Kings, and not the vertue or maieſtie of a Prince, whereby they did excell the common people. But as for Lycurgus, they thought of him thus: that he was a man borne to rule, to command, and to giue order, as hauing in him a certaine naturall grace and power, to draw men willingly to obey him. Moreouer the Kings themſelues were not vnwilling to haue him to returne home, becauſe they hoped that his preſence would ſomewhat bridle, and reſtraine the people from their inſolency and diſobedience towards them. Whereupon Lycurgus returning home in this opinion and affection of men, it fell out that he was no ſooner arriued, but he began to deuiſe how to alter the whole gouernement of the common-weale, and throughout to chaunge the whole courſe and order of the ſtate: thinking that to make onely certaine particular lawes were to no purpoſe, but much like, as one ſhould giue ſome eaſie medicine, to purge an ouerthrowne body with all humours and diſeaſes. Therefore he thought firſt that all groſſe and ſuperfluous humours, were meete to be dissolued and purged, and then afterwards to giue them a new forme and order of gouernement. When he had thus determined with himselfe, before he would take in hand to do any thing, he went to the city of DELPHES: where after he had sacrificed to Apollo, he consulted with him about his matters. From whom he returned with this glorious title by the oracle of Pythia: ô beloued of the gods, and rather god then man. Where when he craued grace of Apollo to establish good lawes in his countrey, it was answered him: that Apollo graunted his petition, and that he should ordaine the best and perfectest maner of a cõmon-wealth, that euer had or should be in the world. This answer did comfort him very much, and so he began to breake his purpose to certaine of the chiefe of the city, and secretly to pray and exhort them to helpe him, going first to those he knew to be his friends, & after by litle & litle he wan others to him, who ioyned with him in his enterprise. So when he saw the time fit for the matter, he caused thirty of the chiefest men of the city in a morning to come into the market place wel appointed and furnished, to suppresse those that would attempt to hinder their purpose. Hermippus the historiographer rehearseth twenty of the chiefest: but he that aboue all others did most assist him in his doings, and was the greatest aide vnto the stablishing of his lawes, was called Arithmiadas. The king Charilaus hearing of this assembly, did feare there had bene some conspiracy or insurrection against his person, and for his safety he fled into the temple of Iuno, called Chalceæcos, as much to say, as Iunos brasen tẽple. Howbeit afterwards when he knew the troth, he waxed bold & came out of the temple againe, & he himselfe fauored the enterprise, being a prince of a noble mind, howbeit very soft by nature, as witnesseth Archelaus (that was thẽ the other king of LACEDÆMON) by telling how Charilaus answered one that praised him to his face, in saying he was a good man. And how should I not (quoth he) be good, whẽ I cãnot be euil to the euill? In this change of the state, many things were altered by Lycurgus, but his chiefest alteration was, his law of the erection of a Senate, which he made to haue a regal power & equal authority with the kings in matters of weight & importance & was (as Plato saith) to be the healthfull counterpoise of the whole body of the cõmon-weale. The other state before was euer wauering, sometime inclining to tyranny, when the kings were too mighty: & somtime to cõfusion, when the people would vsurpe authority. Lycurgus therfore placed between the kings & the people, a counsell of Senators, which was as a strong beame, that held both these extremes in an euen ballance, and gaue sure footing and ground to either part, to make strong the state of the common-weale. For the 28. Senators (which made the whole body of the Senate) tooke somtime the kings part, when it was needfull to pull downe the fury of the people: and contrarily, they held sometimes with the people against the kings, to bridle their tyrannicall gouernement. Aristotle saith, he ordeined the number of Senatours to be but eight and twenty, because two of thirty that ioyned with him as afore, did for feare forsake him at his enterprise. Howbeit Sphærus writeth, that from the beginning, he neuer purposed to haue more then eight and twenty to be the Senate. And perhaps he had great regard to make it a perfect number, considering it is compounded of the number of seuen, multiplied by foure: and is the first perfect number next to sixe, being equall to all parts gathered together. But as for me, my opinion is, he chose this number rather then any other, because he meant the whole body of the counsell should be but thirty persons, adding to that number, the two kings. Lycurgus tooke so great care to establish well this counsell, that he brought an oracle for it, from Apolloes temple in DELPHES. This oracle is called vnto this day Retra, as who would say, the statute oracle: whereof the answer was: When thou hast built a temple vnto Iupiter the Syllanian, and to Minerua the Syllanian, and deuided the people into lineages, thou shalt establish a Senate of thirty counsellors, with the two kings: and shalt assemble the people at times conuenient, in the place betweene the bridge and the riuer CNACION. There the Senators shall propound all matters, and breake vp after their assemblies: and it shall not be lawfull for the people to speake one word. In those dayes the people were euer assembled betweene two riuers, for there was no hall to assemble a counsell at large, nor any other place prepared for them. For Lycurgus thought no builded place meete for men to giue good counsell in, or to determine causes, but rather a hinderance: because in such places men be drawne to muse on vaine things, and their minds be caried away with beholding the images, tables, and pictures, commonly set vp for ornament in such open places. And if it be in a Theater, then beholding the place where the playes and sports be made, they thinke more of them, then of any counsell. not ſtill their buſineſſe they come for. When the people were aſſembled in counſell, it was not lawfull for any of them to put forth matters to the counſell to be determined, neither might any of them deliuer his opinion what he thought of any thing: but the people had onely authority to giue their aſſent (if they thought good) to the things propounded by the Senators, or the two Kings. Howbeit afterwards, the two kings Polydorus and Theopompus, becauſe the people did many times croſſe and alter the determination of the Senate, by taking away or adding ſomething to it, they did adde theſe words to the Oracle aforeſayd: That if the people would not aſſent to any ordinance of the Senate, then ſhould it be lawfull for the Kings and Senate to breake vp the counſell, and to fruſtrate all things done in the ſame: the wiſe aduiſe of the Senate being encountred thus, and their meaning to the beſt, ſo peruerted to the worſe. Theſe two kings perſwaded the people, that at the very firſt, this addition came with the Oracle of Apollo: as the poet Tyrtæus maketh mention in the place, where he ſaith:

From Delphos Ile, this oracle is brought of Pythia: into their countrey ſoile.
The Kings (euen they to whom of right there ought a louing care in princely breaſts to boile,

Shalbe the chiefe, graue cauſes to decide with Senators: whoſe ſound aduiſe is tride.
And next to them, the people ſhall fulfill as much as ſeemes, to pleaſe their princes will.

Lycurgus now hauing thus tempered the forme of his common-weale, it ſeemed notwithſtanding to thoſe that came after him, that this ſmall number of thirty perſons that made the Senate, was yet too mighty, and of too great authority. Wherefore to bridle them in a litle, they gaue them (as Plato ſaith) a bit in their mouths, & that was the authority of the Ephores, which ſignifie as much as controllers: & were erected about a hundred & thirty yeares after the death of Lycurgus. The firſt which was choſen of theſe, was Elatus, and it was in the time of King Theopompus, whoſe wife on a day in her anger ſayd: how through his negligence he would leaue leſſe to his ſucceſſours, then he had receiued of his predeceſſors. To whom he anſwered againe, not leſſe but more, for that it ſhall continue longer, and with a more ſurety. For, in loſing thus their too abſolute power, that wrought them great enuy and hatred among their citizens, they did eſcape the danger and miſchiefe that their neighbours the ARGIVES, and MESSENIANS did feele: who would not giue ouer the ſoueraigne authority which they had gotten once. This example maketh Lycurgus great wiſdome and foreſight manifeſtly knowne: who ſo will deeply conſider the ſeditions and ill gouernements of the ARGIVES, and MESSENIANS (their neere neighbours and kinſmen) aſwell from the people, as from the kings. Who from the beginning had all things alike to the SPARTANS: and in deuiding of their lands a farre better order thē theirs. This notwithſtanding, they did not proſper long: but through the pride of their kings, & the diſobedience of their people, they entred into ciuill warres one againſt another, ſhewing by their diſorders and misfortunes the ſpeciall grace the gods did beare to SPARTA, to giue thē ſuch a reformer, as did ſo wiſely temper the ſtate of their common-weale, as we will ſhew hereafter. The ſecond law that Lycurgus made, and the boldeſt and hardeſt he euer tooke in hand, was the making of a new diuiſion of their lands. For he ſaw ſo great a diſorder and vnequality among the inhabitants, as well of the country, as of the city LACEDÆMON, by reaſon ſome (and the greateſt number of them) were ſo poore, that they had not a handfull of ground, & other ſome being leaſt in nūber were very rich, that had all: he thought with himſelf to baniſh out of the city all inſolency, enuy, couetouſneſſe, & deliciouſnes and alſo all riches & pouerty, which he tooke the greateſt, and the moſt continual plagues of a city, or common-weale. For this purpoſe, he imagined there was none ſo ready and neceſſary a meane, as to perſwade his citizens to ſuffer all the lands, poſſeſſions, and inheritance of their country, to runne in common together: and that they ſhould make a new diuiſion equally in partition amongſt themſelues, to liue from thencefoorth as it were like brothers together, ſo that no one were richer then another, & none ſhould ſeeke to go before each other, any other way then in vertue only: thinking there ſhould be no difference or vnequality among inhabitants of one city, but the reproches of diſhoneſty, and the praiſes of vertue. Thus Lycurgus following his determination, did out of hand make a law of the diuiſion of their lands. For first he did deuide all the country of LACONIA, into thirty thousand equal parts, the which he did set out for those that inhabited about SPARTA: and of those lands that ioyned next to the city of SPARTA, that was the chiefe metropolitan city of LACONIA, he made other nine thousand parts, which he deuided to the naturall citizens of SPARTA, who be those that are properly called SPARTANS. Howbeit some will say, he made but sixe thousand parts, and that king Polydorus afterwards did adde too other three thousand parts. Other say also, that Lycurgus of these nine thousand parts made but the halfe onely, and Polydorus the rest. Euery one of these parts was such, as might yeeld vnto the owner yearely, three score and ten bushels of barley for a man, and twelue bushels for the woman, and of wine and other liquide fruits, much like in proportion: which quantitie Lycurgus iudged to be sufficient, to keepe the body of a man in health, and to make him strong and lusty, without any further allowance. They say after this, as he returned home one day out of the fields, and came ouer the lands where wheate had bene reaped not long before, and saw the number of sheaues lying in euery shocke together, and no one shocke bigger then another: he fell a laughing, and told them that were with him, me thinkes all LACONIA is as it were an inheritance of many brethren, who had newly made partition together. He gaue an attempt to haue deuided also moueables, and to haue made a common partition betweene them, to the end he would haue vtterly taken away all vnequality. But finding the citizens tooke it very impatiently, that openly that which they had, should be taken away, he went about to do it more secretly, and in a cunninger wise to take away that couetousnesse. For first of all he did forbid all coine of gold & siluer to be currant: and then he did set out certaine coines of iron, which he cõmanded only to be currant, whereof a great weight and quantity was but litle worth. So as to lay vp thereof the value of ten Minas, it would haue occupied a whole celler in a house, besides it would haue needed a yoke of oxen to carry it any where. Now gold and siluer being thus banished out of the country, many lewd parts and faults must needs cease thereby. For who would rob, steale, picke, take away, hide, procure, or hoord vp any thing, that he had no great occasion to desire, nor any profit to possesse, nor would be any pleasure to vse or imploy? For, the iron they occupied for their coine, they cast vineger vpon it while it was red-hote out of the fire, to kill the strength and working of it to any other vse: for thereby it was so eger and brickle, that it would bide no hammer, nor could be made, beaten, or forged to any other fashion. By this meanes he banished also, all superfluous and vnprofitable sciences, which he knew he should not need to do by any proclamation: because they would fall away (or the most part of them) euen of thẽselues, when the baseneſse of the mony they should take for their worke, should vndo them. For their iron monies were not currant elsewhere in the cities of GREECE, but euery body made a iest of it there. By this occasion, the LACEDÆMONIANS could buy no forrein wares nor marchandises, neither came there any ship into their hauen to trafficke with them, neither any fine curious Rhetorician did repaire into their country to teach them eloquence, and the cunning cast of lying: nor yet came there to them any wisard to tell thẽ their fortune, nor any Pander to keepe any brothell house, nor yet goldsmith or ieweller, to make or sell any toyes or trifles of gold or siluer to set forth women: considering all these things are vsed to be made to get mony, and to hoord vp that they had not. After this sort, delicateneſse that wanted many things that entertained it, began by litle & litle to vanish away, and lastly, to fall off from themselues: when the most rich men had no more occasion then the poorest, and riches hauing no meane to shew her selfe openly in the world, was faine to remaine shut at home idly, as not able to do her master any seruice. Therupon moueables and houshold stuffe (which a man cannot be without, and must be daily occupied) as bedsteads, tables, chaires, and such like necessaries for house, were excellently well made: and men did greatly praise the fashion of the LACONIAN cup which they called Cothon, and especially for a souldier in the warres, as Critias was wont to say. For it was made after such a fashion, that the colour of it did let the eye to discerne the fowle and vnwholesome water, which men are driuen oft times to drinke in a campe, and goeth many times against ones stomacke to see it: and if by chance there was any filth or mudde in the bottome, it would cleaue and sticke fast vpon the ribs of the belly, and nothing came through the necke, but cleane water to his mouth that dranke it. The reformer of their state was the cause of all this: because their artificers tending now to superfluous works, were occupied about the making of their most necessary things. Further, now to driue away all superfluity & diliciousnesse, and to roote out vtterly desire to get and gather: he made another third law for eating & drinking, and against feasts and bankets. First he willed and com-commanded the citizens, that they ſhould eate together all of one meate, and chiefly of thoſe he had permitted by his ordinance. Then he did expreſſely forbid them to eate alone, or apart, or ſecretly by themſelues, vpon rich tables and ſumptuous beds, abuſing the labour of excellent workemen, and the deuiſes of lickeriſh cookes to cramme themſelues in corners, as they do fat vp beaſts and poultry, which doth not onely breed ill conditions in the minde, but doth marre the complexions of men, and the good ſtates of their body, when they giue themſelues ouer to ſuch ſenſuality and gluttony. Whereof it followeth in the ende, that men muſt needes ſleepe much, to helpe to digeſt the exceſſe of meates they haue taken, and then muſt they go to the hote houſes to bath themſelues, and ſpend long time about the ordinary attendance of their ſickly bodies. This was a maruellous thing for him to bring to paſſe, but much more, to make riches not to be ſtolen, and leaſt of all to be coueted, as Theophraſtus ſaid of him: which by this meanes of making thē eate together with all ſobriety at their ordinary diet, was brought to paſſe. For there was no more meane to the rich, then to the poore, to vſe to play, or ſhew riches, ſith both of them were forced to be together in one place, and to eate all of one meate: ſo as that which is commonly ſpoken, that Pluto the god of riches is blind, was truly verified onely in the city of SPARTA, aboue all other places of the world. For there riches was layd on the ground like a corſe without a ſoule, that mooueth no whit at all: conſidering it was not lawfull for any man to eate at home ſecretly in his houſe before he came to their open hals, nor might not come thither for a countenance onely to his meales, being already fed and full fraught. For euery mans eye was vpon thoſe eſpecially which did not eate and drinke with a good ſtomach amongſt them: and it was the vſe to reproch them as gluttons, and dainty mouthed men, which refuſed to eate as it were in common together. So as this was the ordinance they ſay, that grieued moſt the rich aboue all that Lycurgus made, and whereat they were moſt madde and angry with him: in ſo much, as on a day, they all ſetting vpon him to alter it, he was compelled to run out of the market place, and getting ground of them, he recouered the liberties of a Church, before any could ouertake him: ſauing one yong man called Alcander, who otherwiſe had no ill nature in him, but that he was ſomewhat quicke of his hand, and cholerike withall. Who following Lycurgus neerer then any other, did giue him a blow ouerthwart the face with a ſtaffe, and ſtrake out one of his eyes, as Lycurgus turned toward him. Yet for all this, Lycurgus neuer baſhed or made word at the matter, but did lift vp his head to thoſe that followed him, and ſhewed them his face all a gore-bloud, & his eye put out cleane: whereof they were ſo ſore aſhamed, that there was not a man that durſt once open his mouth againſt him, but to the contrary, they ſeemed to pity him, and did deliuer Alcander into his hands that had done the deed, to puniſh him as himſelfe pleaſed. And ſo they all brought him to his houſe, and ſhewed they were right hartily ſorie for his hurt. Lycurgus thanking them, returned them all backe againe, ſaue that he made Alcander to go with him into his houſe, where he neuer hurt him, nor gaue him fowle word: but commaunded him onely to waite vppon him, and made his other ordinarie ſeruants to withdraw their waiting. This young man who now began to ſpie his owne fault, did moſt willingly attend vpon him, and neuer ſpake word to the contrary. When he had ſerued him a certaine time, being very neere continually about him, he began to feele and taſte of his naturall liberality, and ſaw of what affection and intention Lycurgus was moued to do all he did: he perceiued what was the ſeuerity of his ordinary life, and what his conſtancy was to endure labour without wearineſſe. Alcander then began to loue and honour Lycurgus from his heart, and told his parents and friends, how he was no ſuch ſeuere man as he ſeemed, but was of ſo kind and gentle a nature to all men as might be. See I pray you how Alcander was transformed by Lycurgus, and his puniſhment alſo, which he ſhould haue receiued: for of a fierce, raſh, and a lewd conditioned youth he was before, he became now a very graue and wiſe man. But for memory of this his misfortune, Lycurgus built a temple to Minerua, which he ſurnamed Optiletide, becauſe the DORIANS which dwell in thoſe parts of PELOPONNESVS, do call the eyes, Optiles. There are other writers (as Dioſcorides for one) which ſay Lycurgus had a blow with a ſtaffe, but he had not his eye ſtriken out with it: and how contrariwiſe, he founded this temple to Minerua, to giue her thankes for healing of his eye. Hereof it came, that euer ſince the SPARTANS haue bene reſtrained to cary ſtaues in any aſſembly of counſell. But to returne to their common repaſtes, which the CRETANS called Andria, and the LACEDÆMONIANS Phiditia, either becauſe they were places wherein they learned to liue ſoberly and ſtraightly (for in the GREKE tongue Phido, is to ſaue and ſpare) or elſe becauſe their amity and friendſhip grew there towards one another, as if they would haue called them Philitia, feaſts of loue, by changing D. into L: It may be alſo they added the firſt letter as ſuperfluous, and meant to call the places Editia, becauſe they did eate and drinke there. They ſat in their hals by fifteene in a company, litle more or leſſe, and at the beginning of euery moneth, euery one brought a buſhell of meale, eight gallons of wine, fiue pound of cheeſe, and two pound and a halfe of figs for a man, beſides ſome litle portion of their money to buy certaine freſh cates. And ouer and aboue all this, euery man when he did ſacrifice in his houſe, was bound to ſend the beſt and chiefeſt things of his ſacrifice to the hals to be eaten. Likewiſe if any man went on hunting, and killed any veniſon: it was an order, he ſhould ſend a peece of the fleſh thither. Hauing theſe two lawfull cauſes, they might eate and drinke by themſelues at home, either when they ſacrificed any beaſt to the gods, or when they came late home from hunting: otherwiſe they were bound of neceſſity to meete in their hals at meales, if they would eate any thing. This order they kept very ſtraightly a great time: in ſo much as king Agis on a day, returning from the wars, where he had ouerthrowne the ATHENIANS, & being deſirous to ſup at home priuatly with the Queene his wife, he ſent to the hals for his portion. But the Polemarchi, that be certaine officers aſſiſting the kings in the wars, did deny him. The next day Agis left of for ſpight, to do the accuſtomed ſacrifice they were wont to celebrate in the end of euery war: wherupon they ſet a fine on his head, and condemned him to pay it. The yong children alſo went to theſe repaſts, euen as they ſhould go to ſchooles to learne grauity & temperance, where they heard wiſe and graue diſcourſes touching the gouernment of a common weale, but not of maſters that were as hirelings. There they learned pretily to play vpon words, and pleaſantly to ſport one with another, without any broad ſpeeches, or vncomely ieſts, and at others hands to beare the ſame againe, without choler or anger. For this property haue the LACEDÆMONIANS aboue all other, to take and giue a mocke without any offence: neuertheleſſe, if any mans nature could not beare it, he needed but pray the party to forbeare his ieſting, and ſo he left it ſtraight. And it was euer an ordinary among them, that the eldeſt of the company told the reſt that were come into the hall to meale, with ſhewing them of the dore: Sirs, remember, there goeth not a word here out of this doore. Euen ſo he that wold be receiued to meale there in their cõpany, muſt firſt of neceſſity be allowed & receiued in this ſort, by all the reſt. Euery one of thẽ tooke a litle ball of bran or dow to waſh their hands with, & without euer a word ſpeaking, they threw it into a baſen, which the ſeruant that waited on them at the table did cary vpon his head: he that was contented the other ſhould be receiued in company, did caſt in his ball as he did receiue it, but if he miſliked him, then he preſſed it flat betweene his fingers, & threw it in. This bal of bran thus preſſed flat, was as much as a beane bored through, and was to them a ſigne of condemnation. If any one ball were found of this ſort, the ſuter was reiected: for they would not haue any enter into their company, that was not liked of all the reſt. He that thus was reiected, they ſay he was diſcadded: for the baſin wherein the little bals were caried, was called Caddos. The beſt diſh they ſerued at theſe meales, was that they call their blacke broth: ſo that when they had that, the old men did eate no fleſh, but left it all to the yong men, and they by themſelues did eate the broth. There was a king of PONTVS, that being deſirous to taſte of this blacke broth, did buy of purpoſe a LACEDÆMONIAN cooke: but after he had once taſted thereof, he was very angry ſtraight. The cooke then ſaid vnto him: and it pleaſe your grace, ere one ſhall find this broth good, he muſt be waſhed firſt in the riuer of EVROTAS. After they had eate & drunke thus ſoberly together, euery one repaired home without any light: for it was not lawfull for them to go thither, nor any where elſe with light, becauſe they ſhould accuſtome themſelues boldly to go vp and downe the darke, and all about in the night. This was the order and manner of their meales. But here is ſpecially to be noted, that Lycurgus would in no wiſe haue any of his lawes put in writing. For it is expreſſely ſet downe in his lawes they call Retra, that none of his lawes ſhould be written. For he thought that which ſhould chiefly make a citie happie, and vertuous, ought throughly by education to be printed in mens hearts and manners, as to haue continuance for euer: which he tooke to be loue and good will, as a farre ſtronger knot to tie men with, then any other compulſarie law. Which when men by vſe and cuſtome through good education do take in their childhood, it maketh euery man to be a law to himſelfe. Furthermore, concerning buying and bargaining one with another, which are but trifles, and ſometime are changed into one ſort, and ſometime in another, as occaſion ſerueth: he thought it beſt not to conſtraine them to do it by writing, nor nor to eſtabliſh cuſtomes that might not be altered, but rather to leaue them to the libertie and diſcretion of men which had bene brought vp in the ſame, both to take away, and to adde therein, as the caſe and time ſhould require. But to conclude, he thought the chiefeſt point of a good law-maker or reformer of the common weale was, to cauſe men to be well brought vp and inſtructed. One of his Ordinances therefore was expreſly, that not one of his lawes ſhould be written. Another of his deuiſes was, againſt ſuperfluous charges and expences: which to auoid, he made a lawe that all roofes of houſes ſhould be made onely with the axe, and all gates and doores with the ſawe, and that without any other toole of occupation. Wherein he had the like imagination as afterwards Epaminondas had, when he ſaid, ſpeaking of his table: Such a boord neuer receiueth any treaſon. Euen ſo thought Lycurgus, that ſuch a built houſe would neuer receiue curioſitie or daintineſſe. For no man is ſo madly diſpoſed or ſimple witted, as to bring into ſo poore and meane houſes, bedſteads with ſiluer feet, imbrodered couerlets, or counterpoints of purple ſilke, neither yet plate of gold nor of ſiluer, nor ſuch other like coſtly furniture & fineneſſe, as thoſe things require to waite vpon them: becauſe the beds muſt be aunſwerable to the meaneneſſe of the houſe, the furnitures of the beds muſt be ſutelike to the ſame, and all other houſhold ſtuffe, diet, meat, and drinke agreeable to the reſt. Hereof proceeded that, which Leontychidas the firſt King of that name, ſaid once: who ſupping on a time in the citie of CORINTH, and ſeeing the roofe of the hall where he ſate, ſumptuouſly embowed & carued, he asked ſtraight if the trees did grow carued ſo in that country. The third law was, he did forbid thē to make war often with one enemie, leſt the enemy forced to take often armes in hand, might in the end grow experter and valianter then they. For this cauſe king Ageſilaus was greatly blamed, who was a long time after. For by making often wars with the countrie of BOEOTIA, he made the THEBANS in the end as expert and valiant ſouldiers as the LACEDÆMONIANS. Wherupon Antalcidas ſeeing him hurt one day, ſaid vnto him: The THEBANS haue nobly rewarded thee for their learning, ſith thou haſt made them expert ſouldiers vnwilling to learne the diſcipline of war. Theſe be the lawes Lycurgus ſelfe called Retra, and ſignifie as much as Oracles, that the god Apollo had diſcouered to him. Now the education of children, he eſteemed the chiefeſt and greateſt matter, that a reformer of lawes ſhould eſtabliſh. Therefore beginning a farre off, he firſt conſidered the ſtate of mariage, and the generation of children. For Ariſtotle ſaith, that Lycurgus did attempt to reforme women, and did ſoone giue it ouer againe: becauſe he could do no good therin, by reaſon of the great libertie they had taken by the abſence of their husbands in the warres, compelled often ſo to be abroade, and that they did leaue them miſtreſſes of their houſe, and at their returne did honour them ſo much, and make of them ſo beyond meaſure, with calling them ladies and miſtreſſes. Howbeit this is true, that he had an eye to the rule and order of their life, aſwell as he had of mens: and ſo reaſon did require. Firſt of all, he willed that the maidens ſhould harden their bodies with exerciſe of running, wreſtling, throw the barre, and caſting the dart, to the end that the fruite wherewith they might be afterwards conceiued, taking nouriſhment of a ſtrong and luſtie bodie, ſhould ſhoot out and ſpreade the better: and that they by gathering ſtrength thus by exerciſes, ſhould more eaſily away with the paines of child bearing. And to take away from them their womanniſh daintineſſe, and fineneſſe, he brought vp a cuſtome, for young maides and boyes to go as it were a preceſſion, and to daunce naked at ſolemne feaſtes and ſacrifices, and to ſing certaine ſongs of their owne making, in the preſence and ſight of young men. To whom by the way they gaue many times pretie mockes of purpoſe, as pleaſantly hitting them home, for things wherein before they had forgotten their duties: and ſometimes alſo in their ſong for their vertues, wittes, or manners, they praiſed them which had deſerued it. By this meanes, they did ſet young mens hearts a fire, to ſtriue to winne moſt praiſe and honour. For who ſo was praiſed of them for a valiant man, or whoſe worthie acts were ſung by them, he thereby was encouraged to do the better another time: and the pretie girds and quippes they gaue to others, was of no leſſe force, then the ſharpeſt wordes and admonitions that otherwiſe could be giuen them. This tooke place the rather, becauſe it was done in the preſence of the Kings, the Senators, and all the reſt of the citizens which came thither to ſee theſe ſports. And though the maides did ſhew themſelues thus naked openly, yet was there no diſhoneſtie ſeene nor offered, but all this ſport was full of play and toyes, without any youthfull part or wantonneſſe: and rather caried a ſhew of demureneſſe, and a deſire to haue their beſt made bodies ſeene and ſpied. Moreouer, it ſomwhat lifted vp their harts, and made them noblier minded, by giuing them to vnderstand, that it was no lesse comely for them, in their kind and exercises to carrie the bel, then it was for men in their games and exercises to carry the price. Hereof it came, that the women of LACEDÆMON were so bold to say, and thinke of themselues that, which Gorgona the wife of king Leonidas one day answered: being in talke with a straunge woman that said to her: There be no women in the world that commaund their husbands, but you wiues of LACEDÆMON. Whereto the Queene straight replied: so be there no women but we, which bring foorth men. Furthermore, these plaies, sports, and daunces, the maides did naked before young men, were prouocations to draw and allure the young men to marrie: not as perswaded by geometricall reasons, as saith Plato, but brought to it by liking, and of very loue. Those which would not marrie, he made infamous by law. For it was not lawful for such to be present, where these open games and pastimes were shewed naked. Furthermore the officers of the citie compelled such as wold not marrie, euen in the hardest time of the winter, to enuirone the place of these sportes, and to go vp and downe starke naked, and to sing a certaine song made for the purpose against them, which was: that iustly were they punished, because that lawe they disobeyed. Moreouer, when such were old, they had not the honour and reuerence done them, which old maried men vsually receiued. Therefore there was no man that misliked, or reproued that, which was spoken to Dercillidas: albeit otherwise he was a noble captaine. For, comming into a presence, there was a young man which would not vouchsafe to rise and do him reuerence, nor to giue him place for to sit downe: and worthily, quoth he, because thou hast not gotten a son, who may do so much for me in time to come. Those which were desirous to marrie any, were driuen to take them away by force, whom they would marrie, not litle young wenches I meane, which were not of age to be maried: but lustie and strong maides of age to beare children. And when one of them was stolen away in this sort, she that was priuie thereto, and meane to make the mariage, came and shaued the haires of her head that was maried: then she put her into mans apparell, and gaue her all things sute like to the same, and laid her vpon a mattresse all alone, without light or candle. After this was done, the bridegrome, being neither drunke nor finelier apparelled then he was wont to be, but hauing supped soberly at his ordinarie, came home secretly to the house where the bride was: & there vntyed his wiues girdle, tooke her in his armes, layd her vpon a bed, and talked together a while, and afterwardes faire and softly stole away to the place, where he was wont to sleepe with other young men. And so from thenceforth, he continued alwaies to do the like, being all the day time with his companions, & sleeping most of the night, vnlesse he sometime stale to see his wife; being afraid, and ashamed euer to be seene by any of the house where she was. And hereunto his young wife did helpe for her part, to spie meanes and occasions how they might meet together, and not be seene. This manner endured a great while and vntill some of them had children, before they boldy met together, and sawe each other on the day time. This secret meeting in this sort did serue to good purposes, not onely because it was some meane of continencie, and shamefastnesse, but also it kept their bodies in strength and better state, to bring foorth children. It continued also in both parties, a still burning loue, and a new desire of the one to the other, not as it were luke warme, nor wearie, as theirs commonly be which haue their bellies full of loue, and as much as they lust: but they euer parted with an appetite one from another, keeping still a longing desire to deuise how to meete againe. Now when he had stablished such a continencie, and so kind a framed honestie in mariage, he tooke no lesse care to driue away all foolish iealousie therein, thinking it very good reason to beware there should be no violence, nor confusion in mariage: and yet as reason would, they should suffer those which were worthie to get children as it were in common, laughing at the madde folly of them which reuenge such things with warre and bloudshed, as though in that case men in no wise should haue no fellowshippe together. Therefore a man was not to be blamed, being stepped in yeares, and hauing a young wife, if seeing a faire young man that liked him, and knowne withall to be of a gentle nature, he brought him home to get his wife with child, and afterwardes would auow it for his, as if himselfe had gotten it. It was lawfull also for an honest man that loued another mans wife, for that he saw her wife shamefast, and bringing foorth goodly children, to intreat her husband to suffer him to lye with her, and that he might also plowe in that lustie ground, and cast abroad the seede of well fauoured children: which by this meanes came to be common in bloud and parentage, with the most honourable and honestest persons. For first of all, Lycurgus did not like that children should be priuate to any man, but that they ſhould be common to the common weale: by which reaſon he would alſo, that ſuch as ſhould become citizens, ſhould not be begotten of euery man, but of the moſt honeſteſt men onely. So Lycurgus thought alſo there were many fooliſh vaine toyes & fanſies, in the lawes and orders of other Nations, touching mariage: ſeeing they cauſed their bitches and mares to be limed and couered with the faireſt dogges and goodlieſt ſtalons that might be gotten, praying or paying the maiſters and owners of the ſame: and kept their wiues notwithſtanding ſhut vp ſafe vnder locke and key, for feare leſt other then themſelues might get them with child, although they were ſickly, feeble brained, and extreame old. As if it were not firſt of all, and chiefly a diſcommodity to the fathers and mothers, and likewiſe to thoſe that bring them vp, to haue vnperfect and feeble children borne, as it were begotten of dry and withered men: and then to the contrarie, what pleaſure and benefit is it to thoſe that haue faire and good children, borne, as gotten of like ſeed and men. Theſe things were done then by naturall & ciuil reaſon, neuertheleſſe they ſay women were ſo farre off then from intreatie, as euer they were before: ſo as in old time, in SPARTA, men knew not what adulterie meant. For proofe wherof, the anſwer made by Geradas (one of the firſt auncient SPARTANS) vnto a ſtranger, may be alledged, that asked him, what puniſhment they had for adulterers. My friend, quoth he, there be none here. But if there were? replyed the ſtranger again. Mary ſaid he, then he muſt pay as great a bul, as ſtanding vpon the top of the mountaine Taygetus, may drinke in the riuer of Eurotas. Yea marie: but how is it poſſible (quoth the ſtranger) to find ſuch a bull? Geradas laughing, anſwered him againe: And how were it poſſible alſo to find an adulterer in SPARTA? And this is that which is found of Lycurgus lawes touching mariages. Furthermore, after the birth of euery boy, the father was no more maiſter of him, to cocker & bring him vp after his will: but he himſelf caried him to a certaine place called Leſché, where the eldeſt men of his kindred being ſet, did view the child: and if they found him faire, and well proportioned of all his limmes, and ſtrong, they gaue order he ſhould be brought vp, and appointed him one of the nine thouſand parts of inheritance for his education. Contrariwiſe, if they found him deformed, miſshapē, or leane, or pale, they ſent him to be throwne in a deepe pit of water, which they commonly called Apothetes, & as a man would ſay, the common houſe of office: holding opinion it was neither good for the child, nor yet for the commonweale, that it ſhould liue, conſidering from his birth he was not wel made, nor giuen to be ſtrong, healthfull, nor luſtie of bodie all his life long. For this cauſe therefore, the nurſe after their birth did not waſh them with water ſimply (as they do euery where at that time) but with water mingled with wine: and thereby did they proue, whether the complexion or temperature of their bodies were good or ill. For they ſuppoſe, that children which are giuen to haue the falling ſickneſſe, or otherwiſe to be full of rewmes and ſickneſſes, cannot abide waſhing with wine, but rather dry & pine away: as contrarily the other which are healthfull, become thereby the ſtronger and the luſtier. The nurces alſo of SPARTA vſe a certaine manner to bring vp their children, without ſwadling, or binding them vp in clothes with ſwadling bands, or hauing on their heads any croſ-clothes: ſo as they made them nimbler of their limmes, better ſhaped and goodlier of bodie. Beſides that, they acquainted their children to all kind of meates, and brought them vp without much tendance, ſo as they were neither fine nor licorous, nor feareful to be left alone in the darke, neither were they cryers, wrallers, or vnhappy children, which be all tokens of baſe and cowardly natures. So that there were ſtrangers, that of purpoſe bought nurces out of LACONIA, to bring vp their children: as they ſay Amicla was one of them which nurced Alcibiades. But Pericles his tutor, gaue him afterwards a bondman called Zopyrus, to be his maiſter and gouernor: who had no better propertie in him, then other common ſlaues. This did not Lycurgus. For he did not put the education and gouernment of the children of SPARTA into the hands of hyred maiſters or ſlaues bought with mony: neither was it lawfull for the father himſelfe to bring vp his owne child after his owne maner and liking. For ſo ſoone as they came to ſeuen yeares of age, he tooke & diuided them by companies, to make them to be brought vp together, and to accuſtome them to play, to learne, and to ſtudie one with another. Then he choſe out of euery company one, whom he thought to haue the beſt wit, and had moſt courage in him to fight, to whom he gaue the charge and ouerſight of his owne company. The reſt had their eyes waiting alwaies on him, they did obey his commandements willingly, they did abide patiently all corrections he gaue them, they did ſuch taskes and works as he appointed them: ſo that all their ſtudie was moſt to learne to obey. Furthermore, the olde gray headed men were preſent many times to ſee them play, and for the moſt part they gaue them occaſions to fall out, and to fight one with another, that they might thereby the better know and diſcerne the naturall diſpoſition of euery one of them, and whether they gaue any ſignes or tokens in time to come, to become cowards or valiant men. Touching learning, they had as much as ſerued their turne: for the reſt of their time they ſpent in learning how to obey, to away with paine, to endure labour, to ouercome ſtill in fight. According to their growth and yeares, they did chaunge the exerciſes of their bodies: they did ſhaue their heads, they went bare-legged, they were conſtrained to play naked together the moſt part of their time. After they were paſt twelue yeares of age, they ware no longer coates: and they gaue them yearely but one ſeely gowne. This was the cauſe they were alwaies ſo naſtie and ſluttiſh, and they neuer vſed to bath or noint themſelues, ſauing onely at certaine daies in the yeare, when they were ſuffered to taſt of this refreſhing. They lay and ſlept together vpon beds of ſtraw, which they themſelues did make, of the tops of reeds or canes that grew in the riuer of Eurotas: which they were forced to go gather and breake thẽſelues with their hands, without any toole or iron at all. In the winter, they did mingle thiſtle downe with theſe, which is called Lycophonas, becauſe that ſtuffe ſeemeth ſomewhat warme of it ſelfe. About this time, the fauourers and likers of this pretie youth, which were commonly the luſtieſt and beſt diſpoſed youths of the citie, began to be ofter in their company: and then the old men tooke the better regard vnto them, and frequented more commonly the places of their daily exerciſes, and where their vſe was to fight together, helping them when they played, how one ſhould mocke another. This did their old men, not by way of paſtime onely, but with ſuch care & hartie loue towards thẽ, as if they had bene altogether their fathers, maiſters, & gouernors, while they were boyes: inſomuch as there was neuer time nor place, where they had not alwaies ſome to admoniſh, reproue, or correct thẽ, if they did a fault. Notwithſtanding all this, there was euer one of the honeſteſt men of the citie, who had expreſly the charge and gouernance of theſe boyes. He did deuide them in companies, & afterwards gaue the ouerſight of them, to ſuch a one of the boyes as was diſcreeteſt, the manlieſt, the moſt hardie, and of the beſt courage amongſt them. They called the children that were paſt infancie two yeares, Irenes: and the greateſt boyes Melirenes: as who would ſay, readie to go out of boyerie. This boy who was made ouerſeer of them, was commonly twenty yeres of age. He was their captaine when they fought, & did commaund them as his ſeruants when they were in the houſe: and willed them which were ſtrongeſt and the moſt grown, to carrie wood when they ſhold prepare dinner or ſupper, and thoſe which were leaſt and weakeſt, to go gather herbes, which they muſt ſteale or lacke them. So they went out to ſteale ſome in gardens, ſome at the markets, other in the halles where the feaſts were kept, and men did eate together, into the which they conueyed themſelues as cloſely and cunningly as they could deuiſe: for if they were taken with the maner, they were ſcourged terribly, becauſe they were ſo groſſe and negligent, and not fine and cunning in their facultie. They ſtole alſo all other kind of meate, whatſoeuer they could get or lay hands on. They pried and ſought all occaſions how to take and ſteale meate handſomely, both when men were aſleepe, or elſe that they were careleſſe, or did not giue good heed vnto them. But he that was taken with the maner, had his payment roundly, and was puniſhed with faſting beſides: for they had but a ſlender pittance, becauſe neceſſitie ſhold driue thẽ to venter boldly, and wit ſhould find out al the deuices to ſteale finely. This was the chiefeſt cauſe, why they gaue thẽ ſo ſmall a diet. The ſecond cauſe was, that their bodies might grow vp higher in height. For the vitall ſpirits not being occupied to concoct and digeſt much meat, nor yet kept down, or ſpread abroad by the quantitie or ouerburden therof, do enlarge thẽſelues into length, & ſhoot vp for their lightnes: & for this reaſon they thought the bodie did grow in height and length, hauing nothing to let or hinder the riſing of the ſame. It ſeemeth that the ſelfe ſame cauſe made them fairer alſo. For the bodies that are leane & ſlender, do better and more eaſily yeeld to nature, which bringeth a better proportion and form to euery member: and contrariwiſe it ſeemeth theſe groſſe, corpulent, and ouer-fed bodies do encounter nature, and be not ſo nimble and pliant to her, by reaſon of their heauie ſubſtance. As we ſee it by experience, the children which women bring a litle before their time, & be ſomwhat caſt before they ſhould haue bene borne, be ſmaller and fairer alſo, and more pure commonly then other that go their time: becauſe the matter whereof the bodie is formed, being more ſupple and plyant, is the eaſilier weilded by nature, which giueth them their ſhape and forme. Touching the naturall cauſe of this effect, let vs giue place to other to diſpute it that will, without our further deciding deciding of the ſame. But to returne to the matter of the LACEDÆMONIANS children. They did robbe with ſo great care, and feare to be diſcouered, that they tell of one, which hauing ſtolen a little foxe, did hide him vnder his cloke, and ſuffered him with his teeth and clawes to teare out all his belly, and neuer cryed, for feare he ſhould haue bene betrayed, vntill he fell downe dead in the place where he ſtoode. This is not vncredible, by that we ſee young boyes do abide at this day: for we haue ſeene diuerſe, which haue bidden whipping euen to death, vpon the altar of Diana, ſurnamed Orthia. Now this vnder maiſter, who had the charge of euery companie of theſe boyes, vſed after ſupper (ſitting yet at the table) to bid one of them ſing a ſong: to another he put foorth a queſtion, who was to be well aduiſed of his aunſwer, as for example: Who is the honeſteſt man in the citie? or how thinkeſt thou by that ſuch a one did? By this exerciſe they were inured from boyes ſtate, to iudge of things well or ill done, and to vnderſtand the life and gouernement of their citizens. For which of them did not anſwer quickely and directly to theſe queſtions, who is a good man, who is an honeſt citizen, and who not: they thought it was a ſigne of a dull wit, and careleſſe nature, not giuen to any vertue, for deſire of honour and eſtimation. Furthermore this vnder maiſter was euer to waite for his aunſwer, and to ſee it ſhould be briefe and well knit vp in wordes: otherwiſe his puniſhment that aunſwered croſſely, or to little purpoſe, was, that his maiſter bit him by the thombe. This he did many times in the preſence of the old men and magiſtrates of the citie, that they might ſee whether he puniſhed them with reaſon or not, and according to their deſeruing. And though he did hurt him, they did not by and by reproue him, but when the children were gone away, then was he himſelfe rebuked and puniſhed, if he had corrected them too ſore, or contrarily had fauoured them too much. Moreouer they did aſcribe the good or ill opinion conceiued of the children, vnto euery of their fauourers and louers, which did affect and entertaine them: in as much as they ſay, a young boy vppon a time fighting with another, and a crie ſcaping out of his mouth, which his faint cowardly heart did yeeld, his fauourer and louer was ſtraight condemned by the officers of the citie to a fine. Albeit this loue was a thing euen incorporated into them, that the moſt honeſt and vertuouſeſt women loued the young maides thus alſo: yet was there no iealouſie nor ſuſpition that grew hereof, but rather to the contrarie, there grew a maruellous mutuall loue and kindneſſe between them, which liued in one ſelfe place. For either of them by all the meanes they could, did deuiſe how to make the child they loued in common, the wiſeſt, the gentleſt, and the beſt conditioned aboue all other. They taught theſe children to ſpeake in ſuch ſort, that their ſpeech had euer in it a pleaſant grace, and in few words comprehended much matter. For Lycurgus ordained, a great maſſe and weight of iron money, ſhould be but litle worth, and of a ſmall value, as we haue told you before: and contrarily, that ſpeech in few wordes, without any affectation, ſhould hold much deepe and graue matter, wherwith the children being acquainted, after long ſilence, ſhold be briefe and pithie in their aunſwers. For as the ſeede of incontinent men which are too buſie with euery ragge and colman hedge, can take no roote to bring foorth fruite: euen ſo immoderate ſpeech, full of wordes and buſie tattle, bringeth foorth as little ſenſe. Hereof it commeth, that the anſwers of the LACONIANS were ſo ſhort and wittie. As they ſay, king Agis aunſwered on a day an ATHENIAN, who ieſting at the ſwords the LACEDÆMONIANS did weare, ſaid they were ſo ſhort, that theſe tumblers and iuglers did ſwallow them downe in the ſight of all the world: and yet ſaid Agis we hurt our enemies with them for all that. For mine owne opinion, I like well of the LACONIANS manner of ſpeaking: which is not to ſpeake much, but when they ſpeake, to touch the matter effectually, and to make the hearers vnderſtand them. I thinke alſo that Lycurgus ſelfe, was ſhort and quicke in his talke. For ſo a man may coniecture by his anſwers which are written: as that which he made to one who earneſtly prayed him to ſtabliſh a popular ſtate in LACEDÆMON, that the baſeſt might haue as great authoritie as the higheſt. Beginne (quoth he) to do it firſt in thine owne houſe. And as that alſo which he anſwered another who asked him, why he had appointed ſo ſmall things, and ſo little of value to be offered to the gods? Becauſe (quoth he) we ſhould neuer ceaſe to honour them. And as that which he ſpake another time, touching fights and frayes, which was: that he did neuer forbid his citizens any of them, but thoſe wherein they vſe to giue their hand, as you would ſay to yeeld. Men find alſo ſuch like aunſwers, in ſome of his letters written to his citizens, as when they asked him: How can we defend our ſelues againſt our enemies? He aunſwered: If ye be poore, and one do couet no more then another. And in another letter that was ſent, where he diſcourſeth, whether it were requisite to incloſe the citie with walles: he ſayeth, can that citie be without walles, which is enuironed with men, though it be vncompaſſed with ſtone? Neuertheleſſe it is hard to reſolue, whether thoſe letters, and other ſuch like that are ſhewed, be to be beleeued, or diſcredited to be his. But that long ſpeech was much diſliked, and reproued among the LACEDÆMONIANS, it is manifeſtly to be ſeene by the wordes, which ſome amongſt them haue heretofore aunſwered. Short ſentences of certaine Laconians. Leonidas. Charilaus. Archidamidas As king Leonidas ſaid one day, to one that diſcourſed with him many good things, but out of ſeaſon: friend, thou ſpeakeſt many good wordes, but to litle purpoſe. And Charilaus, nephew to Lycurgus, being asked why his vncle made ſo few lawes: becauſe ſaid he, to men of few wordes, few lawes will ſerue. And Archidamidas ſayed thus to ſome which reproued Hecataeus the Oratour, for that being bidden to ſupper at one of their feaſtes, he ſpake not a word all ſupper time. He who can ſpeake well, knoweth alſo when to ſpeake. And where I haue tolde before, that in their feate and quicke aunſwers, commonly there was ſome pretie grace, it may be well ſeene and knowne by theſe that follow. Sharpe ſentences of the Laconians: Demaratus. Agis. Theopompus. Demaratus aunſwered a buſie fellow who troubled him too much with vaine importunate queſtions, asking him ſtill: who was the honeſteſt man of LACEDÆMON? euen he that is leaſt like thy ſelfe. And Agis ſaid to ſome which highly praiſed the ELIANS for their vpright iudgement, and iuſt dealing in the games Olympicall. What wonder make ye of it (quoth he) if in fiue yeares ſpace the ELIANS one day do good iuſtice? And Theopompus likewiſe to a ſtraunger, who as deſirous to ſhew his affection he bare the LACEDÆMONIANS, told him how euery body called him Philolacon (as to ſay) a louer of LACEDÆMON. It were more honeſtie for thee (ſaid he) to be named Philopolites, a louer of her citizens. Pliſtonax, Pauſanias ſon. And Pliſtonax the ſonne of Pauſanias, when an Oratour of ATHENS ſaid the LACEDÆMONIANS were vnlearned and ignorant: Thou ſayeſt true quoth he, for we only of al the GRECIANS haue learned none of your ill conditions. Archidamidas And Archidamidas, to one that demaunded of him, what number of fighting men there might be of the SPARTANS: Enow ſaid he, to driue away the wicked. We may coniecture alſo their manner of ſpeaking, by their words in mirth, which they ſpake ſometimes playing wiſe: for they did neuer vſe to ſpeake vaine words at randone, but it had alwaies ſome ſecret meaning in it, which required anothers good obſeruation that would find it. As he which was deſired to go heare the nightingale counterfeited naturally: I haue (ſaid he) heard the nightingale it ſelfe. In the life of Ageſilaus. And another which hauing read this inſcription vpon a tumbe:

When as they had well quenched tyrannie throughout their land, by worthy warlike power, Their happe was yet in wretched wiſe to dye,
by ſcaling Selynuntaes ſtrongeſt tower.

They well deſerued death, ſaid he, that did but quench tyranny: they ſhould haue quite conſumed it with fire. And one younger boy to another, promiſing to giue him ſuch hardie cocks of the game, as ſhould die in the place where they fought. O giue me not thoſe (ſaid he) which will dye, but thoſe which with fighting will kill others. Another ſeeing men ſitting in coaches and litters as they went: God forbid (ſaid he) that I ſhould euer ſit in a chaire, where I could not riſe to my elders. Such were their aunſwers and encounters. So that ſome had reaſon which ſaid heretofore, to ſpeake LACONIAN like, was to be Philoſopher like: as you would ſay, more to exerciſe the mind, then the bodie. Beſides all this, they did ſtudie to ſing well, and to make goodly ditties and ſongs. The Lacedemonians ſongs. Then they ſpake moſt properly and featly. There was in their ſongs alſo a certaine motion, I wote not what, which ſtirred vp the hearers hearts, and did kindle deſire in them to do notable feates. Their tongue was plain, without affectation: their matter graue and moral, containing for the moſt part the praiſe of thoſe, which were ſlaine in battell for the defence of their countrie, as being happie men: and a ſhame to thoſe that liue, which for faint hearts refuſed ſo to die, to leade a miſerable and vnfortunate life. Or elſe they ſang how they were the patternes for time to come, or the right glorie of the world, and the true repreſentation of vertuous men; as the ſong would beſt become their ages which did ſing. It ſhall not be impertinent for the better vnderſtanding hereof, to bring you here an example. For in their open feaſtes, there were alwaies three dauncers, according to the difference of the three ages. Three dauncers among the Lacedemonians. The daunce of the old men, thus began firſt for to ſing.

To conclude, who nearely will conſider the works and makings of the LACON Poets (whereof ſome are yet extant) and will marke alſo the notes and tunes of the pipe, after the ſound and meaſure whereof they marched in array, going to charge the enemy: he ſhall find that Terpander and Pindarus, had reaſon to ioyne hardineſſe with muſicke. For Terpander ſpeaking of the LACEDÆMONIANS, ſaith in a place: Terpander of the Lacedæmonians.

This is that land where deedes of chiualrie,
did flouriſh moſt, in many a martiall feate:
Where muſicke made, her choiſe of harmonie,
and iuſtice kept her ſtately royall ſeate.

And Pindarus ſpeaking of them alſo ſaith: Pyndarus of the Lacedæmonians.

There: graue aduiſe, is found in aged braines:
there: gallant youths are luſtie lads in deede.
Which can both ſing, and daunce, in courtlike traines:
yet daunt their foes with many a doughtie deede.

By which teſtimonies it appeareth, the one and the other made, and deſcribed them to haue loued muſicke, and the warres together. For as another LACON Poet ſaith:

It fitteth well, and is a ſeemely thing,
for ſuch as ſpend their time in feates of warre:
To haue the skill, ſweete ſonnets for to ſing,
and touch the harpe withouten iangling iarre.

For this cauſe therefore in all their warres, when they ſhould giue battell, the King did firſt ſacrifice to the Muſes, to put his ſouldiers in mind (as it ſhould ſeeme) of the diſcipline and wiſedome of the Muſes that they had bene brought vp in, to the end that when his ſouldiours were in the moſt extreme daunger, the Muſes ſhould preſent them ſelues before the ſouldiers eyes, to pricke them forwards to do ſome noble actes of worthie memorie. In their time of warre, they did tollerate their yong men a little of their hard and old accuſtomed life, and ſuffered them then to trimme their haires, to haue braue armour, to weare gay apparell, and tooke as great delight therein, to ſee them gallant and luſtie, as to behold yong neying and ſnorting horſes, deſirous for to fight. And although from the beginning of their youth, they did vſe to weare long haires: yet were they neuer ſo carefull to combe and bruſh their heads, as when they ſhould to the battell. For then they did noint them ſelues with ſweete oyles, and did ſhed their haire, remembring Lycurgus ſaying: who was wont to tell them, that haires to them which were faire, did make them more faire, and to them that were foule, they made them more vgly and dreadfull. The exerciſes alſo of their bodies, were more eaſie and gentle, and not ſo hard and ſtraight in their warres, as they were in a peace: and generally, their whole manner of life was not then ſo ſtraightly viewed, nor yet controlled. So as they onely were the men of the world, to whom warres were made a reſt from labour, which men ordinarily do endure, to make them the fitter for the warres. Afterwardes when their armie was ſet in battell ray, euen in the face of the enemie, the King did ſtraight ſacrifice a goate vnto the goddes, and forthwith commaunded all his ſouldiours to put their garlands of flowers on their heads, and willed that the pipes ſhould ſound the ſong of Caſtor, at the noiſe and tune whereof, he him ſelfe beganne firſt to march forward. So that it was a maruellous pleaſure, and likewiſe a dreadfull ſight, to ſee the whole battell march together in order, at the ſound of the pipes, and neuer to breake their pace, nor confound their rankes, nor to be diſmaid nor amazed themſelues, but to go on quietly and ioyfully at the ſound of theſe pipes, to hazard them ſelues euen to death. For it is likely, that ſuch courages are not troubled with much feare, nor yet ouercome with much furie: but rather they haue an aſſured conſtancie and valiantneſſe in good hope, as thoſe which are backed with the aſſiſting fauour of the gods. The king marching in this order, had alwaies ſome about him, which had before time wonne the priſes in games and iuſtes. And they ſay there was one of theſe on a time, that was offered a great ſumme of mony at the games Olympicall, not to preſent himſelfe at them: but he refuſed it, liking better with great paine to win the priſe, then for much mony to loſe his honour. Whereupon the one ſayd vnto him, LACONIAN: and what haſt thou gotten now, to cary away the priſe with ſo much ſwet? The LACONIAN anſwered him laughing: I ſhal fight in the battel, ſaith he, before the King. When they had once broken into their enemies, they did ſtil fiercely and fiercelier ſet vpon them, and did neuer ceaſe, vntill their enemies gaue way & fled: and then they chaſed and followed them ſtill, vntill ſuch time as their ouerthrow and flight had aſſured them of the victorie. Then they quickly and quietly returned to their campe, iudging it to be no manhood, neither part of a noble mind, or of ſo worthy a nation as the GRECIANS were, to kil and hew in peeces, men ſo ſcattered and out of order, hauing forſaken al the hope of victorie. This fell out not onely honourable, but alſo very profitable for them. For they which were in battell againſt them, knowing they killed none but ſuch as reſiſted ſtoutly, and how they did let other go which fled before them: they found it was more their benefite to flie, then to tarrie and abide the ſtrokes. Hippias the ſophiſter ſaith, that Lycurgus him ſelfe was a very good captaine, and a great ſouldier, as he that had bene in many foughten fields: and Philoſtephanus aſcribeth to him the deuiſe to put horſemen in troupes & companies, which they called Oulames, whereof fiftie men at armes was a troupe, whoſe maner was to put themſelues in ſquadrons. But Demetrius the Phalerian writeth otherwiſe, that Lycurgus was neuer at the wars, and that he made all his lawes and gouernement in a full peace. But in my opinion, the intermiſſion of wars during the playes Olympical, which they ſay he deuiſed, doth ſhew in apparance that he was a gentle natured man, and one that loued quietnes and peace. Some notwithſtanding (amongſt whom Hermippus was one) ſay, he was not with Iphitus at the firſt beginning when he ordeined the playes Olympicall, but that by chance he happened to come thither, paſſing by in his iourney only, and that he ſtaid there to ſee the games: where he thought he heard the voice of a man behind him, ſaying, he maruelled much why he did not perſwade his citizens alſo to be partners of this new deuice: and turning backe to ſee who it was that ſpake to him, he ſaw no body. Whereupon he tooke a conceit that it was a ſpeech from the gods: and went therefore preſently to ſeek out Iphitus, with whom he made all the ſtatutes and orders of the feaſt, which afterwards were farre more famous, better ordered, and more ſtately then before. But to returne againe to the LACEDÆMONIANS: their diſcipline and order of life continued ſtill, after they were full growne men. For it was not lawfull for any man to liue as he liſted, but they were within their city, as if they had bene a campe, where euery man knoweth what allowance he hath to liue withall, and what buſineſſe he hath elſe to do in his calling. To be ſhort, they were all of this mind, that they were not borne to ſerue themſelues, but to ſerue their countrey. Therefore if they were commanded nothing elſe, they went continually to ſee what the children did, and to teach them ſomwhat which might profit the common weale, or elſe they went to learne of thoſe which were their elders. For one of the beſt and happieſt things which Lycurgus euer brought into his citie, was the great reſt & leiſure which he made his citizens to haue, only forbidding them that they ſhould not profeſſe any vile or baſe occupation: and they needed not alſo to be carefull to get great riches, in a place where goods were nothing profitable nor eſteemed. For the Ilotes, which were made bōd mē by the wars, did till their grounds, and yeelded them a certain reuenue euery yeare. And as touching this matter, they tel of a LACEDÆMONIAN, who being on a day at ATHENS where the law was pleaded, did vnderſtand that a citizen there was condemned for idlenes, and how he went home to his houſe very ſorowfully, accompanied with his friends which were ſory for him, and greatly lamented his ill hap: the LACEDÆMONIAN then prayed thoſe which were about him, to ſhew him the man condemned for liuing nobly, and like a gentleman. I haue alledged this, to ſhew how he thought it a vile and ſeruile thing to exerciſe any handy craft, or to worke any thing by hand to get money. For ſutes in law, a man may be well aſſured they were baniſhed with the gold and ſiluer from LACEDÆMON, conſidering now there was no more auarice nor couetouſneſſe there, nor yet pouerty nor lacke, but equality with abundance, and quiet life with ſobriety. All other times but when they had warres, they followed dauncing, feaſts, playes, bankets, hunting, or other exerciſes of body, and meetings to paſſe the time away. For the young men vntill they came to thirty yeares of age, neuer went into the market to buy any prouiſion or things for the houſe, but did their fathers or their friends buſineſſe: nay it was a ſhame for the oldeſt men, to haunt the market too often. As to the contrarie, it was honourable for them to be preſent at the ſhew place the moſt part of the day, where they diuerſly exerciſed their bodies, and likewiſe to be at the places of assembly, there to spend time with walking together, and discoursing honestly one with another, without talking of any matter of gaine, trafficke, or mony. For all their talke (for the most part) was about the praising of some honest thing, or sporting wise to reproue some dishonesty, which alwaies caried with it some gentle lesson or monitiō by the way. For Lycurgus was not such a sower mā, as they neuer saw him laugh: but as Sosibius writeth, it was he that first sacriced to the litle god of laughter, which is at LACEDÆMON, because he would mingle their feasts & assemblies with mirth, as a pleasant sawce to ease the trouble of their strict and hard life. To be briefe, he did accustome his citizens so, that they neither would nor could liue alone, but were in maner as men incorporated one with another, and were alwaies in company together, as the bees be about their maister bee: still in a continuall loue to serue their countrie, to win honour, and to aduance the common-weale. Which affection of theirs is plaine and easly seene to be imprinted in them by certain of their answers, as in that which Pædaretus said on a time, being left out of the election of the number of the three hundred. Who departing home to his house mery & iocond as might be, said: It did him good to see there were three hundred found better in the citie than himself. Pisistratidas also being sent ambassadour with certaine other to the lieutenants of the king of PERSIA, the PERSIAN Lords asked him, if they came of their owne desire, or whether they were sent from the whole state: If we obtaine, said he, it is from the state: if we be denied, then we come of our selues. And Argileonida the mother of Brasidas, asked some that went to visit her after they were returned home to LACEDÆMON from their iourney to AMPHIPOLIS, if her sonne died like a man, & a worthy SPARTAN: and they straight did commend him highly, saying: there was not left in all LACEDÆMON such a valiant man. She replied vnto them. Say not so, my friends, I pray you: for Brasidas was indeed a valiant man, but the countrey of LACONIA hath many moe yet valienter then he was. Now touching their Senate, Lycurgus was the first that erected it among them. The first that were thereof, were Lycurgus chiefe aiders and assisters of that erection, as we haue declared before: but afterwardes he ordained, that when any of those first should happen to die, they should chuse in his place the most honest reported man in the citie, so he were three score yeares old and aboue. This was the noblest glorie that could be among men, when a man bare the bell & prise, not that he was swiftest among the swift, nor strongest amongst the strong, but that he among the honest was honestest. He had the reward of his vertue, as for libertie to speake, soueraigne authoritie to gouerne, and princely power ouer the commonweale, the honor, the life, and the goods of the whole citizens: howbeit the election was made after this sort. The people first assembled in the market place, where there were some appointed & shut vp thereabout in a house, from whence they could neither see, nor be seene of those that were assembled, but only they might heare the noise which they made there. For the people by their crie and shout, did declare whom they did chuse, and whom they did refuse of the competitours, as they vsed to shew their liking by the like crie in other things. The competitours were not brought in, and presented all together, but one after another in order, as by lot did fall out. He on whom the lot fel, passed through the midst of the assembly of the people, and said neuer a word. The people straight that liked, made a crie or shout aloud. The men appointed which were locked vp, had bookes or tables in which they wrote and noted the greatnes of the cry & shout the people made, as euery competitor passed by, not knowing nor seeing who he was. These hidden men did only set downe in their bookes, the first, the second, the third, and so many more, as by shouts and cries they perceiued did passe thus through the assembly. They noted also in their said bookes, which of these had the greatest crie & shout of people at their passing through: and him they came and declared to be Senator chosen. Then he wearing a garland of flowers on his head, went to all the temples of the gods in the citie to giue thankes, hauing a great traine of yong men following, and praising of his vertues. There went also with him a maruellous companie of women singing songs of his praise, and how blessed he was that he had liued so vertuously. Then euery one of his kinne prepared a banquet for him at home at their houses, and as he entred the house, they said vnto him: The citie honoureth thee with this banquet. That done, he repaired afterwards to the ordinarie place of their eating, where he did in all things as he was accustomed, sauing he was serued now at his table with a double allowance, whereof he reserued the one. After supper, all his kinswomen stood in the entrie of the hall where they had eaten: so he called her whom he loued best, and gaue her his allowance he had saued, and sayd to her: This was giuen me in token I was this day rewarded for my vertue: and euen so I giue it thee for a like token of reward for thy vertue. Then was she brought home by all the women there to her house, euen in like sort as he was by the men. Touching burials, Lycurgus made a wise order: For first of all, to cut off all superstition of burying places, he commaunded they should bury their dead within the city, and that their graues should be round about their temples, that yong persons might haue them alwayes in their eyes, and not be affraid to see a dead body, as if to touch a coarse, or to passe by their graues, it should defile a man. Then did he forbid them to bury any thing with the coarse, & willed they should only lap it vp in a red cloth, with oliue leaues. It was not lawfull to graue the name of any dead body vpon his graue, but only of such a man as died in the warres, or of some holy woman professed into their temples. Furthermore, the time appointed to mourne in, was very short. For it lasted not but eleuen daies, and on the twelfth day, they must do sacrifice to Proserpina, and so leaue off their mourning. To conclude, he left nothing idle, or vnworking in his citizens: for to all necessary things which men cannot lack, Lycurgus ioyned euer a certaine emulation of men; as to desire vertue, and to contemne vice: and furnished his city with many good precepts and examples, among which his citizens being still borne and bred vp, and hauing the same in euery place before their eyes where they went, they came to passe in time to be framed after the very patterne and mould of vertue it selfe. For this cause did he not suffer any to trauell out of the country, or to go abroad as he would, without special licence, for feare lest those which trauelled abroad for their pleasure, should bring home strange fashions and maners, and a corrupt disordered life, which by litle and litle might get way, and bring an alteration and change of the whole state. Furthermore, he kept out of SPARTA all strangers, except those which had necessary businesse there, or were come thither for some profit to the countrey: not that he was afraid they should learne something whereby to loue vertue, or that they should desire to follow his fashion and manner of gouernement, as Thucydides was: but rather fearing they should teach his citizens some naughty manners, or some ill fauoured vice. For it must needs be, that strangers bring euer strange and new deuises with them: which new deuises bring with them also new opinions: and new opinions beget new affections and minds, that many times are repugnant to the law, and to the forme of the common-weale established before, as discords do many times in an harmony of musicke, that before agreed very well together. Therefore he iudged it a thing most necessary, to keep his city free and safe from counterfaiting of any strangers manners or fashions, that were commonly as persons infected with some contagious sickenesse. Now in all we haue spoken before, euen to this place, there is no maner of token or shew of iniustice, or lacke of equitie, wherewith some seeme to burden Lycurgus in his lawes: by saying they were well made, to make men warlike and valiant, but not to be iust or righteous. But concerning the law they call Cryptia, as much to say, as their secret: if it were of Lycurgus institution, as Aristotle sayth, it might haue caried Plato into the like opinion that Lycurgus had of his common weale. This was the law: The gouernors which had the charge and ouersight of the yong men, at certaine appointed times, did chuse out those they thought to haue the best discretion, and sent them abroad into the country, some one way, some another way, who caried with them daggers, and some prouision to feed them. These yong men being thus dispersed abroade in the country, did hide themselues all the day close in secret places, and there they lay and tooke their rest: afterwards when night was come, they went to seek out the high wayes, & killed the first of the ILOTES that they met. Sometimes euen in the broad day, they went into the country to kill the strongest and stoutest of them: as Thucydides telleth in his history of the wars of PELOPONNESVS, where he saith: That a certaine conuenient number of the ILOTES were crowned, by a publike proclamation of the SPARTANS: and being infranchised, for their good seruices they had done the common weale, they were caried to all the temples of the gods for an honour. Within a while after, no man knew what was become of them, being about two thousand in number: so that neuer man heard tell neither then nor since, how they came to their deaths. Howbeit Aristotle aboue all others saith, that the Ephores, so soone as they were placed in their offices, made warre with the ILOTES, because they might lawfully kill them. And it is true, that in other things they did handle them very hardly. For they forced them sometimes to drinke wine without water out of measure, till they had made them starke drunke. Then they brought them all into their common hals where they did eate, to make their children to behold them, and to see what beastlinesse it was for a man to be drunke. Likewise they made them sing songs, and daunce daunces, vnfit for honest men, and such as were ful of derision and mockery, and did forbid them expressly to sing any honest honeſt ſongs. So it is reported, that in the iourny the THEBANS made to LACONIA, many of the ILOTES were taken priſoners thereat, and when they were commanded to ſing the verſes of Terpander, or of Alcman, or of Spendon the Laconian, they would not do it: ſaying, they durſt not ſing thē for their maiſters. Wherfore he that firſt ſaid in the country of LACEDÆMONIA, he that is free is more free, & he that is bond, is more bond then in other places: knew very well the diuerſitie betweene the libertie and bondage there, and the libertie and bondage of other countries. But in my opinion, the LACEDÆMONIANS began to vſe theſe great outrages and cruelties, long time after the death of Lycurgus, and ſpecially ſince the great earthquake that happened at SPARTA, at which time the ILOTES roſe againſt them with the MESSENIANS, and did great miſchiefe thorough the countrey, and put the citie to the greateſt diſtreſſe and daunger that euer it had. For I cannot be perſwaded, that euer Lycurgus inuented, or inſtituted, ſo wicked and miſchieuous an act, as that kind of ordinance was: becauſe I imagine his nature was gentle and mercifull, by the clemencie and iuſtice we ſee he vſed in all his other doings, and was witneſſed beſides by open oracle from the gods, for a iuſt and wiſe man. Furthermore, they ſay of him, that when he ſaw the chiefeſt points of his gouernement had taken deepe roote, and that the forme of his common-weale went on, and was ſtrong inough to maintaine and keepe it ſelfe a foote, like as Plato ſaith, that God reioyced greatly after he had made the world, and ſaw the ſame turne and moue his firſt mouing: euen ſo Lycurgus taking ſingular pleaſure and delight in his mind, to ſee his notable lawes put in vre, and ſo well eſtabliſhed and liked of by experience, ſought yet to make them immortal, as neere as he could poſſible, by any forecaſt of man, that no after time whatſoeuer, might change or put them downe. To bring this to paſſe, he cauſed all the people to aſſemble, and told them he thought his ciuil pollicy and ſtate of common weale was already ſufficiently eſtabliſhed, for vertuous and happie life: yet there was one matter behind of greater importance then all the reſt, which he could not yet declare vnto them, vntill he had firſt asked counſell of the oracle of Apollo. And therefore in the meane time they ſhould keepe and obſerue his lawes and ordinances inuiolably, without changing, remouing, or ſtaying any matter therein, vntill he were returned from the citie of DELPHES, and then they ſhould do that other thing behind, if the god then ſo counſelled him. They all promiſed him to do it, and praied him to make haſt to go on his iourny. But before he departed, he made the kings and ſenators ſweare firſt, and conſequently al the people after, that they would keep his lawes and ordinances without changing or altering any thing, vntill he did returne againe. This done, he went to the citie of DELPHES, where ſo ſoone as he arriued, he ſacrificed in the temple to Apollo, and asked him: If the lawes he had made were good to make a man an happie life. Apollo made him anſwer, his lawes were very good, and that his city keeping them, ſhould be the moſt renowmed of the world. Lycurgus cauſed this oracle to be written, which he ſent to SPARTA. After he ſacrificed to Apollo againe: and then taking leaue of his friends, and of his ſonne, he determined to die, becauſe his citizens ſhould neuer be releaſed of the oath they had made betweene his hands. When he had this determination, he was come to the age, wherein a man hath ſtrength inough to liue longer: and yet was old inough alſo to die if he would. Wherefore finding himſelf happie to haue obtained his deſire, he willingly pined him ſelfe to death, by abſtinence and lacke of meate. For he thought it meete, that the very death of great perſonages ſhould bring benefite euer to the common-weale, and that the end of their life ſhould be no more idle or vnprofitable, then the reſt of their life before: nay rather, that it was one of their moſt meritorious acts, to haue their death extolled for worthineſſe. So he imagined, that his death would be the perfection & crown of his felicity, after he had made & ordained ſo many good and notable lawes, for the honor and benefit of his country: and ſhould be as a ſeale of confirmation of his law, and the continuall preſeruitour of this citie, conſidering all his citizens had ſworne to keepe them all inuiolably, vntill he were returned. He was not deceiued of his hope, for his citie was the chiefeſt of the world, in glory and honour of gouernement, by the ſpace of fiue hundred yeares. For ſo long his citie kept his lawes without any change or alteration by any of the Kings ſucceſſours, vntill King Agis, the ſonne of Archidamus began to raigne. For the creation of the Ephores, did not breake, nor diſcontinue any of the lawes of Lycurgus, but reduced them rather to a more ſtraight and ſtrict order: although it ſeemed at the firſt that the Ephores were ordained, for the maintenance and defence of the liberty of the people, whereas indeed they did alſo ſtrengthen the authority of the Kings and Senate. Now in the raigne of King Agis, gold and ſiluer beganne firſt to creepe in againe to the citie of SPARTA, by meanes of Lyſander brought in riches againe into Sparta. brought riches and couetouſneſſe into the country, and filled the ſame with all fineneſſe, by bringing in great ſtore of gold and ſiluer from the warres, directly againſt the laws and ordinances of Lycurgus. The which ſo long as they were in force and vſe, it appeared that the gouernement of SPARTA ſeemed not to be a pollicie or common weale, but rather a certain holy place and order of religion. And euen as the Poets faine, that Hercules went through the world with his club and Lions skinne, puniſhing cruell robbers, and vnnaturall tyrants: ſo in like caſe with a litle ſcrole of parchment, and a poore cape, did the SPARTANS commaund and giue lawes to all the reſt of GREECE, euen with their good liking and conſent. And they chaſed the tyrants away, which vſurped tyrannicall power ouer any of their cities, and did decide all controuerſies, and oftentimes pacified their ſeditions, without ſending out one ſouldier, but only a ſimple poore ambaſſadour. At whoſe commaundement, the people preſently aſſembled like the bees, which gather together about their king, ſo ſoone as they ſpie him: they did then ſo greatly reuerence the good gouernement and iuſtice of the SPARTANS. Therefore I can but wonder much at thoſe which ſay, the city of LACEDÆMON could obey well, but not commaund: and for proofe they alleage words of Theopompus words of obeying and commanding. king Theopompus, who anſwered one which ſaid, that SPARTA was maintained, becauſe the kings could command well. Nay the rather (ſaid he) becauſe the citizens can obey well. For men commonly diſdaine to obey thoſe, which are not wiſe in commanding. So that the faithfull obediēce of the ſubiects, dependeth much vpon the ſufficient cōmandement of the wiſe prince. For he that directeth well, muſt needs be well obeyed. For like as the art of a good rider, is to make his horſe gentle, and ready at commandement: euen ſo the chiefeſt point belonging to a Prince, is to teach Good gouernement breedeth due obedience. his ſubiects to obey. Wherefore the LACEDÆMONIANS procured, that not onely other people did willingly obey them, but alſo deſired to be ruled and commaunded by them. For they asked them, neither ſhips nor money, nor yet did ſend them any number of men of warre to compell them, but only they ſent one citizen of SPARTA to gouerne them, to whom all the other people ſubmitted themſelues, and were holpen by him in their neceſſity, as fearing and reuerencing him. In this wiſe the SICILIANS were holpen by Gyſippus, the CHALCIDIANS by Braſidas, and all the GRECIANS inhabiting ASIA, by Lyſander, Collicratidas, and by Ageſilaus, who were called the reformers and directers of Princes, peoples and Kings, vnto whom they were ſent here and there: but euer they had their eye vpon the city of SPARTA, as vpon the moſt perfect patterne to order mans life by, and to gouerne a common weale after. To this effect tended the mery word ſpoken in ieſt by Stratonicus: who ſaid he did order the ATHENIANS to tend their ſacrifices, and the ELIANS to tend their games: and if they made any fault therein, the LACEDÆMONIANS ſhould be well whipped. That was merily ſpoken, and in a ieſting maner. But Antiſthenes, Socrates ſcholers words. Antiſthenes (the philoſopher and one of Socrates ſchollers) ſeeing the THEBANS growne very hawty and glorious, after that they had conquered the LACEDÆMONIANS in the iourney of LEVCTRES: me thinketh ſaid he, theſe THEBANS here do like the ſchool-boyes, which bragge and reioyce, when they haue a little beaten their maſter. But this was not Lycurgus meaning, to haue his city to command many. But he thought the felicitie of a citie, as of a priuate man, conſiſted chiefly in the exerciſe of vertue, and in the vnity of the inhabitants therof. He framed his common wealth to this end, that his citizens ſhould be nobly minded, content with their owne, and temperate in their doings, that thereby they might maintaine and keepe themſelues long in ſafety. The ſelfe ſame intention had Plato, Diogenes, and Zenon, in ſetting forth their bookes, which they wrote of the gouernement of common weales: and ſo had likewiſe many other great and learned men which

The foundation of a common weale. haue written of the ſame matter. Howbeit they only left behind them, words, and written books: but Lycurgus contrariwiſe, left no written bookes nor pamphlets, but ſtabliſhed and left behind him a royall forme of gouernement, which no man euer before had inuented, nor neuer after could be followed. He hath made them plainly ſee a whole city liue together, and gouerne it ſelfe philoſophically, according to the true rules and precepts of perfect wiſedome: which imagined that true wiſedome was a thing hanging in the ayre, and could not viſibly be ſeene in the world. Whereby he hath worthily excelled in glory all thoſe, which euer tooke vpon them to write or ſtabliſh the gouernement of a common weale. And therefore ſayth Ariſtotle, that after his death they did him leſſe honor in LACEDÆMONIA, then he had deſerued: albeit they did him all the honor they poſſibly could deuiſe. And yet they built a temple for him, and made ſolemne ſacrifice to him euery yeare, as vnto a god. More, they ſay, that when the aſhes of his body were brought to SPARTA, there fell ſtraight lightning vpon his tomb where they were put, which they had not often ſeene to happen to other men of name after their deceaſe, ſauing only to the Poet Euripides, who dying in MACEDONIA, was buried neare the citie of ARETHVSA. The which is ſome manifeſt argument, for ſuch as loue the Poet, to lay againſt thoſe which ſomwhat depraue him, ſeeing this ſigne came to him after his death, which had happened before to a moſt well beloued man of the gods. Some ſay Lycurgus dyed in the citie of CIRRHA. But Apollothemis ſaith, he died in ELIDA. Timæus and Ariſtoxenus write, he ended his daies in CRETA. And Ariſtoxenus ſaith further, that thoſe of the Ile of CRETA do ſhew his graue in the place which they cal Pergamia, by the broad high waies ſide. He left one only begottē ſon named Antiorus, who died without iſſue, ſo that his houſe and name failed with him. But his neare kinſmen and familiar friends, did ſet vp a company or brotherhood in memorie of him, which continued a long time: and the daies wherin they aſſembled, were called the Lycurgides. There is another Ariſtocrates (the ſon of Hipparchus) who ſaith, that he being dead in CRETA, his friends burned his body, and afterwards threw his aſhes into the ſea, according as he had prayed and requeſted them. For he feared, that if any part of him ſhould at any time haue bene brought to SPARTA, the inhabitants would haue ſaid he was returned againe, and thereby would haue thought themſelues diſcharged of their oath, and might haue lawfully altered the lawes which he had appointed. And this is the diſcourſe and end of Lycurgus life.

THE LIFE OF Numa Pompilius.

THE Hiſtoriographers differ maruellouſly of the time, in which Numa Pompilius raigned king, albeit ſome wil deriue frō him many noble houſes deſcended in ROME. For one Clodius, who wrote the book intituled, the table of time, affirmeth that the ancient regiſters of the city of ROME were loſt when it was taken and ſacked by the GAVLES: and that thoſe which are extant at this day be not true, but were only made by men deſirous to gratifie ſome, which haue thruſt in ancient houſes & families of the firſt ROMAINES, that concerne nothing them whom they meant to repreſent. On the other ſide, although the common opinion be, that Numa was a familiar friend and ſcholler of Pythagoras the Philoſopher, yet ſome ſay he was neuer learned, nor had any knowledge at all in the Greeke tongue. And yet maintaining that it is poſſible enough, that he was so well borne, and had such perfection in all kind of vertue, that he neuer needed any master: and though he had needed, they had rather attribute the honour of the instructing of this king vnto some other forreine person, that was more excellent then Pythagoras. Other say, that Pythagoras the Philosopher was long time after the raigne of Numa, and well nigh fiue ages after him. Howbeit other say, there was another Pythagoras borne in SPARTA (who hauing won the prize of running at the games Olympicall, in the sixteenth Olympiad, and the third yeare of Numaes raigne) did come into ITALIE, where he kept much about Numa, and did assist and helpe him in the gouerning and ordering of his Realme. By meanes whereof there be many customes yet of the LACONIANS, mingled with the ROMAINES, which this second Pythagoras was said to haue taught him. Neuertheles it is not confessed that Numa was borne of the SABYNES, which they say are descended from the LACEDÆMONIANS. So it falleth out very hard to agree certainly of the time when Numa was, and chiefly for such as will follow the roll or table of those, which from Olympiades to Olympiades haue won the prizes of games Olympicall: considering the rolle or table that they haue at this present, was very lately published by one Hippias an Elian, who deliuereth no reason or argument of necessitie, why it should be taken for an vndoubted troth, which he in that sort hath gathered. Yet we will not leaue to put in writing those things worthy of memory which we could gather by any meanes of king Numa, beginning at that place which we thought to be meetest. It was now since ROME was built, seuen and thirty yeres (for so long time raigned Romulus) when Romulus the fifth of the month of Iuly (which they call the Nones of the goates) made a solemne sacrifice without the citie, neare to a certain place commonly called, the goate marsh. As all the whole Senate, with the most part of the people were present at this sacrifice, suddenly there rose in the aire a very great tempest, and a maruellous darke thicke cloud, which fell on the earth with such boysterous winds, stormes, lightnings, and thunder, that the poore common people being afraid of so sore a tempest, dispersed themselues suddenly, running here and there for succour, and therewithall king Romulus vanished away in such sort, that he was neuer after seene aliue nor dead. This brought the Senators & Noble men whō they called Patricians, into great suspition. And there ran a foule tale among the common people, how they had long time borne very impatiently to be subiects to a King, because themselues would haue had and taken vpon them some soueraign authority, and that for this cause they had killed king Romulus. Adding somewhat more vnto it, how a litle before he had vsed them more roughly, and commanded them more straightly then he was wont or accustomed. Neuertheles they found the meanes to quench all these brutes and murmurings, by doing diuine honor and sacrifice vnto him, as one not dead, but passed to a better life. To confirme this, one of the noblest men among them called Proclus came in, and by oath, affirmed before all the people, that he saw Romulus ascending vp into heauen, armed at all peeces, and that he heard a voice say: fiō thencefoorth call him Quirinus. This being thus appeased, there sprang vp another trouble, to know whom they should choose in his place. For the strangers which were come then from other places to dwell in ROME, were not yet throughly ioyned to the naturall borne ROMAINES: in so much, as the common people did not onely wauer, and stagger vp and downe in opinion, but the Senatours also (that were many, and of diuerse nations) did enter into a suspition one of another. These things notwithstanding they all agreed in this, that of necessitie they must choose a king: howbeit in the rest they differed much, not onely whom they should choose, but also of what nation he should be. For those which were the first founders and builders of the citie of ROME with Romulus, could in no wise abide, nor suffer that the SABYNES (to whom they had diuided part of their lands, and a moitie of their citie) should attempt and presume to command them, whom they did receiue and associate into their company and fellowship. The SABYNES alledged on the other side for them, a good reason, and such as caried great probability. Which was, that neuer since the death of their king Tatius, they neither had in any thing disobeyed nor disquieted king Romulus, but had suffered him to raigne peaceably: and therefore Romulus being now deceased, reason would that the new King should be chosen of their nation. And that albeit the ROMAINES had receiued them into their citie, they could not say therfore, that in time of this association, they were lesse to be reckened of in any thing, then themselues. Further they added, that in ioyning with them, the ROMAINES had doubly increased their might and power, and had made a bodie of a people, which deserued the honour and title of a citie. These were the causes of their contention. But to preuent that of this contention there might grow no confusiō in the citie, if it ſhould remaine without an head to command: the Senators which were a hundred and fiftie in number, gaue counſell that euery one of them by turnes, one after another, ſhould carrie the royall ſtate of the king, and all the ſhewes and ornaments of his maieſtie, and ſhould do the ordinarie ſacrifices of the king, and diſpatch all cauſes ſixe houres in the day, and ſix hours in the night, as the king before had vſed. Thus they thought it beſt to deuide the rule, that one might haue aſmuch power as the other, aſwell in reſpect of themſelues, as alſo for regard of the people. For they imagined, that the changing and remouing thus of this regall dignitie, and paſſing it from man to man, would cleane take away enuie among them, and make euery of them to rule temperately, and vprightly ſee, that in one and the ſelfe ſame day and night, euery of them ſhould be a King and priuate perſon alſo. The ROMAINES call this manner of regiment in vacation, Interregnum: as you would ſay, rule for the time. Now albeit their gouernment was very modeſt and ciuill, yet they could not for all that keepe themſelues from falling into the ſuſpition and ſlaunder of the people: who gaue it out ſtraight, that this was a fine deuice of theirs, to chaunge by this meanes the rule of the Realme into a few noble mens hands, to the end that the whole authority and gouernment of all publike cauſes, ſhould remaine ſtill in themſelues, becauſe it grieued them to be ſubiect to a King. And in the end, the two parts of the city came to this agreement: that the one part ſhould chooſe one of the bodie of the other, to be the King. This courſe they liked very well, aſweli for the pacification of preſent ſtirre and diſſention amongeſt themſelues, as for procuring equalitie of affection, and ſtirring vp a likeneſſe of good will in the King that thus indifferently ſhould be choſen: whereby he ſhould loue the one part for that they had choſen him, and likewiſe the other part for that he was of their Nation. The SABYNES were the firſt, which referred the election to the ROMAINES choyce: and the ROMAINES thought it better to chooſe one of the Nation of the SABYNES, then to haue a ROMAINE choſen by the SABYNES. After they had conſulted, they determined amongſt themſelues: and did chooſe Numa Pompilius one of the bodie of the SABYNES to be King, who was none of the number of them which came to dwell at ROME, howbeit he was a man ſo famous for his vertue, that the SABYNES ſo ſoone as they named him, did receiue him more willingly, then they who had choſen him. After they had thus publiſhed their election, the firſt and chiefeſt perſons of the one and the other ſide, were choſen out to go vnto him. Now Numa Pompilius was borne in one of the chiefeſt and beſt cities which the SABYNES had, called Cures, whereupon the ROMAINES, and their fellowes the SABYNES were called afterwards Quirites, and he was the ſon of Pomponius a Noble man, the youngeſt of foure brethren: being by the ſecret working of the gods, borne on the very day, on the which ROME was firſt founded by Romulus, which was the one and twentieth day of April. This man being naturally giuen and inclined vnto all vertue, did yet increaſe the ſame by ſtudie, and all kind of good diſcipline: and by the exerciſe thereof, and of true patience, and right philoſophie, he did maruellouſly adorne himſelfe and his manners. For he did not onely cleare his ſoule and mind of all paſſions and vices commonly vſed in the world: but he conquered in himſelfe all heats, violence and couetouſneſſe. And would neither ſeeke nor vſurpe that which was another mans; a thing at that time honoured among the moſt barbarous people: but thought that to be the true and right victorie in man, firſt to conquer and command himſelfe by iudgement and reaſon, and then to ſubdue all couetouſnes and greedineſſe. Hauing therfore this opinion, he would in no wiſe haue in his houſe any ſuperfluity or fineneſſe. He became to euery man that would employ him (aſwell ſtranger as his own country man) a wiſe counſeller, and an vpright iudge. He beſtowed his leiſure, not to follow his own delight, or to gather goods together: but to ſerue the gods, and to behold their celeſtiall nature & power, as much as mans reaſon and vnderſtanding could comprehend. Therby he got ſo great a name and reputation, that Tatius (which was king of ROME with Romulus) hauing but one only daughter called Tatia, made him his ſon in law. Howbeit this mariage put him in no ſuch iolity, that he would dwell at ROME with his father in law, but rather kept at home at his owne houſe in the country of the SABYNES, there to ſerue and cheriſh his old father with his wife Tatia: who for her part alſo liked better, to liue quietly with her husband being a priuate man, then to go to ROME where ſhe might haue liued in much honor and glory, by meanes of the King her father. She dyed as it is reported, 13. yeares after ſhe was maried. After her death, Numa leauing to dwell in the citie, was better contented to liue in the country alone, & ſolitarie, & gaue himſelf to walke much in the fields & woods conſecrated to the gods, as one deſirous to lead alone life, far frō the company of men. Whereupon was raiſed (in my opinion) that which is ſpoken of him, and of the goddeſſe Egeria. That it was not for any ſtrangeneſſe, or melancholineſſe of nature, that Numa withdrew himſelfe from the conuerſation and company of men, but becauſe he had found another more honourable and holy ſocietie of the Nymph, and goddeſſe Egeria, who had done him, as they ſay, that honour, as to make him her husband: with whom as his beloued darling it is ſaid he enioyed happie daies, and by daily frequenting of her company, he was inſpired with the loue and knowledge of all celeſtiall things. Surely, theſe deuiſes are much like vnto certaine old fables of the Phrygians, which they hauing learned from the father to the ſonne, do loue to tell of one Atis: of the Bithynians, of one Herodotus: of the ARCADIANS, of one Endymion: & of many other ſuch like men, who in their liues were taken for ſaints, and beloued of the gods. Notwithſtanding, it is likely, that the gods loue neither birds, nor horſe, but men, and haue ſometimes a liking to be familiar with perfect good men, and do not diſdaine ſometime the conuerſation of ſuch as be holy, religious and deuout. But to beleeue the gods haue carnall knowledge, and do delight in the outward beautie of creatures, that ſeemeth to carie a very hard beleefe. Yet the wiſe ÆGYPTIANS thinke it probable enough and likely, that the ſpirit of the goddes hath giuen originall of generation to women, and do beget fruite of their bodies: howbeit they hold that a man can haue no corporall companie with any diuine nature. Wherein they do not conſider, that euery thing that ioyneth together, doth deliuer againe a like ſubſtance, to that wherewith it was ioyned. This notwithſtanding, it is meete we ſhould beleeue the gods beare good will to men, and that of it doth ſpring their loue, whereby men ſay the gods loue thoſe whoſe manners they purifie and inſpire with vertue. And they do not offend, which faine that Phorbas, Hyacinthus and Admetus, were ſometimes the louers of Apollo, and alſo Hyppolitus the SICYONIAN: of whom they report, that euer when he paſſed ouer the arme of the ſea which lieth betweene the cities of SICYONA, and of CIRRHA, the god which knew he came, reioyced, and cauſed Pythia the Propheteſſe to pronounce theſe heroycall verſes:

I know full well, my deare Hippolytus returnes by ſea, my mind diuineth thus.

It is ſaid alſo that Pan was in loue with Pindarus and his verſes, and that the gods honoured the Poets Heſiodus, and Archilocus, after their death by the Muſes. They ſay moreouer, that AEſculapius lay with Sophocles in his life time, and at this day they do yet ſhew many tokens thereof: and after his death, another god (as it is reported) made him to be honourably buried. Now if they graunt, that ſuch things may be true: how can we refuſe to beleeue, that ſome gods haue bene familiar with Zaleucus, Minos, Zoroaſtres, Lycurgus, Numa, and ſuch other like perſonages, which haue gouerned Kingdomes, and ſtabliſhed Common weales? And it is not vnlike that the gods indeed did company with them, to inſpire and teach them many notable things, and that they did draw neare vnto theſe Poets and players of the harpe, that made and played many dolefull and ioyfull ditties, at the leaſt for their ſport and pleaſure onely, if euer they came neare them. Neuertheles if any man be of other opinion, the way is open and large as Bacchylides ſaid, to thinke and ſay as he luſt. For my ſelfe I do find, that which is written of Lycurgus, Numa, and other ſuch perſons, not to be without likelihood and probability: who hauing to gouern rude, churliſh, and ſtiffe necked people, and purpoſing to bring in ſtrange nouelties into the gouernments of their countries, did faine wiſely to haue conference with the gods, conſidering this faining fell to be profitable & beneficiall to thoſe themſelues, whom they made to beleeue the ſame. But to return to our hiſtory. Numa was forty yeres old, when the ambaſſadors of ROME were ſent to preſent the kingdome vnto him, and to intreat him to accept thereof. Proclus & Veleſus, were the ambaſſadors that were ſent. One of the which the people looked ſhould haue bene choſen for King, becauſe thoſe of Romulus ſide, did fauor much Proclus: & thoſe of Tatius part fauoured Veleſus. Now they vſed no long ſpeech vnto him, becauſe they thought he would haue bene glad of ſuch a great good fortune. But contrarily it was indeed a very hard thing, & required great perſwaſions, & much intreaty, to moue a man which had alwaies liued quietly, and at eaſe, to accept the regiment of a city, which as a man would ſay, had bin raiſed vp and grown by wars and martiall deeds. Wherfore he aunſwered them in the preſence of his father, and one other of his kinſemen called Martius in this ſort: Change and alteration of mans life is euer dangerous: but for him that lacketh nothing neceſſary, nor hath cauſe to complain of his preſent ſtate, it is a great folly to leaue his old acquainted trade of life, and to enter into another new and vnknowne, if there there were no other but this only respect: that he leaueth a certaintie, to venter vpon vncertainty. Howbeit there is further matter in this, that the dangers & perils of this kingdom which they offer me, are not altogether vncertaine, if we wil looke backe what happened vnto Romulus: who was not vnsuspected to haue laid wait, to haue had Tatius his fellow and companion murdered: and now after Romulus death, the Senatours selues are mistrusted to haue killed him on the other side by treason. And yet they say it, and sing it euery where: that Romulus was the son of a God, that at his birth he was miraculously preserued, and afterwards he was as incredibly brought vp. Whereas for my owne part, I do confesse, I was begotten by a mortall man, and was fostered, brought vp, and taught by men as you know: and these few qualities which they praise & commend in me, are conditions farre vnmeet for a man that is to raigne. I euer loued a solitarie life, quiet and study, and did exempt my selfe from worldly causes. All my life time I haue sought & loued peace aboue all things, and neuer had to do with any warres. My conuersation hath bene to company with men, which meet only to serue and honor the gods, or to laugh and be merie one with another, or else to spend their time in their priuate affaires, or otherwise somtime to attend their pastures, and feeding of their cattell. Whereas Romulus (my ROMAINE lords) hath left you many wars begun, which peraduenture you could be contented to spare: yet now to maintaine the same, your citie had need of a martiall King, actiue, and strong of body. Your people moreouer, through long custome, and the great increase they are giuen vnto by feates of armes, desire nought else perhaps but warres: and it is plainely seene, they seeke still to grow, and commaund their neighbours. So that if there were no other consideration in it, yet were it a meere mockerie for me, to go to teach a city at this present to serue the goddes, to loue iustice, to hate wars, and to fly violence: when it rather hath need of a conquering captaine, then of a peaceable king. These and such other like reasons & perswasions Numa alledged, to discharge himself of the kingdome which they offered him. Howbeit, the ambassadors of the ROMAINES most humbly besought and prayed him with all instance possible, that he wold not be the cause of another new stir, and commotion among them, seeing both parts in the city haue giuen their consent & liking to him alone, and none other to be their king. Moreouer, when the ambassadors had left him vpon this sute, his father, and Martius his kinseman, began also priuately to perswade him, that he should not refuse so good and godly an offer. And albeit he was contented with his present state, and desired to be no richer then he was, nor coueted no princely honour nor glory, because he sought onely most famous vertue: yet he must needs thinke, that to rule well, was to do the gods good seruice, whose will it was to employ the iustice they knew in him, and not to suffer it to be idle. Refuse not therfore (quoth they) this royall dignity, which to a graue and wise man is a goodly field, to bring forth many commendable works and fruits. There you may do noble seruice to the gods, to humble the hearts of these martiall people, and to bring them to be holy and religious: for they readily turne, and easily conforme themselues vnto the nature of their prince. They dearely loued Tatius, although he was a stranger: they haue consecrated a memorie to Romulus with diuine honours, which they make vnto him at this day. And it may be, that the people seeing themselues conquerors, will be full enough of wars: and the ROMAINES being now full of spoiles and triumphes, will be glad to haue a gentle prince, and one that loueth iustice, that they may thencefoorth liue in peace vnder good and holy lawes. And yet if it be otherwise, that their hearts be still full of heate and furie to fight: is it not better to turne this their desire to make warres some other way, when a man hath the bridle in his owne hands to do it, and to be a mean in the meane time to ioyne the countrey, and all the nations of the SABYNES in perpetuall loue and amitie, with so mightie and flourishing a citie? Besides all these perswasions and reasons, there were many signes also (as they say) which promised him good lucke, together with the earnest affection and liking of his owne countrey citizens. Who, so soone as they vnderstood the comming and commission of the ambassadours of ROME, they importunately desired him to go thither, and to accept the offer of the Kingdome: that he might more straightly vnite and incorporate them together with the ROMAINES. Whereupon, Numa accepted the Kingdome. Then after he had done sacrifice to the goddes, he set forwards on his iourney towards ROME: where the people and Senate went out to meete him, with a wonderfull desire to see him. The women at his entrie, went blessing of him, and singing of his praises. They did sacrifice for him, in all the temples of the goddes. There was neither man nor woman but seemed to be as ioyfull and glad, as if a new Realme, and not a new King, had bene come to the citie of ROME.

Thus was he brought with this open ioy and reioycing, vnto the market place, where one of the Senatours, which at that time was regent, called Spurius Vettius, made them pronounce his open election: and so by one consent he was chosen King, with all the voyces of the people. Then were brought vnto him the tokens of honour and dignity of the King. But he himselfe commanded they should be staid awhile, saying: He must first be confirmed King by the gods. Then he tooke the wise men and priests, with whom he went vp into the Capitoll, which at that time was yet called mount Tarpeian. And there, the chiefest of the southsayers called Augures, turned him towards the south, hauing his face couered with a veile, and stood behind him, laying his right hand vpon his head, and praying to the gods that it would please them to declare their willes by flying of birds, or some other token concerning this election: and so the southsayer cast his eyes all about, as farre as he could possibly discerne. During all this time there was a maruellous silence in the market place, although then an infinit number of people were assembled there together, attending with great deuotion what the issue of this diuination would be: vntill there appeared vnto them on the right hand, good and luckie birds, which did confirme the election. Then Numa putting on his regall robes, came downe from mount Tarpeian, into the market place, where all the people receiued him with wonderfull shoutes of ioy, as a man the most holy and best beloued of the gods that they could haue chosen. So hauing taken the royall seat of the Kingdome, his first act was this. That he discharged the guard of the three hundred souldiers, which Romulus had alwaies about his person, called Celeres, saying: he would not mistrust them which trusted him, neither would he be King ouer people, which should mistrust him. His second act was, that he did adde to the two priests of Iupiter and Mars, a third in the honour of Romulus, who was called Flamen Quirinalis. For the auncient Romaines also called their priests, instituted in the old time, Flamines, by reason of certaine litle narrow hats which they did weare on their heads, as if they had called them Pilamines: for Pilos in Greeke signifieth a hat. And at that time (as they say) there were many mo Greeke words mingled with the Latine, then there are at this day. For they called the mantles the Kings did weare Lænas. And Iuba saith, that it is the very same which the Grecians call Chlænas, and that the young boy which was a seruant in the temple of Iupiter, was called Camillus, as some of the Grecians do yet call the god Mercurie, because he is seruant of the gods. Now Numa hauing done these things at his first entrie into his Kingdome, still to winne further fauour and good will of the people, began immediatly to frame his citizens to a certaine ciuility, being as iron wrought to softnesse, and brought them frō their violent and warlike desires, to temperate and ciuill manners. For out of doubt, Rome was properly that, which Plato ascribeth to a citie full of trouble and pride. For, first it was founded by the most couragious and warlike men of the world, which from all parts were gathered there together, in a most desperat boldnes, and afterwards it increased, and grew strong, by armes & continuall wars, like as piles driuen into the ground, which the more they are rammed in, the further they enter, and sticke the faster. Wherfore Numa iudging it no small nor light enterprise, to pluck downe the haughty stomacks of so fierce and violent a people, and to frame them vnto a sober & quiet life: did seeme to work it by meanes of the gods, with drawing them on therto by litle and litle, and pacifying of their hote and fierce courages to fight, with sacrifices, feasts, dancings, and cōmon processions, wherin he celebrated euer himself. In the which together with their deuotiō, there was mingled now and then pastime & pleasure: and somtimes he laid the terror & feare of the gods before their eyes, making thē beleeue that he had seene straunge visions, or that he had heard voyces, by which the gods did threaten them with some great troubles & plagues, alwaies to pull downe and humble their hearts, vnto the feare of the gods. This was the cause why they thought afterwards that he had learned his wisedome of Pythagoras the Philosopher: because the greatest part of the philosophy of the one, & of the gouernment of the other, consisted in such ceremonies and diuine studies. They report also that Numa did put on the outward shew and semblance of Pythagoras holinesse, as following his intention and example. For Pythagoras as they say, made an Eagle so tame and gentle, that she wold stoupe, and come downe to him by certaine voices, as she flew in the aire ouer his head. And that passing through the assembly of the games Olympical, he shewed her thigh of gold, and many other prety feats and deeds they tel of, which seemed to be wonderfull, and for which Timon Phliasian hath written these verses of him:

Much

Much like a man which ſought, by charming to enchaunt, did vſe this art, to winne mens minds, which vnto him did haunt:
His graue and pleaſant tongue, in ſugred ſpeech did flow, whereby he drew moſt minds of men, to bent of his owne bow.

Euen ſo the fained fable of Numa, which he ſo cunningly diſguiſed, was about the loue of a goddeſſe, or ſome Nymph of the mountaine: with whom he ſeemed to haue certaine ſecret meetings and talke, whereof we haue ſpoken before. And it is ſaid, he much frequented the Muſes in the woods. For he would ſay, he had the moſt part of his reuelations of the Muſes, and he taught the ROMAINES to reuerence one of them aboue all the reſt, who was called Tacita, as ye would ſay, Lady ſilence. It ſeemeth he inuented this, after the example of Pythagoras, who did ſo ſpecially commaund, and recommend ſilence vnto his ſchollers. Againe, if we conſider what Numa ordained concerning images, and the repreſentation of the gods, it is altogether agreeable vnto the doctrine of Pythagoras: who thought that God was neither ſenſible nor mortall, but inuiſible, incorruptible, and only intelligible. And Numa did forbid the ROMAINES alſo to beleeue, that God had euer forme or likeneſſe of beaſt or man. So that in thoſe former times, there was in ROME no image of God, either painted or grauen: and it was from the beginning a hundred three ſcore and ten yeares, that they had built temples and chappels vnto the gods in ROME, and yet there was neither picture nor image of God within them. For they tooke it at the firſt for a ſacriledge, to preſent heauenly things by earthly formes, ſeeing we cannot poſſibly any way attaine to the knowledge of God, but in mind and vnderſtanding. The very ſacrifices which Numa ordained, were altogether agreeable, and like vnto the maner of ſeruing of the gods, which the Pythagorians vſed. For in their ſacrifices they ſpilt not the bloud, but they did theirs commonly, with a litle meale, a litle ſhedding of wine and milke, and with ſuch other light things. Such as affirme that thoſe two men did much companie and were familiar together, do lay further proofes and arguments for the ſame. The firſt is this: that the ROMAINES did make Pythagoras a free man of the city of ROME, as Epicharmus the Comicall poet an ancient writer (and ſometimes one of Pythagoras ſchollers) ſaith in a booke he wrote and dedicated vnto Antenor. The other proofe is: that Numa hauing had foure children, called one of them Mamercus, after Pythagoras ſonnes name, from whom they ſay is deſcended, the houſe of the AEmilians, which is the nobleſt of the Patricians: for the king gaue him the ſurname of AEmilius, becauſe of his ſweet tongue and pleaſant voice. Furthermore, I my ſelfe haue heard ſay many times in ROME, that the ROMAINES hauing receiued an oracle, which commaunded them to ſet vp images in their city, to the wiſeſt and valianteſt man that euer was among the GRECIANS: cauſed two ſtatues of braſſe to be ſet vp in their market place, the one of Pythagoras, and the other of Alcibiades. Howbeit to ſtriue about this matter any further, ſeeing there are ſo many doubts: me thinketh it were but vaine. Moreouer, they attribute to Numa, the firſt erection of the colledge pontificall: and ſay, he him ſelfe was the firſt Pontifex that euer was. But touching the name of Pontifex, ſome will ſay they were ſo called, becauſe they chiefly were ordained and appointed for the ſeruice of the Almightie: for this word Potens in the ROMAINE tongue, betokeneth mightie. Other thinke this name was giuen to them by their founders, as to exempt perſons out of the world: who enioyned them to do all the ſeruice and ſacrifices to the gods they could poſſibly, and yet notwithſtanding, if they had any other lawfull let or impediment thereof, they were not ſtraight condemned for omitting the ſame. Howbeit the moſt part do bring out another deriuation of this name, wherein me thinkes there is little reaſon. As that they ſhould be called Pontifices, becauſe they had the charge and maintenance of the bridge. For that which the GRECIANS call Gephyran, the LATINES call Pontem: that is, a bridge. And to ſay truly, the charges of repairing the bridge, belongeth to the Biſhops: as well as the keeping of the moſt holy and vnchaungeable ceremonies. For the ROMAINES thought it not onely a thing vnlawfull, but tooke it for a moſt damnable and wicked act, to deſtroy or breake the bridge of wood, which was onely ioyned together (as they ſay) with pinnes of wood, and without anie yron at all, by the commaundement of an old oracle. But the ſtone bridge was built long time after the raigne of Numa, and in the time of the raigne of his nephew Martius. Nowe the firſt and chiefeſt of theſe biſhoppes, which they call the great Pontifex, hath the place, authoritie, and dignitie of the high prieſt and maiſter, of their pontificall law: who ſhould be carefull, not onely about all publicke ſacrifices and ceremonies, but alſo about such as were priuate, and to see that no man priuatly should breake the auncient ceremonies, nor bring in any new thing into religion, but rather euery man should be taught by him, how, and after what sort he should serue and honour the gods. He also hath the keeping of the holy virgines which they call Vestales. For they do giue Numa the first foundation and consecrating of them, and the institution also of keeping the immortal fire with honour and reuerence, which these virgines haue the charge of. Either for that he thought it meete to commit the substance of fire (being pure and cleane) vnto the custodie of cleane and vncorrupt maides: or else becausse he thought the nature of fire (which is barren, & bringeth forth nothing) was fittest, and most proper vnto virgines. For in GREECE, where they kept continuall fire likewise (as in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, and at ATHENS) the maidens do not keepe the same, but old women which are past mariage. And if this fire chance to faile, as they say in ATHENS the holy lamp was put out in the time of the tyranny of Arisšion: and in the city of DELPHES it was put out, when the temple of Apollo was burnt by the MEDES: and at ROME also, in the time of the warres that the ROMAINES had against king Mithridates: and in the time of the ciuill warres, when altar, fire, and all were burnt and consumed together: they say that it must not be lighted againe with other common fire, but must be made a new, with drawing cleane and pure flame from the beames of the sunne, and that they do in this maner. They haue a hollow vessell made of a peece of a triangle, hauing a corner right, and two sides alike: so that from all parts of his compasse and circumference, it falleth into one point. Then they set this vessell right against the beames of the sunne, so that the bright sunne beames come to assemble and gather together in the center of this vessell, where they do pierce the ayre so strongly, that they set it a fire: and when they put to it any drie matter or substance, the fire taketh it straight, becausse the beame of the sunne, by meanes of the reuerberation, putteth that drie matter into fire, and forceth it to flame. Some thinke that these Vestall virgines keepe no other thing, but this fire, which neuer goeth out. Other say, there are other holy things also, which no body may lawfully see but they: whereof we haue written more largely in the life of Camillus, at the least so much as may be learned and told. The first maidens which were vowed & put into this order of religion by Numa, were (as they say) Gegania and Verenia: and after them, Canuleia and Tarpeia. Afterwards king Seruius increased the number with two other, and that number of foure continueth vnto this day. Their rule and order set downe by king Numa was this: that they should vow chastity for the space of thirty yeares. In the first ten yeares they learne what they haue to do: the next ten yeares following, they do that which they haue learned: and the last then yeres, they teach yong nouices. After they haue passed their thirty yeares, they may lawfully marry if they be disposed, and take them to another maner of life, and leaue their religion. But as it is reported, there haue bene very few of them which haue taken this libertie, and fewer also which haue ioyed after they were professed, but rather haue repented themselues, and liued euer after a very grieuous and sorrowfull life. This did so fray the other Vestals, that they were better contented with their vowed chastitie: and so remained virgines, vntill they were old, or els died. He gaue them also great priuiledges, and prerogatiues. As, to make their will and testament, in their fathers life time. To do all things without any gardian or ouerseer, as women which haue three children at a birth. When they go abroad, they carry maces before them to honour them. And if by chance they meete any offendour in their way going to execution, they saue his life: howbeit the professed Vestall must affirme by oath, that she met him vnwares, and not of set purpose. If any man presume vnder their chaire, whereupon they are caried through the city, he shall die for it. Also when they themselues do any fault, they are corrected by the great Bishop, who sometimes doth whip them naked (according to the nature and quality of their offence) in a darke place, and vnder a curten. But she that hath defloured her virginitie, is buried quick by one of the gates of the city, which they call Collina gate: where within the city there is a mount of earth of a good length, & with the LATINES is said to be raised. Vnder this forced mount, they make a litle hollow vawt, and leaue a hole open, whereby one may go downe: and within it there is set a litle bed, a burning lampe, and some victuals to sustaine life withall. As a litle bread, a litle water, a litle milke, and a litle oyle, and that for honors sake: to the end they would not be thought to famish a bodie to death, which had bene consecrated by the most holy and deuout ceremonies of the world. This done, they take the offender, and put her into a litter, which they couer strongly, and close it vp with thicke leather, in such sort, that no bodie can so much as heare her voice, and so they carie her thus shut vp through the market place.

Euery

Euery one draweth back, when they ſee this litter a farre off, and do giue it place to paſſe by: and then follow it mourningly with heauy lookes, and ſpeake neuer a word. They do nothing in the city more fearefull to behold, then this: neither is there any day wherein the people are more ſorrowfull, then on ſuch a day. Then after ſhe is come to the place of this vawt, the ſergeants ſtraight vnloſe theſe faſt bound couerings: and the chiefe Biſhop after he hath made certaine ſecret praiers vnto the gods, and lift his hands vp to heauen, taketh out of the litter, the condemned Veſtall muffled vp cloſe, and ſo putteth her vpon the ladder, which conueyeth her downe into the vawt. That done, he withdraweth, and all the prieſts with him: and when the ſilly offendour is gone downe, they ſtraight pluck vp the ladder, and caſt abundance of earth in at the open hole, ſo that they fil it vp to the very top of the arch. And this is the puniſhment of the Veſtals which defile their virginitie. They thinke alſo it was Numa that built the round temple of the goddeſſe Veſta, in which is kept the euerlaſting fire: meaning to repreſent not the forme of the earth, which they ſay is Veſta, but the figure of the whole world, in the middeſt whereof (according to the Pythagorians opinion) remaineth the proper ſeate and abiding place of fire, which they call Veſta, and name it the Vnity. For they are of opinion, neither that the earth is vnmooueable, nor yet that it is ſet in the middeſt of the world, neither that the heauen goeth about it: but ſay to the contrarie, that the earth hanged in the aire about the fire, as about the center therof. Neither will they graunt, that the earth is one of the firſt and chiefeſt parts of the world: as Plato held opinion in that age, that the earth was in another place then in the very middeſt, and that the center of the world, as the moſt honourableſt place, did appertaine to ſome other of more worthy ſubſtance than the earth. Furthermore, the biſhops office was to ſhew thoſe that needed to be taught, all the rites, manners, and cuſtomes of buriall: whom Numa taught not to beleeue that there was any corruption or diſhoneſty in burials, but rather it was to worſhip and honour the gods of the earth, with vſuall and honourable ceremonies, as thoſe which after their death receiue the chiefeſt ſeruice of vs they can. But aboue all other in burials, they did ſpecially honour the goddeſſe called Libitina, that is ſaid, the chiefe gouernour and preſeruer of the rites of the dead: or be it Proſerpina, or Venus, as the moſt learned men among the ROMAINES do iudge, who not without cauſe do attribute the order of the beginning and end of mans life, to one ſelfe god, and power diuine. Numa ordained alſo, how long time euery body ſhould mourne in black. And for a child from three yeares to ten yeares of age, that died: he ordained they ſhould mourne no more moneths then it had liued yeares, and not to adde a day more. For he commaunded, that the longeſt time of mourning ſhould be but ten moneths onely, and ſo long time at the leaſt he willed the women ſhould remaine widowes, after the deceaſe of their husbands: or elſe ſhe that would mary within that time was bound by his order to ſacrifice a whole bullocke. Numa alſo erected many other orders of prieſts: of two ſorts whereof I will onely make mention. The one ſhall be the order of the SALII, and the other of the FECIALES: for me thinkes, both the one and the other doth manifeſtly ſhew the great holineſſe, and ſingular deuotion which he had in him. The FECIALES are properly thoſe, which the GRECIANS call IRENOPHYLACES, as who would ſay, peacekeepers. And in my iudgement, they had their right name according to their office, becauſe they did pacifie quarrels with reaſon by way of order, and did not ſuffer (as much as in them lay) that any matter ſhould be tried by violence, vntil they were paſt al hope of any peace. For the GRECIANS call it properly Irenen, when both parties agree, and decide their controuerſie with reaſon, & not with ſword. Euē ſo thoſe which the ROMAINES called the Feciales, went many times in perſon to thoſe that did the ROMAINES iniury, & ſought to perſwade them with good reaſon, to keepe promiſe with the ROMAINES, and to offer them no wrong. But if they would not yeeld to reaſon, whom they ſought to perſwade: then they called the gods to the witneſſe thereof, and prayed them, that if they did not moſt earneſtly incenſe the ROMAINES, to purſue that moſt iuſtly appertained vnto their right, that all euils and miſchiefes of the warres might fall vpon themſelues, and on their countrey. This done, they did threaten open warres againſt ſuch enemies. And if the FECIALES would not conſent to open warres, and did happen to ſpeake againſt them: it was not lawfull in that caſe, neither for priuate perſon, nor for the King himſelfe to make any warres. But like a iuſt Prince, he muſt haue leaue by their ſufferance to make the warres. Then did he conſider, and conſult, by what meanes he might beſt procure and proſecute the ſame. Concerning this matter, they iudge that the il hap which came to the ROMANES, when the citie of ROME was takēn and ſacked by the GAVLES, chaunced iuſtly for breaking of this holy inſtitution. For at that time the barbarous people beſieged the citie of the CLVSINIANS: and Fabius Ambuſtus was ſent ambaſſadour vnto them, to ſee if he could make peace betweene them. The barbarous people gaue him an ill anſwer: whereupon Fabius thinking his embaſie had bene ended, and being ſomewhat hote, and raſh in defence of the CLVSINIANS, gaue defiance to the valianteſt GAVLE there, to fight with him man to man. Fortune fauoured him in this chalenge: for he ſlue the GAVLE, and ſtripped him in the field. The GAVLES ſeeing their man ſlaine, ſent immediatly an herauld to ROME, to accuſe Fabius, how againſt all right and reaſon he began warres with them, without any open proclamation made before. The FECIALES being then conſulted with thereabout, did declare, he ought to be deliuered into the hands of the GAVLES, as one that had broken the law of armes, and had deſerued it: but he made friends to the people which fauoured him very much, and by their meanes eſcaped his deliuery and puniſhment. Neuertheleſſe, the GAVLES within ſhort time after, came before ROME with all their power: wich they tooke, ſacked, and burnt euery whit, ſauing the Capitoll, as we haue written more amply in the life of Camillus. Now concerning the Prieſts that were called Salij, they ſay he did inſtitute them vpon this occaſion. In the eight yeare of his raigne, there came a peſtilent diſeaſe through all ITALIE, and at the length it crept alſo into ROME. Whereat euery man being greatly affraid and diſcouraged, they ſay there fell from heauen a target of copper, which lighted betweene the hands of Numa. They tell hereof a wonderfull tale, which the King himſelfe affirmed he heard, of the Nymph Egeria, and the Muſes. To wit, that this target was ſent from heauen, for the health and preſeruation of the citie: and therefore he ſhould keepe it carefully, and cauſe eleuen other to be caſt and made, all like vnto the ſame in faſhion and greatneſſe, to the end, that if any would enterpriſe to ſteale it, he ſhould not tell which of them to take for the right target. Moreouer he ſaid, he was commaunded to conſecrate the place to the Muſes (in the which he did oftentimes companie with them) and alſo the fields which were neare thereabouts: and likewiſe to giue the fountaine that ſprang in that place, vnto the Veſtals profeſſed, that euery day, they might draw water at that Well, to waſh the ſanctuarie of their temple. The ſucceſſe hereof proued his words true, for the ſicknes ceaſed incontinently. So he aſſembled al the chiefe crafts-men then in ROME, to proue which of them would take vpon him to make one like vnto that. Euery man deſpaired to performe it. Howbeit one called Veturius Mamurius (the excellenteſt workman that was in thoſe dayes) did make them all ſo ſute like, that Numa himſelfe did not know the firſt target, when they were all laid together. So he ordained theſe prieſts Salij, to haue the cuſtodie of theſe targets, to ſee them ſafe kept. They were called Salij, not after the name of Salian borne in SAMOTHRACIA, or in MANTINEA, as ſome haue vntruly alleaged, who firſt inuented the maner of dauncing all armed: but they were ſo called, of their faſhion and manner of dauncing and leaping. For in the moneth of March, they go skipping and leaping vp and downe the citie, with thoſe targets on their armes, apparelled in red caſſockes without ſleeues, and girded about with broade leather ſword girdles, ſtudded with copper, hauing helmets of copper on their heads, and ſtriking vpon their targets with ſhort daggers, which they cary in their hands. Moreouer, all their dauncing conſiſteth in mouing of their feete: for they handle them finely, making turnes aboue ground and beneath, with a ſodaine meaſure, and a maruellous force of agilitie. They call theſe targets Ancylia, becauſe of their faſhion, which is not altogether compaſſe: for they are not all round as other common targets be, but they are cut with circles wreathed about, both the ends bowing in many foldes, and one ſo neare another, that altogether they come to a certaine wreathed forme, which the GRECIANS call Ancylon. Or elſe they are ſo called, becauſe Ancon ſignifieth an elbow, vpon which they cary them. Al theſe deriuations are written in the hiſtory of Iuba, who in any caſe wil haue this word Ancylia to be drawn out of the Greek tongue. And it may be alſo they were ſo called, becauſe the firſt came frō aboue, which the GRECIANS cal Anecathen: or els for healing the ſick, which is called Aceſis. Or els for ceaſing of the dryneſſe, which in Greek is called Anchmôn Lyſis. Or for the ending of all diſeaſes and euils, for which cauſe the ATHENIANS cal Caſtor & Pollux, Anacas: if they luſt to giue this word his deriuation from the Greeke tongue. Now the reward which Mamurius the goldſmith had for making of theſe targets was, that the Salij vnto this day do make mention of him in their ſong', which they ſing going through the citie, and dauncing of their daunce all armed. Howbeit ſome thinke they ſay not Veturius Mamurius, but veterem memoriam, ancient memory. But Numa after he had ordained and inſtituted theſe orders of prieſts, built his palace neare vnto the temple of Veſta, which holdeth his name Regia at this this day, to say, the Kings palace. In which he remained most part of his life, studying either to sacrifice to the gods, or to teach the Priests what they should do, or how with them he should best contemplate all heauenly things. It is true that he had another house on the hill, which they call at this day, Quirinall, the place wherof is yet to be seen. But in all these sacrifices, ceremonies, and processions of the Priests, there were alwayes husshers that went before, crying to the people, Keepe silence, and tend vpon diuine seruice. For they say the Pythagoreans thought it good, that men should not worship the gods, nor make prayers to them in passing by, or doing any other thing: but they thought it meete, that men should of purpose go out of their houses, to serue and pray vnto them. Euen so king Numa thought it not meete, that his subiects should come to see, & heare diuine seruice negligently, as it were for a fashion, & only to be rid of it, as heeding another thing: but he would haue them set aside all other businesse, and employ their thoughts and hearts onely vpon the principall seruice of religion, and deuotion towards the gods. So that during seruice time, he would not haue heard any noise, any knocking, bouncing, or any clapping, as they commonly heare in al artificers shops of occupation, whereof at this day yet they see some signes and tokens remaining in their sacrifices at ROME. For al the time the Augur beholdeth the flying of the birds, or that he is doing any sacrifice, the Vergers crie alowd: Hoc age, which meaneth, tend this. And it is a warning to those that are present, to call their wits home, & to think on that which is in hand. Also there are many of his orders like the precepts of the Pythagoreans. For as they did warne men, not to sit vpon a litle bushell, not to cut fire with a sword, not to looke behind them when they go abroade: to sacrifice to the celestiall gods in odde number, and to the gods of the earth in an euen number, of which precepts they would not haue the common people to haue any knowledge or vnderstanding. Euen so there are many institutions of Numa, the reasons whereof are hidden and kept secret: as not to offer wine to the gods of the vine neuer cut, and not to sacrifice vnto them without meale: & to turne a turne about when they do reuerence to the gods, and to sit downe after they haue worshipped them. And as touching the two first ordinances, it seemeth that by them he did recommend clemency & humanity, as being a part of the deuotion towards the gods. But as for the turning which he willeth them to make that worship the gods, they say it presenteth the turning which the element maketh by his mouing. But me thinketh it should rather come of this: for that the temples being set to the East, he that worshippeth entring into the temple, sheweth his backe to the West, and for this cause turneth towards that part, and afterwards returneth againe towards God: doing the whole turne, & ending the consummation of his praier, by this double adoratiõ which he maketh before & behind. Vnles peraduenture that he meant secretly to signifie, & giue them to vnderstand by this turning & changing of their look, that which the ÆGYPTIANS figured by their wheeles: in shewing thereby, that these worldly things were neuer constant and in one state: and therefore, that we should take it thankfully, and patiently beare it, in what sort soeuer it pleased God to change or alter our life. And where he cõmanded that they should sit after they had worshipped God: they said it was a token of a good hope vnto thẽ that prayed, that their praiers should be exalted, & that their goods should remaine safe, and stick by them. Other say, that this ease & sitting, is a separating them from doing: & therfore he would they should sit in the temples of the gods, to shew they had done that which they had in hãd before, to the end to take of the gods the beginning of another. And it may wel be also, that it was referred to the thing we spake of a litle before: That Numa would accustome his people, not to serue the gods, nor to speak to thẽ at al, as they passed by, or did any other thing, or were in haste: but would haue them pray vnto the gods when they had time & leisure, & all other businesse at that time set a part. By this good instruction and training them vnto religion, the city of ROME by litle and litle came to be so tractable, & had the great power of King Numa in such admiration, that they took all to be as true as the Gospell that he spake, though it had no more likelihood of troth, thẽ tales deuised of pleasure. Furthermore, they thought nothing incredible, or vnpossible to him, if he wold haue it. And for proofe herof, there goeth a tale of him, that he hauing bidden a great company of the citizens of ROME to come & sup with him, caused them to be serued with plaine grosse meate, & in very poore & homely vessel. And when they were set, & began to fall to their meate, he cast out words sodainly vnto them, how the goddesse with whom he accompanied, was come to see him euen at that instant, and that sodainly the hall was richly furnished, & the tables couered with all sorts of excellent fine & delicate meates. Howbeit this far passed all the vanity of lying, which is found written of him, about his speaking with Iupiter. The hill

Auentine was not at that time inhabited, nor incloſed within the wals of ROME, but was full of ſprings and ſhadowed groues, whither commonly repaired to ſolace themſelues, the two gods, Picus and Faunus, which otherwiſe might be thought two Satyres, or of the race of the Titanians: ſauing it is ſaid, that they went through all ITALY, doing the like miracles and wonders in phiſicke, charmes and art magicke, which they report of thoſe the GRECIANS cal Idæes Dactyles. There they ſay that Numa tooke them both, hauing put into the ſpring both wine and honie, where they vſed to drinke. When they ſaw that they were taken, they transformed themſelues into diuers formes, diſguiſing and disfiguring their naturall ſhape, into many terrible and fearefull ſights to behold. Neuertheleſſe in the end, perceiuing they were ſo faſt, as to eſcape there was no reckoning: they reuealed vnto him many things to come, and taught him the purifying againſt lightning and thunder, which they make yet at this day with onions, haire, and pilchers. Other ſay, he was not taught that by them, but that they fetched Iupiter out of heauen, with their coniuring and magicke: whereat Iupiter being offended, anſwered in choller, that he ſhould make it with heads. But Numa added ſtraight, of onions: Iupiter replied, of men. Then Numa asked him againe, to take a litle away the crueltie of the commaundement: What haires? Iupiter anſwered, quicke haires. And Numa put too pilchers alſo. And it is reported that this was the goddeſſe Egeria, that taught Numa this ſubtiltie. This done, Iupiter returned appeaſed: by reaſon whereof the place was called Ilicium. For Ileos in the Greeke tongue ſignifieth appeaſed, and fauourable: and this purifying was afterwards made in that ſort. Theſe tales not onely vaine, but full of mockerie alſo, do ſhew vs yet plainly the zeale and deuotion men had in thoſe times towards the gods: vnto which Numa through cuſtome had won them. And as for Numa himſelfe, they ſay that he ſo firmely put all his hope and confidence in the helpe of the gods: that one day when he was told his enemies were in armes againſt him, he did but laugh at it, and anſwered: And I do ſacrifice. It is he (as ſome ſay) that firſt built the temple to Faith and Terme: and which made the ROMAINES vnderſtand, that the moſt holy and greateſt oath they could make, was to ſweare by their faith, which they keepe yet at this day. But Terme, which ſignifieth bounds, is the god of confines, or borders: vnto whom they do ſacrifice, both publikely and priuately, vpon the limits of inheritances, and now they ſacrifice vnto him liue beaſts. Howbeit in old time they did ſacrifice vnto him without any bloud, through the wiſe inſtitution of Numa: who declared and preached vnto them, that this god of bounds was ſincere, and vpright, without bloud or murther, as he that is a witneſſe of iuſtice, and a keeper of peace. It was he, which in my opinion, did firſt limite out the bounds of the territorie of ROME, which Romulus would neuer do, for feare leaſt in bounding out his owne, he ſhould confeſſe that which he occupied of other mens. For bounding and mearing, to him that will keepe it iuſtly, is a bond that bridleth power and deſire. But to him that forceth not to keepe it, it is a proofe to ſhew his iniuſtice. To ſay truly, the territorie of ROME had no great bounds at the firſt beginning, and Romulus had got by conqueſt the greateſt part of it, and Numa did wholy deuide it vnto the needy inhabitants to relieue them, and to bring them out of pouerty: (which carieth men headlong into miſchiefe, & diſcourageth them to labor) to the end that plowing vp the ſaid land, they ſhould alſo plow vp the weeds of their owne barennes, to become ciuill and gentle. For there is no exerciſe nor occupation in the world, which ſo ſodainly bringeth a man to loue and deſire quietnes, as doth husbandry & tillage: and yet to defend a mans own, there is in it courage & hardines to fight. But greedy deſire, violently to take from others, & vniuſtly to occupy that is none of theirs, is neuer in right husbandmen. And therefore Numa hauing brought in husbandrie amongſt his ſubiects, as a medicine & meane to make them loue quietneſſe, was deſirous to inure them to this trade of life, the rather to make them humble and gentle of condition, then to increaſe them in riches. He deuided all the territorie of ROME into certaine parts which he called Pagos: as much to ſay, as villages. And in euery one of them he ordained controllers and viſiters, which ſhould ſuruey all about: and he himſelfe ſometimes went abroade in perſon, coniecturing by their labour the manners and nature of euery man. Such as he found diligent, he aduaunced them vnto honour, and gaue them countenance and authoritie: other which he ſaw ſlothfull and negligent, by rebuking and reprouing of them, he made them amend. But amongſt all his ordinances which he made, one aboue all the reſt caried the praiſe: and that was, that he deuided his people into ſundry occupations. For the citie of ROME ſeemed yet to be made of two nations, as we haue ſaid before: and to ſpeake more properly, it was made of two tribes. So that it could not, or would not for any thing be made one: being altogether impoſſible impossible to take away all factions, and to make there should be no quarrels nor contentions betweene both parts. Wherefore he considered that when one will mingle two bodies or simples together, which for their hardnesse and contrary natures cannot well suffer mixture: then he breakes and beates them together, as small as may be. For, so being brought into a smaller and lesser powder, they would incorporate and agree the better. Euen so he thought it was best to deuide the people also into many small parts: by meanes whereof they should be put into many parties, which would more easily take away the first and the greatest part, when it should be deuided and separated thus into sundry sorts. And this diuision he made by arts and occupations: as minstrels, goldsmiths, carpenters, diers, shoemakers, tawers, tanners, bel-founders, and pot-makers, and so forth through other crafts and occupations. So that he brought euery one of these into one body, and company by it selfe: and ordained vnto euery particular mystery or craft, their feasts, assemblies, and seruices, which they should make vnto the gods, according to the dignity and worthinesse of euery occupation. And by this meanes, he first tooke away all faction: that neither side sayd, nor thought any more, those are SABYNES, these are ROMAINES, these are of Tatius, these are of Romulus. Insomuch as this diuision was an incorporating, and an vniting of the whole together. Among other his ordinances, they did much commend his reforming of the law, that gaue liberty vnto fathers to sell their children. For he did except children already maried, so they were maried with their fathers consent and good will: iudging it to be too cruell and ouer hard a thing, that a woman who thought she had maried a free man, should find her selfe to be the wife of a bondman. He began also to mend a litle the calender, not so exactly as he should haue done, nor yet altogether ignorantly. For during the raigne of Romulus, they vsed the moneths confusedly, without any order or reason, making some of them 20. dayes and lesse, and others 35. dayes and more, without knowing the difference betweene the course of the Sunne and the Moone: and onely they obserued this rule, that there was 360. dayes in the yeare. But Numa considering the inequality stood vpon 11. dayes, for that the 12. reuolutions of the Moone are runne in 354. dayes, and the reuolution of the sunne, in 365. dayes, he doubled the 11. dayes, whereof he made a moneth: which he placed from 2. yeares to 2. yeares, after the moneth of February, and the ROMAINES called this moneth put betweene, Mercidinum, which had 22. dayes. And this is the correction that Numa made, which since hath had a farre better amendment. He did also change the order of the moneths. For March which before was the first, he made it now the third: and Ianuary the first, which vnder Romulus was the eleuenth, and February the twelfth and last. Yet many are of opinion, that Numa added these two, Ianuary and February. For the ROMAINES at the beginning had but ten moneths in the yeare: as some of the barbarous people make but three moneths for their yeare. And the ARCADIANS amongst the GRECIANS haue but foure moneths for their yeare. The ACARNANIANS haue sixe to the yeare. And the ÆGYPTIANS had first but one moneth to their yeare: and afterwards they made foure moneths for their yeare. And this is the cause why they seeme (albeit they inhabite in a new countrey) to be neuertheless the auncientest people of the world: for that in their Chronicles they reckon vp such infinite number of yeares, as those which count the moneths for the yeares. And to proue this true, that the ROMAINES at the beginning had but ten moneths in the yeare, and not twelue, it is easily to be iudged by the name of the last, which they call at this day December. And that the moneth of March was also the first, may be coniectured by this: for the fifth moneth after that, is yet called Quintilis: the sixt Sextilis, and so the other in order following the numbers. For if Ianuary and February had then bene the first, of necessity the moneth of Iuly, which they call Quintilis, must haue bene named September: considering also that it is very likely, that the moneth which Romulus had dedicated vnto Mars, was also by him ordained to be the first. The second was Aprill: so called of the name Aphrodite, that is to say Venus, vnto whom they make open sacrifice in this moneth. And on the first day of the same, women do wash themselues, hauing a garland of myrtle vpon their heads. Howbeit some other say, that it was not called after the name of Aphrodite, but it was onely called Aprilis, because then is the chiefest force and strength of the spring, at which season the earth doth open, and the seedes of plants and herbes begin to bud and shew foorth, which the word it selfe doth signifie. The moneth following next after that, is called May: after the name of Maia, the mother of Mercury, vnto whom the moneth is consecrated. * The moneth of Iune is so called also, because of the quality of that season, which is as the youth of the

yeare. Although ſome will ſay, that the moneth of May was named of this word Maiores, which ſignifieth as much as the elders: and the moneth of Iune, of Iuniores, which ſignifies the yonger men. All the other following, were named in old time by the numbers according to their order, Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, Nouember, and December. But Quintilis, was after called Iulius, of the name of Iulius Cæſar, who ſlue Pompeius: and Sextilis was named Auguſtus, of Octauius Cæſar his ſucceſſour in the empire, who was alſo ſurnamed Auguſtus. It is true alſo that Domitian would they ſhould call the two moneths following (which are September and October) the one Germanicus, and the other Domitianus. But that held not long: for ſo ſoone as Domitian was killed, the moneths recouered their auncient names againe. The two laſt moneths only, haue euer continued their names, without changing or altering. But of the two which Numa added, or at the leaſt tranſlated: the moneth of February doth ſignifie as much as purging, or at leaſt the deriuation of the word ſoundeth neere it. In this moneth, they do ſacrifice of plants, and do celebrate the feaſt of the LVPERCALES, in which there are many things agreeable, and like to the ſacrifices made for purification. And the firſt, which is Ianuary, was called after the name of Ianus. Wherfore me thinkes that Numa tooke away the moneth of March from the firſt place, & gaue it vnto Ianuary: becauſe he would haue peace preferred before war, & ciuill things before marſhall. For this Ianus (were he King, or demigod) in the former age was counted very ciuill and politike. For he changed the life of men, which before his time was rude, cruel, & wild: and brought it to be honeſt, gentle, and ciuill. For this cauſe they do paint his image at this day with two faces, the one before, and the other behind, for thus changing the liues of men. And there is in ROME a temple dedicated vnto him, which hath two doores, that be called the doores of warre: for the cuſtome is to open them, when the ROMAINES haue any warres in any place, and to ſhut them when they be at peace. To haue them ſhut, it was a rare thing to ſee, and happened very ſeldome: by reaſon of the greatneſſe of their empire, which of all ſides was enuironed with barbarous nations, whom they were compelled to keepe vnder with force of armes. Notwithſtanding it was once ſhut vp in the time of Auguſtus, after he had ſlaine Antonie: and once before alſo in the yeare when Marcus Attilius and Titus Manlius were Conſuls. But that continued not long, for it was opened againe incontinently, by reaſon of warres that came vpon them ſoone after. Howbeit during the raigne of Numa, it was neuer one day opened, but remained ſhut continually by the ſpace of three and forty yeares together. For all occaſions of warres, were then vtterly dead and forgotten: becauſe at ROME the people were not onely through the example of iuſtice, clemency, and the goodneſſe of the King, brought to be quiet, and to loue peace: but in the cities thereabouts, there began a maruellous change of maners and alteration of life, as if ſome gentle aire had breathed on them, by ſome gracious and healthfull wind, blowne from ROME to refreſh them. And thereby bred in mens minds ſuch a hearty deſire to liue in peace, to till the ground, to bring vp their children, and to ſerue the gods truly: that almoſt through all ITALY, there was nothing but feaſts, playes, ſacrifices, and bankets. The people did trafficke and frequent together, without feare or danger, and viſited one another, making great cheere: as if out of the ſpringing fountaine of Numaes wiſedome many prety brooks and ſtreames of good and honeſt life had runne ouer all ITALY, and had watered it: and that the mildneſſe of his wiſdom had from hand to hand bin diſpearſed through the whole world. Inſomuch, as the ouer exceſſiue ſpeeches the Poets accuſtomably do vſe, were not ſufficient inough to expreſſe the peaceable raigne of that time.

There: ſpiders weaue, their cobwebs day and night with rotton wormes: and in that country there, the braying trompe doth neuer ſeeme to threaten

There: in that land, no drowſie ſleepe is broken,

For during all king Numaes raigne, it was neuer heard that euer there were any warres, ciuill diſſention, or innouation of gouernement attempted againſt him, nor yet any ſecret enmity or malice malice borne him, neither any conſpiracy once thought on to reigne in his place. And whether it was for feare of diſpleaſing the gods (which viſibly ſeemed to take him into their protection) or for the reuerent regard they had vnto his vertue, or for his proſperous and good ſucceſſe all the time he raigned, I cannot tell: howbeit he ſought to keepe men ſtill pure, and honeſt, from all wickedneſſe, and layd moſt open before the eyes of the whole world, a cleere example of that which Plato long time after did affirme, and ſay, concerning true gouernement: which was: That the onely meane of true quietneſſe, and remedy from all euill (which euer troubleth men) was: when by ſome diuine ordinance from aboue there meeteth in one perſon, the right maieſtie of a King, and the mind of a wiſe philoſopher, to make vertue gouerneſſe and ruler ouer vice. For indeed happy is ſuch a wiſe man, and more happy are they, which may heare the graue counſell, and good leſſons of ſuch a mouth: and there (me thinkes) needeth no force, no compulſion, no threats, nor extremity to bridle the people. For men ſeeing the true image of vertue in their viſible prince, and in the example of his life, do willingly grow to be wiſe, and of themſelues do fall into loue, liking, and friendſhip together, and do vſe all temperance, iuſt dealing, and good order one toward another, leading their life without offence, and with the commendation of other: which is the chiefe point of felicity, and the moſt happy good that can light vnto men. And he by nature is beſt worthy to be a King, who through his wiſedome and vertue, can graffe in mens manners ſuch a good diſpoſition: and this, Numa aboue all other, ſeemed beſt to know and vnderſtand. Furthermore, touching his wiues and children, there are great contrarieties among the hiſtoriographers. For ſome of them ſay, he neuer maried other wife then Tatia, and that he neuer had any children, but one onely daughter, and ſhe was called Pompilia. Other write to the contrary, that he had foure ſonnes, Pompo, Pinus, Calpus, and Mamercus: of euery one of the which (by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne) haue deſcended the nobleſt races, and moſt auncient houſes of the Romaines. As the houſe of the Pomponians, of Pompo: the houſe of the Pinarians, of Pinus: the houſe of the Calphurnians, of Calpus: and the houſe of the Mamercians, of Mamercus. All which families by reaſon of their progenitor haue kept the ſurname of Reges, Kings. There are three other writers, which do reproue the two firſt: ſaying, that they did write to gratifie the families, making them falſely to deſcend of the noble race of king Numa. Moreouer it is ſayd, he had his daughter Pompilia, not by Tatia, but by his other wife called Lucretia, whom he maried after he was made King. Howbeit they all agree, that his daughter Pompilia was maried vnto one Martius, the ſonne of the ſame Martius which perſwaded him to accept the kingdome of Rome. For he went with him to Rome, to remaine there: where they did him the honour to receiue him into the number of the Senators. After the death of Numa, Martius the father ſtood againſt Tullus Hoſtilius for the ſucceſſion of the Realme, and being ouercome, he killed himſelfe for ſorow. But his ſonne Martius, who maried Pompilia, continued ſtill at Rome, where he begot Ancus Martius, who was king of Rome after Tullus Hoſtilius, and was but fiue yeare old when Numa died. Whoſe death was not ſudden. For he died conſuming by litle and litle, as well through age, as alſo through a lingring diſeaſe that waited on him to his end, as Piſo hath written: and Numa at his death was litle more then foure ſcore yeare old. But the pompe and honour done vnto him at his funerals, made his life yet more happy and glorious. For all the people his neighbours, friends, kinſemen, and allies of the Romaines came thither, bringing crownes with them, and other publicke contributions to honor his obſequies. The noble men ſelues of the city (which were called Patricians) caried on their ſhoulders the very bed, on which the corſe lay, to be conueyed to his graue. The Prieſts attended alſo on his body, and ſo did all the reſt of the people, women and children in like caſe, which followed him to his tombe, all bewailing and lamenting his death, with teares, ſighes, and mournings. Not as a King dead for very age, but as they had mourned for the death of their deareſt kinſeman, and neareſt friend that had died before he was old. They burnt not his body, becauſe (as ſome ſay) he commanded the contrary by his will and teſtament: but they made two coffines of ſtone, which they buried at the foote of the hill called Ianiculum. In the one they layd his bodie, and in the other the holy bookes which he had written himſelfe, much like vnto thoſe, which they that made the lawes among the Grecians did write in tables. But becauſe in his life time he had taught the prieſts the ſubſtance of the whole contained in the ſame, he willed the holy tables which he had written, ſhould be buried with his body. For he thought it not reaſonable that ſo holy matters ſhould be kept by dead letters and writings, but by mens maners and exercises. And he followed herein they say, the Pythagorians, who would not put their workes in writing, but did print the knowledge of them in their memories, whom they knew to be worthy men, and that without any writing at all. And if they had taught any manner of person the hidden rules and secrets of Geometry, which had not bene worthy of them, then they sayd the gods by manifest tokens would threaten to reuenge such sacriledge and impiety, with some great destruction and misery. Therefore, seeing so many things agreeable, and altogether like betweene Numa and Pythagoras, I easily pardon those which maintaine their opinion, that Numa and Pythagoras were familiarly acquainted and conuersant together. Valerius Antias the historian writeth, there were twelue bookes written concerning the office of Priests, and twelue other containing the philosophy of the GRECIANS. And that foure hundred yeares after (in the same yeare when Publius Cornelius, and Marcus Bebius were consuls) there fell a great rage of waters and raigne, which opened the earth, and discouered these coffines: and the lids and couers thereof being caried away, they found the one altogether voide, hauing no manner of likelihood, or token of a body that had layen in it: and in the other they found these bookes, which were deliuered vnto one named Petilius (at that time Prætor) who had the charge to reade them ouer, and to make the report of them. But he hauing perused them ouer, declared to the Senate, that he thought it not conuenient the matters contained in them should be published vnto the simple people: and for that cause they were caried into the market place, and there were openly burnt. Surely it is a common thing, that happeneth vnto all good and iust men, that they are farre more praysed and esteemed after their death, then before: because that enuy doth not long continue after their death, and oftentimes it dieth before them. But notwithstanding, the misfortunes which chaunced afterwards vnto the fiue Kings which raigned at ROME after Numa, haue made his honour shine, with much more noble glory then before. For the last of them was driuen out of his Kingdome, and died in exile, after he was very old. And of the other foure, none of them died their naturall death, but three of them were killed by treason. And Tullus Hostilius which raigned after Numa, deriding and contemning the most part of his good and holy institutions, and chiefly his deuotion towards the gods, as a thing which made men lowly and faint hearted: did as soone as euer he came to be King, turne all his subiects hearts to the warres. But this madde humour of his, continued not long. For he was plagued with a straunge and most grieuous disease that followed him, which brought him to chaunge his mind, and did farre otherwise turne his contempt of Religion, into an ouer fearefull superstition, which did nothing yet resemble the true religion and deuotion of Nyma: and besides, he infected others with his contagious errour, through the inconuenience which happened vnto him at his death. For he was striken and burnt with lightning.

THE COMPARISON OF Lycurgus with Numa.

THVS hauing written the liues of Lycurgus and Numa, the matter requireth, though it be somewhat hard to do, that we comparing the one with the other, should set out the difference betweene them. For in those things wherein they were like of condition, their deeds do shew it sufficiently. As in their temperance, their deuotion to the gods, their wisedome in gouerning, and their discreet handling of their people, by making them beleeue that the gods had reuealed the lawes vnto them, which they established. And now to come vnto their qualities, which are diuersely, and seuerally commended in either of them. Their first quality is, that Numa accepted the kingdome, and Lycurgus gaue it vp. The one receiued it, not seeking for it: and the other hauing it in his hands did restore it againe. The one being a stranger and a priuate man, was by strangers elected and chosen their Lord and King. The other being in possession a King, made himselfe againe a priuate person. Sure it is a goodly thing to obtaine a Realme by iustice: but it is a goodlier thing to esteeme iustice aboue a Realme. Vertue brought the one to be in such reputation, that he was iudged worthy to be chosen a King: and vertue bred so noble a mind in the other, that he esteemed not to be a King. Their second quality is, that like as in an instrument of musicke, the one of them did tune and wrest vp the slacke strings which were in SPARTA: so the other slackened, and set them lower, which were too high mounted in ROME. Wherein Lycurgus difficulty was the greater. For he did not perswade his citizens, to plucke off their armor and curates, nor to lay by their swords: but only to leaue their gold and siluer, to forsake their soft beds, their fine wrought tables, & other curious rich furniture, and not to leaue off the trauell of warres, to giue themselues onely vnto feasts, sacrifices, and playes. But to the contrary, to giue vp banquetting and feasting, and continually to take paines in the wars, yeelding their bodies to all kind of paines. By which meanes, the one for the loue and reuerence they did beare him, easily perswaded all that he would: and the other, by putting himselfe in danger, and being hurt also, obtained not without great trauell and aduenture, the end of his intended purpose and desire. Numa his muse was so gentle, louing, and curteous, that the manners of his citizens, which before were furious and violent, were now so tractable and ciuill, that he taught them to loue peace and iustice. And to the contrary, if they will compell me to number amongst the lawes and ordinances of Lycurgus, that which we haue written touching the ILOTES, which was a barbarous cruell thing: I must of force confesse that Numa was much wiser, more gentle, and ciuill in his lawes, considering that euen vnto those which indeed were borne slaues, he gaue some litle taste of honour, and sweetnesse of liberty, hauing ordained, that in the feasts of Saturne, they should sit downe at meate at their maisters owne table. Some hold opinion, that this custome was brought in by king Numa: who willed that those, which through their labour in tillage brought in much fruite, should haue some pleasure thereof to make good cheere with the first fruits of the same. Other imagine, that it is yet a token and remembrance of the equality which was amongſt men in the world in Saturnes time, when there was neither maiſter nor ſeruant, but all men were alike equall, as brethren or kinſmen. To conclude, it ſeemeth either of them tooke a direct courſe, thought beſt to themſelues, to frame their people vnto temperance, and to be contented with their owne. But for their other vertues, it appeareth that the one loued warre beſt, and the other iuſtice: vnleſſe it were that men would ſay, that for the diuerſitie of the nature or cuſtome of their people (which were almoſt contrary in manners) they were both compelled to vſe alſo contrary and diuerſe meanes from other. For it was not of a faint heart, that Numa tooke from his people the vſe of armes, and deſire to be in warres: but it was to the end they ſhould not do any wrong to others. Neither did Lycurgus alſo ſtudy to make his people ſouldiers and warlike, to hurt others: but for feare rather that others ſhould hurt them. And ſo, to cut off the exceſſe in the one, and to ſupply the defect of the other, they were both enforced to bring in a ſtraunge manner of gouernement. Furthermore, touching their ſeuerall kind of gouernement, & diuiding of their people into ſtates and companies: that of Numa was maruellous meane and baſe, and framed to the liking of the meaneſt people, making a body of a city, and a people compounded together, of all ſorts, as goldſmiths, minſtrels, founders, ſhoemakers, and of all ſorts of crafts men and occupations together. But that of Lycurgus was directly contrary: for his was more ſeuere and tyrannicall, in gouerning of the nobility, caſting all crafts and baſe occupations vpon bondmen and ſtraungers, and putting into the hands of his citizens the ſhield and launce, ſuffering them to exerciſe no other art or ſcience, but the art and diſcipline of warres, as the true miniſters of Mars: which all their life time neuer knew other ſcience, but onely learned to obey their captaines, and to commaund their enemies. For to haue any occupation, to buy and ſell, or to trafficke, free men were expreſſely forbidden: becauſe they ſhould wholly and abſolutely be free. And all ſciences to get money was lawfull for ſlaues, and the Ilotes: being counted for as vile an occupation, as to dreſſe meate, and to be a ſcullian of a kitchin. Numa put not this difference amongſt his people, but onely tooke away couetous deſire to be rich by warres: but otherwiſe, he did not forbid them to get goods by any other lawfull meanes, neither tooke any regard to bring all to equality, and to be alike wealthy, but ſuffering euery man to get what he could, taking no order to preuent pouerty, which crept in, and ſpread farre in his city: which he ſhould haue looked vnto at the beginning, at that time when there was not too great an vnequality amongſt them, and that his citizens for ſubſtance were in manner equall one with another: for then was the time when he ſhould haue made head againſt auarice, to haue ſtopped the miſchiefes and inconueniences which fell out afterwards, and they were not litle. For that onely was the fountaine and roote of the moſt part of the greateſt euils and miſchiefes, which happened afterwards in Rome. And as touching the diuiſion of goods: neither ought Lycurgus to be blamed for doing it, nor Numa for that he did it not. For this equality to the one, was a ground and foundation of his common-wealth, which he afterwards inſtituted: and to the other, it could not be. For this diuiſion being made not long before the time of his predeceſſor, there was no great need to change the firſt, the which (as it is likely) remained yet in full perfection. As touching mariages, & their children to be in cõmon, both the one and the other wiſely ſought to take away all occaſion of iealouſie: but yet they tooke not both one courſe. For the Romaine husbãd, hauing childrẽ inough to his cõtentation, if another that lacked children came vnto him, to pray him to lend him his wife, he might graunt her vnto him, and it was in him to giue her altogether, or to lend her for a time, and to take her afterwards againe. But the Laconian keeping his wife in his houſe, and the mariage remaining whole and vnbroken, might let out his wife to any man that would require her to haue children by her: nay furthermore, many (as we haue told you before) did themſelues intreate men, by whom they thought to haue a trim brood of children, and layd them with their wiues. What difference, I pray you was betweene theſe two cuſtomes? ſauing that the cuſtome of the Laconians ſhewed, that the husbands were nothing angry, nor grieued with their wiues for thoſe things, which for ſorrow and iealouſie doth rent the harts of moſt maried men in the world. And that of the Romaines was a ſimplicity ſomewhat more ſhamefaſt, which to couer it, was ſhadowed yet with the cloke of matrimony, and contract of mariage: confeſſing that to vſe wife and children by halfes together, was a thing moſt intollerable for him. Furthermore, the keeping of maidens to be maried by Numaes order, was much ſtraighter and more honorable for womanhood: and Lycurgus order hauing too much ſcope and liberty, gaue Poets occaſion to ſpeake, and to giue them surnames not very honest. As Ibycus called them Phænomeridas: to say, thigh shewers: and Andromanes: to say, manhood. And Euripides saith also of them:

and sought for young mens company, and tooke their ware in charge:
And shewed their thighes all bare, the taylour did them wrong, on each side open were their cotes, the slits were all too long.

And indeed to say truly, the sides of their peticotes were not sewed beneath: so that as they went, they shewed their thighs naked and bare. The which Sophocles doth easily declare by these verses:

The song which you shall sing, shall be the sonnet sayd
by Hermony lusty lasse, that strong and sturdy maide:
Which trust her petticote, about her middle short,
and set to shew her naked hippes, in francke and friendly sort.

And therfore it is sayd, the LACON wiues were bold, manly, and stout against their husbands, namely the first. For they were wholly mistresses in the house, and abroad: yea they had law on their side also, to vtter their minds frankly concerning the chiefest matters. But Numa euer reserued the honor and dignity vnto the women, which was left them by Romulus in his time, when their husbands, after they had taken thē away perforce, disposed themselues to vse them as gently as possibly they could: neuertheless, he added otherwise thereto, great honesty, and tooke away all curiosity from them, and taught them sobriety, and did inure them to speake litle. For he did vtterly forbid them wine, and did prohibit them to speake, although it were for things necessary, vnlesse it were in the presence of their husbands. In so much as it is reported, that a woman chancing one day to plead her cause in person, openly before the Iudges: the Senate hearing of it, did send immediatly vnto the oracle of Apollo, to know what that did prognosticate to the city. And therfore Numa thought the memory of the naughty women, would much commend the great humility, gentlenes, & obedience of the good. For like as our GRECIAN historiographers do note those which were the first that killed any of their citizens, or haue fought with their brethren, or haue killed their fathers or mothers: euen so the ROMAINES do note that Spurius Caruilius was the first that forsooke his wife, two hundred & thirty yeares after the first foundation of ROME, which was neuer done by any before. And that the wife of one Pinarius, called Thalæa, was the first which euer brauled or quarrelled with her mother in law called Gegania, in the time whē Tarquine surnamed the proud raigned: so well and honestly were the orders of Numa deuised cōcerning mariage. Moreour, the age & time of marying of maids, which both the one & the other ordained, doth agree with the rest of their education. For Lycurgus would not that they should be maried, till they were of good yeares, & women grown, to the end that they knowing the cōpany of man at such time as nature requireth, it should be a beginning of their pleasure & loue, and not of griefe & hate, when she should be cōpelled vnto it before time agreeable by nature, & because their bodies also should be more strong & able to beare children, & to endure the mothers painfull throwes & trauell in child-bearing, considering they are maried to no other end, but to beare children. But the ROMANES to the contrary, do marry them at twelue yeares of age and vnder: saying, that by this meanes their bodies and manners be wholly theirs which do marry them, being assured that no body else could touch them. By this reason it is manifest, that the one is more natural, to make thē strong to beare children: & the other more morall, to giue them the forme & maner of conditions, which a man wold haue thē to keepe all their life time. Moreouer touching orders for education of children, that they should be brought vp, instructed, & taught, vnder the selfe same maisters and gouernors, which should haue an eye to make them drinke, eate, play, and exercise themselues honestly, and orderly together: Numa made no more prouision for the same, then the least maker of lawes that euer was, & nothing in comparison of Lycurgus. For Numa left the parents at liberty, to vse their discretion (according to their couetousnes or necessity) to cause their children to be brought vp as they thought good: whether they would put them to be labourers, carpenters, founders, or minstrels. As if they should not frame the maners of children, and fashion them from their cradle all to one end: but should be as it were like passengers into one ship, which being there, some for one businesse, other for another purpose, but all to diuerse ends, do neuer meddle one with another, but in a rough storme or tempest, when euery man is affraide of his own life. For otherwise, no man careth but for himselfe. And other makers of lawes also, are to be borne withall, if any thing hath ſcaped them through ignorance, or ſometime through lacke of ſufficient power and authority. But a wiſe philoſopher, hauing receiued a realme of people newly gathered together, which did contrary him in nothing: whereto ſhould he moſt ply his ſtudy and indeuour, but to cauſe children to be well brought vp, and to make yong men exerciſe themſelues, to the end they ſhould not differ in manners, nor that they ſhould be troubleſome, by their diuerſe manner of bringing vp, but that they ſhould all agree together, for that they had bene trained from their childhood vnto one ſelfe trade, and faſhioned vnder one ſelfe patterne of vertue? That good education, beſides other commodities, did alſo ſerue to preſerue Lycurgus lawes. For the feare of their oath which they had made, had bene of ſmall effect, if he had not through inſtitution, and education (as it were) died in wooll the maners of children, and had not made them from their nurſes breaſts in manner, ſucke the iuyce and loue of his lawes and ciuill ordinances. And this was of ſuch force, that for the ſpace of fiue hundred yeares and more, Lycurgus chiefe lawes and ordinances remained in full perfection, as a deepe wodded dye, which went to the bottome, and pierced into the tender wooll. Contrariwiſe, that which was Numaes chiefe end and purpoſe, to continue ROME in peace and amity, died by and by with him. For he was no ſooner dead, but they opened both the gates of the temple of Ianus, which he ſo carefully had kept ſhut all his raigne, as if indeed he had kept in wars there, vnder locke and key, & they filled all ITALIE with murther and bloud: and this his godly, holy, and iuſt gouernement which his Realme enioyed all his time, did not laſt long after, becauſe it had not the bond of education, and the diſcipline of children which ſhould maintaine it. Why, may a man ſay to me here: hath not Rome excelled ſtill, and preuailed more and more in cheualry? This queſtion requireth a long anſwer, and ſpecially vnto ſuch men as place felicity in riches, in poſſeſſions, and in the greatneſſe of empire, rather then in the quiet ſafety, peace, and concord of a commonweale, and in clemency and iuſtice, ioyned with contention. Neuertheleſſe, howſoeuer it was, that maketh for Lycurgus alſo, that the ROMAINES after they had chaunged the ſtate which they had of Numa, did ſo maruellouſly increaſe and grow mighty: and that the LACEDÆMONIANS to the contrary, ſo ſoone as they began to breake Lycurgus lawes, being of great authority and ſway, fell afterwards to be of ſmall account. So that hauing loſt the ſoueraigntie and commandement ouer GREECE, they ſtood in great hazard alſo to be ouerthrowne for euer. But in troth it was ſome diuine thing in Numa, that he being a meere ſtranger, the ROMAINES did ſeeke him, to make him King, and that he could ſo change all, and rule a whole city as he liſted (not yet ioyned together) without need of any force or violence: as it was in Lycurgus, to be aſſiſted with the beſt of the city, in reſiſting the commons of LACEDÆMON, but he could neuer otherwiſe haue kept them in peace, and made them loue together, but by his onely wiſedome and iuſtice.

Solon.

DIDYMVS the Grammarian, in a litle booke that he wrote, and dedicated vnto Aſclepiades, touching the tables of the lawes of Solon, alleageth the words of one Philocles, in which he ſpeaketh againſt the common opinion of thoſe that haue written, that Solons father was called Euphorion. For all other writers agree, that he was the ſonne of Execeſtides, a man but reaſonably to liue, although otherwiſe he was of the nobleſt and moſt auncient houſe of the city of ATHENS. For of his fathers ſide, he was deſcended of King Codrus: and for his mother, Heraclides Ponticus writeth, ſhe was coſin germaine vnto Pyſiſtratus mother. For this cauſe euen from the beginning there was great friendſhip betweene them, partly for their kindred, and partly alſo for the curteſie and beauty of Pyſiſtratus, with whom it is reported Solon on a time was in loue. Afterwards they fortuned to fall at iarre one with the other, about matter of ſtate and gouernement: yet this ſquare bred no violent inconuenience betweene them, but they reſerued in their hearts ſtill their auncient amity, which continued the memory of their loue, as a great fire doth a burning flame. That Solon was no ſtayed man to withſtand beauty, nor any great doer to preuaile in loue, it is manifeſt to all, as well by other poeticall writings that he hath made, as by a law of his owne: wherein he did forbid bondmen to perfume themſelues, or to be louers of children. Who placed this law among honeſt matters, and commendable: as allowing it to the better ſort, and forbidding it to the baſeſt. They ſay alſo that Pyſiſtratus ſelfe was in loue with Charmus, and that he did ſet vp the litle image of loue, which is in ACADEMIA, where they were wont to light the holy candle. But Solons father (as Hermippus writeth) hauing ſpent his goods in liberality, and deeds of courteſie, though he might eaſily haue bene relieued at diuerſe mens hands with money, he was yet aſhamed to take any, becauſe he came of a houſe which was wont rather to giue and relieue others, then to take themſelues: ſo being yet a young man, he deuiſed to trade marchandiſe. Howbeit other ſay, that Solon trauelled countries, rather to ſee the world, and to learne, then to trafficke, or gaine. For ſure he was very deſirous of knowledge, as appeareth manifeſtly: for that being now old, he commonly vſed to ſay this verſe:

Solons linage.

Great friendſhip betwixt Solon and Pyſiſtratus.

A ſtatute for bondmen.

Solon gaue himſelfe in youth to trade marchandiſe.

I grow old, learning ſtill.

Alſo he was not couetouſly bent, nor loued riches too much: for he ſayd in one place:

Who ſo hath goods, and gold inough at call,
great heards of beaſts, and flockes in many a fold,
both horſe and mule, yea ſtore of corne and all,
that may content each man aboue the mould:
no richer is, for all thoſe heapes and hoords,
then he which hath, ſufficiently to feede,
and cloth his corpes, with ſuch as God afoords.
But if his ioy, and chiefe delight do breede,
for to behold the faire and heauenly face,
of ſome ſweete wife, which is adornd with grace,
or elſe ſome child, of beauty faire and bright,
then hath he cauſe (indeed) of deepe delight.

Solons iudgement of riches.

And in another place alſo he ſaith:

Indeed I do deſire, ſome wealth to haue at will:
but not vnleſſe the ſame be got, by faithfull dealing ſtill.
For ſure who ſo deſires by wickedneſſe to thriue:
ſhall find that iuſtice from ſuch goods, will iuſtly him depriue.

There is no law forbiddeth an honeſt man, or gentleman, greedily to ſcrape goods together, and more then may ſuffice: and likewiſe to get ſufficient to maintaine one withall, and to defray all needfull charges. In thoſe dayes no ſtate was diſcommended, as ſaith Heſiodus, nor any art or ſcience made any difference betweene men: but marchandiſe they thought an honorable ſtate, as that which deliuered meanes, to trafficke into ſtraunge and farre countries, to get acquaintance with ſtates, to procure the loue of princes, and chiefly to gather the experience of the world. So that there haue bene marchants, which heretofore haue bene founders of great cities: as he which firſt built MASSILIA, after he had obtained the friendſhip of the GAVLES, dwelling by the riuer of Rhoſne. And they ſay alſo, that Thales Mileſius the wiſe, did trafficke marchandiſe, and that Hippocrates the mathematike did euen ſo: and likewiſe that Plato trauelling into ÆGYPT, did beare the whole charges of his iourney, with the gaines he made of the ſale of oyle he caried thither. They remember alſo that Solon learned to be lauiſh in expence, to fare delicatly, and to ſpeake wantonly of pleaſures in his Poems, ſomewhat more licentiouſly then became the grauity of a Philoſopher: onely becauſe he was brought vp in the trade of marchandiſe, wherein for that men are maruellous ſubiect to great loſſes and dangers, they ſeeke otherwhiles good cheere to driue theſe cares away, and liberty to make much of themſelues. Yet it appeareth by theſe verſes, that Solon accoumpted himſelfe rather in the number of the poore, then of the rich:

The commodities of marchandiſe.
A marchant builded Maſſilia.
Thales.
Hippocrates.
Plato, all marchants.

Rich men (oft times) in lewdeſt liues do range,
and often ſeene, that vertuous men be poore:
Yet would the good their goodneſſe neuer chaunge with lewd eſtate, although their wealth be more.
For vertue ſtands alwayes both firme and ſtable:
when riches rore, and ſeldome are dureable.

Pouerty with vertue better then riches.

This poetry at the beginning he vſed but for pleaſure, and when he had leiſure, writing no matter of importance in his verſes. Afterwards he did ſet out many graue matters of philoſophy, & the moſt part of ſuch things as he had deuiſed before, in the gouernment of a common-weale, which he did not for hiſtory or memories ſake, but only of a pleaſure to diſcourſe: for he ſheweth the reaſons of that he did, and in ſome places he exhorteth, chideth, and reproueth the ATHENIANS. And ſome affirme alſo he went about to write his lawes and ordinances in verſe, and do recite his preface, which was this:

How Solon vſed his poetry.

Vouchſafe ô mighty Ioue, of heauen and earth high King:
to graunt good fortune to my lawes, and heaſts in euery thing.
And that their glory grow, in ſuch triumphant wiſe,
as may remaine in fame for aye, which liues and neuer dyes.

Solon delighted in morall, but not in naturall philoſophy.

He chiefly delighted in morall philoſophy, which treated of gouernement and common weales: as the moſt part of the wiſe men did of thoſe times. But for naturall philoſophie, he was very groſſe and ſimple, as appeareth by theſe verſes:

The

The clattering haile, and ſoftly falling ſnow
do breede in aire, and fall from clouds on hie.
The dreadfull claps, which thunderbolts do throw,
do come from heauen, and lightnings bright in skie.
The ſea it ſelfe by boiſterous blaſts doth rore,
which (were it not prouoked ſo full ſore)
Would be both calme and quiet for to paſſe, as any element that euer was.

So in effect there was none but Thales alone of all the ſeuen wiſe men of GRECE, who ſearched further the contemplation of things in common vſe among men, than he. For ſetting him apart, all the others got the name of wiſedome, onely for their vnderſtanding in matters of ſtate and gouernement. It is reported that they met on a day all ſeauen together in the city of DELPHES, and another time in the city of CORINTH, where Periander got them together at a feaſt that he made to the other ſixe. But that which moſt increaſed their glory, and made their fame moſt ſpoken of, was the ſending backe againe of the three footed ſtoole when they all had refuſed it, and turned it ouer one to another with great humanitie. For the tale is, how certaine fiſher-men of the Ile of Co, caſt their nets into the ſea, and certaine ſtraungers paſſing by, that came from the city of MILETVM, did buy their draught of fiſh at aduenture, before the net was drawne. And when they drue it vp, there came vp in the net a three footed ſtoole of maſſie gold, which men ſay, Hellen (as ſhe did returne from TROY) had throwne in that place, in memorie of an auncient Oracle ſhe called then vnto her mind. Thereupon the ſtrangers and fiſher-men firſt fell at ſtrife about this three footed ſtoole, who ſhould haue it: but afterwards the two cities tooke part of both ſides, on their citizens behalfe. In ſo much as warres had like to haue followed betweene them, had not the propheteſſe Pythia giuen a like Oracle vnto them both: That they ſhould giue this three footed ſtoole vnto the wiſeſt man. Whereupon the men of Co, ſent it firſt to Thales in the city of MILETVM, as being willing to grant that vnto a priuate perſon, for which they had made warres with all the MILESIANS before. Thales ſayd, he thought Bias a wiſer man then himſelfe: and ſo it was ſent vnto him. He likewiſe ſent it againe vnto another, as to a wiſer man. And that other, ſent it alſo vnto another. So that being thus poſted from man to man, and through diuerſe hands, in the end it was brought backe againe vnto the city of MILETVM, and deliuered into the hands of Thales the ſecond time: and laſt of all was caried vnto THEBES, and offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo Iſmenian. Howbeit Theophraſtus writeth, that firſt it was ſent to the city of PRIENA, vnto Bias: and then vnto Thales, in the city of MILETVM, by Bias conſent. And after that it had paſſed through all their hands, it was brought againe vnto Bias: and laſtly it was ſent to the city of DELPHES. And thus much haue the beſt and moſt ancient writers written: ſauing that ſome ſay in ſtead of a three footed ſtoole, it was a cuppe that King Cræſus ſent vnto the city of DELPHES. Other ſay, it was a peece of plate which Bathycles left there. They make mentiō alſo of another priuate meeting betwixt Anacharſis and Solon, and of another betweene him and Thales, where they recite, that they had this talke. Anacharſis being arriued at ATHENS, went to knocke at Solons gate, ſaying that he was a ſtranger which came of purpoſe to ſee him, and to deſire his acquaintance and friendſhip. Solon anſwered him, that it was better to ſeeke friendſhip in his owne countrey. Anacharſis replied againe: thou then that art at home, and in thine owne country, begin to ſhew me friendſhip. Then Solon wondering at his bold ready wit, entertained him verie courteouſly, & kept him a certaine time in his houſe, & made him very good cheere, at the ſelfe ſame time wherein he was moſt buſie in gouerning the common-weale, & making lawes for the ſtate thereof. Which when Anacharſis vnderſtood, he laughed at it, to ſee that Solon imagined with written lawes, to bridle mens couetouſneſſe and iniuſtice. For ſuch lawes, ſayd he, do rightly reſemble the ſpiders cobwebs: becauſe they take hold of lide flyes and gnats which fall into them, but the rich and mighty will breake and runne through them at their will. Solon anſwered him, that men do iuſtly keepe all couenants and bargaines which one make with another, becauſe it is to the hinderance of either partie to breake them: and euen ſo, he did ſo temper his lawes, that he made his citizens know, it was more for their profit to obey law and iuſtice, then to breake it. Neuertheleſſe afterwards, matters proued rather according to Anacharſis compariſon, then agreeable to the hope that Solon had conceiued. Anacharſis being by hap one day in a common aſſembly of the people at ATHENS, ſayd

Hellens three footed ſtoole of gold drawne vp in a drag net.

Anacharſis and Solons meeting

Anacharſis ſaying of Solons written lawes.

that he maruelled much, why in the conſultations and meetings of the GRECIANS, wiſe men propounded matters, and fooles did decide them. It is ſayd moreouer, that Solon was ſometime in the city of MILETVM at Thales houſe, where he ſayd that he could not but maruell at Thales, that he would neuer marry to haue children. Thales gaue him neuer a word at that preſent: but within few dayes after he ſuborned a ſtraunger, which ſayd that he came but newly home from ATHENS, departing from thence but ten dayes before. Solon asked him immediatly, What newes there? This ſtranger whom Thales had ſchooled before, anſwered: none other there, ſauing that they caried a yong man to buriall, whom all the city followed: for that he was one of the greateſt mens ſonnes of the city, and the honeſteſt man withall, who at that preſent was out of the countrey, and had bene a long time (as they ſayd) abroad. O poore vnfortunate father, then ſayd Solon: and what was his name? I haue heard him named, ſayd the ſtranger, but I haue forgotten him now: ſauing that they all ſayd, he was a worthy wiſe man. So Solon ſtill trembling more and more for feare, at euery anſwer of this ſtranger: in the end he could hold no longer, being full of trouble, but told his name himſelfe vnto the ſtranger, and asked him againe, if he were not the ſonne of Solon which was buried. The very ſame, ſayd the ſtraunger. Solon with that, like a madde man ſtraight began to beate his head, and to ſay, and do, like men impatient in affliction, and ouercome with ſorow. But Thales laughing to ſee this pageant, ſtaid him, and ſaid: Lo, Solon, this is it that keepeth me from marying, and getting of children: which is of ſuch a violence, that thou ſeeſt it hath now ouercome thee, although otherwiſe thou art ſtrong, and able to wreſtle with any. Howbeit for any thing he hath ſayd vnto thee, be of good cheere man, for it is but a tale, and nothing ſo. Hermippus writeth, that Patæcus (he which ſayd he had Æſops ſoule) reciteth this ſtory thus. Neuertheleſſe it lacketh iudgement, and the courage of a man alſo, to be affraid to get things neceſſary, fearing the loſſe of them: for by this reckoning, he ſhould neither eſteeme honor, goods, nor knowledge when he hath them, for feare to looſe them. For we ſee that vertue it ſelfe, which is the greateſt and ſweeteſt riches a man can haue, decayeth oft times through ſickneſſe, or elſe by phyſicke, and potions. Furthermore Thales ſelfe, although he was not maried, was not therefore free from this feare, vnleſſe he would confeſſe that he neither loued friends, kinſemen, nor country: howbeit Thales had an adopted ſon, called Cybiſtus, which was his ſiſters ſon. For our ſoule hauing in it a naturall inclination to loue, and being borne as well to loue, as to feel, to reaſon, or vnderſtand, and to remember: hauing nothing of her owne whereupon ſhe might beſtow that naturall loue, borroweth of other. As where there is a houſe or inheritance without lawfull heires, many times ſtraungers, and baſe borne children, do creepe into the kind affection of the owner, and when they haue once won and poſſeſſed his loue, they make him euer after to be kind and tender ouer them. So that ye ſhall ſee many times men of ſuch a hard and rough nature, that they like not of them that moue them to marry, and get lawfull children: and yet afterwards are ready to die for feare and ſorow, when they ſee their baſtards (that they haue gotten of their ſlaues or concubines) fall ſicke or dye, & do vtter words far vnmeet for men of noble courage. And ſome ſuch there be, that for the death of a dog, or their horſe, are ſo out of hart, and take ſuch thought, that they are ready to go into the ground, they looke ſo pitifully. Other ſome are cleane contrary, who though they haue loſt their children, forgone their friends, or ſome gentleman deare vnto them, yet no ſorowfull word hath commen from them, neither haue they done any vnſeemely thing: but haue paſſed the reſt of their life like wiſe, conſtant, and vertuous men. For it is not loue but weakenes, which breedeth theſe extreme ſorowes, & exceeding feare, in men that are not exerciſed, nor acquainted to fight againſt fortune with reaſon. And this is the cauſe that plucketh from them the pleaſure of that they loue & deſire, by reaſon of the continuall trouble, feare & griefe they feele, by thinking how in time they may be depriued of it. Now we muſt not arme our ſelues with pouerty, againſt the griefe of loſſe of goods: neither with lacke of affection, againſt the loſſe of our friends: neither with want of mariage, againſt the death of children: but we muſt be armed with reaſon againſt misfortunes. Thus haue we ſufficiently enlarged this matter. The ATHENIANS hauing now ſuſtained a long and troubleſome warre againſt the MEGARIANS, for the poſſeſſion of the Ile of SALAMINA, were in the end weary of it, and made proclamation ſtraightly commaunding vpon paine of death, that no man ſhould preſume to preferre any more to the counſell of the city, the title or queſtion of the poſſeſſion of the Ile of SALAMINA. Solon could not beare this open ſhame, and ſeeing the moſt part of the luſtieſt youths deſirous ſtill of warre though their tongues were tied for feare of the proclamation: he fained himſelfe himselfe to be out of his wits, and caused it to be giuen out that Solon was become a foole: and secretly he had made certaine lamentable verses, which he had conned without booke, to sing abroad the citie. So one day he ranne suddenly out of his house with a garland on his head, and got him to the market place, where the people straight swarmed like Bees about him: and getting him vp vpon the stone where all proclamations are vsually made, out he singeth these Elegies he had made, which began after this sort:

Solon fained madnesse to recouer Salamina.

Solons Elegies of the Salaminians.

I here present my selfe (an Herauld) in this case, which come from Salamina land, that noble worthy place.
My mind in prose, shall neuer be expresst, but sung in verse Heroicall, for so I thinke it best.

This Elegie is intituled SALAMINA, and containeth an hundred verses, which are excellently well written. And these being sung openly by Solon at that time, his friends incontinently praised them beyond measure, and especially Pysistratus: and they went about perswading the people that were present, to credit that he spake. Herupon the matter was so handled amongst them, that by and by the proclamation was reuoked, and they began to follow the wars with greater furie then before, appointing Solon to be generall in the same. But the common tale and report is, that he went by sea with Pysistratus vnto the temple of Venus, surnamed Coliade: where he found all the women at a solemne feast and sacrifice, which they made of custome to the goddesse. He taking occasion thereby, sent from thence a trustie man of his owne vnto the MEGARIANS, which then had SALAMINA: whom he instructed to faine himselfe a reuolted traitour, and that he came of purpose to tell them, that if they would but go with him, they might take all the chief ladies and gentlewomen of ATHENS on a sudden. The MEGARIANS easily beleeued him, and shipped forthwith certaine souldiers to go with him. But when Solon perceiued the shippe vnder saile coming from SALAMINA, he commanded the women to depart, and in stead of them he put lusty beardlesse springals into their apparell, and gaue them litle short daggers to conuey vnder their clothes, commanding them to play and daunce together vpon the sea side, vntill their enemies were landed, and their ship at anker; and so it came to passe. For the MEGARIANS being deceiued by that they saw a farre off, assoone as euer they came to the shore side, did land in heapes, one in anothers necke, euen for greedinesse, to take these women: but not a man of them escaped, for they were slaine euery mothers sonne. This stratageme being finely handled, and to good effect, the ATHENIANS tooke sea straight, and coasted ouer to the Isle of SALAMINA: which they tooke vpon the sudden, and wanne it without much resistance. Other say that it was not taken after this sort: but that Apollo Delphicus gaue Solon first such an Oracle:

Of the temple of Venus Coliad. Strab. lib. 4 & Paus. of the Athenians.

Solons stratagem.

Solon wanne Salamina.

Thou shalt first winne by vowes and sacrifice,
the helpe of lords and demy gods full bright:
Of whose dead bones, the dust engraued lyes,
in westerne soyle, Asopia that hight.

By order of this oracle, he one night passed ouer to SALAMINA, and did sacrifice to Peripheemas, and to Cichris, demy-gods of the country. Which done, the ATHENIANS deliuered him fiue hundred men, who willingly offered themselues: and the city made an accord with them: that if they tooke the Isle of SALAMINA, they should beare greatest authoritie in the common weale. Solon imbarked his souldiers into diuers fisher boats, and appointed a galiot of thirty owers to come after him, & he ankered hard by the city of SALAMINA, vnder the point which looketh towards the Isle of NEGREPONT. The MEGARIANS which were within SALAMINA, hauing by chance heard some inkling of it, but yet knew nothing of certainty, ran presently in hurly burly to arme them, and manned out a ship to descry what it was. But they fondly comming within danger, were taken by Solon, who clapped the MEGARIANS vnder hatches fast bound, & in their roomes put aboord in their shippe the choisest souldiers he had of the ATHENIANS, commaunding them to set their course direct vpon the citie, and too keepe themselues as close out of sight as could be. And he himselfe with all the rest of his souldiers landed presently, and marched to encounter with the MEGARIANS, which were come out into the field. Now whilst they were fighting together, Solons men whom he had sent in the MEGARIANS shippe, entred the hauen and wan the towne. This is certainely true, and testified by that which is shewed yet at this day. For to keepe a memoriall hereof, a shippe of ATHENS arriueth quietly at the first, and by and by those that are in the shippe make a great showt, and a man armed leaping out of the ship, runneth ſhowting towards the rocke called Sciradion, which is as they come from the firme land: and hard by the ſame is the temple of Mars, which Solon built there after he had ouercome the MEGARIANS in battell, from whence he ſent backe againe thoſe priſoners that he had taken (which were ſaued from the ſlaughter of the battell) without any ranſome paying. Neuertheleſſe, the MEGARIANS were ſharpely bent ſtill to recouer SALAMINA againe. Much hurt being done and ſuffered on both ſides: both parts in the end made the LACEDÆMONIANS iudges of the quarrell. But vpon iudgement giuen, common report is, that Homers authoritie did Solon good ſeruice, becauſe he did adde theſe verſes to the number of ſhips, which are in the Iliades of Homer, which he rehearſed before the iudges, as if they had bene indeed written by Homer:

Aiax that champion ſtout, did leade with him in charge, twelue ſhippes from Salamina ſoyle, which he had left at large, and euen thoſe ſelfe ſame ſhippes, in battell did he caſt,
and place in order for to fight, with enemies force at laſt,
In that ſame very place, whereas it ſeemed them,
the captaines which from Athens came, imbatteld had their men.

Howbeit the ATHENIANS ſelues thinke it was but a tale of pleaſure: and ſay that Solon made it appeare to the iudges, that Phileus, and Euryſaces (both Aiax ſons) were made free denizens of ATHENS. Wherupon they gaue the Iſle of SALAMINA vnto the ATHENIANS, and one of them came to dwell in a place called Brauron, in the country of ATTICA: and the other in a town called MILETVM. And for due proofe thereof, they ſay there is yet a certaine canton or quarter of the country of ATTICA, which is called the canton of the Philaides, after the name of this Phileus, where Pyſiſtratus was borne. And it is ſaid moreouer, that Solon (becauſe he would throughly conuince the MEGARIANS) did alledge that the SALAMINIANS buried not the dead after the MEGARIANS maner, but after the ATHENIANS maner. For in MEGARA they bury the dead with their faces to the Eaſt: and in ATHENS their faces are towards the Weſt. Yet Hereas the Megarian denyeth it ſaying, that the MEGARIANS did bury them alſo with their faces towards the Weſt: alledging moreouer, that at ATHENS euery corſe had his owne beere or coffin by it ſelf, and that at MEGARA they did put three or foure corſes together. They ſay alſo there were certaine oracles of Apollo Pythias, which did greatly help Solon, by which the god called SALAMINA, IONIA. Their ſtrife was iudged by fiue Arbitrators, all SPARTANS borne: that is to ſay, Critolaidas, Amompharetus, Hypſechidas, Anaxilas, and Cleomenes. Solon vndoubtedly won great glory and honor by this exploit, yet was he much more honored and eſteemed, for the oration he made in defence of the temple of Apollo, in the city of DELPHES: declaring that it was not meete to be ſuffered, that the CYRRHÆIANS ſhould at their pleaſure abuſe the ſanctuarie of the Oracle, and that they ſhold ayde the DELPHIANS in honour and reuerence of Apollo. Whereupon the counſell of the Amphictyons, being moued with his wordes and perſwaſions, proclaimed warres againſt the CYRRHÆIANS: as diuers others do witneſſe, and eſpecially Ariſtotle, in the ſtorie he wrote of thoſe that wan the Pythian games, where he aſcribeth vnto Solon the honour of that determination. Neuertheleſſe Hermippus ſaith, Solon was not made generall of their armie, as Euanthes Samian hath written. For Æſchines the Orator wrote no ſuch thing of him: and in the Chronicles of the DELPHIANS they find, that one Alcmæon, and not Solon, was the generall of the ATHENIANS. Now the city of ATHENS had a long time bene vexed and troubled through Cylons hainous offence, euer ſince the yere that Megacles (gouernor of the city of ATHENS) did with faire words handle ſo the confederats of the rebellion of Cylon, which had taken ſanctuarie within the liberties of the temple of Minerua: that he perſwaded them to be wiſe, and to preſent themſelues before the iudges, holding by a threed, which they ſhould tye about the baſe of the image of the goddeſſe where ſhe ſtood, becauſe they ſhould not loſe their libertie. But when they were come to the place of the honorable goddeſſes ſo called (which be the images of the furies) comming down to preſent themſelues before the Iudges, the threed brake of it ſelf. Then Megacles, & other officers his companions, laid hold on them preſently, ſaying that it was a manifeſt ſigne that the goddeſſe Minerua refuſed to ſaue thē. So thoſe they tooke, and all they could lay hands on were immediatly ſtoned to death without the city: the reſt which tooke the altars of refuge, were ſlain there alſo. And none were ſaued, but ſuch as had made meanes to the gouernours wiues of the city, to intreat for them: which from that time forth were euer hated of the people, and cōmonly called the abiects and excommunicates. chanced to riſe againe in credit,& growing to great authority,they neuer left quarrelling & fighting continually with the offspring of Megacles. Theſe factions were greateſt & higheſt in Solons time: who being of authority,and ſeeing the people thus diuided in two parts, he ſtepped in betweene them,with the chiefeſt men of ATHENS,and did ſo perſwade & intreat thoſe whom they called the abiects and excommunicates, that they were contented to be iudged. So 300. of the chiefeſt citizens were choſen iudges to heare this matter.The accuſer was Myron Phlyeian. This matter was heard and pleaded,and by ſentence of the iudges,the excommunicats were condemned.Thoſe that were aliue,to perpetual exile:& the bones of thē that were dead,to be digged vp, and thrown out of the confines of the territory of ATHENS.But whilſt the city of ATHENS was occupied with theſe vprores,the MEGARIANS wiſely caught hold of the occaſion deliuered,& ſet vpon the ATHENIANS,took from them the hauen of NISÆA, and recouered againe out of their hands the Ile of SALAMINA.Furthermore,all the citie was poſſeſſed with a certaine ſuperſtitious feare: for ſome ſaid,that ſprites were come againe,and ſtraunge ſights were ſeene. The prognoſticators alſo ſaid,they perceiued by their ſacrifices the citie was defiled with ſome abominable and wicked things,which were of neceſſity to be purged and throwne out. Hereupon they ſent into CRETA for Epimenides Phæſtian, whome they reckened the ſeuenth of the wiſe men, at the leaſt ſuch as will not allow Periander for one of the number. He was a holy and deuout man,and very wiſe in celeſtiall things,by inſpiration from aboue: by reaſon whereof, men of his time called him the new Curetes,that is to ſay,Prophet: and he was thought the ſonne of a Nymph called Balte.When he was come to ATHENS,and growne in friendſhip with Solon, he did helpe him much,and made his way for eſtabliſhing of his lawes. For he acquainted the ATHENIANS to make their ſacrifices much lighter,and of leſſe coſt: & brought the citizens to be more moderate in their mourning, with cutting off certaine ſeuere and barbarous ceremonies, which the moſt part of women obſerued in their mourning: and he ordained certaine ſacrifices which he would haue done immediatly after the obſequies of the dead. But that which exceeded all the reſt was,that by vſing the citizens vnto holines and deuotion,daily ſacrifices, prayers vnto the gods,purging of themſelues,& humble offerings: he wan mens harts by litle and litle, to yeeld them more confirmable to iuſtice, & to be more inclined to concord and vnity. It is reported alſo that Epimenides when he ſaw the hauen of Munychia,and had long conſidered of it: told thoſe about him,that men were very blind in foreſeeing things to come. For if the ATHENIANS,(ſaid he)knew what hurt this hauen would bring them, they would eate it (as they ſay) with their teeth. It is ſaid alſo that Thales did prognoſticate ſuch a like thing, who after his death commanded they ſhould bury his body in ſome vile place of no reckening, within the territorie of the MILESIANS,ſaying that one day there ſhould be the place of a citie. Epimenides therefore being maruellouſly eſteemed of euery man for theſe cauſes,was greatly honored of the ATHENIANS,& they offered him great preſents of mony and other things,but he would take nothing, & only prayed them to giue him a bough of the holy oliue: which they granted him, and ſo he returned ſhortly home into CRETA. Now that this ſedition of Cylon was vtterly appeaſed in ATHENS,for that the excommunicates were baniſhed the country, the city fell againe into their old troubles & diſſentions about the gouernment of the common weale: & they were deuided into ſo diuers parts and factions,as there were people of ſundry places and territories within the country of ATTICA. For there were the people of the mountaines,the people of the vallies, and the people of the ſea coaſt. Thoſe of the mountaines,tooke the common peoples part for their liues.Thoſe of the valley,would a few of the beſt citizens ſhould carry the ſway. The coaſt-men would that neither of them ſhould preuaile,becauſe they would haue had a mean gouernment & mingled of thē both. Furthermore,the faction between the poore & rich, proceeding of their vnequality,was at that time very great. By reaſon whereof the citie was in great daunger, and it ſeemed there was no way to pacifie or take vp theſe controuerſies,vnleſſe ſome tyrant hapned to riſe, that would take vpon him to rule the whole. For all the common people were ſo ſore indetted to the rich, that either they plowed their lands, and yeelded them the ſixt part of their crop: (for which cauſe they were called Hectemorij and ſeruants)or elſe they borrowed mony of them at vſurie,vpon gage of their bodies to ſerue it out.And if they were not able to pay thē,then were they by the law deliuered to their creditors, who kept thē as bondmen & ſlaues in their houſes, or elſe they ſent them into ſtrange countries to be ſold: & many euen for very pouerty were forced to ſel their own childrē (for there was no law to forbid the cōtrary) or els to forſake their city and countrey, for the extreame cruelty and hard dealing of these abominable vsurers their creditors. Insomuch that many of the lustiest & stoutest of them, banded together in companies, and incouraged one another, not to suffer and beare any longer such extremity, but to choose them a stout and trusty captaine, that might set them at liberty, and redeeme those out of captiuity, which were iudged to be bondmen and seruants, for lack of paying of their dets at their daies appointed: and so to make againe a new diuision of all lands and tenements, and wholly to change and turne vp the whole state and gouernment. Then the wisest men of the citie, who saw Solon only neither partner with the rich in their oppression, neither partaker with the poore in their necessity: made sute to him, that it would please him to take the matter in hand, and to appease and pacifie all these broiles and sedition. Yet Phanias Lesbian writeth, that he vsed a subtilty, whereby he deceiued both the one and the other side, concerning the common weale. For he secretly promised the poore to diuide the lands againe: and the rich also, to confirme their couenants and bargaines. Howsoeuer it fell out, it is very certaine that Solon from the beginning made it a great matter, and was very scrupulous to deale betweene them: fearing the couetousnesse of the one, and arrogancie of the other. Howbeit in the end he was chosen gouernor after Philōbrotus, and was made reformer of the rigor of the lawes, and the temperer of the state and common weale, by consent and agreement of both parties. The rich accepted him, because he was no begger: the poore did also like him, because he was an honest man. They say moreouer, that one word and sentence which he spake (which at that present was rife in euery mans mouth) that equality did breed no strife: did aswell please the rich and wealthy, as the poore and needie. For the one sort conceiued of this word equality, that he wold measure all things according to the qualitie of the man: and the other tooke it for their purpose, that he would measure all things by the number, and by the polle only. Thus the captains of both factions perswaded and prayed him, boldly to take vpon him that soueraigne authority, sithence he had the whole citie now at his commandement. The neuters also of euery part, when they saw it very hard to pacifie these things with law and reason, were well content that the wisest, and honestest man, should alone haue the royall power in his hands. Some say also that there was such an oracle of Apollo:

Sit thou at helme, as gouernour to steere,
to guide our course; and rule the rowling shippe:
for thou shalt see, full many Athenians there,
will take thy part, and after thee will trippe.

Solons equitie & vprightnes. Solon by subtiltie set order betwixt the poore & rich.

Solon chosen reformer of the lawe, and chiefe gouernour.

But his familiar friends aboue all rebuked him, saying he was to be accompted no better then a beast, if for feare of the name of tyrant, he would refuse to take vpon him a Kingdome: which is the most iust and honourable state, if one take it vpon him that is an honest man. As in old time, Tinnondas made himselfe King of those of Negrepont, with their consent: and as Pittacus was then presently of those of METELIN. Notwithstanding, all these goodly reasons could not make him once alter his opinion. And they say that he aunswered his friendes, that principalitie and tyrannie, was indeede a goodly place: howbeit there was no way for a man to get out, when he was once entred into it. And in certaine verses that he wrote to Phocus, thus he said:

Solon refuseth to be a tyrant. Tynnondas, & Pittacus tyrants.

Solons answer for tyranny.

I neither blush, nor yet repent my selfe,
that haue preseru'd my natiue soyle alwaies,
and that therein (to hoord vp trash and pelfe)
no tyrants thought could once eclypse my praise.
No might could moue my mind to any wrong,
which might beblot the glory of my name:
for so I thought, to liue in honour long,
and farre excell all other men for fame.

Hereby appeareth plainely, that euen before he was chosen reformer of the state, to stablish new lawes: he was then of great countenance and authoritie. But he himselfe writeth, that many said of him thus, after he had refused the occasion of vsurping of this tyrannie:

Sure Solon was a foole, and of a bashfull mind, that would refuse the great good hap, which gods to him assignd.
The pray was in his hands, yet durst he neuer draw the net therefore: but stood abasht, and like a dastard daw.

For had not that ſo bene, he would (for one daies raigne, to be a king in Athens towne) himſelfe (all quicke) haue ſlaine.
And eke ſubuerted quite, his familie withall,
So ſweete it is to rule the roſt, yclad in princely pall.

Thus brought he common rumor to taber on his head. Now, notwithſtanding he had refuſed the kingdome, yet he waxed nothing the more remiſſe nor ſoft therefore in gouerning, neither would he bow for feare of the great, nor yet would frame his lawes to their liking, that had choſen him their reformer. For where the miſchiefe was tollerable, he did not ſtraight plucke it vp by the rootes: neither did he ſo change the ſtate, as he might haue done, leaſt if he ſhould haue attempted to turne vpſide downe the whole gouernment, he might afterwards haue bene neuer able to ſettle & ſtabliſh the ſame again. Therfore he only altred that which he thought by reaſon he would perſwade his citizens vnto, or elſe by force he ought to compell them to accept, mingling as he ſaid, ſoure with ſweet, and force with iuſtice. And herewith agreeth his aunſwer that he made afterwards vnto one that asked him, if he had made the beſt lawes he could for the ATHENIANS? Yea ſure, ſaith he, ſuch as they were to receiue. And this that followeth alſo, they haue euer ſince obſerued in the Athenian toung: to make certain things pleaſant, that be hateful, finely conueying them vnder colour of pleaſing names. As calling whores, lemans: taxes, contributions: garriſons, guards: priſons, houſes. And all this came vp firſt by Solons inuention, who called clearing of debts, Seiſachtheian: in Engliſh, diſcharge. For the firſt change and reformation he made in gouernment was this: he ordained that all manner of debts paſt ſhould be cleare, and no body ſhould aske his debtour any thing for the time paſt. That no man ſhould thencefoorth lend money out to vſurie, vpon couenants for the body to be bound, if it were not repayed. Howbeit ſome write (as Androtion among other) that the poore were contented that the intereſt only for vſurie ſhould be moderated, without taking away the whole debt: and that Solon called this eaſie & gentle diſcharge, Seiſachtheian with crying vp the value of mony. For he raiſed the pound of ſiluer, being before but threeſcore & thirteene Drachmes, full vp to an hundred: ſo they which were to pay great ſums of mony, payed by tale as much as they ought, but with leſſe number of peeces then the debt could haue bene payed when it was borrowed. And ſo the detters gained much, & the creditors loſt nothing. Neuertheles the greater part of them which haue written the ſame, ſay, that this crying vp of mony, was a general diſcharge of all debts, conditions, and couenants vpon the ſame: wherto the very poemes themſelues, which Solon wrote, do ſeem to agree. For he glorieth, and breaketh foorth in his verſes, that he had taken away all bawkes and marks that ſeparated mens lands through the country of ATTICA: and that now he had ſet at libertie, that which before was in bondage. And that of the citizens of ATHENS, which for lacke of paiment of their debts had bene condemned for ſlaues to their creditors, he had brought many home againe out of ſtrange countries, where they had bene ſo long, that they had forgotten to ſpeake their naturall tongue: and other which remained at home in captiuitie, he had now ſet them all at good liberty. But while he was in doing this, men ſay a thing thwarted him, that troubled him maruellouſly. For hauing framed an Edict for clearing of all debts, & lacking only a litle to grace it with words, and to giue it ſome pretie preface, that otherwiſe was readie to be proclaimed: he opened himſelf ſomwhat to certain of his familiars whom he truſted (as Conon, Clinias, and Hipponicus) & told them how he would not meddle with lands & poſſeſſions, but wold only cleare & cut off all maner of debts. Theſe men before the proclamatiō came out, went preſently to the money-men, & borowed great ſums of mony of them, & laid it out ſtraight vpon land. So when the proclamation came out, they kept the lands they had purchaſed, but reſtored not the mony they had borrowed. This foule part of theirs made Solon very ill ſpoken of, and wrongfully blamed: as if he had not onely ſuffered it, but had bene partaker of this wrong and iniuſtice. Notwithſtanding he cleared himſelfe of this ſlaunderous report, loſing fiue talents by his owne law. For it was well knowne that ſo much was due vnto him, and he was the firſt that following his owne proclamation, did clearely releaſe his debtours of the ſame. Other ſay he was owing fifteene talents: and among the ſame, Polyzelus the Rhodian is one that affirmeth it. Notwithſtanding they euer after called Solons friends, Greocopides, cutters of debts. This law neither liked the one nor the other ſort. For it greatly offended the rich for cancelling their bonds: and it much more miſliked the poore, becauſe all lands and poſſeſſions they gaped for, were not made againe common, and euery bodie alike rich and wealthie, as Lycurgus had made the LACEDÆMONIANS. But Lycurgus was the eleuenth descended of the right line from Hercules, and had many yeres ben King of LACEDÆMON, where he had gotten great authority, and made himselfe many friends: all which things together, did greatly helpe him to execute that, which he wisely had imagined for the order of his Common weale. Yet also, he vsed more perswasion then force, a good witnesse thereof the losse of his eye: preferring a lawe before his priuate iniurie, which hath power to preserue a citie long in vnion and concord, and to make citizens to be neither poore nor rich. Solon could not attaine to this, for he was borne in a popular state, and a man but of meane wealth: Howbeit he did what he could possible, with the power he had, as one seeking to winne no credit with his citizens, but onely by his counsell. Now, that he got the ill will of the greater part of the citie, by his proclamation which he made: he himselfe doth witnesse it saying:

Euen those which earst, did beare me friendly face,
and spake full faire, where euer I them met:
gan now beginne, to looke full grim of grace,
and were (like foes) in force against me set.
As if I had done them some spite or scorne,

Solons absolute authoritie in the common weale.

But shortly after, hauing a feeling of the benefit of his ordinance, and euery one forgetting his priuate quarrell: they altogether made a common sacrifice, which they called the sacrifice of Seisachtheia, or discharge, and chose Solon generall reformer of the law, and of the whole state of the common weale, without limiting his power, but referred all matters indifferently to his will. As the offices of state, common assemblies, voices in election, iudgements in iustice, and the body of the Senate. And they gaue him also full power and authoritie, to sesse & taxe any of them, to appoint the number, what time the sesse should continue, and to keepe, confirme, and disanull at his pleasure, any of the ancient lawes & customes then in being. To begin withall, he first took away all Dracons bloudie lawes, sauing for murther, & manslaughter, which were too seuere & cruell. For almost he did ordaine but one kind of punishment for all kind of faults and offences, which was death. So that they which were condemned for idlenesse, were iudged to dye. And pety larcenie, as robbing mens hortyards, & gardens of fruit, or herbes, was as seuerely punished, as those who had committed sacrilege or murder. Demades therefore encountred it pleasantly, when he said: that Dracons lawes were not written with inke, but with bloud. And Draco himselfe being asked one day, why his punishments were so vnequall, as death for all kinds of faults: he aunswered: Because he thought the least offence worthy so much punishment: and for the greatest, he found none more grieuous. Then Solon being desirous to haue the chiefe offices of the citie to remaine in rich mens hands, as already they did, and yet to mingle the authority of gouernment in such sort, as the meaner people might beare a litle sway, which they neuer could before: he made an estimate of the goods of euery priuate citizen. And those which he found yearly worth 500. bushels of corne, & other liquide fruits and vpwards, he called Pentacosiomedimnes: as to say, fiue hundred bushell men of reuenue. And those that had 300. bushels a yeare, and were able to keep a horse of seruice, he put in the second degree, & called them knights. They that might dispend but two hundred bushels a yere, were put in the third place, & called Zeugites. All other vnder those, were called Thetes, as ye would say, hirelings, or crafts men liuing of their labor: whom he did not admit to beare any office in the city, neither were they taken as free citizens, sauing they had voices in elections, & assemblies of the city, and in iudgements, where the people wholy iudged. This at the first seemed nothing, but afterwards they felt it was to great purpose, for hereby the most part of priuate quarrels and strife that grew among them, were in the end laid open before the people. For he suffered those to appeale vnto the people, which thought they had wrong iudgment in their causes. Furthermore because his lawes were written somwhat obscurely, & might be diuersely taken & interpreted: this did giue a great deale more authority and power to the Iudges. For, considering all their controuersies could not be ended, and iudged by expresse law: they were driuen of necessitie alwaies to run to the Iudges, and debated their matters ters before them. In ſo much as the Iudges by this meanes came to be ſomewhat aboue the law: for they did euen expound it as they would themſelues. Solon ſelfe doth note this equall diuiſion of the publike authoritie, in a place of his poeſies, where he ſayth:

Such power haue I giuen, to common peoples hand,
as might become their meane eſtate, with equitie to ſtand:
and as I haue not pluckt, from them their dignitie, ſo haue I not too much increac'd, their ſmall authoritie.
Vnto the rich likewiſe, I haue allowed no more,
then well might ſeeme (in iuſt conceit) ſufficient for their ſtore.
And ſo I haue for both prouided in ſuch wiſe, that neither ſhall each other wrong, nor ſeeme for to deſpiſe.

Yet conſidering it was meete to prouide for the pouertie of the common ſort of people: he ſuffered any man that would, to take vpon him the defence of any poore mans caſe that had the wrong. For if a man were hurt, beaten, forced, or otherwiſe wronged: any other man that would might lawfully ſue the offendor, and proſecute law againſt him. And this was a wiſe law ordained of him, to accuſtome his citizens to be ſorie for anothers hurt, and ſo to feele it, as if any part of his owne body had bene iniured. And they ſay he made an anſwere on a time agreeable to this law. For, being asked what citie he thought beſt gouerned: he anſwered: That citie where ſuch as receiue no wrong, do as earneſtly defend wrong offered to other, as the very wrong and iniury had bene done vnto themſelues. He erected alſo the counſell of the Areopagites, of thoſe magiſtrates of the citie, out of which they did yearely chuſe their gouernour: and he himſelf had bene of that number, for that he had bene gouernour for a yeare. Wherefore perceiuing now the people were growne to a ſtomack, and haughtines of mind becauſe they were cleare diſcharged of their debts: he ſet one vp for matters of ſtate, another counſel of an hundred choſen out of euery tribe, whereof foure hundred of them were to conſult and debate of all matters, before they were propounded to the people: that when the great counſell of the people at large ſhould be aſſembled, no matters ſhould be put forth, vnles it had bene before well conſidered of, & digeſted, by the counſell of the foure hundred. Moreouer, he ordained the higher court ſhould haue the chiefe authoritie and power ouer al things, and chiefly to ſee the law executed and maintained: ſuppoſing that the common weale being ſetled, & ſtaied with theſe two courts (as with two ſtrong anker holds) it ſhould be the leſſe turmoiled and troubled, and the people alſo better pacified and quieted. The moſt part of writers hold this opinion, that it was Solon which erected the counſell of the Areopagites, as we haue ſaid, and it is very likely to be true, for that Dracon in all his lawes and ordinances made no manner of mention of the Areopagites, but alwayes ſpeaketh to the Ephetes (which were Iudges of life and death) when he ſpake of murther, or of any mans death. Notwithſtanding, the eight law of the thirteenth table of Solon ſaith thus, in theſe very words: All ſuch as haue bene baniſhed or detected of naughtie life, before Solon made his lawes, ſhal be reſtored againe to their goods and good name, except thoſe which were condemned by order of the counſell of the Areopagites, or by the Ephetes, or by the Kings in open court, for murther, and death of any man, or for aſpiring to vſurp tyrannie. Theſe words to the contrary ſeeme to proue and teſtifie, that the counſell of the Areopagites was, before Solon was choſen reformer of the lawes. For how could offenders and wicked men be condemned, by order of the counſell of the Areopagites before Solon, if Solon was the firſt that gaue it authoritie to iudge? vnleſſe a man will ſay peraduenture, that he would a litle helpe the matter of his lawes which were obſcure and darke, and would ſupply that they lacked, with expounding of the ſame by them. Thoſe which ſhall be found attainted and conuicted of any matter, that hath bene heard before the counſell of the Areopagites, the Ephetes, or the gouernours of the citie when this law ſhall come forth: ſhall ſtand condemed ſtill, and all other ſhall be pardoned, reſtored, and ſet at libertie. Howſoeuer it is, ſure that was his intent and meaning. Furthermore among the reſt of his lawes, one of them indeede was of his owne deuiſe: for the like was neuer ſtabliſhed elſewhere. And it is that law, that pronounceth him defamed, and vnhoneſt, who in a ciuill vprore among the citizens, ſitteth ſtill a looker on, and a neuter, and taketh part with neither ſide. Whereby his mind was as it ſhould appeare, that priuate men ſhould not be only carefull to put themſelues and their cauſes in ſafetie, nor yet ſhould be carcleſſe for other mens matters, or think it a vertue not to meddle with the miſeries & misfortunes of their countrey, but from the beginning of euery ſedition that they ſhould ioyne with thoſe that take the iuſteſt cauſe in hand, and rather to hazard themſelues with ſuch, then to tary looking (without putting themſelues in danger) which of the two ſhould haue the victorie. There is another law alſo, which at the firſt ſight me thinketh is very vnhoneſt and fond. That if any man according to the law hath matched with a rich heyre and inheritour, and of himſelfe is impotent, and vnable to do the office of a husband, ſhe may lawfully lie with any whom ſhe liketh, of her husbands neareſt kinſmen. Howbeit ſome affirme, that it is a wiſe made law for thoſe, which knowing themſelues vnmeete to entertaine wedlocke, will for couetouſneſſe of lands, marie with rich heyres and poſſeſſioners, and mind to abuſe poore gentlewomen vnder the colour of law: and will thinke to force and reſtraine nature. For, ſeeing the law ſuffereth an inheritour or poſſeſſioner thus ill beſtowed, at her pleaſure to be bold with any of her husbands kin: men will either leaue to purchaſe ſuch mariages, or if they be ſo careleſſe that they will needs marie, it ſhall be to their extreame ſhame and ignominy, and ſo ſhall they deſeruedly pay for their greedy couetouſneſſe. And the law is well made alſo, becauſe the wife hath not ſcope to all her husbands kinſmen, but vnto one choice man whom ſhe liketh beſt of his houſe: to the end that the children that ſhall be borne, ſhall be at the leaſt of her husbands bloud and kindred. This alſo confirmeth the ſame, that ſuch a new maried wife ſhould be ſhut vp with her husband, and eate a quince with him: and that healſo which marieth ſuch an inheritor, ſhould of dutie ſee her thriſe a moneth at the leaſt. For although he get no children of her, yet it is an honour the husband doth to his wife, arguing that he taketh her for an honeſt woman, that he loueth her, and that he eſteemeth of her. Beſides, it taketh away many miſlikings and diſpleaſures which oftentimes happen in ſuch caſes, and keepeth loue and good will waking, that it die not vtterly betweene them. Furthermore, he tooke away all ioynters and dowries in other marriages, and willed that the wiues ſhould bring their hubands but three gownes onely, with ſome other litle moueables of ſmall value, and without any other thing as it were: vtterly forbidding that they ſhould buy their husbãds, or that they ſhould make marchandize of mariages, as of other trades to gaine, but would that man and woman ſhould marrie together for iſſue, for pleaſure, and for loue, but in no caſe for money. And for proofe hereof, Dionyſius the tyrant of SICILIE, one day anſwered his mother (which would needs be maried to a yong man of SYRACVSA) in this ſort: I haue power (ſayth he) to breake the lawes of SYRACVSA, by hauing the kingdome: but to force the law of nature, or to make mariage without the reaſonable compaſſe of age, that paſſeth my reach and power. So is it not tollerable, and much leſſe allowable alſo, that ſuch diſorder ſhould be in well ordered cities, that ſuch vncomely and vnfit mariages ſhould be made, betweene couples of ſo vnequall yeares: conſidering there is no meete nor neceſſarie end of ſuch matches. A wiſe gouernour of a citie, or a Iudge and reformer of lawes and manners, might well ſay to an old man that ſhould marrie with a yong maide, as the Poet ſayth of Philoctetes:

Ah ſilly wretch, how trimme a man art thou,
at theſe yong yeares, for to be married now?

And finding a yong man in an old rich womans houſe, getting his liuing by riding of her errands, and waxing fat as they ſay the partridge doth by treading of the hens: he may take him from thence, to beſtow him on ſome yong maide that ſhall haue neede of a husband. And thus much for this matter. But they greatly commend another law of Solons, which forbiddeth to ſpeake ill of the dead. For it is a good and godly thing to thinke, that they ought not to touch the dead, no more than to touch holy things: and men ſhould take great heed to offend thoſe that are departed out of this world: beſides it is a token of wiſedome and ciuilitie, to beware of immortall enemies. He commaunded alſo in the ſelfe ſame law, that no man ſhould ſpeake ill of the liuing, ſpecially in Churches, during diuine ſeruice, or in counſell chamber of the citie, nor in the Theaters whileſt games were a playing: vpon paine of three ſiluer *Drachmes to be payed to him that was iniured, and two to the common treaſurie. For he thought it too much ſhameleſſe boldnes, in no place to keepe in ones choller, and moreouer, that ſuch lacked ciuilitie and good manners: and yet altogether to ſuppreſſe and ſmother it, he knew it was not onely a hard matter, but to ſome natures vnpoſſible. And he that maketh lawes, muſt haue regard to the common poſſibilitie of men, if he will puniſh litle, with profitable example, and not much without ſome profit. So was he maruellouſly well thought of, for the law that he made touching wils and teſtaments. For before, men might not lawfully make their heyres whom they would, but the goods came to the children or kinred of the teſtator. But he leauing it at libertie, to diſpoſe their goods where they

they thought good, ſo they had no children of their owne: did therein preferre friendſhip before kindred, and good wil and fauor before neceſſitie and conſtraint, and ſo made euery one lord and maſter of his own goods. Yet he did not ſimply & alike allow of all ſorts of gifts, howſoeuer they were made (but thoſe only which were made by men of ſound memorie, or by thoſe whoſe wits failed them not by extreame ſicknes, or through drinkes, medicines, poiſonings, charmes, or other ſuch violence and extraordinarie meanes, neither yet through the intiſements and perſwaſions of women. As thinking very wiſely, there was no difference at all between thoſe that were euidently forced by conſtraint, and thoſe that were compaſſed & wrought by ſubornation at length to do a thing againſt their will, taking fraud in this caſe equall with violence, and pleaſure with ſorrow, as paſſions with madnes, which commonly haue as much force the one as the other, to draw and driue men from reaſon. He made another law alſo, in which he appointed women their times to go abroade into the fields, their mourning, their feaſts and ſacrifices, plucking from them all diſorder and wilfull libertie, which they vſed before. For he did forbid that they ſhould carrie out of the citie with them aboue three gownes, and to take victuals with them aboue the value of an halfe penny, neither basket nor pannier aboue a cubite high: and ſpecially he did forbid them to go in the night, other then in their coach, and that a torch ſhould be caried before them. He did forbid them alſo at the buriall of the dead, to teare and ſpoile themſelues with blowes, to make lamentations in verſes, to weepe at the funerals of a ſtranger not being their kinſeman, to ſacrifice an oxe on the graue of the dead, to burie aboue three gownes with the corſe, to go to other mens graues, but at the very time of burying the corſe: all which or the moſt part of them, are forbidden by our lawes at this day. Moreouer, thoſe lawes appoint a penaltie vpon ſuch women as offend in the ſame, to be diſtrained for, by certain officers expreſly named, to controle and reforme the abuſes of women, as womaniſh perſons and faint harted, which ſuffer themſelues to be ouercome with ſuch paſſions and fondneſſe in their mourning. And perceiuing that the citie of ATHENS began to repleniſh daily more and more, by mens repairing thither from all parts, and by reaſon of the great aſſured ſafetie and liberty that they found there: and alſo conſidering how the greateſt part of the Realme became in manner heathie, and was very barren, and that men traffiquing the ſeas, are not wont to bring any merchandize to thoſe which can giue them nothing againe in exchange: he began to practiſe that his citizens ſhould giue themſelues vnto crafts and occupations, and made a law, that the ſonne ſhould not be bound to relieue his father being old, vnleſſe he had ſet him in his youth to ſome occupation. It was a wiſe part of Lycurgus (who dwelt in a citie where was no reſort of ſtrangers, and had ſo great a territorie, as could haue furniſhed twiſe as many people, as Euripides ſaith, and moreouer on all ſides was enuironed with a great number of ſlaues of the ILOTES, whom it was needfull to keepe ſtill in labour and worke continually) to haue his citizens alwayes occupied in exerciſes of feates of armes, without making them to learne any other ſcience, but diſcharged them of all other miſerable occupations and handy-craftes. But Solon framing his lawes vnto things, and not things vnto lawes, when he ſaw the countrey of ATTICA ſo leane and barren, that it could hardly bring forth to ſuſtaine thoſe that tilled the ground onely, and therefore much more impoſſible to keepe ſo great a multitude of idle people as were in ATHENS: thought it very requiſite to ſet vp occupations, and to giue them countenance and eſtimation. Therefore he ordained, that the counſell of the Areopagites, ſhould haue full power and authoritie to enquire how euery man liued in the citie, and alſo to puniſh ſuch as they found idle people, and did not labour. But this was thought too ſeuere and ſtraight a law which he ordained (as Heraclides Ponticus writeth) that the children borne of common harlots and ſtrumpets ſhould not be bound to relieue their fathers. For he that maketh no accompt of matrimonie, plainely ſheweth that he tooke not a wife to haue children, but onely to ſatisfie his luſt and pleaſure: and ſo ſuch a one hath his iuſt reward, and is diſappointed of the reuerence that a father ought to haue of his children, ſince through his owne fault the birth of his child falleth out to his reproch. Yet to ſay truly, in Solons lawes touching women, there are many abſurdities, as they fall out ill fauouredly. For he maketh it lawfull for any man to kill an adulterer taking him with the fact. But he that rauiſheth or forcibly taketh away a free woman, is only condemned to pay a hundred ſiluer * drachmes. And he that was the Pandor to procure her, ſhould onely pay twentie drachmes. Vnleſſe ſhe had bene a common ſtrumpet or curtiſan: for ſuch do iuſtifie open acceſſe to all that will hire them. Furthermore, he doth forbid any perſon to ſel his daughters or ſiſters, vnleſſe the father or brother had taken them, abuſing themſelues before mariage. Me thinketh it is far from purpoſe and reaſon, with ſeueritie to puniſh a thing in one place, and ouer lightly to paſſe it ouer in another: or to ſet ſome light fine on ones head for a great fault, and after to diſcharge him, as it were but a matter of ſport. Vnleſſe they will excuſe it thus, that money being very hard and ſcant at that time in ATHENS, thoſe fines were then very great and grieuous to pay. For in ſetting out the charges of offerings which ſhould be made in ſacrifices, he appointed a weather to be a conuenient offering, and he ſetteth a buſhell of corne at a ſiluer drachme. More he ordained, that they which wonne any of the games at ATHENS, ſhould pay to the common treaſurie an hundred drachmes. And thoſe that wonne any of the games Olympicall, fiue hundred drachmes. Alſo he appointed that he which brought a he woolfe, ſhould haue fiue drachmes, and him one drachme for reward of a ſhe woolfe. Whereof as Demetrius Valerian writeth, the one was the price of an oxe, and the other of a mutton. For, touching the rates he ordained in the ſixteenth table of his lawes meete for burnt ſacrifices, it is likely he did rate them at a much higher price, then ordinarily they were worth: and yet notwithſtanding, the price which he ſetteth, is very litle in compariſon of that which they are worth at this day. Now it was a cuſtome euer amongſt the ATHENIANS to kill their woolues, becauſe all their countrey lay for paſture, and not for tillage. Some there be that ſay, the tribes of the peopeople of ATHENS haue not bene called after the names of the children of Ion, as the common opinion hath bene: but that they were called after their diuers trades and maners of liuing, which they tooke themſelues vnto from the beginning. For, ſuch as gaue themſelues vnto the warres, were called Oplites: as who would ſay, men of armes. Thoſe that wrought in their occupations, were called Ergades: as much to ſay, as men of occupation. The other two which were husbandmen, and followed the plough, were called Teleontes: as you would ſay, laboring men. And thoſe that kept beaſts and cattell, were called Ægicores: as much to ſay, as heardmen. Now, foraſmuch as the whole prouince of ATTICA was very drie, and had great lacke of water, being not full of riuers, running ſtreames, nor lakes, nor yet ſtored with any great number of ſprings, in ſo much as they are driuen there to vſe (through the moſt part of the countrey) water drawne out of welles made with mens hands: he made ſuch an order, that where there was any Well within the ſpace of an Hippicon, that euery body within that circuite, might come and draw water onely at that Well, for his vſe and neceſſitie. Hippicon is the diſtance of foure furlongs, which is halfe a mile: and thoſe that dwell further off, ſhould go ſeek their water in other places where they would. But if they had digged ten yards deepe in their ground, & could find no water in the bottome, in this caſe, they might lawfully go to their next neighbors well, and take a pot full of water containing ſixe gallons, twiſe a day: iudging it great reaſon that neceſſitie ſhould be holpen, but not that idleneſſe ſhould be cheriſhed. He appointed alſo the ſpaces that ſhould be kept and obſerued by thoſe that would ſet or plant trees in their ground, as being a man very skilfull in theſe matters. For he ordained, that whoſoeuer would plant any kind of trees in his ground, he ſhould ſet them fiue foote aſunder one from another: but for the fig tree and oliue tree ſpecially, that they ſhould in any caſe be nine foote aſunder, becauſe theſe two trees do ſpread out their branches farre off, and they cannot ſtand neare other trees but they muſt needes hurt them very much. For beſides that they draw away the ſap that doth nouriſh the other trees, they caſt alſo a certaine moiſture and ſteame vpon them, that is very hurtfull and incommodious. More he ordained, that whoſoeuer would digge a pit or hole in his ground, ſhould digge it as farre off from his neighbours pit, as the pit he digged was in depth to the bottome. And he that would ſet vp a hiue of bees in his ground, he ſhould ſet them at the leaſt three hundred foote from other hiues ſet about him before. And of the fruites of the earth, he was contented they ſhould tranſport and ſell onely oyle out of the Realme to ſtrangers, but no other fruite or graine. He ordained that the gouernour of the citie ſhould yearely proclaime open curſes againſt thoſe that ſhould do to the contrarie, or elſe he himſelfe making default therein, ſhould be fined at a hundred drachmes. This ordinance is in the firſt table of Solons lawes, and therefore we may not altogether diſcredite thoſe which ſay, they did forbid in the old time that men ſhould carie figges out of the countrey of ATTICA, and that from thence it came that theſe picke-thankes, which bewray and accuſe them that tranſported figges, were called Sycophantes. He made another law alſo againſt the hurt that beaſts might do vnto men. Wherein he ordained, that if a dogge did bite any man, he that ought him ſhould deliuer to him that was bitten, his dogge tied to a logge of timber of foure cubites long: and this was a very good deuiſe, to make men ſafe from dogs. But he was very ſtraight in one law he

he made, that no ſtranger might be made denizen & free man of the citie of ATHENS, vnleſſe he were a baniſhed man for euer out of his countrey, or elſe that he ſhould come and dwell there with all his family, to exerciſe ſome craft or ſcience. Notwithſtanding, they ſay he made not this law ſo much to put ſtrangers from their freedome there, as to draw them thither, aſſuring them by this ordinance, they might come and be free of the citie: and he thought moreouer, that both the one and the other would be more faithfull to the common weale of ATHENS. The one of thē, for that againſt their wils they were driuen to forſake their country: & the other ſort, for that aduiſedly and willingly they were contented to forſake it. This alſo was another of Solons lawes, which he ordained for thoſe that ſhould feaſt certain daies at the towne houſe of the city, at other mens coſt. For he would not allow that one man ſhould come often to feaſts there. And if any man were inuited thither to the feaſt, and did refuſe to come: he did ſet a fine on his head, as reproouing the miſerable niggardlines of the one, and the preſumptuous arrogancie of the other, to contemne and deſpiſe common order. After he had made his lawes, he did ſtabliſh them to continue for the ſpace of one hundred yeares, and they were written in tables of wood called Axones, which were made more long then broad, in the which they were grauen: whereof there remaine ſome monuments yet in our time, which are to be ſeen in the towne hall of the city of ATHENS. Ariſtotle ſaith, that theſe tables were called Cyrbes. And Cratinus alſo the Comicall poet ſayth in one place, of Solon & Dracon: that Cyrbes was a veſſell or pan wherein they did frie millet or hirſe. Howbeit others ſay, that Cyrbes properly were the tables, which contained the ordinances of the ſacrifices: and Axones were the other tables, that concerned the common weale. So, all the counſels and magiſtrates together did ſweare, that they would keepe Solons lawes themſelues, and alſo cauſe them to be obſerued of others throughly and particularly. Then euery one of the Theſmothetes (which were certaine officers attendant on the counſell, and had ſpeciall charge to ſee the laws obſerued) did ſolemnly ſweare in the opē market place, neare the ſtone where the proclamations are proclaimed: & euery of them both promiſed, and vowed openly to keep the ſame laws, and that if any of them did in any one point breake the ſaid ordinances, then they were content that ſuch offender ſhould pay to the temple of Apollo, at the city of DELPHES, an image of fine gold, that ſhould way as much as himſelfe. Moreouer, Solon ſeeing the diſorder of the moneths, and the mouing of the Moon, which followed not the courſe of the Sunne, and vſed not to riſe and fall when the ſunne doth, but oft times in one day, it doth both touch and paſſe the ſunne: he was the firſt that called the change of the Moone, Enē caì néa, as much to ſay, as old & new moon. Allowing that which appeared before the coniunction, to be of the moneth paſt: and that which ſhewed it ſelfe after the coniunction, to be of the moneth following. And he was the firſt alſo (in my opinion) that vnderſtood Homer rightly, when he ſaid: then beginneth the moneth when it endeth. The day following the change, he called Neomenia, as much to ſay, that the new moneth or the new moon. After the twentith day of the moneth which they called Icada, he reckned not the reſt of the moneth, as increaſing, but as in the wane; and gathered it by ſeeing the light of the moone decreaſing vntil the thirtieth day. Now after his lawes were come abroad, & proclaimed, there came ſome daily vnto him, which either praiſed them, or miſliked them, and praied him either to take away, or to adde ſomething vnto them. Many againe came and asked him, how he vnderſtood ſome ſentence of his laws: and requeſted him to declare his meaning, and how it ſhould be taken. Wherefore conſidering how it were to no purpoſe to refuſe to do it, and againe how it would get him much enuie and ill will to yeeld thereunto: he determined (happen what would) to wind himſelfe out of theſe briers, and to flie the gronings, complaints, and quarrels of his citizens. For he ſaith himſelfe:

Full hard it is, all minds content to haue,
and ſpecially in matters hard and graue.

So, to conuey himſelf a while out of the way, he took vpon him to be maſter of a ſhip in a certaine voyage, & asked licence for ten yeares of the ATHENIANS to go beyond ſea, hoping by that time the ATHENIANS would be very well acquainted with his lawes. So went he to the ſeas, and the firſt place of his arriuall was in ÆGYPT, where he remained a while, as he himſelfe ſayth.

rehearse the story of the Iles ATLANTIDES as Plato writeth, he proued to put the same into verse, and did send it abroad through GREECE. At his departure out of ÆGYPT he went into CYPRVS, where he had great courtesie and friendship of one of the Princes of that country, called Philocyprus, who was lord of a pretie litie citie which Demophon (Theseus sonne) caused to be built vpon the riuer of Clarie, and was of a goodly strong situation, but in a very leane and barren countrey. Whereupon Solon told him, it would do better a great deale to remoue it out of that place, into a very faire and pleasant valley that lay vnderneath it, and there to make it larger and statelier then it was: which was done according to his perswasion. And Solons selfe being present at it, was made ouerseer of the buildings, which he did help to deuise and order in good sort, aswell in respect of pleasure, as for force & defence: insomuch as many people came from other places to dwel there. And herein many other Lords of the country did follow the example of this Philocyprus, who to honor Solon, called this citie SOLES, which before was called ÆPIA. Solon in his Elegies maketh mention of this foundation, directing his wordes vnto Philocyprus, as followeth:

Clarius fl.

AEpia called Soles.

So graunt the gods, that thou, and thine of-spring,
may clime to great and passing princely state:
long time to liue, in Soles flourishing.
And that they graunt, my ship and me good gate
when I from hence, by seas shall take my way:
that with her harpe, dame Venus do vouchsafe to wafte me still, vntill she may conuey
my selfe againe, into my countrey safe.
Since I haue bene, the onely meane and man, which here to build, this citie first began.

And as for the meeting and talke betwixt him and king Cræsus, I know there are that by distance of time will proue it but a fable, and deuised of pleasure: but for my part I will not reiect, nor condemne so famous an historie, receiued and approoued by so many graue testimonies. Moreouer it is very agreeable to Solons manners and nature, and also not vnlike to his wisdome and magnanimitie: although in all points it agreeth not with certaine tables (which they call Chronicles) where they haue busily noted the order and course of times which euen to this day, many haue curiously sought to correct, and could yet neuer discusse it, nor accord all contrarieties and manifest repugnances in the same. Solon at the desire and request of Cræsus, went to see him in the citie of SARDIS. When Solon was come thither, he seemed to be in the selfe same taking that a man was once reported to be: who being borne and bred vp on the maine land, and had neuer seene the sea neither farre nor neare, did imagine euery riuer that he saw had bene the sea. So Solon passing alongst Cræsus pallace, and meeting by the way many of the Lords of his Court richly apparelled, and carying great traines of seruing men, and souldiours about them: thought euer that one of them had bene the King, vntill he was brought vnto Cræsus selfe. Who was passing richly arrayed, what for precious stones and iewels, and for rich coloured silkes, layed on with curious goldsmiths worke, and all to shew himselfe to Solon in most stately, sumptuous, and magnificent manner. Who perceiuing by Solons repaire to his presence, that he shewed no manner of signe, nor countenance of wondering, to see so great a state before him, neither had giuen out any word neare or likely to that which Cræsus looked for in his owne imagination, but rather had deliuered speeches for men of iudgement and vnderstanding to know, how inwardly he much did mislike Cræsus foolish vanitie and base mind: then Cræsus commaunded all his treasuries to be opened, where his gold and siluer lay: next, that they should shew him his rich and sumptuous wardrobes, although that needed not: for to see Cræsus selfe, it was enough to discerne his nature and condition. After he had seene all ouer and ouer, being brought againe vnto the presence of the King: Cræsus asked him, if euer he had seene any man more happie than himselfe was? Solon aunswered him, I haue: and that was one Tellus a citizen of ATHENS, who was a maruellous honest man, and had left his children behind him in good estimation, and well to liue: and lastly, was most happie at his death, by dying honourably in the field, in defence of his countrey. Cræsus hearing this answere, began to iudge him a man of litle wit, or of grosse vnderstanding, because he did not thinke, that to haue store of gold and siluer, was the onely ioy and felicitie of the world, and that he would preferre the life and death of a

meane and priuate man as more happie, then all the riches and power of ſo mighty a king. Notwithſtanding all this, Cræſus yet asked him again: What other man beſide Tellus he had ſeen happier then himſelf? Solon anſwered him, that he had ſeene Cleobis and Biton, which were both brethren, and loued one another ſingularly well, and their mother in ſuch ſort: that vpon a ſolemne feſtiuall day, when ſhe ſhould go to the temple of Iuno in her coach drawne with oxen: becauſe they taried too long ere they could be brought, they both willingly yoaked themſelues by the necks, & drue their mothers coach in ſtead of the oxen, which maruellouſly reioyced her, & ſhe was thought moſt happy of all other, to haue borne two ſuch ſons. Afterwards when they had done ſacrifice to the goddeſſe, & made good cheare at the feaſt of this ſacrifice, they went to bed: but they roſe not againe the next morning, for they were found dead without ſuffering hurt or ſorrow, after they had receiued ſo much glory and honor. Cræſus then could no longer bridle in his patience, but breaking out in choler, ſaid vnto him: Why, doſt thou recken me then in no degree of happy men? Solon would neither flatter him, nor further increaſe his heate, but anſwered him thus: O king of LYDIANS, the gods haue giuen vs GRECIANS all things in a meane, and amongſt other things chiefly, a baſe and popular wiſedom, not princely nor noble: which conſidering how mans life is ſubiect to infinit changes, doth forbid vs to truſt or glory in theſe worldly riches. For time bringeth daily misfortunes vnto man, which he neuer thought of, nor looked for. But when the gods haue continued a mans good fortune to his end, then we think that man happy and bleſſed, and neuer before. Otherwiſe, if we ſhould iudge a man happy that liueth, conſidering he is euer in danger of change during life: we ſhould be much like to him, who iudgeth him the victory before hand, that is ſtill a fighting, and may be ouercome, hauing no ſurety yet to cary it away. After Solon had ſpoken theſe words, he departed from the Kings preſence, and returned back againe, leauing king Cræſus offended, but nothing the wiſer, nor amended. Now Æſope that wrote the fables, being at that time in the city of SARDIS, and ſent for thither by the king, who entertained him very honorably: was very ſory to ſee that the king had giuen Solon no better entertainment: ſo by way of aduice he ſaid vnto him: O Solon, either we muſt not come to princes at all, or elſe we muſt ſeeke to pleaſe and content them. But Solon turning it to the contrarie, anſwered him: Either we muſt not come to princes, or elſe we muſt needs tell them truly, and counſell them for the beſt. So Cræſus made light account of Solon at that time. But after he had loſt the battell againſt Cyrus, and that his city was taken, himſelfe become priſoner, and was bound faſt to a gibbet, ouer a great ſtacke of wood, to be burnt in the ſight of all the PERSIANS, and of Cyrus his enemie: he then cryed out as loud as he could, thriſe together: O Solon! Cyrus being abaſhed, ſent to aske him, whether this Solon he onely cryed vpon in his extreame miſerie, was a god or man. Cræſus kept it not ſecret from him, but ſaid: he was one of the wiſe men of GRECE, whom I ſent for to come vnto me on a certaine time, not to learne any thing of him which I ſtood in need of, but only that he might witnes my felicitie, which then I did enioy: the loſſe whereof is now more hurtfull, then the enioying of the ſame was good or profitable. But now (alas) too late I know it, that the riches I poſſeſſed then, were but words and opinion, all which are turned now to my bitter ſorrow, and to preſent & remedileſſe calamitie. Which the wiſe GRECIAN conſidering then, and foreſeeing a farre off by my doings at that time, the inſtant miſerie I ſuffer now: gaue me warning I ſhould marke the end of my life, and that I ſhould not too farre preſume of my ſelfe, as puffed vp then with vaine glory of opinion of happineſſe, the ground thereof being ſo ſlippery, and of ſo litle ſuretie. Theſe words being reported vnto Cyrus, who was wiſer then Cræſus, and ſeeing Solons ſaying confirmed by ſo notable an example: he did not only deliuer Cræſus from preſent perill of death, but euer after honored him ſo long as he liued. Thus had Solon glory, for ſauing the honor of one of theſe Kings, and the life of the other, by his graue & wiſe counſell. But during the time of his abſence, great ſeditions roſe at ATHENS amongſt the inhabitants, who had gotten them ſeuerall heads amongſt them: as thoſe of the vallie had made Lycurgus their head. The coaſt men, Megacles, the ſonne of Alcmæon. And thoſe of the mountains, Pyſiſtratus: with whom all artificers and crafts men liuing of their handy labour were ioyned, which were the ſtouteſt againſt the rich. So that notwithſtanding the city kept Solons lawes and ordinances, yet was there not that man but gaped for a change, & deſired to ſee things in another ſtate: either parties hoping their condition would mend by change, and that euery of thē ſhould be better then their aduerſaries. The whole cōmon weale broiling thus with troubles Solon arriued at ATHENS, where euery man did honour and reuerence him: howbeit he was no more able to ſpeake aloud in open aſſembly to the people, nor to deale in matters as he had done before, becauſe his age would not ſuffer him: and therfore he ſpake with euery one of the heads of the ſeuerall factions a part, trying if he could agree and reconcile them together againe. Wherunto Pyſiſtratus ſeemed to be more willing then any of the reſt, for he was courteous, and maruellous faire ſpoken, and ſhewed himſelfe beſides, very good and pitifull to the poore, and temperate alſo to his enemies: further, if any good quality were lacking in him, he did ſo finely counterfeit it, that men imagined it was more in him, then in thoſe that naturally had it in them indeed. As to be a quiet man, no medler, contented with his owne, aſpiring no higher, and hating thoſe which would attempt to change the preſent ſtate of the common weale, and would practiſe any innouation. By this art and fine maner of his, he deceiued the poore common people. Howbeit Solon found him ſtraight, and ſaw the marke he ſhot at: but yet hated him not at that time, and ſought ſtill to win him, and bring him to reaſon, ſaying oft times, both to himſelf and to others: That who ſo could plucke out of his head the worme of ambition, by which he aſpired to be the chiefeſt, and could heale him of his greedy deſire to rule: there could not be a man of more vertue, or a better citizen then he would proue. About this time began Theſpis to ſet out his tragedies, which was a thing that much delighted the people for the rareneſſe therof, being not many Poets yet in number, to ſtriue one againſt another for victory, as afterwards there were. Solon being naturally deſirous to heare and learne, and by reaſon of his age ſeeking to paſſe his time away in ſports, in muſick, & making good cheare more then euer he did: went one day to ſee Theſpis, who plaid a part himſelf, as the old faſhion of the Poets was, and after the play was ended, he called him to him, & asked him: if he were not aſhamed to lye ſo openly in the face of the world. Theſpis anſwered him, that it was not materiall to do or ſay any ſuch things, conſidering all was but in ſport. Then Solon beating the ground with his ſtaffe he had in his hand: but if we cõmend lying in ſport (quoth he) we ſhal find it afterwards in good earneſt, in all our bargains & dealings. Shortly after Pyſiſtratus hauing wounded himſelf, and bloudied all his body ouer, cauſed his men to carry him in his coach into the market place, where he put the people in an vprore, & told thẽ that they were his enemies that thus traiterouſly had handled and arrayed him, for that he ſtood with thẽ about the gouerning of the common weale: inſomuch as many of them were maruellouſly offended, & mutined by and by, crying out, it was ſhamefully done. Then Solon drawing neere ſaid vnto him: O thou ſon of Hippocrates, thou doeſt ilfauouredly counterfet the perſon of Homers Vlyſſes: for thou haſt whipped thy ſelf to deceiue thy citizens, as he did teare & ſcratch himſelf, to deceiue his enemies. Notwithſtanding this, the common people were ſtill in vprore, being readie to take armes for Pyſiſtratus: and there was a generall counſell aſſembled, in the which one Ariſton ſpake, that they ſhould graunt fiftie men, to carry halbards and maſes before Pyſiſtratus for guard of his perſon. But Solon going vp into the pulpit for orations, ſtourly inueyed againſt it: & perſwaded the people with many reaſõs, like vnto theſe he wrote afterwards in verſe:

Pyſiſtratus vvicked craft and ſubtiltie.

Theſpis a maker of tragedies

Solon reproued Theſpis for lying.

Ech one of you (o men) in priuate actes can play the foxe, for ſlie and ſubtill craft:
But when you come, vfore (in all your facts)
then are you blind, dull witted and bedaft:
For pleaſant ſpeech and painted flatterie, beguile you ſtill, the which you neuer ſpie.

But in the end, ſeeing the poore people did tumult ſtill, taking Pyſiſtratus part, and that the rich fled here and there, he went his way alſo, ſaying: he had ſhewed himſelfe wiſer then ſome, & hardier then other. Meaning, wiſer then thoſe which ſaw not Pyſiſtratus reach and fetch: and hardier then they which knew very well he did aſpire to be king, and neuertheleſſe durſt not reſiſt him. The people went on with the motion of Ariſton, and authoriſed the ſame, touching the graunt of halbarders: limiting no number, but ſuffered him to haue about him, and to aſſemble as many as he would, vntill ſuch time as he had gotten poſſeſſion of the caſtle. Then the city was maruellouſly afraid and amazed: and preſently Megacles, and all thoſe which were of the houſe of the Alcmeonides did flie. Solon, who for yeares was now at his laſt caſt, and had no man to ſticke vnto him: went notwithſtanding into the market place, and ſpake to the citizens whom he found there, and rebuked their beaſtlineſſe, and faint cowardly hearts, and encouraged them, not to loſe their liberty. He ſpake at that time notably, and worthy memorie, which euer after was remembred. Before, ſaid he, you might more eaſily haue ſtaid this preſent tyranny: but now that it is already fashioned, you shall win more glory, vtterly to suppresse it. But for all his goodly reasons, he found no man that would hearken vnto him, they were all so amazed. Wherefore he hied him home againe, and tooke his weapons out of his house, and laid them before his gate in the middest of the street, saying: For my part, I haue done what I can possible, to helpe and defend the lawes and liberties of my countrey. So from that time he betooke himselfe vnto his ease, and neuer after dealt any more in matters of state, or common weale. His friends did counsell him to flye: but all they could not perswade him to it. For he kept his house, and gaue himself to make verses: in which he sore reproued the ATHENIANS faults, saying: Solons libertie and constancie.

If presently your burden heauie be:
yet murmure not against the gods therefore.
The fault is yours, as you your selues may see,
which graunted haue of mighty Mars the lore to such as now, by your direction
do hold your neckes in this subiection.

His friends hereupon did warne him, to beware of such speeches, and to take heed what he said: lest if it came vnto the tyrants eares, he might put him to death for it. And further, they asked him wherein he trusted, that he spake so boldly. He answered them, in my age. Howbeit Pysistratus after he had obtained his purpose, sending for him vpon his word and faith, did honour and entertaine him so well, that Solon in the end became one of his counsell, and approoued many things which he did. For Pysistratus himselfe did straightly keepe, and caused his friends to keepe Solons lawes. Insomuch as when he was called by proces into the court of the Areopagites for a murther, euen at that time when he was a tyrant: he presented himselfe very modestly to answer his accusation, and to purge himselfe thereof. But his accuser let fall the matter, and followed it no further. Pysistratus himselfe also did make new lawes: as this. That he that had bene maimed, and made lame of any member in the wars, should be maintained all his life long at the common charges of the citie. The selfe same was before decreed by Thersippus (as Heraclides writeth) by Solons perswasion: who did preferre it to the counsell. Pysistratus afterwards tooke hold of the motion, and from thencefoorth made it a generall law. Theophrastus saith also, it was Pysistratus, and not Solon, that made the law for idlenesse: which was the onely cause that the country of ATTICA became more fruitfull, being better manured: and the citie of ATHENS waxed more quiet. But Solon hauing begun to write the story of the Isles ATLANTIDES in verse (which he had learned of the wise men of the citie of SAIS in EGYPT, and was very necessary for the ATHENIANS) grew wearie, and gaue it ouer in mid way: not for any matters or businesse that troubled him, as Plato said, but only for his age, and because he feared the tediousnesse of the worke. For otherwise he had leysure enough, as appeareth by these verses, where he saith: A good Lawe for reward of seruice.

I grow old, and yet I learne still.

And in another place where he saith:

Now Venus yeelds me sweet delights, and Bacchus lends me comfort still:
the Muses eke refresh my sprights,
and much releeue my weary will.
These be the points of perfect ease,
which all mens minds oft times do please.

Plato afterwards for beautifying of the story and fables of the Isles ATLANTIDES, was desirous to dilate them out at length, as if he would by way of speech haue broken vp a field or lay land of his owne, or that this gift had descended to him of right from Solon. He began to raise vp a stately front vnto the same, and enclosed it with high wals, and large squared courts at the entry thereof: such was it, as neuer any other worke, fable or poeticall inuention had euer so notable, or the like. But because he began a litle too late, he ended his life before his worke, leauing the readers more sorrowfull for that was left vnwritten, then they tooke pleasure in that they found written. For euen as in the citie of ATHENS, the temple of Iupiter Olympian only remained vnperfect: so the wisedome of Plato (amongest many goodly matters of his that haue come abroad) left none of them vnperfect, but the only tale of the Isles ATLANTIDES. Solon liued long time after Pysistratus had vsurped the tyranny, as Heraclides Ponticus writeth. Howbeit Phanias Ephesian writeth, that he liued not aboue two yeares after. For Pysistratus vsurped tyrannicall power in the yeare that Comias was chiefe gouernor in ATHENS. And Phanias writeth, that Solon dyed in the yeare that Hegeſtratus was gouernour, which was the next yeare after that. And where ſome ſay, the aſhes of his body were after his death ſtrawed abroad through the Iſle of SALAMINA: that ſeemeth to be but a fable, and altogether vntrue. Neuertheleſſe it hath bene written by many notable authors, and amongſt others, by Ariſtotle the Philoſopher.

The end of Solons life.

THE LIFE OF PVBLIVS Valerius Publicola.

The houſe of P. Valerius.

NOW we haue declared what Solon was, we haue thought good to compare him with Publicola, to whom the ROMAINE people for an honour gaue that ſurname: for he was called before Publius Valerius, deſcended from that auncient Valerius, who was one of the chiefeſt workers and meanes, to bring the ROMAINES and the SABYNES that were mortall enemies, to ioyne together as one people. For it was he that moſt mooued the two Kings to agree, and ioyne together. Publicola being deſcended of him, whileſt the Kings did rule yet at ROME, was in very great eſtimation, as well for his eloquence as for his riches: vſing the one rightly & freely for the maintenance of iuſtice, and the other liberally and courteouſly, for the releefe of the poore. So that it was manifeſt, if the Realme came to be conuerted into a publike ſtate, he ſhould be one of the chiefeſt men of the ſame. It chanced that king Tarquine ſurnamed the proud, being come to the crowne by no good lawfull meane, but contrarily by indirect and wicked waies, and behauing himſelf not like a King, but like a cruell tyrant; the people much hated and deteſted him, by reaſon of the death of Lucretia (which killed her ſelfe for that ſhe was forcibly rauiſhed by him) and ſo the whole city roſe and rebelled againſt him. Lucius Brutus taking vpon him to be the head and captaine of this inſurrection and rebellion, did ioyne firſt with this Valerius: who did greatly fauour and aſſiſt his enterpriſe, and did helpe him to driue out king Tarquine with all his houſe and familie. Now whileſt they were thinking that the people would chooſe ſome one alone to be chiefe ruler ouer them, in ſteade of a king: Valerius kept himſelfe quiet, as yeelding willingly vn-

to Brutus the firſt place, who was meeteſt for it, hauing bene the chiefe author and worker of their recouered liberty. But when they ſaw the name of Monarchy (as much to ſay, as ſoueraignty alone) was diſpleaſant to the people, & that they would like better to haue the rule deuided vnto two, and how for this cauſe they would rather chooſe two Conſuls: Valerius then began to hope, he ſhould be the ſecond perſon with Brutus. Howbeit this hope failed him. For againſt Brutus wil, Tarquinius Collatinus (the husband of Lucretia) was choſen Conſul with him: not becauſe he was a man of greater vertue, or of better eſtimation then Valerius. But the noble men of the city fearing the practiſes of thoſe of the Kings bloud, which ſought by all the faire and flattering means they could to returne againe into the city: did determine to make ſuch a one Conſul, whom occaſion forced to be their hard and heauie enemie, perſwading themſelues that Tarquinius Collatinus would for no reſpect yeeld vnto them. Valerius tooke this matter grieuouſly, that they had a miſtruſt in him, as if he would not do any thing he could, for the benefit of his countrie: for that he had neuer any priuate iniurie offered him by the tyrants. Wherefore he repaired no more vnto the Senate to pleade for priuate men, and wholly gaue vp to meddle in matters of ſtate: inſomuch as he gaue many occaſion to thinke of his abſence, and it troubled ſome men much, who feared leſt vpon this his miſliking and withdrawing, he would fall to the Kings ſide, & ſo bring all the city in an vprore, conſidering it ſtood then but in very tickle termes. But when Brutus, who ſtood in ielouſie of ſome, wold by oath be aſſured of the Senate, and had appointed them a day ſolemnly to take their oathes vpon the ſacrifices: Valerius then with a good cheerefull countenance came into the market place, and was the firſt that tooke his oath he wold leaue nothing vndone that might preiudice the Tarquines, but with all his able power he would fight againſt them, and defend the liberty of the city. This oath of his maruellouſly reioyced the Senate, and gaue great aſſurance alſo to the Conſuls, but ſpecially, becauſe his deeds did ſhortly after performe his words. For there came ambaſſadours to ROME which brought letters from king Tarquine, full of ſweet and lowly ſpeeches to win the fauor of the people, with commiſſion to vſe all the mildeſt meanes they could, to dulce and ſoften the hardned harts of the multitude: who declared how the king had left all pride and cruelty, and meant to aske nought but reaſonable things. The Conſuls thought beſt to giue them open audience, and to ſuffer them to ſpeake to the people. But Valerius was againſt it, declaring it might perill the ſtate much, and deliuer occaſion of new ſtir vnto a multitude of poore people, which were more afraid of wars, then of tyranny. After that, there came other ambaſſadours alſo, which ſaid that Tarquine would from thencefoorth for euer giue ouer and renounce his title to the kingdome, and to make any more wars, but beſought them only, that they would at the leaſt deliuer him and his friends their mony and goods, that they might haue wherwithall to keepe them in their baniſhment. Many came on a pace, and were very ready to yeeld to this requeſt, and ſpecially Collatinus, one of the Conſuls who did fauor their motion. But Brutus that was a faſt and reſolute man, and very fierce in his heate, ran immediatly into the market place, crying out that his fellow Conſull was a traitor, and contented to grant the tyrants matter and meanes to make war vpon the city, where indeed they deſerued not ſo much, as to be relieued in their exile. Hereupon the people aſſembled together, and the firſt that ſpake in this aſſembly, was a priuat man called Gaius Minutius, who ſpeaking vnto Brutus, and to the whole aſſembly, ſaid vnto them: O noble Conſull and Senate, handle ſo the matter, that the tyrants goods be rather in your cuſtody to make war with them, then in theirs to bring war vpon your ſelues. Notwithſtanding the ROMAINES were of opinion, that hauing gotten the liberty, for which they fought with the tyrants, they ſhould not diſappoint the offred peace, with keeping backe their goods, but rather they ſhould throw their goods out after them. Howbeit this was the leaſt part of Tarquines intent, to ſeek his goods againe: but vnder pretence of that demand, he ſecretly corrupted the people, and practiſed treaſon, which his ambaſſadours followed, pretending only to get the kings goods and his fauorers together, ſaying, that they had already ſold ſome part, and ſome part they kept, and ſent them daily. So as by delaying the time in this ſort with ſuch pretences, they had corrupted two of the beſt and ancienteſt houſes of the city: to wit, the family of the Aquilians, whereof there were three Senators: and the family of the Vitellians, wherof there were two Senators: all which by their mothers, were Conſul Collatinus nephewes. The Vitellians alſo were allied vnto Brutus, for he had maried their own ſiſter, and had many children by her. Of the which the Vitellians had drawn to their ſtring, two of the eldeſt of them, becauſe they familiarly frequented together, being coſin germains, whom they had entiſed to be of their conſpiracie, allying them with the houſe of the Tarquines, which was of great power, and through the which they might perſwade themſelues to riſe to great honour and preferment by means of the king, rather then to truſt to their fathers wilful hardneſſe: for they called his ſeueritie to the wicked, hardneſſe: for that he would neuer pardon any. Furthermore, Brutus had fained himſelfe mad, and a foole of long time for ſafety of his life, becauſe the tyrants ſhould not put him to death: ſo that the name of Brutus only remained. After theſe two yong men had giuen their conſent to be of the confederacie, & had ſpoken with the Aquilians: they all thought good to be bound one to another, with a great and horrible oath, drinking the bloud of a man, & ſhaking hands in his bowels, whom they would ſacrifice. This matter agreed vpon betweene them, they met together to put their ſacrifice in execution, in the houſe of the Aquilians. They had fitly pickt out a dark place in the houſe to do this ſacrifice in, & where almoſt no body came: yet it hapned by chance, that one of the ſeruants of the houſe called Vindicius, had hidden himſelfe there, vnknowing to the traitors, and of no ſet purpoſe, to ſpie and ſee what they did, or that he had any manner of inkling thereof before: but falling by chance vpon the matter, euen as the traitors came into that place with a countenance to do ſome ſecret thing of importance, fearing to be ſeene, he kept himſelf cloſe, and lay behind a coffer that was there, ſo that he ſaw all that was done, and what they ſaid and determined. The concluſion of their counſell in the end was this, that they would kil both the Conſuls: and they wrote letters to Tarquinius aduertiſing the ſame, which they gaue vnto his ambaſſadors, being lodged in the houſe of the Aquilians, and were preſent at this concluſion. With this determination they departed from thence, and Vindicius came out alſo as ſecretly as he could, being maruellouſly troubled in mind, and at a maze how to deale in this matter. For he thought it daungerous (as it was indeed) to go and accuſe the two ſonnes vnto the father (which was Brutus) of ſo wicked and deteſtable a treaſon, and the nephewes vnto their vncle, which was Collatinus. On the other ſide alſo, he thought this was a ſecret, not to be imparted to any priuate perſon, and not poſſible for him to conceale it, that was bound in dutie to reueale it. So he reſolued at the laſt to go to Valerius to bewray this treaſon, of a ſpeciall affection to this man, by reaſon of his gentle and courteous vſing of men, giuing eaſie acceſſe and audience vnto any that came to ſpeake with him, and ſpecially for that he diſdained not to heare poore mens cauſes. Vindicius being gone to ſpeake with him, and hauing told him the whole conſpiracie before his brother Marcus Valerius, and his wife, he was abaſhed and fearefull withall: whereupon he ſtayed him leſt he ſhould ſlip away, and locked him in a chamber, charging his wife to watch the doore, that no body went in nor out vnto him. And willed his brother alſo, that he ſhould go and beſet the Kings palace round about, to intercept theſe letters if it were poſſible, and to ſee that none of their ſeruants fled. Valerius ſelfe being followed (according to his manner) with a great traine of his friends and people that waited on him, went ſtraight vnto the houſe of the Aquilians, who by chance were from home at that time: and entring in at the gate, without let or trouble of any man, he found the letters in the chamber, where king Tarquines ambaſſadors lay. Whilſt he was thus occupied, the Aquilians hauing intelligence thereof, ran home immediatly, and found Valerius comming out at their gate. So they would haue taken thoſe letters from him by force and ſtrong hand: but Valerius and his company did reſiſt them, and moreouer hudded them with their gownes ouer their heades, and by force brought them (do what they could) into the market place. The like was done alſo in the Kings palace, where Marcus Valerius found other letters alſo wrapt vp in certaine fardels for their more ſafe cariage, and brought away with him by force into the market place, all the Kings ſeruants he found there. There the Conſuls hauing cauſed ſilence to be made, Valerius ſent home to his houſe for this bondman Vindicius, to be brought before the Conſuls: then the traitours were openly accuſed, and their letters read, and they had not the face to aunſwer one word. All that were preſent, being amazed, hung downe their heads, and beheld the ground, and not a man durſt once open his mouth to ſpeake, excepting a fewe, who to gratifie Brutus, beganne to ſay that they ſhould baniſh them: and Collatinus alſo gaue them ſome hope, becauſe he fell to weeping, and Valerius in like manner for that he held his peace. But Brutus calling his ſonnes by their names: Come on (ſaid he) Titus and thou Valerius, why do you not aunſwer to that you are accuſed of? and hauing ſpoken thriſe vnto them to aunſwere, when he ſawe they ſtoode mute, and ſaid nothing: he turned him to the Sergeants, and ſaid vnto them: They are now in your handes, do iuſtice. So ſoone as he had ſpoken theſe words, the Sergeants layed hold imme-immediatly vpon the two yong men, and tearing their clothes off their backs, bound their hands behind them, and then whipped them with rods: which was such a pitifull sight to all the people, that they could not find in their hearts to behold it, but turned themselues another way, because they would not see it. But contrariwise, they say that their own father had neuer his eye off them, neither did chaunge his austere and fierce countenance, with any pitie or naturall affection towards them, but stedfastly did behold the punishment of his owne children, vntill they were laied flat on the ground, and both their heads striken off with an axe before him. When they were executed, Brutus rose from the bench, and left the execution of the rest vnto his fellow Consull. This was such an act, as men cannot sufficiently praise, nor reprooue enough. For either it was his excellent vertue, that made his mind so quiet, or else the greatnesse of his miserie that tooke away the feeling of his sorrow: whereof neither the one nor the other was any small matter, but passing the common nature of man, that hath in it both diuinenesse, and sometime beastly brutishnesse. But it is better the iudgement of men should commend his fame, then that the affection of men by their iudgements should diminish his vertue. For the Romaines hold opinion, it was not so great an act done of Romulus first to build Rome, as it was for Brutus to recouer Rome, and the best libertie thereof, and to renew the auncient gouernement of the same. When Brutus was gone, all the people in the market place remained as they had bene in a maze, full of feare and wonder, and a great while without speaking to see what was done. The Aquilians straight grew bold, for that they saw the other Consull Collatinus proceede gently, and midly against them: and so made petition they might haue time giuen them to answer to the articles they were accused of, and that they might haue their slaue and bondman Vindicius deliuered into their hands, because there was no reason, he should remaine with their accusers. The Consull seemed willing to yeeld thereto, and was readie to breake vp the assembly thereupon. But Valerius said, he would not deliuer Vindicius (who was among the assembly that attended vpon his person:) and staied the people besides for departing away, least they should negligently let those escape that had so wickedly sought to betray their countrey: vntill he himselfe had laied hands vpon them, calling vpon Brutus to assist him, with open exclamation against Collatinus, that he did not behaue himselfe like a iust and true man, seeing his fellow Brutus was forced for iustice sake to see his owne sonnes put to death: and he in contrarie manner, to pleasea few women, sought to let go manifest traitours, and open enemies to their countrey. The Consull being offended herewith, commaunded they should bring away the bondman Vindicius. So the sergeants making way through the preasse, laid hands vpon him to bring him away with them, and began to strike at them which offered to resist them. But Valerius friends stept out before thē, & put them by. The people showted straight, and cried out for Brutus: who with this noise returned againe into the market place, and after silence made him, he spake in this wise: For mine own children, I alone haue bene their sufficient Iudge, to see them haue the law according to their deseruings: the rest I haue left freely to the iudgement of the people. Wherefore (said he) if any man be disposed to speake, let him stand vp, and perswade the people as he thinketh best. Then there needed no more words, but only to hearken what the people cried: who with one voice and consent condēned them, & cried execution, & accordingly they had their heads strikē off. Now was Consull Collatinus long before had in some suspition, as allied to the kings, & disliked for his surname, because he was called Tarquinius: who perceiuing himself in this case much hated and mistrusted of the people, voluntarily yeelded vp his Consulship, and departed the citie. The people then assembled themselues, to place a successour in his roome: they chose Valerius in his stead, without the contradiction of any, for his faithful trauel and diligence bestowed in this great matter. Then Valerius iudging that Vindicius the bondman had wel deserued also some recompence, caused him not onely to be manumissed by the whole graunt of the people, but made him a free man of the citie besides: and he was the first bondman manumissed, that was made citizen of Rome, with permission also to giue his voice in all elections of officers, in any companie or tribe he would be enrolled in. Long time after that, and very lately, Appius to currie fauour with the common people, made it lawful for bondmen manumissed, to giue their voices also in elections, as other citizens did: and vnto this day the perfect manumissing and freeing of bondmen, is called Vindicta, after the name of this Vindicius, that was then made a free man. These things thus passed ouer, the goods of the kings were giuen to the spoile of the people, and their palaces were razed and ouerthrowne. Now amongst other lands, the goodliest part of the field of Mars was belonging vnto king Tarquine: the same they consecrated forthwith, vnto the god Mars, and not long before they had cut downe the wheat thereof. The sheaues being yet in shocks in the field, they thought they might not grind the wheate, nor make any commoditie of the profit thereof: wherefore they threw both corne and sheaues into the riuer, and trees also which they had hewn downe and rooted vp, to the end that the field being dedicated to the god Mars, should be left bare, without bearing any fruite at all. These sheaues thus throwne into the riuer, were caried downe by the streame not farre from thence, vnto a foord and shallow place of the water, where they first did stay, and did let the other which came after, that it could go no further: there these heapes gathered together, and lay so close one to another, that they began to sinke and settle fast in the water. Afterwards the streame of the riuer brought downe continually such mud and grauell, that it euer increased the heape of corne more and more, in such sort, that the force of the water could no more remoue it from thence, but rather softly pressing and driuing it together, did firme and harden it, and made it grow so to land. Thus this heape rising still in greatnesse and firmenesse, by reason that all that came downe the riuer staied there, it grew in the end, and by time to spread so farre, that at this day it is called the holy Iland in ROME: in which are many goodly temples of diuerse gods, and sundrie walks about it, and they call it in Latine, Inter duos pontes: in our tongue, betweene the two bridges. Yet some write, that this thing fell not out at that time when the field of the Tarquines was consecrated vnto Mars: but that it happened afterwards, when one of the Vestall Nunnes, called Tarquinia, gaue a field of hers vnto the people, which was hard adioyning vnto Tarquines field. For which liberalitie and bountie of hers, they did graunt her in recompence many priuiledges, and did her great honour besides. As amongest others, it was ordained, that her word and witnesse should stand good, and be allowed in matters iudiciall: which priuiledge, neuer woman besides her selfe did enioy. By speciall grace of the people also, it was graunted her, that she might mary if she thought it good: but yet she would not accept the benefite of that offer. Thus you heare the report how this thing happened. Tarquinius then being past hope of euer entring into his kingdome againe, went yet vnto the THVSCANES for succour, which were very glad of him: and so they leauied a great armie together, hoping to haue put him in his kingdome againe. The Consuls also hearing thereof, went out with their armie against him. Both the armies presented themselues in battell ray, one against another, in the holy places consecrated to the gods: whereof the one was called the wood Arsia, and the other the meadow AEsuuia. And as both armies began to giue charge vpon each other, Arnus the eldest sonne of King Tarquine, and the Consull Brutus encountred together, not by chaunce, but sought for of set purpose to execute the deadly fode and malice they did beare each other. The one, as against a tyrant and enemie of the libertie of his countrey: the other, as against him that had bene chiefe authour and worker of their exile and expulsion. So they set spurres to their horses, so soone as they had spied each other, with more furie then reason, and fought so desperatly together, that they both fell starke dead to the ground. The first onset of the battell being so cruell, the end thereof was no lesse bloudie: vntill both the armies hauing receiued and done like damage to each other, were parted by a maruellous great tempest that fell vpon them. Now was Valerius maruellously perplexed, for that he knew not which of them wanne the field that day: seeing his souldiers as sorrowfull for the great losse of their men lying dead before them, as they were glad of the slaughter and victorie of their enemies. For, to view the multitude of the slaine bodies of either side, the number was so equall in sight, that it was very hard to iudge, of which side fell out the greatest slaughter: so that both the one and the other viewing by the eye the remaine of their campe, were perswaded in their opinion, that they had rather lost then won, coniecturing a farre off the fall of their enemies. The night being come, such things fel out as may be looked for after so terrible a battel. For when both campes were all laied to rest, they say the wood wherein they lay incamped, quaked & trembled: and they heard a voice say, that only one man more was slaine on the THVSCANS side, than on the ROMAINES part. Out of doubt this was some voice from heauen: for the ROMAINES thereupon gaue a shrill shout, as those whose hearts receiued a new quickning spirit or courage. The THVSCANS on the contrary part were so afraid, that the most part of them stole out of the camp, and scattered here and there: and there remained behind about the number of fiue thousand men, whom the ROMAINES tooke prisoners euery one, and had the spoile of their campe. The carkasses were viewed afterwards, and they found that there were slaine in that battell, eleuen thousand thousand and three hundred of the THVSCANES: and of the ROMAINES, so many sauing one. This battel was fought (as they say) the last day of February, and the Consul Valerius triumphed, being the first of the Consuls that euer entered into ROME triumphing vpon a chariot drawne with foure horses, which sight the people found honourable and goodly to behold, and were not offended withall (as some seem to report) nor yet did enuie him for that he began it. For if it had bene so, that custome had not bene folowed with so good acceptation, nor had continued so many yeares as it did afterwards. They much commended also the honor he did to his fellow Consull Brutus, in setting out his funerals and obsequies, at the which he made a funerall oration in his praise. They did so like and please the ROMAINES, that they haue euer since continued that custome at the buriall of any noble man, or great personage, that he is openly praised at his buriall, by the worthiest man that liueth among them. They report this funerall oration is far more ancient then the first that was made in GREECE in the like case: vnlesse they will confirme that which the orator Anaximenes hath written, that the manner of praising the dead at their funerals, was first of all instituted by Solon. But they did most enuy Valerius, & beare him grudge, because Brutus (whom the people did acknowledge for father of their libertie) would neuer be alone in office, but had procured twise, that they should appoint Valerius fellow Consull with him. This man in contrariwise (said the people) taking vpon him alone the rule and soueraignte, sheweth plainely he will not be Brutus succession in his Consulship, but Tarquinius selfe in the kingdom. For to great purpose was it to praise Brutus in words, and to follow Tarquinius in deeds: hauing borne before himselfe only all the maces, the axes and the rods, when he commeth abroad out of his owne house, which is farre greater, and more stately, then the kings palace which he himselfe ouerthrew. And to say truly, Valerius dwelt in a house a litle too sumptuously built and seated, vpon the hanging of the hill called mount Velia: and because it stood high, it ouerlooked all the market place, so that any man might easily see from thence what was done there. Furthermore, it was very il to come to it: but when he came out of his house, it was a maruellous pompe and state to see him come downe from so high a place, and with a traine after him, that caried the maiestie of a Kings court. But herein Valerius left a noble example, shewing how much it importeth a noble man and magistrate, ruling weightie causes, to haue his eares open to heare, and willingly to receiue free speech in steed of flatteries, and plaine troth in place of lies. For, being informed by some of his friends, how the people misliked and complained of it, he stood not in his owne conceit, neither was angry with them: but forthwith set a world of workemen vpon it, early in the morning before breake of day, and commanded them to plucke downe his house, and to raze it to the ground. Insomuch as the next day following, when the ROMAINES were gathered together in the market place, and saw this great sodaine ruine, they much commended the noble act and mind of Valerius, in doing that he did: but so were they angry, and sorie both, to see so faire and stately a built house (which was an ornament to the citie) ouerthrowne vpon a sodain. Much like in comparison to a man, whom through spite and enuy they had vniustly put to death: and to see their chiefe magistrate also like a stranger and a vagabond, compelled to seek his lodging in another mans house. For his friends receiued him into their houses, vntill such time as the people had giuen him a place, where they did build him a new house, farre more orderly, and nothing so stately and curious as the first was, and it was in the same place, where the temple called Vicus Publicus standeth at this day. Now becausse he would not onely reforme his person, but the office of his Consulship, and also would frame himselfe to the good acceptation and liking of the people: where before he seemed vnto them to be fearefull, he put away the carying of the axes from the rods, which the sergeants vsed to beare before the Consull. Moreouer when he came into the market place, where the people were assembled, he caused the rods to be borne downwards, as in token of reuerence of the soueraigne maiestie of the people: which all the magistrates obserue yet at this day. Now in all this humble shew & lowlines of his, he did not so much imbase his dignity and greatnes, which the common people thought him to haue at the first: as he did therby cut off enuy from him, winning againe as much true authority, as in semblance he would seeme to haue lost. For this made the people willinger to obey, and readier to submit themselues vnto him: insomuch as vpon this occasion he was surnamed Publicola, as much to say, as the people pleaser. Which surname he kept euer after, and we from henceforth also writing the rest of his life, wil vse no other name: for he was contented to suffer any man that would, to offer himselfe to aske the Consulship in Brutus place. But he yet not knowing what kind of man they would ioyne fellow

Consull with him, and fearing least through enuie or ignorance, the partie might thwart his purpose and meaning: employed his sole power and authoritie whilest he ruled alone, vpon high and noble attempts. For first of all he supplied vp the number of the Senatours that were greatly decayed, because king Tarquine had put some of them to death not long before, & other also had bene lately slaine in the warres, in whose places he had chosen new Senatours, to the number of a hundred threescore and foure. After that, he made new decrees and laws, which greatly did aduance the authoritie of the people. The first law gaue libertie to all offenders, condemned by iudgement of the Consuls, to appeale vnto the people. The second, that no man vpon paine of death should take vpon him the exercise of any office, vnlesse he had come to it by the gift of the people. The third was, and all in fauour of the poore, that the poore citizens of Rome should pay no more custome, nor any impost whatsoeuer. This made euery man the more willing to giue himselfe to some craft or occupation, when he saw his trauell should not be taxed, nor taken from him. As for the law that he made against those that disobeyed the Consuls, it was found to be so fauourable to the communaltie, as they thought it was rather made for the poore, than for the rich and great men. For the offenders and breakers of that law, were condemned to pay for a penaltie, the value of fiue oxen and two muttons. The price of a mutton was then, ten oboles, and of an oxe, a hundred oboles. For in those dayes, the Romaines had no store of coyned money: otherwise, they lacked no sheepe, nor other rother beasts. Hereof it came, that to this day they call their riches or substance, Peculium, because Pecus signifieth sheepe and muttons. And in the old time the stampe vpon their money was an oxe, a mutton, or a hogge: and some of them called their children Bubulci, which signifieth cowheards: others Caprarij, to say goateheards: and other Porcij, as you would say, swineheards. Now though in all his other lawes, he was very fauourable and temperate toward the people: yet in that moderation, sometimes he did set grieuous paines and punishments. For he made it lawfull to kill any man without any accusation, that did aspire to the kingdome, and he did set the murderer free of all punishment: so he brought forth manifest proofe, that the partie slaine, had practised to make himselfe King. As being impossible a man should pretend so great a matter, and no man should find it: and contrariwise being possible, albeit he were spied, that otherwise he might attempt it, by making himself so strong, that he needed not passe for the law. In this case he gaue euery man libertie by such an act or meane, to preuent him if he could of discretion, who by strength otherwise sought to aspire to raigne. They greatly commended him also for the law that he made touching the treasure. For being very necessarie that euery priuate citizen should according to his abilitie, be contributor to the charges and maintenance of the warres: he himselfe would neither take such collection into his charge, nor suffer any man of his to meddle with the same, nor yet that it should be laid in any priuate mans house, but he did ordaine that Saturnes temple should be the treasurie thereof. This order they keepe to this present day. Furthermore, he graunted the people to chuse two young men Quæstores of the same, as you would say the treasurers, to take the charge of this money: and the two first which were chosen, were Publius Veturius, and Marcus Minutius, who gathered great summes of mony together. For numbring the people by the pole, there were found a hundred and thirtie thousand persons which had payed subsidie, not reckoning in this account, orphans, nor widowes, which were exempted from all payments. After he had established all these things, he caused Lucretius (the father of Lucretia) to be chosen fellow Consull with him, vnto whom, for that he was his auncient, he gaue the vpper hand, and commaunded they should cary before him the rodds, which were the signes of the chiefe magistrate: and euer since they haue giuen this honour vnto age. But Lucretius dying not long after his election, they chose againe in his place Marcus Horatius, who held out the Consulship with Publicola the rest of the yeare. Now about that time King Tarquine remained in the countrey of Thvscane, where he prepared a second armie against the Romaines, and there fell out a maruellous strange thing thereupon. For when he raigned King of Rome, he had almost made an end of the building of the temple of Iupiter Capitolin, and was determined (whether by any oracle receiued, or vpon any fantasie it is not knowne) to set vp a couch of earth baked by a potter, in the highest place of the temple, and he put it out to be done by certain Thvscane workmen of the citie of Veies: but whilest they were in hand with the worke, he was driuen out of his Realme. When the workmen had formed this couch, and that they had put it into the fornace to bake it, it fell out contrary to the nature of the earth, and the common order of their worke put into the fornace. For the earth earth did not ſhut and cloſe together in the fire, nor dryed vp all the moiſture thereof: but rather to the contrarie it did ſwell to ſuch a bigneſſe, and grew ſo hard and ſtrong withall, that they were driuen to breake vp the head and walles of the fornace to get it out. The ſoothſayers did expound this, that it was a celeſtiall token from aboue, and promiſed great proſperitie and increaſe of power vnto thoſe that ſhould enioy this coach. Whereupon the VEIANS reſolued not to deliuer it vnto the ROMAINES that demaunded it, but anſwered that it did belong vnto King Tarquine, and not vnto thoſe that had baniſhed him. Not many dayes after, there was a ſolemne feaſt of games for running of horſes in the citie of VEIES, where they did alſo many other notable actes, worthy ſight according to their cuſtome. But after the game was playd, he that had wonne the bell, being crowned in token of victorie, as they did vſe at that time, brought his coach and horſes faire and ſoftly out of the ſhew place: and ſodainely the horſe being affraide vpon no preſent cauſe or occaſion ſeene, whether it was by chaunce, or by ſome ſecret working from aboue, ranne as they had bene mad with their coach to the citie of ROME. The coach driuer did what he could poſſible at the firſt to ſtay them, by holding in the reines, by clapping them on the backes, and ſpeaking gently to them: but in the end, perceiuing he could do no good, and that they would haue their ſwinge, he gaue place to their furie, and they neuer linne running, till they brought him neare to the Capitoll, where they ouerthrew him and his coach, not farre from the gate called at this preſent, Ratumena. The VEIANS wondering much at this matter, and being afraid withall, were contented the workemen ſhould deliuer their coach made of earth vnto the ROMAINES. Now concerning Iupiter Capitolins temple, king Tarquine the firſt (which was the ſonne of Demaratus) vowed in the warres that he made againſt the SABYNES, that he would build it. And Tarquine the proude, being the ſonne of him that made this vow did build it: howbeit he did not conſecrate it, becauſe he was driuen out of his Kingdome before he had finiſhed it. When this temple was built and throughly finiſhed, and ſet forth with all his ornaments: Publicola was maruellouſly deſirous to haue the honor of the dedication thereof. But the noble men and Senatours enuying his glorie, being very angrie that he could not content himſelfe with all thoſe honours that he had receiued in peace for the good lawes he had made, and in warres for the victories he had obtained and well deſerued, but further that he would ſeeke the honour of this dedication, which nothing did pertaine vnto him: they then did egge Horatius, and perſwaded him to make ſute for the ſame. Occaſion fell out at that time, that Publicola muſt haue the leading of the ROMAINES army into the field: in the meane time, while Publicola was abſent, it was procured that the people gaue their voices to Horatius, to conſcrate the temple, knowing they could not ſo well haue brought it to paſſe he being preſent. Other ſay, the Conſuls drew lots betweene them, and that it lighted vpon Publicola to leade the armie againſt his will, and vpon Horatius to conſecrate this temple, which may be coniectured by the thing that fortuned in the dedication therof. For all the people being aſſembled together in the Capitoll with great ſilence, on the 15. day of the moneth of September, which is about the new moone of the moneth which the GRECIANS call Metagitnion: Horatius hauing done all the ceremonies needfull in ſuch a caſe, and holding then the doores of the temple, as the vſe was euen to vtter the ſolemne words of dedication, Marcus Valerius, the brother of Publicola, hauing ſtood a long time there at the temple doore, to take an oportunitie to ſpeake, began to ſay alowd in this wiſe: My Lord Conſull, your ſonne is dead of a ſickneſſe in the Campe. This made all the aſſembly ſorie to heare it, but it nothing amazed Horatius, who ſpake onely thus much: Caſt his bodie then where you will for me, the thought is taken. So he continued on to end his conſecration. This was but a deuice and nothing true, of Marcus Valerius, onely to make Horatius leaue off his conſecration. Horatius in this ſhewed himſelfe a maruellous reſolute man, were it that he ſtraight found his deuice, or that he beleeued it to be true: for the ſodaineneſſe of the matter nothing altered him. The very like matter fell out in conſecrating of the ſecond temple. For this firſt which Tarquine had built and Horatius conſecrated, was conſumed by fire in the ciuill warres: and the ſecond was built vp againe by Sylla, who made no dedication of it. For Catulus ſet vp the ſuperſcription of the dedication, becauſe Sylla died before he could dedicate it. The ſecond temple was burnt againe not long after the troubles and tumults which were at ROME, vnder Vitellius the Emperour. The third in like manner was reedified and built againe by Veſpaſian, from the ground to the toppe. But this good happe he had aboue other: to ſee his worke perfected and finiſhed before his death, and not ouerthrowne as it was immediatly after his death. Wherein he did farre paſſe

the happineſſe of Sylla, who died before he could dedicate that he had built: and the other deceaſed before he ſaw his worke ouerthrowne. For all the Capitoll was burnt to the ground incontinently after his death. It is reported the only foundations of the firſt temple, coſt Tarquinius fortie thouſand Pondos of ſiluer. And to gild onely the temple which we ſee now in our time, they ſay al the goods and ſubſtance that the richeſt citizen of ROME then had, wil come nothing neare vnto it: for it coſt aboue 12. thouſand talents. The pillars of this temple are cut out of a quarrie of marble, called pentlike marble, and they were ſquared parpine, as thicke as long: theſe I ſaw at ATHENS. But afterwards they were cut againe, & poliſhed in ROME, by which doing they got not ſo much grace, as they loſt proportion: for they were made too ſlender, & left naked of their firſt beautie. Now he that would wonder at the ſtately building of the Capitol, if he came afterwards vnto the palace of Domitian, and did but ſee ſome gallerie, porch, hall, or hote houſe, or his concubines chambers: he would ſay (in my opinion) as the Poet Epicharmus ſaid of a prodigall man:

How much was ſpent in building the Capitoll.

It is a fault, and folly both in thee
to laſh out gifts, and prodigall rewards:
For fond delights, without all rule that bee, regarding not what happens afterwards.

So might they iuſtly ſay of Domitian: Thou art not liberall, nor deuout vnto the gods: but it is a vice thou haſt to loue to build, and deſireſt (as they ſay of old Midas) that all about thee were turned to gold and precious ſtones. And thus much for this matter. Tarquine after that great foughten battell wherein he loſt his ſonne (that was ſlaine by Brutus in fighting together hand to hand) went to the citie of CLVSIVM, vnto King Claras Porſena, the mightieſt Prince that raigned at that time in all ITALIE, and was both noble and a courteous Prince. Porſena promiſed him aide: and firſt of all he ſent to ROME to ſummon the citizens to receiue their King againe. But the ROMAINES refuſing the ſummons, he ſent forthwith an Herauld to proclaime open warres againſt them, and to tell them where, and when he would meete them: and then marched thitherwards immediatly with a great armie. Publicola now being abſent, was choſen Conſull the ſecond time, and Titus Lucretius with him. When he was returned home againe to ROME, becauſe he would exceede king Porſena in greatneſſe of mind, he began to build a citie called SIGLIVRIA, euen when the King with all his armie was not farre from ROME: and hauing walled it about to his maruellous charge, he ſent thither ſeuen hundred citizens to dwell there, to ſhew that he made litle account of this warre. Howbeit Porſena at his comming did giue ſuch a luſty aſſault to the mount Ianiculum, that they draue out the ſouldiers which kept the ſame: who flying towards ROME, were purſued ſo hard with the enemies, that with them they had entred the towne, had not Publicola made a ſally out to reſiſt them. Who began a hote skirmiſh hard by the riuer of Tyber, and there ſought to haue ſtaied the enemies to follow any further: which being the greater number did ouerlay the ROMAINES, and did hurt Publicola very ſore in this skirmiſh, ſo as he was caried away into the citie in his ſouldiers armes. And euen ſo was the other Conſull Lucretius hurt in like caſe: which ſo diſcouraged and frayed the ROMAINES, that they all tooke them to their legges, and fled towards the citie. The enemies purſued them at their heeles, as farre as the wodden bridge: ſo that the citie was in maruellous hazard of taking vpon the ſodaine. But Horatius Cocles, and Herminius, and Lucretius, two other of the chiefeſt noble yong men of the citie, ſtood with them to the defence of the bridge, and made head againſt the enemie. This Horatius was ſurnamed Cocles (as much to ſay, as one eye) becauſe he had loſt one of them in the wars. Howbeit other writers ſay, it was becauſe of his flat noſe, which was ſo ſunke into his head, that they ſaw nothing to part his eyes, but that the eye browes did meete together: by reaſon whereof the people thinking to ſurname him Cyclops, by corruption of the tongue they called him (as they ſay) Cocles. But howſoeuer it was, this Horatius Cocles had the courage to ſhew his face againſt the enemy, and to keep the bridge, vntil ſuch time as they had cut and broken it vp behind him. When he ſaw they had done that, armed as he was, and hurt in the hip with a pike of the THVSCANES, he leaped into the riuer of Tyber, and ſaued himſelfe by ſwimming vnto the other ſide. Publicola wondering at this manly act of his, perſwaded the ROMAINES ſtraight, euery one according to his abilitie, to giue him ſo much as he ſpent in a day: and afterwards alſo he cauſed the common treaſurie to giue him as much land as he could compaſſe about with his plow in a day. Furthermore he made his image of braſſe to be ſet vp in the temple of Vulcane, comforting by this honour his wounded hippe, whereof he was lame euer after. Now whileſt

King

King Porſena was hotly bent, very ſtraightly to beſiege ROME, there began a famine among the ROMAINES: and to increaſe the daunger, there came a new army out of THVSCANE, which ouerranne, burnt, and made waſte, all the territorie of ROME. Whereupon Publicola being choſen Conſull, then the third time, thought he ſhould neede to do no more to reſiſt Porſena brauely, but to be quiet onely, and to looke well to the ſafe keeping of the city. Howbeit ſpying his oportunitie, he ſecretly ſtole out of ROME with a power, and did ſet vpon the THVSCANES that deſtroyed the countrey about: and ouerthrew and ſlue of them, fiue thouſand men. As for the hiſtorie of Mutius, many do diuerſly report it: but I will write it in ſuch ſort, as I thinke ſhall beſt agree with the truth. This Mutius was a worthy man in all reſpects, but ſpecially for the warres. He deuiſing how he might come to kill King Porſena, diſguiſed himſelfe in THVSCANS apparell, and ſpeaking THVSCANE very perfectly, went into his campe, and came to the Kings chaire, in the which he gaue audience: and not knowing him perfectly, he durſt not aske which was he, leaſt he ſhould be diſcouered, but drew his ſword at aduenture, and ſlue him whom he tooke to be King. Vpon that they layd hold on him, and examined him. And a pan full of fire being brought for the King that intended to do ſacrifice vnto the gods, Mutius held out his right hand ouer the fire, and boldly looking the King full in his face, whileſt the fleſh of his hand did frie off, he neuer changed hew nor countenance: the King wondering to ſee ſo ſtrange a ſight, called to them to withdraw the fire, and he himſelfe did deliuer him his ſword againe. Mutius tooke it of him with his left hand, whereupon they ſay afterwards, he had giuen him the ſurname of Scæuola, as much to ſay, as left handed, and told him in taking of it: Thou couldeſt not Porſena for feare haue ouercomed me, but now through courteſie thou haſt won me. Therefore for good will I will reueale that vnto thee, which no force nor extremity could haue made me vtter. There are three hundred ROMAINS diſperſed through thy campe, all which are prepared with like minds to follow that I haue begun, onely gaping for oportunitie to put it in practiſe. The lot fell on me to be the firſt to breake the Iſe of this enterpriſe: and yet I am not ſory my hand failed to kill ſo worthy a man, that deſerueth rather to be a friend then an enemy vnto the ROMAINES. Porſena hearing this, did beleeue it, and euer after he gaue the more willing eare to thoſe that treated with him of peace: not ſo much (in my opinion) for that he feared the three hundred lying in waite to kill him, as for the admiration of the ROMAINES noble mind and great courage. All other writers call this man, Mutius Scæuola: howbeit Athenodorus ſurnamed Sandon, in a booke he wrote vnto Octauia, Auguſtus ſiſter, ſayth that he was alſo called Opſigonus. But Publicola taking king Porſena not to be ſo daungerous an enemy to ROME, as he ſhould be a profitable friend and ally to the ſame: let him vnderſtand that he was contented to make him iudge of the controuerſie betweene them and Tarquine. Whom he did many times prouoke to come and haue his cauſe heard before king Porſena, where he ſhould iuſtifie to his face, that he was the naughtieſt and moſt wicked man of the world, and that he was iuſtly driuen out of his countrey. Tarquine ſharpely anſwered, that he would make no man his iudge, and Porſena leaſt of all other, for that hauing promiſed him to put him againe in his Kingdome, he was now gone from his word, and had chaunged his mind. Porſena was very angrie with this aunſwere, iudging this a manifeſt token that his cauſe was ill. Wherefore Porſena being ſolicited againe by his owne ſonne Aruns, who loued the ROMAINES, did eaſily graunt them peace vpon condition: that they ſhould redeliuer backe againe to him the lands they had gotten before within the countrey of THVSCANE, with the priſoners alſo which they had taken in this warre, and in lieu thereof he offered to deliuer to them againe the ROMAINES, that had fled from them vnto him. To confirme this peace, the ROMAINES deliuered him hoſtages, ten of the nobleſt mens ſonnes of the city, and ſo many of their daughters: among which was Valeria, Publicolaes owne daughter. Peace being thus concluded, Porſena brake his army, and withdrew his ſtrength, truſting to the peace concluded. The ROMAINES daughters deliuered for hoſtages, came downe to the riuers ſide to waſh them, in a quiet place where the ſtreame ranne but gently, without any force or ſwiftneſſe at all. When they were there, and ſaw they had no guard about them, nor any came that way, nor yet any botes going vp nor downe the ſtreame: they had a deſire to ſwimme ouer the riuer, which ranne with a ſwift ſtreame, and was maruellous deepe. Some ſay, that one Clælia ſwamme the riuer vpon her horſe backe, and that ſhe did embolden and encourage the other to ſwimme hard by her horſe ſide: and recouering the other bancke, and being paſt all daunger, they went and preſented themſelues before

Publicola the Consull. Who neither commended them, nor liked the part they had played, but was maruellous sory, fearing least men would iudge him lesse carefull to keepe his faith, then was king Porsena: and that he might suspect the boldnesse of these maidens, was but a craftie sleight deuised of the ROMAINES: therefore he tooke them all againe, and sent them immediatly vnto King Porsena. Whereof Tarquine hauing intelligence, he layd an ambush for them that had the conduction of them. Who so soone as they were past the riuer, did shew themselues, and brake vpon the ROMAINES: they being farre fewer in number then the other, did yet very stoutly defend themselues. Now whiles they were in earnest fight together, Valeria Publicolaes daughter, and three of her fathers seruants, escaped through the midst of them, and saued themselues. The residue of the virgines remained in the middest among their swords, in great danger of their liues. Aruns king Porsenas sonne aduertised hereof, ran thither incontinently to the rescue: but when he came the enemies fled, and the ROMAINES held on their iourney to redeliuer their hostages. Porsena seeing them againe, asked which of them it was that began first to passe the riuer, and had encouraged the other to follow her. One pointed him vnto her, and told him her name was Clælia. He looked vpon her very earnestly, and with a pleasant countenance, and commanded they should bring him one of his best horses in the stable, and the richest furniture he had for the same, and so he gaue it vnto her. Those which hold opinion that none but Clælia passed the riuer on horsebacke, do alledge this to proue their opinion true. Other do deny it, saying that this THVSCANE king, did only honour her noble courage. Howsoeuer it was, they see her image on horsebacke in the holy streete, as they go to the pallace: and some say it is the statue of Valeria, other of Clælia. After Porsena had made peace with the ROMAINES, in breaking vp his campe, he shewed his noble mind vnto them in many other things, and specially in that he commanded his souldiers they should cary nothing but their armour and weapon onely, leauing his campe full of corne, victuals, and other kind of goods. From whence this custome came, that at this day when they make open sale of any thing belonging to the common-weale, the sergeant or common crier crieth, that they are king Porsenas goods, and taken of thankfulnesse and perpetuall memory of his bounty and liberality towards them. Further, Porsenas image standeth adioyning to the pallace where the Senate is vsed to be kept, which is made of great antique worke. Afterwards the SABYNES inuading the ROMAINES territory with a great force, Marcus Valerius Publicolaes brother, was then chosen Consull, with one Posthumius Tubertus. Howbeit all matters of waight and importance passed by Publicolaes counsell and authority, who was present at any thing that was done: and by whose meanes Marcus his brother wan two great battels, in the last whereof he slue thirteene thousand of his enemies, not losing one of his owne men. For which his victories, besides the honour of triumph he had, the people also at their owne charges, built him a house in the streete of mount Palatine, & granted him moreouer that his dore should open outwards into the street, where al other mens doors did open inwards into their house: signifying by graunt of this honour and priuiledge, that he should alwayes haue benefit by the common-weale. It is reported that the GRECIANS doores of their houses in old time, did all open outwards after that fashion: and they do coniecture it by the comedies that are played: where those that would go out of their houses, did first knocke at their doores, and make a noise within the house, least in opening their doore vpon a sudden, they might ouerthrow or hurt him that taried at the streete doore, or passed by the way, who hearing the noise, had warning straight to auoid the danger. The next yeare after that, Publicola was chosen Consul the fourth time, because they stood in great doubt that the SABYNES and LATINES would ioyne together to make warres vpon them: besides all this, there was a certaine superstitious feare ranne through the city, of some ill hap toward it, because most part of the women with child were deliuered of vnperfect children, lacking some one lim or other, and all of them came before their time. Wherefore Publicola looking in some of Sybillaes bookes, made priuate sacrifice vnto Pluto, and did set vp againe some feasts and solemne games that were left off, and had bene commaunded before time to be kept by the Oracle of Apollo. These meanes hauing a litle reioyced the city with good hope, because they thought that the anger of the gods had bene appeased: Publicola then began to prouide for the daungers that they were threatned withall by men, for that newes was brought him that their enemies were vp in all places, and made great preparation to inuade thē. Now there was at that time amongst the SABYNES, a great rich man called Appius Clausus, very strong and actiue of body, and otherwise a man of great reputation and eloquence, aboue aboue all the reſt of his country men: but notwithſtanding he was much enuied, and could not auoide it, being a thing common to great men. He went about to ſtay thoſe intended wars againſt the ROMAINES. Whereupon, many which before tooke occaſion to murmur againſt him, did now much more increaſe the ſame: with ſaying he ſought to maintaine the power of the ROMAINES, that afterwards by their ayde he might make himſelfe tyrant & king of the country. The cõmon people gaue eaſie eare vnto ſuch ſpeeches, & Appius perceiuing well inough how the ſoldiers hated him deadly, he feared they would complaine and accuſe him. Wherefore being well backed and ſeconded by his kinſmen, friends, and followers, he practiſed to make a ſtir among the SABYNES, which was the cauſe of ſtaying the warres againſt the ROMAINES. Publicola alſo for his part was very diligent, not only to vnderſtand the originall cauſe of this ſedition, but to feede on further and increaſe the ſame, hauing gotten men meete for the purpoſe, which caried Appius ſuch a meſſage from him: That Publicola knew very well he was a iuſt man, and one that would not be reuenged of his citizens to the generall hurt of his countrey, although the iniuries he receiued at their hands, deliuered him iuſt occaſion to do it: neuertheleſſe if he had any deſire to prouide for his ſafety, and to repaire to ROME, leauing them which cauſeleſſe wiſhed him ſo much euill, they would both openly and priuatly receiue him with that due honour which his vertue deſerued, and the worthineſſe of the ROMAINE people required. Clauſus hauing long and many times conſidered this matter with himſelfe, reſolued that it was the beſt way he could take, making vertue of neceſſity; and therefore being determined to do it, he did procure his friends to do as he did, and they got other alſo vnto them, ſo that he brought away with him out of the countrey of the SABYNES, fiue thouſand families with their wiues and children (of the quieteſt and moſt peaceable people among the SABYNES) to dwell at ROME. Publicola being aduertiſed thereof before they came, did receiue them at their comming to ROME with great ioy, and all manner of good curteous entertainement. For at their firſt comming, he made them all and their families free citizens, and aſſigned vnto euery perſon of them two iugera of land (which contained one acre, one rood, eleuen pole, and ſixtie nine parts of a poole) by the riuer of Tyber: and vnto Appius ſelfe he gaue fiue and twenty iugera (to wit, ſixteene acres and a halfe, foure pole and ſeuenty ſixe parts of a pole) and receiued him into the number of the Senatours. And thus came he firſt vnto the gouernement of the common-weale in ROME, where he did ſo wiſely behaue himſelfe, that in the end he came to be the chiefeſt man of dignity and authority in ROME, ſo long as he liued. After his death, he left behind him the family of the Claudians, deſcending from him: which for honour, and worthineſſe, gaue no place to the nobleſt family in ROME. But now the ſedition amongſt the SABYNES being pacified, by the departure of thoſe that were gone to ROME: the ſeditious gouernours would not ſuffer thoſe that remained to liue in peace, but ſtill cried out, it were too much ſhame for them, that Clauſus being a fugitiue, and become an enemy, ſhould honour their enemies abroad, that being preſent durſt not ſhew ſo much at home, and that the ROMAINES ſhould eſcape vnreuenged, who had done them ſuch apparant wrongs. So they raiſed great force and power, and went and encamped with their army neare the city of FIDENES, and layd an ambuſh hard by ROME, in certaine hidden and hollow places, where they put a two thouſand choiſe footemen, very well armed, and did appoint the next morning to ſend certaine light horſemen to runne and pray to ROME gates: commaunding them, that when the ROMAINES came out of the city to charge them, they ſhould ſeeme leiſurely to retire, vntill they had drawne them within daunger of their ambuſh. Publicola receiuing full intelligence of all their intention, by a traytour that fled from them vnto him, made due preparation to encounter with their priuy ambuſh, and ſo deuided his army into two parts: for he gaue his ſonne in law Poſthumius Balbus, three thouſand footemen, whom he ſent away by night, commaunding them the ſame night to take the hils, in the bottome whereof the SABYNES were layd in ambuſh. Lucretius, fellow Conſull with Publicola, hauing the lighteſt and luſtieſt men of the city, was appointed to make head againſt the vantcurrers of the SABYNES that minded to approch the gates. And Publicola with the reſt of the army, marched a great compaſſe about to incloſe his enemies behind. The next morning betimes, by chance it was a thicke miſte, and at that preſent time Poſthumius comming downe from the hilles, with great ſhouts, charged them that lay in ambuſh. Lucretius on the other ſide, ſet vpon the light horſemen of the SABYNES: and Publicola fell vpon their campe. So that of all ſides the SABYNES enterpriſe had very ill ſucceſſe, for they had the worſt in euery place, and the ROMAINES killed them flying, without any turning againe to make reſiſtance. Thus the place which gaue them hope of beſt ſafety, turned moſt to their deadly ouerthrow. For euery one of their companies ſuppoſing the other had bene whole and vnbroken, when a charge was giuen vpon them, did ſtraight breake, and neuer a company of them turned head toward their enemy. For they that were in the campe, ranne toward them that lay in ambuſh: and thoſe which were in ambuſh on the contrary ſide, ranne towards them that were in campe. So that in flying, the one met with the other, and found thoſe, towards whom they were flying to haue bin ſafe, to ſtand in as much need of helpe as themſelues. That which ſaued ſome that were not ſlaine, was the city of FIDENES, which was neere the campe, and ſpecially ſaued thoſe which fled thither. But ſuch as came ſhort of the city, and could not in time recouer it, were all ſlaine in the field, or taken priſoners. As for the glory of this honourable victory, albeit the ROMAINES were wont to aſcribe all ſuch great notable matters to the ſpeciall prouidence and grace of the gods, yet at that time notwithſtanding, they did iudge that this happy ſucceſſe fell out by the wiſe foreſight and valiantneſſe of the Captaine. For euery man that had ſerued in this iourney, had no other talke in his mouth, but that Publicola had deliuered their enemies into their hands, lame, and blind, and as a man might ſay, bound hand and feete to kill them at their pleaſure. The people were maruellouſly enriched by this victory, as well for the ſpoyle, as for the raunſome of the priſoners that they had gotten. Now Publicola after he had triumphed, and left the gouernement of the city to thoſe which were choſen Conſuls for the yeare following, died incontinently, hauing liued as honourably and vertuouſly all the dayes of his life, as any man liuing might do. The people then tooke order for his funerals, that the charges thereof ſhould be defrayed by the city, as if they had neuer done him any honour in his life, and that they had bene ſtill debters vnto him for the noble ſeruice he had done vnto the ſtate and common-weale whileſt he liued. Therefore towards his funerall charges, euery citizen gaue a peece of mony called a Quatrine. The women alſo for their part to honour his funerals, agreed among themſelues to mourne a whole yeare in blacke for him, which was a great and honourable memoriall. He was buried alſo by expreſſe order of the people, within the city, in the ſtreete called Velia; and they graunted priuiledge alſo vnto all his poſterity, to be buried in the ſelfe ſame place. Howbeit they do no more bury any of his there. But when any dye, they bring the corſe vnto this place, and one holding a torch burning in his hand, doth put it vnder the place, and take it ſtraight away againe, to ſhew that they haue liberty to bury him there, but that they willingly refuſe this honour: and this done, they cary the corſe away againe.

THE COMPARISON OF Solon with Publicola.

NOW presently to compare these two personages together, it seemeth they both had one vertue in them: which is not found in any other of their liues which we haue written of before. And the same is, that the one hath bene a witnesse, and the other a follower of him, to whom he was like. So as the sentence that Solon spake to king Cræsus, touching Tellus felicity and happinesse, might haue bene better applied vnto Publicola then to Tellus: whom he iudged to be very happy, because he dyed honourably, he had liued vertuously, and had left behind him goodly children. And yet Solon speaketh nothing of his excellency or vertue in any of his poems: neither did he euer beare any honourable office in all his time, nor yet left any children that caried any great fame or renowne after his death. Whereas Publicola so long as he liued, was alwaies the chiefe man among the ROMAINES, of credit and authority: and afterwards since his death, certaine of the noblest families, & most ancient houses of ROME, in these our dayes, as the PVBLICOLES, the MESSALES, and the VALERIANS, for sixe hundred yeares continuance, do referre the glory of the nobility and auncientry of their house vnto him. Furthermore, Tellus was slaine by his enemies, fighting valiantly like a worthy honest man. But Publicola died after he had slaine his enemies: which is farre more great good hap, then to be slaine. For after he as generall had honourably serued his countrey in the warres, and had left them conquerers, hauing in his life time receiued all honors and triumphs due vnto his seruice, he attained to that happy end of life, which Solon accompted and esteemed, most happy and blessed. Also in wishing manner, he would his end should be lamented to his praise, in a place where he confuteth Mimnermus, about the continuance of mans life, by saying:

Publicola happy.

Let not my death without lamenting passe,
but rather let my friends bewaile the same:
Whose grieuous teares, and cries of out alas,
may oft resound the Eccho of my name.

If that be good happe, then most happy maketh he Publicola: for at his death, not onely his friends and kinsfolkes, but the whole city also, and many a thousand persons besides, did bitterly bewaile the losse of him. For all the women of ROME did mourne for him in blacke, and did most pitifully lament his death, as euery one of them had lost either father, brother, or husband:

True it is, that I couet goods to haue:
but yet so got as may me not depraue.

Solon saith this, because vengeance followed ill gotten goods. And Publicola tooke great heede, not onely to get his goods most iustly, but had regard that those which he had, he ſpent moſt honeſtly in helping the needie. So that if Solon was iuſtly reputed the wiſeſt man, we muſt needes confeſſe alſo that Publicola was the happieſt. For what the one deſired for the greateſt and moſt perfect good a man can haue in this world, the other hath wonne it, kept it, and vſed it all his life time, vntill the houre of his death. And thus hath Solon honoured Publicola, and Publicola hath done the like vnto Solon; ſhewing himſelfe a perfect example & looking-glaſſe, where men may ſee how to gouerne a popular ſtate: when he made his Conſulſhip void of all pride and ſtately ſhew, and became himſelfe affable, courteous, and beloued of euery body. So tooke he profit by many of his lawes: as when he ordained, that the people onely ſhould haue authoritie to chuſe and create all common officers and magiſtrates, and that they might appeale from any Iudge to the people: as Solon when he ſuffered them to appeale vnto the iudges of the people. Indeed Publicola did not create any new Senate, as Solon did: but he did augment the firſt number, with as many perſons almoſt as there were before. He did alſo firſt erect the office of Quæſtores, for keeping of all fines, taxes, and other collections of money. Becauſe the chiefeſt magiſtrate, if he were an honeſt man, ſhould not for ſo light an occaſion be taken from the care of better and more waightie affaires: and if he were wickedly giuen, and ill diſpoſed, that he ſhould haue no ſuch meane or occaſion to worke his wicked will, by hauing the treaſure of the city in his hands, and to commaund what he liſt. Moreouer in hating the tyrants, Publicola therein was farre more ſharpe and terrible. For Solon in his lawes puniſhed him that went about to make himſelfe a tyrant, yet after he was conuicted thereof by law: but Publicola ordained that they ſhould kill him, before the law did paſſe on him, that ſought to be King. And where Solon iuſtly and truely vaunteth himſelfe, that being offered to be King and Lord of ATHENS, and that with the whole conſent of the citizens, yet he did notwithſtanding refuſe it: this vaunt and glorie is as due vnto Publicola; who finding the dignitie of a Conſull tyrannicall, he brought it to be more lowly and fauourable for the people, not taking vpon him all the authority he might lawfully haue done. And it ſeemeth that Solon knew before him, what was the true and direct way to gouerne a common-weale vprightly. For he ſaith in one place:

Publicola erected the office of Quæſtores.

Both great and ſmall of power, the better will obay,
if we too little or too much, vpon them do not lay.

The diſcharging of debts was proper to Solon, which was a full confirmation of libertie. For litle preuaileth law to make equality among citizens, when debts do hinder the poore people to enioy the benefit thereof. And where it ſeemeth that they haue moſt libertie, as in that they may be choſen Iudges and officers, to ſpeake their opinion in the counſell, and giue their voyces alſo: there indeede are they moſt bound and ſubiect, becauſe they do but obey the rich in all they do commaund. But yet in this act there is a thing more wonderfull, and worthie to be noted. That commonly diſcharging of debts, was wont to breede great tumults and ſeditions in common-weales. And Solon hauing vſed it in a very good time (as the Phiſition ventring a daungerous medicine) did appeaſe the ſedition already begun, and did vtterly quench through his glory, and the common opinion they had of his wiſedome and vertue, all the infamy and accuſation that might haue growne of that act. As for their firſt entrie into the gouernement, Solons beginning was farre more noble: for he went before, and followed not another; and himſelfe alone without any others helpe, did put in execution the beſt, and more part of all his notable and goodly lawes. Yet was Publicolaes end and death much more glorious and happie: for Solon before he died, ſaw all his common-wealth ouerthrowne; but Publicolaes common-weale continued whole as he left it, vntill the broile of ciuill warres began againe among them. Solon, after he had made his lawes, and written them in wodden tables, leauing them without defence of any man, went his way immediatly out of the city of ATHENS. Publicola abiding continually in ROME gouerning the ſtate, did throughly ſtabliſh and confirme the lawes he made. Furthermore Solon hauing wiſely foreſeene Pyſiſtratus practiſes, aſpiring to make himſelfe King, he could neuer let him for all that, but was himſelfe ouercome and oppreſſed with the tyranny he ſaw ſtabliſhed in his owne ſight, and in deſpite of him: where Publicola ouerthrew and did put downe a mightie Kingdome, that had continued of long time, and was throughly ſtabliſhed; his vertue and deſire being equall with Solons, and hauing had beſides fortune fauorable, and ſufficient power to execute his vertuous and well diſpoſed mind. But as for warres and marſhall deedes, there is no compariſon to be made betweene them. For Daimachus Plateian,

Plateian, doth not attribute the warres of the MEGARIANS vnto Solon, as we haue written it: where Publicola being generall of an army, and fighting himselfe in person, hath wonne many great battels. And as for matters of peace and ciuill gouernement, Solon neuer durst present himselfe openly to perswade the enterprise of SALAMINA, but vnder a counterfeit madnesse, and as a foole to make sport: where Publicola taking his aduenture from the beginning, shewed himselfe without dissimulation, an open enemy to Tarquine, and afterwards he reuealed all the whole conspiracy. And when he had bene the onely cause and authour of punishing the traytours, he did not onely driue out of ROME the tyrants selues in person, but tooke from them also all hope of returne againe. Who hauing alwayes thus nobly and valiantly behaued himselfe, without shrinking backe, or flying from ought that required force, a manly courage, or open resistance: did yet shew himselfe discreete, where wisedome was requisite, or reason and perswasion needfull. As when he cunningly wanne King Porsena, who was a dreadfull enemy vnto him, and inuincible by force: whom he handled in such good sort, that he made him his friend. Peraduenture some might stand in this, and say: that Solon recouered the Ile of SALAMINA vnto the ATHENIANS, which they would haue lost. Publicola to the contrary, restored the lands vnto Porsena againe, which the ROMAINES had conquered before, within the countrey of THVSCANE. But the times in which these things were done, are alwayes to be considered of. For a wise gouernour of a Realme, and politicke man, doth gouerne diuersely according to the occasions offered, taking euery thing in his time wherein he will deale: and many times, in letting go one thing, he saueth the whole; and in loosing a litle, he gaineth much: as Publicola did, who loosing a litle peece of another mans countrey which they had vsurped, saued by that meanes all that was assuredly his owne. And whereas the ROMAINES thought he should do very much for them, to saue their city onely, he got them moreouer, all the goods that were in their enemies campe, which did besiege them. And in making his enemy iudge of his quarrell, he wan the victorie: winning that moreouer, which he would gladly haue giuen to haue ouercome, and haue sentence passe on his side. For the King their enemy did not onely make peace with them, but did also leaue them all his furniture, prouision, and munition for the warres:

A politicke precept.

euen for the vertue, manhood, and iustice, which the great wisedome of the Consull perswaded Porsena to beleeue to be in all the other ROMAINES.

The end of Publicolaes life.

THE LIFE OF Themiſtocles.

THEMISTOCLES parentage did litle aduance his glory: for his father Neocles was of ſmall reputation in ATHENS, being of the hundred of Phrear, and tribe of Leontis: of his mother an alien or ſtranger: as theſe verſes do witneſſe:

Abrotonon I am, yborne in Thracia, and yet this high good hap I haue, that into Grecia
I haue brought forth a ſonne, Themiſtocles by name, the glory of the Greekiſh blouds, and man of greateſt fame.

Howbeit Phanias writeth, that his mother was not a THRACIAN, but borne in the country of CARIA: and they do not call her Abrotonon, but Euterpé. And Neanthes ſaith furthermore, that ſhe was of HALICARNASSVS, the chiefeſt city of all the Realme of CARIA. For which cauſe when the ſtrangers did aſſemble at Cynoſargos (a place of exerciſe without the gate dedicated to Hercules, which was not a right god, but noted an alien, in that his mother was a mortall woman:) Themiſtocles perſwaded diuerſe youths of the moſt honourable houſes, to go downe with him, and to annoint themſelues at Cynoſargos, cunningly thereby taking away the difference between the right & alien ſort. But ſetting a part all theſe circūſtances, he was no doubt alied vnto the houſe of the Lycomedians: for Themiſtocles cauſed the chappel of this family, which is in the village of PHLYES, being once burnt by the barbarous people, to be built vp againe at his owne charges: and as Simonides ſaith, he did ſet it forth and enrich it with pictures. Moreouer euery man doth confeſſe it, that euen from his childhood they did perceiue he was giuen to be very hote headed, ſtirring, wiſe, and of good ſpirit, and enterpriſing of himſelfe to do great things, and borne to rule weighty cauſes. For at ſuch dayes and howers as he was taken from his booke, and had leaue to play, he neuer played, nor would neuer be idle, as other children were: but they alwayes found him conning ſome oration without booke, or making it alone by himſelfe: and the ground of his matter was euer commonly, either to defend, or accuſe ſome of his companions. Whereupon his ſchoolemaiſter obſeruing him, oft ſayd vnto him: ſure ſome great matter hangeth ouer thy head my boy, for it cannot be choſen but that one day thou ſhalt do ſome notable good thing, or ſome extreme miſchiefe. Therefore when they went about to teach him any thing, onely to checke his nature, or to faſhion him with good manner and ciuility, or to ſtudy any matter for pleaſure or honeſt paſtime, he would ſlowly and careleſly learne of them.

But

But if they deliuered him any matter of wit, and things of weight concerning ſtate, they ſaw he would beate at it maruellouſly, and would vnderſtand more then any could of his age & cariage, truſting altogether to his naturall mother wit. This was the cauſe, that being mocked afterwards by ſome that had ſtudied humanity, and other liberall ſciences, he was driuen for reuenge and his owne defence, to anſwer with great and ſtout words, ſaying, that indeed he could no skill to tune a harpe, nor a violl, nor to play of a pſalterion: but if they did put a city into his hands that was of ſmall name, weake, and litle, he knew wayes inough how to make it noble, ſtrong, and great. Neuertheleſſe, Steſimbrotus writeth, how he went to Anaxagoras ſchoole, and that vnder Meliſſus he ſtudied natural Philoſophy. But herein he was greatly deceiued, for that he tooke no great heed vnto the time. For Meliſſus was captaine of the Samians againſt Pericles, at what time he did lay ſiege vnto the city of Samos. Now this is true, Pericles was much yonger then Themiſtocles, and Anaxagoras dwelt with Pericles in his owne houſe. Therefore we haue better reaſon & occaſion to beleeue thoſe that write, Themiſtocles did determine to follow Mneſiphilus Phrearian. For he was no profeſſed Orator, nor naturall Philoſopher, as they termed it in that time: but made profeſſion of that which then they called wiſdome. Which was no other thing, but a certaine knowledge to handle great cauſes, and an indeuor to haue a good wit & iudgement in matters of ſtate & gouernment: which profeſſion beginning in Solon, did continue, & was taken vp from man to man, as a ſect of Philoſophy. But thoſe that came ſithence, haue mingled it with art of ſpeech, and by litle and litle haue tranſlated the exerciſe of deeds, vnto bare and curious words: whereupon they were called Sophiſters, as who would ſay, counterfeit wiſe men. Notwithſtãding, when Themiſtocles began to medle with the gouernment of the common-weale, he followed much Mneſiphilus. In the firſt part of his youth, his behauior and doings were very light & vnconſtant, as one caried away with a raſh head, and without any order or diſcretion: by reaſon whereof his maners and conditions ſeemed maruellouſly to change, and oft times fell into very ill fauored euents, as himſelf did afterwards cõfeſſe by ſaying: that a ragged colt oft times proues a good horſe, ſpecially if he be well ridden, & broken as he ſhould be. Other tales which ſome wil ſeeme to adde to this, are in my opinion but fables. As, that his father did diſinherite him, and that his mother for very care & ſorow ſhe tooke to ſee the lewd life of her ſon, did kill her ſelfe. For there are that write to the contrary, that his father being deſirous to take him from dealing in gouernment, did go and ſhew him all alongſt the ſea ſhore, the ſhipwracks and ribs of old galleys caſt here & there, whereof no reckoning was made, and ſayd to him: thus the people vſe their gouernors, when they can ſerue no longer. Howſoeuer it was, it is moſt true that Themiſtocles earneſtly gaue himſelf to ſtate, and was ſuddenly taken with deſire of glory. For euen at his firſt entry, becauſe he would ſet foot before the proudeſt, he ſtood at pike againſt the greateſt and mightieſt perſons, that bare the ſway and gouernment, and ſpecially againſt Ariſtides, Lyſimachus ſon, who euer encountered him, and was ſtill his aduerſary oppoſite. Yet it ſeemeth the euill will he conceiued toward him, came of a very light cauſe. For they both loued Steſilaus, that was borne in the city of Teos, as Ariſton the Philoſopher writeth. And after this ielouſie was kindled betweene them, they alwayes tooke cõtrary part one againſt another, not only in their priuate likings, but alſo in the gouernment of the common-weale. Yet I am perſwaded, that the difference of their manners and conditions, did much increaſe the grudge and diſcord betwixt them. For Ariſtides being by nature a very good man, a iuſt dealer, and honeſt of life, and one that in all his doings would neuer flatter the people, nor ſerue his owne glory, but rather to the contrary would do, ſay, and counſell alwayes for the moſt benefit and commodity of the cõmon-weale, was oft times enforced to reſiſt Themiſtocles, & diſappoint his ambitiõ, being euer buſily mouing the people, to take ſome new matter in hand. For they report of him, that he was ſo enflamed with deſire of glory, and to enterpriſe great matters, that being but a very yong man at the battel of Marathon, where there was no talke but of the worthineſſe of captaine Miltiades that had won the battell: he was found many times ſolitary alone deuiſing with himſelfe: beſides, they ſay he could take no reſt in the night, neither would go to playes in the day time, nor would keepe company with thoſe whom he was accuſtomed to be familiar withall before. Furthermore, he would tell thẽ that wondred to ſee ſo great alteration in his manners, and asked him what he ailed; that Miltiades victory would not let him ſleepe: becauſe other thought this ouerthrow at Marathon, would haue made an end of all wars. Howbeit Themiſtocles was of a contrary opinion, and that it was but a beginning of greater troubles. Therfore he daily ſtudied how to preuent them, & how to ſee to the ſafety of Greece, and before occasion offered, he did exercise his city in feats of war, foreseeing what shold folow after. Wherfore, where the citizens of ATHENS before did vse to deuide among themselues the reuenue of their mines of siluer, which were in a part of ATTICA called LAVRION, he alone was the first that durst speake to the people, & perswade them, that from thenceforth they should cease that distribution among themselues, & employ the mony of the same in making of galleys, to make wars against the ÆGYNETES. For their wars of all GREECE were most cruell, because they were lords of the sea, & had so great a number of ships. This perswasion drew the citizens more easily to Themistocles mind, than the threatning them with king Darius, or the Persians wold haue done: who were farre from them, and not feared that they would come neere vnto them. So this oportunity taken of the hatred & ielousie betweene the ATHENIANS & the ÆGYNETES, made the people to agree, of the said mony to make an 100. galleys, with which they fought against king Xerxes, and did ouercome him by sea. Now after this good beginning and succesſe, he wan the citizens by degrees to bend their force to sea, declaring vnto them, how by land they were scant able to make head against their equals, whereas by their power at sea, they should not only defend themselues from the barbarous people, but moreouer be able to cõmand all GREECE. Herupon he made them good mariners, & passing sea men, as Plato saith, where before they were stout & valiant souldiers by land. This gaue his enemies occasion to cast it in his teeth afterwards, that he had taken away from the ATHENIANS the pike & the target, and had brought them to the banke and the ower: and so he got the vpper hand of Miltiades. Who inueyed against him in that, as Stesimbrotus writeth. Now after he had thus his will, by bringing this sea seruice to passe, whether thereby he did ouerthrow the iustice of the cõmon weale or not, I leaue that to the philosophers to dispute. But that the preseruation of all GREECE stood at that time vpon the sea, and that the galleys only were the cause of setting vp ATHENS againe, Xerxes himself is a sufficient witnes, besides other proofes that might be brought thereof. For his army by land being yet whole, and vnset on, when he saw his army by sea broken, dispersed, & sunke, he fled straight vpon it, cõfessing as it were that he was now too weake to deale any more with the GRECIANS, & left Mardonius his lieutenãt in GREECE, of purpose in my opinion, rather to let that the GRECIANS should not follow him, then for any hope he had to ouercome them. Some write of Themistocles, that he was a very good husband for his owne profit, and carefull to looke to his things: for he did spend liberally, & loued oft to make sacrifices, and honorably to receiue and entertaine strangers: wherefore he had good reason to be careful to get, to defray his charges. Other to the cõtrary, blame him much, that he was too neere & miserable: for some say, he wold sell presents of meat that were giuen him. He did aske one Philides on a time, which had a breed of mares, a colt of gift: who denying him flatly, he was so angry, that he threatned him ere it were long he wold make his house the horse of wood, with the which TROIA was taken. Meaning couertly to let him vnderstand, that he wold shortly set strife & quarrell betwixt him, & his neareſt kinsmẽ & familiar friẽds. It is true that he was the most ambitious man of the world. For whẽ he was but a yong man, & scantly known, he earnestly intreated one Epicles borne at HERMIONNA, an excellent player of the citherne, & counted at that time the cunningest man in all ATHENS at that instrumẽt, that he wold come & teach his art at his house: and all was no more, but that many people being desirous to heare him play, shold aske for his house, & come thither to him. And one yeare when he went vnto the feast & assembly of the playes Olympicall, he would needs keepe open house for all commers, haue his tents richly furnished, and a great traine of seruants and all other furniture, only to contend with Cimon. This maruellously spited the GRECIANS, who thought Themistocles expences fit for Cimons countenance & ability, because he was a yong gentleman, & of a noble house: but for him that was but a new come mã, & would beare a greater port, then either became his calling or ability, they thought it not onely vnallowable in him, but meere presumption & vaineglory. Another time he defrayed the whole charges of a tragedy which was playd openly: & being set out therein to haue won the prise, and the ATHENIANS being maruellous desirous of the honor in such playes, he caused this victory of his to be painted in a table, which he did dedicate and set vp in a temple, with this inscriptiõ: Themistocles Phrearian defrayed the charges: Phrynicus made it: Adimantus was chiefe ruler. Yet notwithstanding he was well taken of the common people, partly because he would speake to euery citizẽ by his name, no man telling him their names: & partly also because he shewed himselfe an vpright iudge in priuate mẽs causes. As one day he answered the Poet Simonides, borne in CHIO, who did request an vnreasonable matter at his hands, at that time when he was gouernour of the city.

citie. Thou couldeſt be no good Poet, Simonides, if thou diddeſt ſing againſt the rules of Muſicke: neither my ſelfe a good gouernour of a city, if I ſhould do any thing againſt the law. And mocking the ſame Simonides another time, he told him he was but a foole to ſpeake ill of the CORINTHIANS, conſidering they were lords of ſo great and ſtrong a city: and that he was not wiſe to make himſelfe to be drawne, being ſo deformed and ill fauoured. But being growne in credit, and hauing won the fauour of the people, he was ſuch an enemy to Ariſtides, that in the end he made him to be expulſed & baniſhed ATHENS for fiue yeares. When newes were brought that the king of PERSIA was onwards on his iourny, and comming downe to make warres vpon the GRECIANS: the ATHENIANS conſulted whom they ſhould make their generall. And it is reported, that al their common counſellers which were wont to ſpeake in matters, fearing the danger, drew backe, ſaue an orator called Epicydes, Ephemides ſon, very eloquent in ſpeech, but ſomwhat womaniſh, faint hearted, & greedy of mony, who offered himſelfe to ſue for this charge, & had ſome hope to obtaine it. Wherfore Themiſtocles fearing all would not be well, if it fell to this man to be generall of the army, he bought out Epicydes ambition with ready money, and ſo made him let fall his ſute. It fell out Themiſtocles was greatly commended, about that was done to the Interpreter, that came with the king of PERSIAS ambaſſadors, and demaunded the empire of the GRECIANS both by ſea and land, that they ſhould acknowledge obedience to the king. For he cauſed him to be taken, and put to death by a common conſent, for vſing the Greeke tongue in the ſeruice and cõmandement of the barbarous people. It was a notable thing alſo, that at his motion, Arthmius borne at ZELEA, was noted of infamy, both he, his children, and all his poſterity after him, becauſe he brought gold from the king of PERSIA, to corrupt and win the GRECIANS. But the greateſt and worthieſt act he did in thoſe parts, was this: that he pacified all ciuill wars among the GRECIANS, perſwading the cities to leaue off their quarrels vntill the wars were done, in the which they ſay Chileus Arcadian did helpe him more then any other man. He being now choſen generall of the ATHENIANS, went about preſently to imbarke his citizens into gallies, declaring to them they ſhould leaue their city, and go meet with the barbarous king by ſea, ſo far from the coaſt of GRECE as they could: but the people did not thinke that good. Wherfore he led great numbers of ſouldiers by land, into the country of TEMPES with the LACEDÆMONIANS, to keepe the paſſage & entry into THESSALY, againſt the barbarous people, which country ſtood yet ſound to GRECE, and not reuolted to the MEDES. Afterwards the GRECIANS comming from thence without any act done, & the THESSALIANS alſo being won ſomwhat on the kings ſide, for that all the whole country vnto BOEOTIA was at the deuotion & goodwil of the barbarous people, the ATHENIANS began then to find, how Themiſtocles opinion to fight by ſea was very good. Whereupon they ſent him with their nauy to the city of ARTEMISIVM, to keepe the ſtraight. There the other GRECIANS would haue had the LACEDÆMONIANS and their Admirall Eurybiades to haue had the authority and commandement of the reſt. But the ATHENIANS would not ſet ſaile vnder any other Admiral then their own, becauſe theirs were the greateſt number of ſhips in the army, & aboue all the other GRECIANS. Themiſtocles foreſeeing the dãger that was likely to fall out amongſt themſelues, did willingly yeeld the whole authority vnto Eurybiades, and got the ATHENIANS to agree vnto it: aſſuring them, that if they behaued themſelues valiantly in theſe wars, the other GRECIANS of their owne accord would afterward ſubmit themſelues vnto their obedience. Hereby it appeareth, that he only of all other was at that time, the originall cauſe of the ſauing of GRECE, & did moſt aduance the honor & glory of the ATHENIANS, by making them to ouercome their enemies by force, and their friends and allies with liberality. In the meane time, Eurybiades ſeeing the barbarous fleete riding at anker, all alongſt the Ile of APHETES, with ſuch a great number of ſhips in the vaward, he began to be affraid. And vnderſtanding moreouer, there were other two hundred ſaile that went to caſt about the Ile of SCIATHE, & ſo to come in: he preſently would haue retired further into GRECE, and would haue drawn neerer vnto PELOPONNESVS, to the end their army by ſea might be neere their army by land, as thinking it vnpoſſible to fight with king Xerxes power by ſea. Wherupon the inhabitants of the Ile of EVBOEA, fearing leaſt the GRECIANS wold leaue thẽ to the ſpoile of the enemy, they cauſed Themiſtocles ſecretly to be ſpoken withall, and ſent him a good ſumme of money by one called Pelagon. Themiſtocles tooke the mony, as Herodotus writeth, and gaue it to Eurybiades. But there was one Architeles amongſt the ATHENIANS, captaine of the galley called the holy galley, that was much againſt Themiſtocles intended purpoſe: who hauing no money to pay his mariners, did what he could that they might depart with ſpeed from thence. Themiſtocles ſtirred vp then his ſouldiers more againſt him then before, inſomuch as they went aboord his gally and tooke his ſupper from him. Architeles being maruellous angry and offended withall, Themiſtocles ſent him both bread and meate in a pannier, and in the bottome thereof he had put a talent of ſiluer, bidding him for that night to ſuppe with that, and the next morning he ſhould prouide for his mariners, or elſe he would complaine, and accuſe him to the citizens that he had taken mony of the enemies. Thus it is written by Phanias Lesbian. Moreouer theſe firſt fights in the ſtraite of EVBOEA, betweene the GRECIANS, & the barbarous people, were nothing to purpoſe to end the wars betweene them. For it was but a taſte giuen vnto them, which ſerued the GRECIANS turne very much, by making them to ſee by experience, and the maner of the fight, that it was not the great multitude of ſhips, nor the pompe & ſumptuous ſetting out of the ſame, nor the proud barbarous ſhouts and ſongs of victory, that could ſtand them to purpoſe, againſt noble hearts and valiant minded ſouldiers, that durſt grapple with them, and come to hand-ſtrokes with their enemies: and that they ſhould make no reckening of all that brauery & brags, but ſhould ſticke to it like men, and lay it on the iackes of them. The which (as it ſeemeth) the poet Pindarus vnderſtood very well, when he ſayd touching the battell of ARTEMISIVM:

The ſtout Athenians, haue now foundation layed
vnto the liberty of Greece, by theſe aſſaults aſſayed.

The coaſt of Artemiſium.

For out of doubt the beginning of victory, is to be hardy. This place ARTEMISIVM is a part of the Ile of EVBOEA, looking towards the North, aboue the city of ESTIÆA, lying directly ouer againſt the country which ſometimes was vnder the obedience of the PHILOCTETES, and ſpecially of the city of OLIZON. There is a litle tẽple of Diana, ſurnamed Orientall, round about the which there are trees, and a compaſſe of pillars of white ſtone, which when a man rubs with his hand, they ſhew of the colour and ſauour of ſaffron. And in one of thoſe pillars there is an inſcription of lamentable verſes to this effect:

When boldeſt blouds of Athens by their might,
had ouercome the numbers infinite of Aſia: they then in memory, of all their deeds, and valiant victory,
began to build, this noble monument,
and to Diane the ſame they did preſent,
for that they had the Medes likewiſe ſubdued,
and with their bloud, their hardy hands embrued.

There is a place ſeene alſo vpon that coaſt at this day, a good way into the land, in the middeſt whereof are great ſands full of blacke duſt like aſhes: and they thinke that they burnt in that place all dead bodies and old ſhipwrackes. Newes being brought what had bene done in the countrey of THERMOPYLES, how that king Leonidas was dead, and how that Xerxes had won that entry into GRECE by land: the GRECIANS then brought their whole army by ſea more into GRECE, the ATHENIANS being in the rereward in this retraite, as men whoſe hearts were lift vp with the glory of their former valiant deedes. Now Themiſtocles paſſing by thoſe places where he knew the enemies muſt of neceſſity fall vpon the lee ſhore for harborow: he did ingraue certaine words ſpoken vnto the IONIANS, in great letters in ſtone, which he found there by chaunce, or purpoſely brought thither for that purpoſe, where there was very good harbour for ſhips, and fit places alſo to lye in. Theſe were the words: that the IONIANS ſhould take the GRECIANS parts being their founders and auncеſtors, and ſuch as fought for their liberty: or at the leaſt they ſhould trouble the army of the barbarous people, and do them all the miſchiefe they could, when the GRECIANS ſhould come to fight with them. By theſe words he hoped either to bring the IONIANS to take their part, or at the leaſt he ſhould make the barbarous people iealous and miſtruſtfull of them. Xerxes being already entred into the vppermoſt part of the prouince of DORICA, into the countrey PHOCIDA, burning and deſtroying the townes and cities of the PHOCIANS: the other GRECIANS lay ſtill and ſuffered the inuaſion, notwithſtanding the ATHENIANS did requeſt them to meete with the barbarous army in BOEOTIA, to ſaue the countrey of ATTICA, as before they had done, when they went by ſea to ARTEMISIVM. But they would not hearken to it in no wiſe: and all was becauſe they were deſirous they ſhould draw to the ſtrait of PELOPONNESVS, and there they ſhould aſſemble the whole

whole ſtrength and power of GRECE within the barre of the ſame, and make a ſtrong ſubſtantiall wall from the one ſea to the other. The ATHENIANS were very angry at this deuice, and were halfe diſcouraged and out of heart, to ſee themſelues thus forſaken and caſt off by the reſt of the GRECIANS. For it was out of all ſpeech that they alone ſhould fight againſt ſo many thouſands of enemies: and therefore their only remedy was, to leaue their city, and to get them to the ſea. The people were very vnwilling to liſten hereunto, making their reckening it was needleſſe to be carefull to ouercome, or to ſaue themſelues, hauing once forſaken the temples of their gods, and the graues of their parents. Wherfore Themiſtocles ſeeing that neither reaſon, nor mans perſwaſion could bring the people to like his opinion: he began to frame a deuice (as men do vſe ſometimes in tragedies) and to threaten the ATHENIANS with ſignes from heauen, with oracles and anſwers from the gods. And the occaſion of Mineruaes dragon ſerued his turne for a celeſtiall ſigne and token, which by good fortune did not appeare in thoſe daies in the temple as it was wont to do: and the prieſts found the ſacrifices which were daily offered to him, whole and vntouched by any. Wherefore being informed by Themiſtocles what they ſhould do, they ſpread a brute abroad amongſt the people, that the goddeſſe Minerua, the protector and defender of the citie, had forſaken it, pointing them the way vnto the ſea. And againe he wan them by a Prophecie, which commanded them to ſaue themſelues in wals of wood: ſaying that the wals of wood did ſignifie nothing elſe but ſhips. And for this cauſe he ſaid, Apollo in his oracle called SALAMINA diuine, not miſerable nor vnfortunate, becauſe it ſhould giue the name of a moſt happy victorie which the GRECIANS ſhould get there. And ſo at the laſt they following his counſell, he made this decree, that they ſhould leaue the city of ATHENS to the cuſtodie of the goddeſſe Pallas, that was ladie and gouernor of the countrey, and that all thoſe which were of age to carie any weapon ſhould get them to the gallies: and for the reſt, that euery man ſhould ſee his wife, children, and bondmen placed in ſome ſure place as well as he could. After this decree was paſt and authorized by the people, the moſt part of them did conuey their aged fathers and mothers, their wiues and litle children, into the city of TROEZEN, where the TROEZNIANS receiued them very louingly and gently. For they gaue order that they ſhold be entertained of the common charge, allowing them a peece, two obulos of their money a day, and ſuffered the young children to gather fruit wherſoeuer they found it: and furthermore did hire ſchoolemaiſters at the charge of the commonwealth, to bring them vp at ſchoole. He that was the penner of this decree, was one called Nicagoras. The ATHENIANS at that time, had no common mony, but the Senate of the Areopagites (as Ariſtotle ſaith) furniſhed euery ſouldier with eight drachmas, which was the only meane that the gallies were armed. Yet Clidemus writeth, that this was a craft deuiſed of Themiſtocles. The ATHENIANS being come downe vnto the hauen of PIRÆA, he made as though Pallas target (on the which Meduſaes head was grauen) had bene loſt, and was not found with the image of the goddeſſe: and faining to ſeeke for it, he ranſacked euery corner of the gallies, and found a great deale of ſiluer which priuate perſons had hidden amongſt their fardels. This mony was brought out vnto the people, and by this meanes the ſouldiers that were ſhipped had wherwithall to prouide them of neceſſarie things. When time came that they were to depart the hauen, and that all the citie of ATHENS had taken ſea: one way it was a pitie to behold them: another way it made all ſorts to wonder, that conſidered the boldneſſe and courage of thoſe men, which before ſent away their fathers and mothers from them, and were nothing moued at their teares, cries, ſhrikes, and embracings of their wiues, their children, and departures, but ſtoutly and reſolutely held on their courſe to SALAMINA. Notwithſtanding, there were many old citizens left ſtill of neceſſitie in ATHENS, becauſe they could not be remoued for very extreame age, which ſtirred many with compaſſion toward them. There was beſides, a certaine pitie that made mens hearts to yerne, when they ſaw the poore dogges, beaſtes, and cattell runne vp and downe bleating, mowing, and howling out aloude after their maiſters, in token of ſorrow, when they did imbarke. Amongſt theſe, there goeth a ſtraunge tale of Xanthippus dogge, who was Pericles father: which for ſorrow his maiſter had left him behind him, did caſt himſelfe after into the ſea, and ſwimming ſtill by the gallies ſide wherein his maiſter was, he held on to the Iſle of SALAMINA, where ſo ſoone as the poore curre landed, his breath failed him, & he died preſently. They ſay, at this day the place called the dogs graue, is the very place where he was buried. Theſe were ſtraunge acts of Themiſtocles, that beholding the ATHENIANS ſory for the abſence of Ariſtides, and fearing leſt of ſpite he taking part with the barbarous nation, might haue bene

the ruine and deſtruction of the ſtate of GRECE, being baniſhed fiue yeares alſo before the wars by Themiſtocles procurement: that he did ſet forth a decree, that all thoſe which had bene baniſhed for a time, might returne home againe, to do, to ſay, and to giue counſell to the citizens in thoſe things, which they thought beſt for the preſeruation of GRECE. And alſo where Eurybiades being Generall of the GRECIANS whole army by ſea, for the worthines of the city of SPARTA, but otherwiſe a ranke coward at time of need, would in any caſe depart from thence, and retire into the gulfe of PELOPONNESVS, where all the army of the PELOPONNESIANS was by land aſſembled: that Themiſtocles withſtood him, and did hinder it all he could. At that time alſo it was, that Themiſtocles made ſo notable anſwers, which ſpecially are noted & gathered together. For when Eurybiades ſaid one day vnto him: Themiſtocles, thoſe that at playes and games do riſe before the cõpany, are whiſtled at. It is true, ſaid Themiſtocles: but thoſe alſo that tary laſt, do neuer win any game. Another time Eurybiades hauing a ſtaffe in his hand lift it vp, as though he would haue ſtriken him: Strike and thou wilt, ſaid he, ſo thou wilt heare me. Eurybiades wondring to ſee him ſo patient, ſuffered him then to ſay what he would. Then Themiſtocles began to bring him to reaſon: but one that ſtood by, ſaid vnto him: Themiſtocles, for a man that hath neither city nor houſe, it is an ill part to will others that haue, to forſake all. Themiſtocles turning to him, replied: We haue willingly forſaken our houſes & wals, ſaid he, cowardly beaſt that thou art, becauſe we would not become ſlaues for feare to loſe things that haue neither ſoule nor life. And yet our city I tell thee is the greateſt of all GRECE: for it is a fleet of 200. galleys ready to fight, which are come hither to ſaue you if you liſt. But if you will needs go your waies and forſake vs the ſecond time, you ſhall heare tell ere it be long, that the ATHENIANS haue another free city, and haue poſſeſſed againe as much good land, as that they haue already loſt. Theſe words made Eurybiades preſently thinke, and feare, that the ATHENIANS would not go, and that they would forſake them. And as another Eretrian was about to vtter his reaſon againſt Themiſtocles opinion: he could not but aunſwer him: Alas, and muſt you my maiſters talke of warres too, that are like to a Sleeue? Indeed you haue a ſword, but you lacke a heart. Some write, that whilſt Themiſtocles was talking thus from his galley, they ſpied an owle flying on the right hand of the ſhips which came to light on one of the maſts of the galleys: and that hereupon all the other GRECIANS did agree to his opinion, and prepared to fight by ſea. But when the fleete of their enemies ſhippes ſhewed on the coaſtes of ATTICA, hard by the hauen Phalericus, and couered all the riuers thereabouts, as farre as any bodie could ſee, and that King Xerxes himſelfe was come in perſon with all his armie by land, to campe by the ſea ſide: ſo that his whole power both by land and ſea might be ſeene in ſight: then the GRECIANS had forgotten all Themiſtocles goodly perſwaſions, and beganne to incline againe to the PELOPONNESIANS, conſidering how they might recouer the gulfe of PELOPONNESVS, and they did grow very angry, when any man went about to talke of any other matter. To be ſhort, it was concluded that they ſhould ſaile away the next night following, and the maiſters of the ſhippes had order giuen them to make all things readie for them to depart. Themiſtocles perceiuing their determination, he was maruellous angrie in his mind, that the GRECIANS would thus diſperſe themſelues aſunder, repairing euery man to his owne citie, and leauing the aduantage which the nature of the place, and the ſtraight of the arme of the ſea, where they lay in harbour together, did offer them: and ſo he bethought himſelfe how this was to be holpen. Sodainely the practiſe of one Sicinus came into his mind, who being a PERSIAN borne, and taken priſoner before in the warres, loued Themiſtocles very well, and was ſchoole-maiſter to his children. This Sicinus he ſecretly ſent vnto the king of PERSIA, to aduertiſe him that Themiſtocles (Generall of the ATHENIANS) was very deſirous to becom his Maieſties ſeruant, and that he did let him vnderſtand betimes, that the GRECIANS were determined to flie: and therefore that he wiſhed him not to let them eſcape, but to ſet vpon them, whileſt they were troubled and afraid, and farre from their armie by land, to the end that vpon a ſudden he might ouerthrow their whole power by ſea. Xerxes ſuppoſing this intelligence came from a man that wiſhed him well, receiued the meſſenger with great ioy, and thereupon gaue preſent order to his captaines by ſea, that they ſhould imbarke their men into the other ſhippes at better leiſure, and that preſently they ſhould put out with all poſſible ſpeed, two hundred ſaile to follow the GRECIANS in the taile, to ſhut vp the foreland of the ſtraight, and to compaſſe the Iſles all about, that not one of his enemies ſhippes might eſcape: and ſo it fell out. Then Ariſtides (Lyſimachus ſonne) being the firſt that perceiued it, went to Themiſtocles

cles tent, though he was his enemy, and through his only meanes had bene baniſhed before, as ye haue heard: and calling him out, told him how they were enuironed. Themiſtocles, who knew well inough the goodneſſe of this man, being very glad he came at that time to ſeeke him out, declared vnto him the pollicie he had vſed by the meſſage of Sicinus, praying him to put too his helpe to ſtay the GRECIANS, and to procure with him, conſidering his word had more authority among them, that they would fight within the ſtraight of SALAMINA. Ariſtides commending his great wiſedome, went to deale with the captaines of the other gallies, and to procure them to fight. For all this, they would not credit that he ſaid, vntill ſuch time as there arriued a galley of TENEDIENA, whereof one Panetius was captaine, who being ſtolen out of the hoſt of the barbarous armie, brought certaine newes, that the ſtraight out of doubt was ſhut vp. So that beſides the neceſſitie which did vrge them, the ſpite which the GRECIANS conceiued thereof, did prouoke them to hazard the battell. The next morning by breake of day, King Xerxes placed himſelfe on a maruellous ſteepe high hill, from whence he might diſcerne his whole fleete, and the ordering of his armie by ſea, aboue the temple of Hercules, as Phanodemus writeth. Which is the narrow way or channell betwixt the Iſle of SALAMINA, and the coaſt of ATTICA: or as Aceſtodorus ſaith, vpon the confines of the territories of MEGARA, aboue the point which they commonly call the Hornes. There Xerxes ſet vp a throne of gold, and had about him many ſecretaries to write all that was done in the battell. But as Themiſtocles was ſacrificing vnto the gods in his galley that was Admirall, they brought to him three young priſoners, faire of complexion, richly arrayed with gold and iewels, whom they ſaid were the children of Sandace the kings ſiſter, and of prince Autarctus. So ſoone as Euphrantides the ſoothſayer had ſeene them, and at their arriuall obſerued there roſe a great bright flame out of the ſacrifice, and at the very ſelfe ſame inſtant that one on his right hand had ſneezed: he tooke Themiſtocles by the hand, and willed him to ſacrifice all thoſe three priſoners vnto the god Bacchus, ſurnamed Omeſtes, as much to ſay, as the cruell Bacchus: for in doing it, the GRECIANS ſhould not onely be ſaued, but they ſhould haue the victorie ouer their enemies. Themiſtocles wondred much, to heare ſo ſtraunge and terrible a commaundement of the ſoothſayer. Neuertheleſſe, the common ſort following their cuſtom, which is, to promiſe ſafetie ſooner in the greateſt daungers, and moſt deſperate caſes, by ſtraunge and vnreaſonable, rather then by reaſonable and ordinarie meanes: they began to call vpon the god with one voice, and bringing the three priſoners neare vnto the altar, they compelled him to performe the ſacrifice in that ſort as the ſoothſayer had appointed. Phanias Lesbian, an excellent Philoſopher, and well ſeene in ſtories and antiquities, reporteth this matter thus. As for the number of the ſhips of the barbarous nauie: Æſchilus the poet, in a tragedie which he entituled the PERSIANS, knowing certainely the troth, ſaith thus:

Themiſtocles and Ariſtides conſent together to giue battell.

King Xerxes had a thouſand ſhippes I know, amongſt the which, two hundred were (I trow)
and ſeuen: which all the reſt did ouerſaile with ſwifter courſe. This is withouten faile.

Xerxes king of Perſia had a thouſand ſhips.

The ATHENIANS had nine ſcore, in euery one of the which there were eighteene ſouldiers, whereof foure of them were archers, and all the reſt armed men. Themiſtocles alſo did with no leſſe skill and wiſedome chooſe his time and place to fight, forbearing to charge his enemies, vntill the hower was come, that of ordinarie cuſtome the ſea wind aroſe, and brought in a rough tide within the channell, which did not hurt the GRECIAN gallies, being made low and ſnug, but greatly offended the PERSIAN gallies, being high cargued, heauy, and not yare of ſteredge, and made them lye ſidelong to the GRECIANS, who fiercely ſet vpon them, hauing alwaies an eye to Themiſtocles direction, that beſt foreſaw their aduantage. At the ſame time, Ariamenes, Xerxes Admirall, a man of great valure and worthieſt of the Kings brethren, beſtowed arrowes and darts as it were from the wals of a caſtle, charging the galley of Aminias Decelian, and Soſicles Pedian, which were ioyned and grapled with him, and fiercely entring the ſame, was by them valiantly receiued vpon their pikes, and thruſt ouer bord into the ſea. Whoſe body floting amongſt other ſhipwracks Artemiſia knowing, cauſed to be carried to king Xerxes. Now whileſt this battell ſtoode in theſe termes, they ſay that there appeared a great flame in the element toward the citie of ELEVSIN, and that a loud voice was heard through all the plaine of THRASIA vnto the ſea, as if there had bene a number of men together, that had ſong out aloude the holy ſong of Iacchus. And it ſeemed by litle and litle, that there roſe a cloud in the ayre from thoſe which ſang, that left the land, and came and lighted on the galleys in the ſea. Other affirmed, that they ſawe armed men, which did reach out their hands from the Iſle of Æ GINA, towards the GRECIAN gallies: and they thought they were the Æ ACIDES, for whoſe helpe they all prayed before the battell was begunne. The firſt man of the ATHENIANS that tooke any of the enemies ſhips, was Lycomedes, a captaine of a galley: who hauing taken very rich furniture and flags, did afterwards conſecrate them to Apollo laurell: as ye would ſay, victorious. The other GRECIANS in the front being equall in number with the barbarous ſhips, by reaſon of the ſtraightnes of the arme of the ſea wherein they fought, and ſo ſtraightned as they could not fight but by one and one, whereby the BARBARIANS diſorderly laied one another aboord, that they did hinder themſelues with their ouer multitude: and in the end were ſo ſore preſſed vpon by the GRECIANS, that they were conſtrained to flie by night, after they had fought and maintained battell vntill it was very darke. So that the GRECIANS wan that glorious and famous victorie: of the which may truly be affirmed that, as Simonides ſaith:

The Grecians victory of the Perſians nauie by ſea.

Was neuer yet, nor Greeke nor barbarous crew,
that could by ſea ſo many men ſubdew:
Nor that obtaind ſo famous victorie,
in any fight againſt their enemie.

Thus was the victory won through the valiantnes and courage of thoſe that fought that battel, but eſpecially through Themiſtocles great pollicie and wiſdome. After this battell Xerxes being mad for his loſſe, thought to fill vp the arme of the ſea, and to paſſe his armie by land, vpon a bridge, into the Iſle of SALAMINA. Themiſtocles, becauſe he would feele Ariſtides opinion, told him as they were talking together, that he thought beſt to go and occupie the ſtraight of HELLESPONT with the armie by ſea, to breake the bridge of ſhippes which Xerxes had cauſed to be made: to the end, ſaid he, that we may take ASIA into EVROPE. Ariſtides liked not this opinion: for we haue (ſaid he) fought all this while againſt this barbarous King, who thought but to play with vs: but if we ſhut him within GRECE, and bring him to fight of neceſſitie to ſaue his life: ſuch an enemy that commaundeth ſo great an army, will no more ſtand ſtill as a looker on, and ſit at his eaſe vnder his golden pauilion, to ſee the paſtime of the battell, but will proue euery way, and be himſelfe in euery place at all aſſaies to ſaue himſelfe from ſuch a ſtraight and danger. Thus with politike care and foreſight, he may eaſily amend his former fault committed by negligence, and do well enough, when he ſhall ſee his life and kingdome both depend vpon it. Therfore Themiſtocles, I would thinke not beſt to breake his bridge at all, which he hath cauſed to be made; but rather if we could, to build another to it, to driue him out of EVROPE as ſoone as we could. Themiſtocles then replyed: Seing you thinke this were good to be done, we muſt all lay our heades together, to deuiſe how he may be forced to come out as ſoone as we could. They breaking off with this reſolution, Themiſtocles ſent immediatly one of the Kings Eunuches, called Arſaces, that was one of the groomes of his chamber, whome he found out amongeſt the priſoners, and by him he ſent this meſſage vnto the King: That the GRECIANS hauing won the battell of him by ſea, had decreed in their counſell, how they would go to the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, to breake the bridge of the ſhips he had cauſed to be made there. Wherof he thought good to aduertiſe him for the good will he did beare him, and to the end he might bethinke him betimes, to get him away to the ſea within his owne dominion, and ſo paſſe backe againe into ASIA as ſoone as he could, whileſt he gaue order to his allies and confederates, to ſtay following him at the poope. The barbarous King vnderſtanding theſe newes, was ſo afraid, that he hoiſſed away with all poſſible ſpeed. The further foreſight and great wiſedome of Themiſtocles, and Ariſtides, in marine cauſes, did manifeſtly appeare afterwards in the battell the GRECIANS fought before the citie of PLATEA, againſt Mardonius, king Xerxes lieutenant: who hauing but a ſmal power of the King his ſoueraignes there, did yet put the GRECIANS to great diſtreſſe, and in hazard to haue loſt all. Of all the townes and cities that fought in this battell, Herodotus writeth, that the citie of ÆGINA wanne the fame for valiantneſſe aboue the reſt: and of priuate men, among the GRECIANS, Themiſtocles was iudged the worthieſt man: although it was ſore againſt their willes, becauſe they enuied much his glorie. For after the battell done, all the captaines being gotten into the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, and hauing ſworne vpon the altar of their ſacrifices, that they would giue their voyces after their conſciences, to thoſe they thought had beſt deſerued it: euery one gaue himſelfe the firſt place for worthineſſe, and the ſecond vnto Themiſtocles.

ſtocles. The LACEDÆMONIANS caried him into SPARTA, where they iudged the honour and dignitie of valiantneſſe to their Admirall Eurybiades: but the wiſedome and pollicie they attributed to Themiſtocles. In token thereof they gaue him an oliue braunch, and the goodlieſt coach that was in their citie: and moreouer they ſent three huudred of their luſtie youths to accompany him, and conduct him out of their countrey. And they ſay, that at the next feaſts and aſſemblies of the playes Olympicall which were made after this victory, when Themiſtocles was once come into the ſhew place where theſe games were played, the people looked no more on them that fought, but all caſt their eyes on him, ſhewing him to the ſtraungers which knew him not, with their fingers, and by clapping of their hands did witneſſe how much they eſteemed him. Whereat he himſelfe tooke ſo great delight, that he confeſſed to his familiar friendes, he then did reape the fruite and benefite of his ſundrie and painefull ſeruices he had taken in hand, for the preſeruation of GREECE: ſo ambitious was he of nature, and couetous of honour, as we may eaſily perceiue by certaine of his deedes and notable ſayings they haue noted of him. For being choſen Admirall of ATHENS, he neuer diſpatched any cauſes priuate or publicke, howſoeuer they fell out, vntill the very day of his departure, and taking ſhippe: and all becauſe that men ſeeing him diſpatch much buſineſſe at once, and to ſpeake with ſo many perſons together, they ſhould eſteeme him to be the notabler man, and of the greater authoritie. Another time he walked vpon the ſands by the ſea ſide, beholding the dead bodies of the barbarous people, which the ſea had caſt vp vppon the ſhore: and ſeeing ſome of them that had on ſtill their chaines of gold, and bracelets, he paſſed by on his way, but ſhewed them yet to a familiar friend of his that followed him, and ſaid vnto him: take thou thoſe, for thou art not Themiſtocles. And vnto one Antiphates, who in his youth had bene a goodly young boy, and at that time did ſcornefully behaue himſelfe vnto him, making no reckening of him: and now that he ſaw him in great authoritie came to ſee him, he ſayed: O my young ſonne, and friend: we are both euen at one time (but too late) growne wiſe. He ſaid the ATHENIANS did not eſteeme of him nor honour him in time of peace: but when any ſtorme of warres were towards, and they ſtoode in any daunger, they ranne to him then, as men runne to the ſhadow of a plane tree, vpon any ſodaine raine: and afterwardes when faire weather commeth againe, they cut away the braunches, and boughes thereof. There was a man borne in the Iſle of SERIPHA, who being fallen out with him, did caſt him in the teeth, that it was not for his worthineſſe, but for the noble citie wherein he was borne, that he had wonne ſuch glorie: Thou ſayeſt true ſaid he: but neither ſhould I euer haue wonne any great honour, if I had bene a SERIPHIAN, nor thou alſo if thou hadſt bene an ATHENIAN. Another time one of the captaines of the citie, hauing done good ſeruice vnto the commonweale, made boaſt before Themiſtocles, and compared his ſeruice equall with his. Themiſtocles to anſwer him, told him a pretie tale. That the working day brauled on a time with the holy day, repining againſt her, that he laboured for his liuing continually, and how ſhe did nothing but fill her belly, and ſpend that they had gotten. Thou haſt reaſon ſaid the holy day. But if I had not bene before thee, thou haddeſt not bene here now. And ſo, if I had not bene then: where had you my maiſters bene now? His owne ſon was a litle too fawſie with his mother, and with him alſo, bearing himſelfe ouer-boldly of her good will, by meanes of her cockering of him. Wherupon being merily diſpoſed, he wold ſay that his ſon could do more then any man in all GREECE. For, ſaith he, the ATHENIANS command the GRECIANS, I command the ATHENIANS, my wife commandeth me, and my ſon commaundeth her. Moreouer becauſe he would be ſingular by himſelfe aboue all other men: hauing a peece of land he would ſell, he willed the cryer to proclaime open ſale of it in the market place, and withall he ſhould adde vnto the ſale, that his land lay by a good neighbour. Another time, two men being ſuters to his daughter, he preferred the honeſter before the richer, ſaying: he had rather haue to his ſonne in lawe a man that lacked goods, then goods to lacke a man. Theſe were Themiſtocles pleaſant conceipts and aunſwers. But after he had done all theſe things we haue ſpoken of before, he took in hand to build againe the city and wals of ATHENS, and did corrupt the officers of LACEDÆMONIA with mony, to the end they ſhould not hinder his purpoſe, as Theopompus writeth. Or as all other ſay when he had deceiued them by this ſubtiltie, he went vnto SPARTA, as ambaſſadour, ſent thither of purpoſe vpon the complaints of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that the ATHENIANS did incloſe their citie againe with wals, who were accuſed vnto the counſell of SPARTA, by an Oratour called Poliarchus, who was ſent thither from the ÆGINETES, of purpoſe to proſecute this matter againſt the ATHENIANS. Themiſtocles ſtoutly denyed it to them, and prayed them for better vnderſtanding of the troth, they would ſend ſome of their men thither to ſee it. This was but a fetch onely to win by this delay, the ATHENIANS ſo much more time to raiſe vp their wals, and that the ATHENIANS ſhould keepe as hoſtages for ſuretie of his perſon, thoſe they ſhould ſend to ATHENS, to bring backe the report thereof: and ſo it fell out. For the LACEDÆMONIANS being enformed of the troth as it was, did him no hurt, but diſſembling the miſliking they had to be thus abuſed by him, ſent him away ſafe and ſound. Afterwards he made them alſo mend and fortifie the hauen of PIRÆA, hauing conſidered the ſituation of the place, and all to encline the citie to the ſea. Wherein he did directly contrarie to all the counſell of the ancient Kings of ATHENS: who ſeeking (as they ſay) to withdraw their people from the ſea, and to accuſtome them to liue vpon the land, by planting, ſowing, and plowing their grounds, did deuiſe and giue out abroad, the fable they tell of the goddeſſe Pallas. And that is this, how ſhe contending with Neptune about the patronage of the countrey of ATHENS, brought foorth and ſhewed to the Iudges the oliue tree, by meanes whereof ſhe preuailed and obtained the preheminence. Euen ſo Themiſtocles did not ioyne the hauen of PIRÆA, vnto the citie of ATHENS, as the Comicall poet Ariſtophanes ſaith: but rather ioyned the citie vnto the hauen PIRÆA, and the land vnto the ſea. By this meanes he made the people ſtrong againſt the nobility, and brought the communaltie to waxe bolder then they were before, by reaſon the rule and authoritie fell into the hands of ſaylers, mariners, pilots, ſhip-maiſters, and ſuch kind of ſeafaring men: ſo as the pulpit where all the orations were made, ſtood in the market place of PNYX, and did looke towards the ſea. But the thirtie tyrants that came in afterwards, did remooue it, and turne it towards the land: holding opinion to be ſtrong by ſea, was it that did maintaine the authoritie of the popular ſtate: and that contrariwiſe they which liue by the labour and toile of the earth, do more willingly like the gouernment of Nobilitie. Themiſtocles called to mind another matter alſo of greater importance, to make the citie of ATHENS of a greater power by ſea. For after the retire of Xerxes, and that all the fleete and nauie of the GRECIANS wintered in the hauen of PEGASES: he ſaid one day in an open aſſembly of the people, that he had thought of a thing which would be very profitable and beneficiall for them, but it was not to be told openly. The people willed him then to impart it to Ariſtides: and if he thought it good, they would execute it ſpeedily. Themiſtocles then told Ariſtides: the thing he had conſidered of, was to burne the Arcenall where the GRECIANS nauie lay, and to ſet on fire all their ſhippes. Ariſtides hearing his purpoſe, returned to the people, and told them: how nothing could be more profitable, but withall more vniuſt, then that which Themiſtocles had deuiſed. The ATHENIANS then willed Ariſtides it ſhould be let alone altogether. Furthermore when the LACEDÆMONIANS had exhibited their petition to the counſell of the Amphictions (that is the generall counſell of all the ſtates of GREECE aſſembled) how the townes and cities of GREECE which had not bene parties with the GRECIANS in the league, againſt the barbarous people, ſhould be put off wholly from this counſell. Themiſtocles doubting that if the ARGIVES, the THESSALIANS, and the THEBANES alſo ſhould by this meanes be exempted, that the LACEDÆMONIANS would be then the greater number in voyces, and by this meanes might do what they would in this counſell: he ſpake ſo conſiderately for the cities which they would haue thus diſcharged, that he made the petitioners in the aſſembly vtterly to chaunge their opinion. Declaring, how there were but one and thirtie cities compriſed only in the league, and yet that ſome of them were very weake and ſmal: and how it were no reaſon, that reiecting all the reſt of GREECE, the greateſt authoritie of this counſell ſhould fall into the hands of two or three of the chiefeſt cities alone. For this cauſe chiefly the LACEDÆMONIANS did euer beare him extreme hatred, and did ſtir vp Cimon all they could, to be alwaies aduerſarie oppoſite vnto him, and as it were to beard him in all matters of ſtate, and the gouernement of ATHENS. They procured him beſides the ill will and diſpleaſure of all the friends and confederates of the ATHENIANS, for that he went ſayling ſtill too and fro alongſt the Iſles, exacting money of the inhabitants of the ſame. And this is to be knowne by the matter propounded by him to the ANDRIANS (of whom he would haue had money) and by the anſwer they made him, as Herodotus writeth. Which was, how he had brought them two mightie gods: Loue and Force. And they anſwered him againe, that they alſo had two great goddeſſes, which kept them from giuing of him any money: Pouertie and Impoſsibilitie. And to make this good alſo: Timocreon the Rhodian Poet galled him to the quicke, when he ſharpely taunted him, for calling many home againe for money that were baniſhed: and how for the couetouſneſſe of money he had betraied, and forſaken his hoſt and friend. The verſes wherein this matter is mentioned, are to this effect: The Andrians goddeſſes, Pouertie, and Impoſſibilitie.

Who liſt commend worthy Pauſanias, Zanthippus or good Leotychides,
yet ſhall I ſeeme but light thereof to paſſe,
compared with valiant Ariſtides.
For yet was nay, the like in Athens towne,
nor neuer ſhall come none of like renowne.
Themiſtocles by right and due deſert, is hated of Latona, for his lies,
and for he bare a traitrous wicked heart,
who like a wretch, and niggard did deuiſe,
for ſmall reward his hoſt Timocreon to hold out of his countrey Ialiſon.
He tooke for bribe (vniuſtly yet therewhile)
of ready coine three talents faire and bright, reuoking ſuch as pleaſd him, from exile,
and baniſhing full many a worthy wight.
Or putting them to death, without cauſe told,
he gate thereby, great heapes of coyne and gold.
But in the end (o right reward for ſuch)
this bribing wretch, was forced for to hold a tipling booth, moſt like a clowne or ſnuch, at holy feaſts and paſtimes manifold,
which were amongſt the people in thoſe dayes Iſtmiciane folke, did vſe the like alwayes.
And there he ſeru'd his gueſts with cold meate ſtill, whileſt they that taſted of his cookerie, gan wiſh that they (to eaſe their weary will) had neuer liued, to ſee the treacherie of falſe Themiſtocles, and that he might no longer liue, which wrought them ſuch deſpight.

After this, he did more openly blaſe him to the world, when he was baniſhed and condemned, in a ſong that had beginning thus:

O Muſe, let theſe my verſes be diſperſt throughout all Grece, ſince they deſerue no leſſe:
and ſince the truth which is in them rehearſt, deſerueth fame, whom no man ſhould ſuppreſſe.

They ſay the cauſe why this Timocreon was baniſhed, was, the friendſhip which he had with the Barbarous people, and for giuing them intelligence. Whereof Themiſtocles was one that iudicially condemned him. Wherefore when Themiſtocles himſelfe was accuſed afterwards of the ſame fault, Timocreon then made theſe verſes following againſt him:

Timocreon was not without his pheere,
which did conferre with Medes priuily,
Since others mo, the ſelfe ſame blame might beare, mo foxes lurke in dennes, as well as I.

Beſides theſe verſes, Themiſtocles owne citizens for the ill will they bare him, beganne nowe with great contentment and applauſe, to hearken to thoſe that gaue out euill ſpeeches and ſclaunders of him. Therefore while he ſought waies to redreſſe all this, he was driuen to vſe ſuch meane, which more increaſed their hatred towards him. For in his orations to the people, he did oft remember them of the good ſeruices he had done them: and perceiuing how they were offended withall, he was driuen to ſaye: Why, are ye wearie ſo often to receiue good by one man? Many of them were very angrie with him alſo, when he ſurnamed Diana (in the dedication of her temple he made vnto her) Ariſtobule, as much to ſay, as the good counſeller: meaning thereby, howe he had giuen graue and wiſe counſell, both vnto his citie, and to all the reſt of the GRECIANS. He built this temple alſo neare his houſe, in a place called Melita, where the hang-men doe caſt the dead bodies of thoſe that were executed, and throwe the ragges and haulters endes of thoſe that were hanged, or otherwiſe put to death by lawe. There was alſo in our dayes in the temple of Diana (Ariſtobule), a little image of Themiſtocles, which ſhewed plainely, that he was not onely wiſe, and of a noble minde, but alſo of a great maieſtie and countenance in the face. In the ende the ATHENIANS baniſhed him ATHENS for fiue yeares, becauſe they would plucke downe his ouer great courage and authoritie, as they did vſe to ſerue thoſe, whoſe greatneſſe they thought to be more, then common equalitie that ought to be among citizens would beare. For this manner of baniſhment for a time, called Oſtraciſmon, was no puniſhment for any fault committed, but a mitigation and taking away of the enuie of the people, which delighted to plucke downe their ſtomackes that too much ſeemed to exceede in greatneſſe: and by this meanes they tooke away the poiſon of his malice, with diminiſhing his glorie and honour. So Themiſtocles being baniſhed from ATHENS, went to dwell in ARGOS. In this meane ſeaſon, Pauſanias trecherie fell out, which gaue his enemies occaſion to lie heauie on his backe. But he which became his accuſer, and was partener of the treaſon, was one called Leobotes (Alcmeons ſonne) borne in a village called AGRAVLA. Beſides this, the SPARTANS alſo did ſet on his skirtes, and charged him ſorely. For Pauſanias neuer before reuealed to Themiſtocles the treaſon he had purpoſed, although he was his verie familiar friend. But after he ſaw Themiſtocles was baniſhed, and did take his exile verie vnpatiently: then Pauſanias was bolde to open his treaſon vnto him, to procure him to take his part, and ſhewed him the letters the King of PERSIA had written to him, and all to ſtirre him vp againſt the GRECIANS, as againſt vngratefull and vnnaturall people. Howbeit Themiſtocles ſhooke him off, and tolde him plainely he would be no partener of his treaſon. Notwithſtanding, he neuer reuealed it to any liuing creature, nor diſcouered the practiſe he intended: hoping either he would haue giuen it ouer, or that ſhortly it would appeare by ſome other meane, conſidering he ſo fondly aſpired to things of great daunger, and without purpoſe or poſſibilitie. After Pauſanias was condemned, and had ſuffered paines of death for the ſame: they found amongeſt his papers, certaine writings and letters, which made Themiſtocles to be very ſore ſuſpected. Whereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS on the one ſide cryed out of him, and his enemies and ill willers at ATHENS accuſed him on the other ſide. To the which he made anſwere by letters from the beginning, and wrote vnto the people; that it was not likely that he (who ſought all the wayes to rule, and was not borne to ſerue, neither had anie mind thereto) would euer haue thought in his head, to ſell his owne libertie, and the GRECIANS alſo vnto the Barbarous people their enemies. Notwithſtanding this purgation of his, the people by the procurement of his enemies, ſent to apprehend him, and to bring him before the ſtates of all GREECE, to be iudged by that counſell. Whereof Themiſtocles hauing intelligence in time, he did conuey himſelfe into the ile of CORPHV, becauſe the citie there was greatly beholding to him, for a certaine pleaſure he had done them in times paſt. For they being at ſute and ſtrife with the CORINTHIANS, he tooke vp the mattter betweene them, and gaue iudgement on their ſide, and condemned the CORINTHIANS to pay them twentie talents damages: and did ſet downe an order, that they ſhould occupie the Ile of LEVCADE in common together, as ground that had bene inhabited with the people, aſwell of the one citie, as of the other. From thence he fled to Epirus, whither being followed by the ATHENIANS, and the LACEDÆMONIANS, he was compelled to venter himſelfe vpon a doubtfull and verie daungerous hope. For he went to yeeld himſelfe into the hands of Admetus, King of the MOLOSSIANS. Who hauing heretofore made certaine requeſts vnto the ATHENIANS, and being ſhameſully denied them by meanes of Themiſtocles (who then was at his chiefeſt height and authoritie) the King was maruellouſly offended with him: and it was a cleere caſe in deede, that if he could then haue layed hands hands on him, he would haue bene reuenged of him throughly. Howbeit feeling the present miserie of his exile, he thought he might lesse feare the Kings old quarrell and displeasure, then the fresh hate and enuie of his countrey men. Whereupon he went vnto King Admetus, trusting to his mercy, and became an humble suter to him in a strange extraordinarie sort. For he tooke the Kings litle yong sonne in his armes, and went and kneeled downe before the altar in his chappel: which humble manner of suing the MOLOSSIANS take to be most effectuall, and such as they dare not denie nor refuse. Some say that Queene Phthia her selfe, the Kings wife did enforme him of this their countrey custome and maner, and brought her litle sonne also neare vnto the altar. Other write also, that it was Admetus himselfe that taught and shewed him this enforcing maner of petition, only for a cloke to excuse himself to those that should come to demand Themistocles of him: that by dutie of religion he was so straightly bound and restrained, that he might not deliuer him out of his protection. In this mean time, Epicrates Acharnian found the means secretly to conuey Themistocles wife & children out of ATHENS, and did send them priuily vnto him: whereupon he was afterwards accused, and put to death, vpon Cimons accusation and motion, as Stesimbrotus writeth. Who not remembring those matters I know not how, or making as though Themistocles had not remembred himselfe doth say, that Themistocles sailed into SICILE, where he sought to marie Hierons daughter, the tyrant of SIRACVSA: promising him if he would let him haue her, he would assure him to conquer al GRECE for him, and to bring them vnder his obedience. But Hieron refusing this offer, Themistocles went from thence into ASIA: but that is not likely. For Theophrastus writeth in his booke intituled of Kingdomes, that Hieron hauing sent certaine running horses to the feast of the games Olympical, and hauing set vp a maruellous rich and sumptuous tent there: Themistocles made an oration to the GRECIANS, declaring vnto them how they should teare the tyrants tents in peeces, and not to suffer his horses to runne with other swift and light horses, and to carie away the prise in those holy games. Thucydides again declareth how he went vnto the other sea, and imbarked in the citie of PYDNE, being not knowne of neuer a man in the ship, vntill such time as the wind beganne to carie them into the Ile of NAXOS, which the ATHENIANS by chãce did besiege at that time, where being afeard to be set on land, he was forced to bewray himselfe to the maister of the ship, and the maisters mate, and wrought them, what with faire words and what with threates (by saying he would accuse them to the ATHENIANS, that they did not ignorantly receiue him in, but hired for money) so as he compelled them to saile no further, and to carie him into ASIA. As for his goods, his friends saued the most part of them, and sent them into ASIA to him. But for those that came to light, and were confiscate vnto the state: Theopompus writeth, they did amount to the value of one hundred * talents. And Theophrastus saith, but to fourescore talents only: whereas all his goods was not worth three * talents, when he beganne to goueme the state of the common weale. When he came vnto the citie of CVMA, he perceiued that all the coasts by sea were layed for him to apprehend him, and that he had many spials vpon him: among the which, these were two speciall noted men, Ergoteles, and one Pythodorus, the reward being very great, for men that sought their gaine any way they could. For the King of PERSIA had proclaimed by sound of trumpet, two hundred talents to him that brought him Themistocles. Whereupon he fled vnto a litle towne of ÆOLIA, called ÆGES, where no liuing body knew him, but his host only, called Nicogenes: who was the richest man of all the ÆOLIANS, and knew all the noble men of authoritie that were about the King of PERSIA. Themistocles continued hidden certaine dayes in his house: in which time, on a night after the feast of a sacrifice, one Olbius, schoolemaister to Nicogenes children, by some secret working of the gods, suddenly fell besides himselfe, and began to sing these verses out alowd:

The manner of supplication among the Molestans.

* Three score thousand crownes.
* Eighteen hundred crownes.

Do thou beleeue, what so the night thee tels,
and giue thy voice, thy counsell and conceits Vnto the night, in darke somnesse that dwels, thereon also thy victorie awaits.

The next night following, Themistocles being fast asleepe in his bed, dreamed that a snake wound it selfe round about his belly, and glided vpwards to his necke, vntill in touched his face, and suddenly then it became an Eagle, and imbraced him with his wings: and so at length did lift him vp into the aire, and caried him a maruellous way off, vntill he thought he saw a golden rodde (such as Heraulds vse to carrie in their hands) whereupon the Eagle did set him, and so was deliuered of all this feare and trouble he thought himselfe in. The troth was, Nicogenes had this deuise in his head, how he might bring him safe to the King of PERSIAES court. The barbarous nations for the most part (and specially the PERSIANS) are of a verie strange nature, and maruellous iealous ouer their women, and that not onely of their wiues, but also of their bondwomen, and concubines: which they keepe so straightly locked vp, that no man euer seeth them abroade at any time, but are alwayes like house-doues kept within doores. And when they haue any occasion to go into the countrey, they are caried in close coaches couered all about, that no man can look into them. Themistocles was conueyed into one of these coches drest after this maner, and had warned his men to answer those they met by the way, that asked whom they caried: how it was a yong GRECIAN gentlewoman of the country of IONIA, which they caried to the court for a noble man there. Thucydides, and Charon Lampsacenian say, he went thither after the death of Xerxes, and spake with his sonne there. But Ephorus, Dino, Clitarchus, Heraclides, and many other write, that he spake with himselfe. Yet notwithstanding it appeareth that Thucydides words do best agree with the chronicles and tables, recording the succession of times, although they be of no great certaintie. Themistocles being come now to the swords point (as it were) and to the extremitie of his danger: did first present him vnto one Artabanus, Colonell of a thousand footemen, and sayd vnto him: Sir, I am a GRECIAN borne, and desire to speake with the King: I haue matters of importance to open to his Maiesty, and such as I know he wil thankfully receiue. Artabanus answered him in this manner: My friend sir stranger, the lawes and customes of men are diuerse, and some take one thing for honest, other some another thing: but it is most honesty for all men, to keepe and obserue the lawes and manners of their owne countrey. For you GRECIANS haue the name to loue libertie, and equalitie aboue all things: and for vs, amongst all the goodly lawes and customes we haue, we esteeme this aboue the rest: to reuerence and honour our King, as the image of the god of nature, who keepeth all things in their perfect life and state. Wherefore, if thou wilt fashion thy selfe after our manner to honour the King, thou maiest both see him, and speake with him: but if thou haue another mind with thee, then must thou of necessitie vse some third person for thy meane. For this is the manner of our countrey: the King neuer giueth audience to any man, that hath not first honoured him. Themistocles hearing what he said, answered him againe: My Lord Artabanus, the great good will I beare vnto the King, and the desire I haue to aduance his glorie and power, is the onely cause of my present repaire vnto his court: therefore I meane not onely to obey your lawes (since it hath so pleased the gods to raise vp the noble empire of PERSIA vnto this greatnesse) but will cause many other people also to honour the King, more then there do at this present. Therefore let there be no stay, but that my selfe in person may deliuer to the King that I haue to say vnto him. Well, sayd Artabanus: whom then shall we say thou art? For by thy speech it seemeth, thou art a man of no meane state and condition. Themistocles answered him: as for that Artabanus, none shall know before the King himselfe. Thus doth Phanias report it. But Eratosthenes, in his booke he wrote of riches, addeth further: how Themistocles had accesse vnto this Artabanus, being recommended to the King by a woman of ERETRIA, whom the King kept. Themistocles being brought to his presence, after he had presented his humble dutie and reuerence to him, stood on his feete, and said neuer a word, vntill the King commaunded the interpreter to aske him what he was? and he answered: May it please your Maiestie, O noble King: I am Themistocles the ATHENIAN, a banished man out of my countrey by the GRECIANS, who humbly repaireth to your Highnesse, knowing I haue done great hurt to the PERSIANS, but I perswade my selfe I haue done them far more good then harme. For I it was that kept the GRECIANS backe they did not follow you, whē the state of GRECE was deliuered from thraldome, & my natiue country from danger, and that I knew I stood in good state to pleasure you. Now for me, I find all mens good wils agreeable to my present miserie and calamitie: for I come determined, most humbly to thanke your highnesse, for any grace and fauour you shall shew me, and also to craue humble pardon if your maiestie be yet offended with me. And therfore licēce me (most noble King) to beseech you, that taking mine enemies the GRECIANS for witnesses of the pleasures I haue done the PERSIAN nation, you will of your princely grace vse my hard fortune, as a good occasion to shew your honourable vertue, rather then to satisfie the passion of your heat and choler. For in sauing my life, your maiestie saueth an humble suter that put himself to your mercy: and in putting me to death, you shall rid away an enemie of the GRECIANS. Hauing spoken thus these wordes, he said further:

ther: That the gods by diuerſe ſignes and tokens had procured him to cõme to ſubmit himſelfe vnto him, and told the king what viſion he had ſeene in his dreame in Nicogenes houſe: and declared alſo the oracle of Iupiter Dodonian, who had commaunded him that he ſhould go vnto him that was called as a god, and how he thought it was the perſon of his Maieſtie, becauſe that god and he in troth were called both great Kings. The King hauing thus heard him ſpeake, gaue him then no preſent anſwere againe, notwithſtanding he maruellouſly wondred at his great wiſedome and boldneſſe. But afterwards amongſt his familiars the King ſaid, he thought himſelfe very happie to meete with the good fortune of Themiſtocles comming to him: and ſo beſought his great god Arimanius, that he would alwayes ſend his enemies ſuch minds, as to baniſh the greateſt and wiſeſt men amongſt them. It is reported alſo he did ſacrifice vnto the gods, to giue them thankes therefore, and diſpoſed himſelfe preſently to be merrie. Inſomuch as dreaming in the night, in the middeſt of his dreame he cried out three times together for ioy: I haue Themiſtocles the ATHENIAN. The next morning the king hauing ſent for the chiefeſt Lords of his Court, he made Themiſtocles alſo to be brought before him: who looked for no goodneſſe at all, ſpecially when he ſaw the ſouldiours warding at the Court gates, giue him ill countenance and language both, when they beheld him, and vnderſtood his name. Moreouer, Roxanes, one of the captaines, as Themiſtocles paſſed by him going to the King (who was ſet in his chaire of ſtate, and euery man keeping ſilence) ſoftly ſighing, ſayd vnto him: O thou Greekiſh ſerpent, ſubtile and malicious, the kings good fortune hath brought thee hither. Neuertheleſſe when he came to the king, and had once againe made him a very humble and low reuerence: the king ſaluted him, and ſpake very courteouſly to him, ſaying: I am now your debter of two hundred talents, for preſenting your ſelf. It is good reaſon I ſhould deliuer you the mony promiſed him that ſhould haue brought you: but I giue you a further warrant, be bold I charge you, and ſpeake your mind freely, ſay what you think of the ſtate of GREECE. Themiſtocles then anſwered him: That mens words did properly reſemble the ſtories and imagerie in a peece of arras: for both in the one and in the other, the goodly images of either of them are ſeene, when they are vnfolded and laid open. Contrariwiſe they appeare not, but are loſt, when they are ſhut vp, and cloſe folded: whereupon he ſaid to the king, he muſt needes require ſome further time of anſwer. The King liked his compariſon paſſingly well, and willed him to appoint his owne time. Themiſtocles asked a yeare: in which time hauing pretily learned the Perſian tongue, he afterwards ſpake to the King himſelfe without any interpreter. So, ſuch as were no Courtiers, thought he only talked with the King of matters of GREECE. But becauſe the change and alteration of the court fell out great at that time, the noblemen imagined he had bene ſo bold to common with the king of them alſo. Thereupon they greatly enuied him, and afterwards murmured much againſt him. For indeed the King did honour Themiſtocles aboue all other ſtrangers whatſoeuer they were. On a time the king had him out a hunting with him, he made him ſee his mother, with whom he grew familiar: and by the Kings owne commandement he was to heare the diſputations of the wiſe men of PERSIA touching ſecret philoſophie, which they call magicke. Demaratus the LACEDÆMONIAN being at that time in the court of PERSIA, the king willing him to aſk what gift he would, he beſought the King to graunt him this fauour: to licence him to go vp and downe the citie of SARDIS with his royall hat on his head as the kings of PERSIA do. Mithropauſtes, the Kings coſin, taking him by the hand, ſaid vnto him: Demaratus, the Kings hat thou demaundeſt, and if it were on thy head, it would couer but little wit: Nay though Iupiter did giue thee his lightning in thy hand, yet that would not make thee Iupiter. But the King gaue him ſo ſharpe a repulſe for his vnreaſonable requeſt, and was ſo angrie with him for it, that it was thought he would neuer haue forgiuen him: howbeit Themiſtocles was ſo earneſt a ſuter for him, that he brought him into fauour againe. And the report goeth, that the Kings ſucceſſours which haue bene ſince that time, vnder whom the PERSIANS haue had more dealings with the GRECIANS, then in former dayes: when they would retaine any great ſtate or perſonage of GREECE into their ſeruice, they wrote vnto him, and promiſed him they would make him greater about them, then euer was Themiſtocles about Xerxes. That which is written of him, doth alſo confirme it. For he being ſtept vp to great countenance and authoritie, and followed with great traines of ſuters after him by reaſon of his greatnes: ſeeing himſelfe one day very honorably ſerued at his table, and with all ſorts of dainty meats, he turned him to his children, & ſaid vnto them: My ſons, we ſhould haue bene vndone, if we had not bene vndone. The moſt writers do agree, that he had giuẽ him the reuenue of 3. cities for his

allowance of bread, wine and victuals: to wit, MAGNESIA, LAMPSACVS, and MYVNTA. But Neanthes Cyzicenian, and Phanias, do adde two other cities more, PERCOTA, and PALESCEPSIA: the one to defray his charges of apparel, and the other for his lodging. Afterwards Themistocles going into the low countries towards the sea, to take order against the practises of the GRECIANS: there was a PERSIAN Lord called Epixies (gouernour of the high PHRYGIA) that had laid a traine to kil him (hauing of long time hired certaine murderers of PISIDIA to do it) so soon as he should come into a towne of his gouernement, called the Lions head. But as he slept on a day in his house in the after noone, the mother of the gods appeared vnto him, and sayd: Themistocles, go not to the Lions head, for feare thou meete with the Lion: and for this warning, I do aske thy daughter Mnesiptolema for my seruant. Themistocles waking sodainely out of his dreame, made his prayer vnto the goddesse, and turning out of the high way, fetched another compasse about. Afterwards hauing passed that towne, he tooke his lodging being benighted: but one of the beasts which caried his tent, fel by the way vnfortunatly in a riuer, and al his arras and tapestry hangings being throughly wet, his seruants were driuen to lay them out a drying by moon light. The Pisidians that lay in waite, and could not discerne by Moone light that they were hangings layed out to drie, thought it had bene the very tent Themistocles selfe did lie in: whereupon they went vnto it with their swords drawne in their hands, hoping to haue taken him sleeping. But when they were come thither, and began to lift vp a peece of the hangings, some of the people of Themistocles (which kept watch) perceiuing them, ran vpon them, and tooke them. So Themistocles hauing escaped this daunger, wondred greatly at the fauour of the goddesse which had appeared vnto him. In recompence whereof, when he was in the citie of MAGNESIA, he built a temple vnto Dindymena, and made his daughter Mnesiptolema prioresse of the same. As he passed by the citie of SARDIS for his recreation, he went to visit the temples, and offerings that had bene giuen there. So he saw an image of a maiden in copper, in the temple of the mother of the gods, being two yards high, which they called the Hydrophora, as much to say, as the watercarier. And it was a statue, which himselfe had heretofore dedicated and caused to be made, with the fines of those that had paid forfeitures, for stealing or turning away the water course at ATHENS, at such time as he was maister surueyer of the water workes and conduits there. Wherfore, whether Themistocles was sorie to see this goodly image a prisoner in the hands of the Barbarous people, or that he would shew vnto the ATHENIANS the greatnesse of his credite and authoritie through all the Kings dominions: he spake to the gouernour of LIDIA, and prayed him for his sake that he would send this image againe to ATHENS. But this barbarous gouernour was very angry with his request, and told him he would aduertise the King thereof. Then Themistocles began to be afeard, and was driuen to seeke to the grouernours women and concubines, whom he got for money to intreat him, and so made faire weather againe with the gouernour. But from thenceforth, he tooke better gard of him in all his doings, greatly fearing the enuie of the Barbarous people. For he progressed not vp and downe ASIA, as Theopompus writeth, but lay a long time in the citie of MAGNESIA, quietly enioying the Kings gracious giftes bestowed on him: where he was honoured and reuerenced for one of the greatest persons of PERSIA, whilest the King was elsewhere occupied in the affaires of the prouinces of ASIA, and had no leisure to thinke vpon those of GRECE. But when newes was brought him, that ÆGYPT was rebelled, by meanes of the fauour and assistance of the ATHENIANS, and that the GRECIANS gallies did scowre the seas euen vnto the Ile of CYPRVS, and vnto the coasts of CILICIA, and that Cimon had all the sea in subiection: that made him then to bend all his thoughts how to resist the GRECIANS, that their greatnesse might not turne to his harme. Then commissions went out to leauie men, to assemble captaines, and to dispatch postes vnto Themistocles at MAGNESIA, with the Kings letters, straightly charging him to haue an eye to the GRECIANS doings, and moreouer that he should faithfully keepe his promise he had made to him. But he, to shew that he neither maliced his citizens, nor was moued with the desire of greatnesse and authoritie he might haue growne vnto in those warres, or else for that he thought the Kings expectation would prooue to a greater matter then he could end or wade through, considering GRECE was full at that time of famous captaines, and that Cimon amongst the rest had maruellous good fortune, and that it should be a reproch to him to staine the glorie of so many noble actes, so many triumphs, and so great victories as Cimon had done and wonne: he tooke a wise resolution with himselfe, to make such an end of his life, as the fame therof deserued, for he made a solemne sacrifice vnto the gods, and

and feasted at the same all his friends. And after he had taken his leaue of them all, he dranke buls bloud, as most men thinke (or as other say) poyson, which dispatcheth a man in 24. houres, and so ended his dayes in the city of MAGNESIA, after he had liued threescore and fiue yeares, & the most part of them alwayes in office, and great charge. It is written, that the King of PERSIA vnderstanding the cause and maner of his death, did more esteeme him afterwards, then he did before, and that euer after he continued to vse his friends and familiars in very good sort. For he left children behind him, which he had of Archippa (Lysanders daughter) of the towne of ALOPECIA: Archeptolis, Polyeuctus, & Cleophantus, of whom Plato the philosopher maketh mention, saying that he was a good man at armes, but otherwise that there was no goodnesse in him. His other sonnes that were elder, as Neocles, died being bitten with a horse: and as for Diocles another sonne, his grandfather Lysander did adopt him for his son. He had many daughters, of the which Mnesiptolema (which he had by a second wife) was maried vnto her halfe brother Archeptolis, for they were not both of one venter: another called Italia, was maried vnto one Panthides of CHIO: Sybaris, vnto Nicomedes an ATHENIAN: and Nicomacha, vnto Pharsicles, Themistocles nephew; vnto whom her brethren did marry her within the city of MAGNESIA, after the death of their father. This Pharsicles did bring vp Asia, which was the yongest of all his daughters. Furthermore his sumptuous tombe standeth yet in the market place of MAGNESIA. But that Andocides writeth of his bones, in a booke he made to his friends, is not to be credited, which was: that the ATHENIANS hauing found the ashes of his bones, did cast thē vp into the aire, as a deuice to stir vp the noble men against the people. And Phylarchus in his history (much like vnto the fained subtilties of a tragedy) bringeth in I cannot tell what Neocles and Demopolis, for Themistocles sonnes, to moue the readers with compassion. Howbeit no man is so simple, but will iudge it straight a very faining and deuise. Diodorus the cosmographer also in a booke he hath written of tombes and monuments saith, by coniecture, rather then of any certaine knowledge: that alongst the hauen of PIRÆA, coming towards the head of Alcimus, there is a foreland in forme of an elbow, within the which when they haue doubled the point, the sea is alwayes calme, and there they find a great and long foundation or base, vpon the which there is as it were the forme of an altar, and that is (saith he) Themistocles tombe. And he supposeth that Plato the comicall poet doth witnesse it in these verses:

Thy graue is set and plac't, commodiously, where passengers and marchants that come by may visite thee, and where it may regard all such as seeke that port to be their ward.
Sometimes also, it may reioyce to see,
the bloudy fights, vpon the sea that be.

And furthermore, those of MAGNESIA did institute certaine honours vnto the issue of Themistocles, which continue yet vnto this day. And in my time, another Themistocles also of ATHENS did enioy the same honours, with whom I was familiarly conuersant in the house of Ammonius the philosopher.

THE LIFE OF
Furius Camillus.

AMONGST many great matters which are ſpoken of this Furius Camillus, this ſeemeth moſt ſtrange and wonderfull aboue the reſt : that he hauing borne the chiefeſt offices of charge in his countrey, and hauing done many notable and worthy deedes in the ſame; as one that was choſon fiue times Dictator, and had triumphed foure times, and had won himſelfe the name and title of the ſecond founder of Rome, and yet neuer came to be Conſull. But the onely cauſe thereof was, that the common weale of Rome ſtood then in ſuch ſtate and ſort: The people were then at diſſention with the Senate : they would chuſe no more Conſuls, but other kind of gouernours whom they called Tribuni militares : theſe did all things with like power and authority as the Conſuls, yet were they nothing ſo odious vnto the people, by reaſon of the number that was of them. For it was ſome hope to them that could ill beare the rule of the ſmall number of nobility, that the gouernment of the ſtate being put into ſixe, & not into two officers hands, their rule would be the eaſier, and tollerabler. Now Camillus being at that time in his beſt credit and authority, and in the prime & glory of his doings, did not deſire to be made Conſul without the goodwil of the people, although whileſt he was in authority, there were many times Couſuls created. But being called and choſen to all other offices and dignities, he behaued himſelfe in ſuch ſort, that when he was alone, he made his authority common to other : and when he had companions and aſſociates, the glory of all redounded to himſelfe alone. The cauſe whereof, was his modeſty on the one ſide, for he commaunded euer without enuy : and his great wiſdome and ſufficiencie on the other ſide, for the which all others willingly gaue him place, and yeelded to him. The houſe of Furians being at that time of no great fame, he was the firſt that began to ſet himſelfe forwards. For in a great battell which was fought againſt the Æques and Volſces, he being but a priuate man at armes vnder the Dictator Poſthumius Tubertus, was the firſt that riding out of the army, aduaunced himſelfe and gaue the charge. And being runne into the thigh at that time with a ſtaffe broken vpon his thigh, he plucked the trunchen out and retired not for all that : but giuing charge againe vpon the ſtouteſt of the enemies, he fought it out ſo valiantly to the encouraging of other, that he was the chiefe cauſe they turned their backes. Whereupon, to requite his ſeruice done at that time (beſides other honors they did him) they made him Cenſor : an office at that time of great preheminence and dignity. In his office of Cenſorſhip, he did two notable acts. The one very honeſt : when he brought men that were not maried, to marry the women whom the wars had left widows, which were in number many.

many. To this he got them partly by perſwaſion, and partly by threatnings, to ſet round fines vpon their heads that refuſed. The other verie neceſſary: in that he brought the orphanes to be contributories, vnto taxes, and ſubſidies, which before payed nothing. The cauſe thereof was, the continuall wars, about the which the common-weale ſuſtained great charges, but ſpecially about the ſiege of the city of the VEIANS (which ſome call VENETIANS) that was a very ſore burthen to them at that time. For it was the capital city of all THVSCAN, the which for ſtore of armor, and number of ſouldiers, was nothing inferior to the city of ROME. For the VEIANS being growne to ſtomacke and courage in time, by reaſon of their wealth and proſperity, and for the ſundry great battels they had fought againſt the ROMAINES, that contended with them for glory and empire: and now it fell ſo out, that they finding themſelues weakned by many great ouerthrowes, which they had receiued of the ROMAINES, they did let fall their former peacockes brauery and ambition, to bid them battell any more in the field. Howbeit the inhabitants of the city of VEIES hauing raiſed the wals, and made very great high rampers, began to fortifie themſelues, and made good prouiſion for armour and munition, beſides ſtore of corne, ſhot, and other neceſſary things: they valiantly, and without feare of any thing, defended the ſiege of the ROMAINES, that continued a long time, and was no leſſe hard and painefull vnto them that did beſiege, then it was vnto thoſe that were beſieged. For where the ROMAINES were wont before-time to keepe their houſes in the winter ſeaſon, and the field onely in the ſommer time: that was the firſt time they were compelled by the captaines and Tribuni militares, to build forts, and to intrench their campe with a wall, euen in their enemies countrey, and to winter abroad as they were wont to lye in the the campe in ſommer. Now this ſiege had continued ſeuen yeares together. The captaines were burthened that they did not their duties, nor ſtood manfully to their charge: whereupon in the end they were diſcharged, and other captaines placed in their roomes to follow the ſiege. Among thoſe, Camillus was one, whom then the ſecond time they created Tribunus militaris. Who notwithſtanding did nothing then in that ſiege, becauſe it was his hap by lot, to make warres vpon the PHALERIANS, and the CAPENATES. Theſe people whileſt the ROMAINES were occupied otherwhere, had inuaded their country and done them great harme, during the time of their warre with the THVSCANES. But Camillus hauing ouerthrowne a great number of them in the field, had the reſt in chaſe, and draue them to take their city, and did ſhut them vp within their owne walles. The chance that happened at the lake of ALBANVS, about the time the THVSCANE warres were greateſt, did maruellouſly amate the ROMAINES, being no leſſe wonderful, then the moſt ſtrange and vncredible thing that could be told by man. For they could not find out the cauſe of it by common reaſon, nor any naturall ground: conſidering it was in the later end of Autumne, and ſommer was ended, & that there had not bene much raine, nor notable South-winds. And although there are many lakes, many brookes, and riuers, many ſprings, and other waters in ITALY: yet ſome of them dried vp altogether, other ran but faintly by reaſon of the drought, & all the riuers then were (as they are wont to be cõmonly in ſommer) very low, and there was ſcant any water. But the lake ALBANVS contrariwiſe, that commeth from no other place, neither runneth any whither out of it ſelfe, being enuironed all about with hils & mountaines, and where the earth is good: began to ſwell, and riſe to euery mans ſight without any cauſe at all (but ſecret and hidden vnto the gods alone) and went alwayes increaſing alongſt thoſe hils ſides, vntill ſuch time as it came to be euen with the height of the higheſt mountaine, gathering vpwards ſtill without any waues or tempeſt of weather at all. This at the firſt, made poore ſhepheards and heardmen, keeping their cattell thereabouts, maruellouſly affraid: but at the length when the earth and the waight of one of the hils (which kept in the lake as a wall, from running ouer into the field) began to breake by reaſon of the waight, and great quantity of water, that ranne ſtraight with a maruellous extreme force and violence ouer all the arable lands and grounds planted with trees, and ſo tooke his courſe into the ſea: the ROMAINES then not alone, but the whole inhabitants of ITALY were wonderfully affraid, and iudged that it was ſome ſigne and prognoſtication of ſome wonderfull thing to come. And there was no other newes currant in the campe, which lay at ſiege of the city of VEIES: in ſo much as the very brute of it flew ouer the wals of the city, vnto them that were beſieged. And as it happeneth very oft in long ſieges, that thoſe which lie in campe do oftentimes talke with them that are beſieged: there was a ROMAINE who fell acquainted, and commonly vſed to talke familiarly with one of the city, who could tell of many old and ſtraunge things done and happened, and was very

skilfull aboue any other in the city, in the art of diuination, or ſoothſaying. The ROMAINE then told him one day the violent breaking out of the lake ALBANVS, and perceiuing that the other after he had heard him, was as merrie as a pye at the matter, and that he gibed at their ſiege: he told him further, that this wonderfull chaunce was not onely happened vnto the ROMAINES at that time, but that they had bene acquainted with many other farre more ſtraunge then this, which he would very willingly open vnto him, to ſee if there were any remedy, that though the affaires of the common-weale had but hard ſucceſſe, yet he would procure that his owne priuate matters might proſper well with him. The VEIAN anſwered them, he would heare them with a goodwill, and gaue good eare vnto him, hoping to haue heard ſome great ſecret. So the ROMAINE training him on ſtill from one matter to another, holding on his way, vntill he ſaw he was a good diſtance off from the gates of the city, he ſuddenly caught hold on him, and by ſtrong hand caried him away with him, and with helpe of other ſouldiers which came running out of the campe vnto him, he brought him to the captaines. The VEIAN ſeeing himſelfe thus forcibly vſed, and knowing alſo that fatall deſtiny cannot be auoided, began to declare vnto the ROMAINES, the ancient Oracles and propheſies touching the fortune of their city: by which it was reported vnto them, that the city of VEIES ſhould neuer be taken, vntill the enemy had cauſed the water of the lake ALBANVS (which ſhould breake out) to be brought backe againe, and to turne it ſome other way from thence, that it ſhould not fall into the ſea. This was caried vnto the Senate at ROME, to be conſulted of in the counſell: and there it was determined they ſhould ſend to the Oracle of Apollo at the city of DELPHES, and aske him what they ſhould do therein. So thither were ſent great and notable men, Coſſus Licinius, Valerius Politus and Fabius Ambuſtus: who hauing ended their iourney by ſea, and receiued anſwer of that they demanded, returned home againe, and amongſt other oracles they brought one that ſayd thus: That through negligence they had omitted ſome ancient ceremonies in the holy dayes of the LATINES. And another willed them, that they ſhould by all poſſible meanes they could, keepe the water of the lake ALBANVS that it fell not into the ſea, and ſhould (if it were poſſible) bring it backe againe into his old place: if not, that yet they ſhould cut as many trenches and ditches as might be, that it might be drunke vp in the middeſt of the fields. When theſe oracles were vnderſtood, the prieſts prepared all things for diuine ſeruice, and the people went about the water of the lake to turne it againe. After theſe things were done, the Senate in the tenth yeare of the warres againſt the VEIANS, put off all thoſe that which did beare office, and created Camillus Dictator, who named for generall of the horſemen, Cornelius Scipio. And before he went in hand with any thing, he made a vow vnto the gods, that if it pleaſed them to grant a happy end of theſe wars, in honor of them he would celebrate great playes, and build a temple vnto the goddeſſe which the ROMAINES call Matuta: which ſeemeth to be her her whom we call Leucothea, conſidering the ceremonies done in theſe ſacrifices. For they cauſe a chambermaid to enter into her temple, & there they boxe her about the eares. Then they put her out of the temple, & do embrace their brothers children rather then their owne. They make many other ceremonies, and they are much like vnto thoſe that are done vnto Bacchus nurces, and to the misfortunes that chanced vnto Ino, by reaſon of her husbands concubine. After all theſe vowes and prayers made, he entred with his army into the FALISSIANS territories, whom he ouerthrew in a great battel, together with the CAPENATES alſo, which came to aide them. From thence he went to the ſiege of the city of VEIES, where perceiuing to take it by aſſault, was not to be done without great daunger: he began to vndermine it (finding the earth all about very minable) and withall ſo deepe, that the enemies could perceiue nothing. Now when his mining fell out according to his good hope, he gaue an aſſault to the wals in all places alike about the city at one inſtant, to bring out all the inhabitants of the city to man the wals. Whileſt they were all thus vpon the walles to make defence, Camillus ſouldiers entred ſecretly through the mines within the caſtell, hard by the temple of Iuno: which was the chiefe Church of all the city, and whereunto the citizens had moſt deuotion. They ſay that euen at that preſent time the Generall of the THVSCANES did ſacrifice vnto the gods, and that his ſoothſayer hauing conſidered the intrails of the beaſts offered vp in ſacrifice, cried out aloud, that the gods gaue the victorie vnto him, which ſhould happen to come vpon them in this ſacrifice. The ROMAINES which were within the mine hearing this, brake the earth incontinently, and leaped out, crying, and making noyſe with their weapons: wherewith the enemies were ſo aſtonied, that they fled vpon it, and ſo the ROMAINES tooke the intrails intrails and caried them vnto Camillus. And these be euen much like the Poets tales and fables. Howbeit Camillus hauing by this meanes taken the city, and seeing from the top of the castell the infinite goods and riches within the city, which the souldiers spoyled and made hauocke of, he wept for very pitie. And when those that were about him told him he was a happy man: he lift vp his hands vnto heauen, and made this prayer. O mighty god Iupiter, and you ô gods, which see and iudge mens good and ill workes: you know right well, that we haue not willingly (without wrong and cause offered vs) begun this warre, but iustly, and by compulsion, to be reuenged of a city our enemy, which hath done vs great iniuries. But if to counteruaile this our great good prosperity, and victory, some bitter aduersitie and ouerthrow be predestined vnto vs: I beseech you then (most mercifull gods) in sparing our city of Rome, and this her army, you will (with as litle hurt as may be) let it all fall and light vpon my person alone. And as he had spoken these words, and was turning on his right hand (according to the manner of the Romaines after they haue prayed vnto the gods) he fell downe flat before them all. The standers by taking this fall for an ill token, were somewhat troubled with the matter: but after he got vp on his feete againe, he told them that the thing he requested of the gods was happened vnto him. And that was, a litle hurt, in exchange of a great good fortune. So the whole city being spoiled and rifled, he was also desirous to carry Iunos image to Rome, to accomplish the vow he had made. And hauing sent for workemen for this purpose, he did sacrifice first vnto the goddesse, beseeching her to accept well of the Romaines good will, and that she would willingly vouchsafe to come and dwell with the other gods, who had the protection of the city of Rome. Some say, that the image aunswered, she was contented. But Liuius writeth, that Camillus made this prayer, as he touched the image, and that the assistants aunswered she was contented, and would go with a good will. Yet they which do affirme, it was the image selfe that spake, do fauor this miracle, grounding their proofe vpon the opinion of the fortune of Rome: the which, from so base and meane beginning had impossibly attained vnto so high glory & power as it had, without the singular fauour of the gods: and that hath manifestly appeared vnto the world, by sundry great proofes and examples. They bring forth also such other like wonders. As, that images haue heretofore let fall drops of swet from them: that they haue bene heard to sigh: that they haue turned: and that they haue made certaine signes with their eyes, as we find written in many ancient stories. And we could our selues also tell such like wonders, which we haue heard mẽ of our time affirme, which are not vncredible, nor lightly to be condemned. But for such matters, it is as dangerous to giue too much credit to them, as also to discredit them too much, by reason of the weakenesse of mans nature, which hath no certaine bounds, nor can rule it selfe, but runneth somtimes after vanity and superstition, and otherwile also despiseth and contemneth holy and diuine matters: and therefore the meane is the vertue, and not to go too farre in this, as in all other things besides, it is the best. Now Camillus, whether his late enterprise performed, in winning a city that stood out with Rome, and held siege with them ten yeares together, had put him into an ouerweening or conceipt of himselfe: or that the words of the people, which did blesse and praise him, had made him looke high, and presume vpon himselfe, more then became the modesty of a ciuill magistrate, and gouernour of the common weale, and one that was subiect to the law: he shewed a stately triumph, set forth with all rich furniture, & specially for that himselfe was caried through Rome vpon his triumphant charret drawne with foure faire white coursers. This, neuer captaine nor generall before him durst vndertake to do, neither any euer after him attempted it: for they thinke it as a sacred cariage, and only meet for the king, and father of the gods. This bred him much enuy amongst the citizens, which had not bene acquainted with so great statelinesse. There was another occasiõ also that made them mislike him much: which was, because he stood against the law put forth that they should deuide the city of Rome. For the Tribunes of the people did set out an Edict, that the Senate and people of Rome should be deuided into two parts: and that those on whom the lot should fall, should abide still in Rome, and the other should go dwell in the new wonne city of Veies. These were the reasons to perswade this: that both the one and the other sort should be richer then they were before, and should more easily keepe their lands & goods from the inuasion of their enemies, by meanes of these two great cities. The people which were multiplied now into great numbers, and had serued dutifully and dangerously, thought it the best way in the world: Therefore they still cried out, and thronged with great tumult, about their pulpet for orations, praying that this law might be put vnto the voyces of the people. But the whole Senate, and wiſeſt citizens among them, iudging this motion of the Tribunes would be the deſtruction, and not the diuiſion of the city of Rome, could in no wiſe abide it ſhould go any further. Whereupon they went and prayed Camillus helpe: who fearing to bring it to the point, whether the law ſhould paſſe or no, did alwayes ſeeke new occaſions and lets, ſtill to delay and put off the matter, and ſtay the confirmation of this law. For theſe cauſes, he was hated of the common people. But the originall and apparant cauſe of the peoples ill will towards him, was for taking from them the tenth part of their ſpoiles: and it was not altogether without ſome reaſon, and to ſay truly the people did him much wrong to beare him ſuch malice for that. For before he went to the city of Veies, he made a ſolemne vow to offer the tenth part vnto the gods, of the ſpoiles of the city, if he wan the ſame. But when it was taken and ſacked, whether it was that he was loth to trouble the citizens, or hauing a world of buſineſſe in his head, that he eaſily forgat his vow, he ſuffered the ſouldiers to deuide the ſpoile amongſt them, and to take the benefit to themſelues. Shortly after he was diſcharged of his charge, he did enforme the Senate of his vow. Furthermore, the ſoothſayers made report at that very time, how they knew by certaine ſignes and tokens of their ſacrifices, that the gods were offended for ſomewhat, and how they muſt of neceſſity be pacified againe. Whereupon the Senate preſently made an order, where it was vnpoſſible euery man ſhould bring in againe the ſelfe ſame things he had gotten, to make a new deuiſion of euery mans ſhare: that euery one therefore vpon his oath ſhould preſent the tenth part of his gaines he had gotten by that booty. There was great trouble about it. They were driuen to vſe great extremity to the poore ſouldiers (which had trauelled ſore, and taken great paines in the warres) to make them to reſtore backe ſuch a collop out of their gaine, and the rather becauſe many of them had already ſpent it euery penny: and for this trouble, they all cried out with open mouth againſt Camillus. But he (not knowing otherwiſe how to excuſe himſelfe) was forced to bring foorth as cold and as vnreaſonable an excuſe as he could make, which was: forſooth that he had forgotten his vow he had made. The people notwithſtanding were eger ſtill againſt him, ſaying: how he had vowed then to offer the tenth part of the enemies goods to the gods, and that now he would performe it with the tenths of the citizens goods. Neuertheleſſe, euery man hauing brought that he ſhould for his part, it was thought good they ſhould cauſe a maſſie cup of gold to be made, to ſend to the temple of Apollo at Delphes. And ſmall ſtore of gold being in the city of Rome, as the officers of the city were ſearching vp and downe to get it, the women of Rome of their owne voluntarie wils without motion, agreed among themſelues, that they would depart with all the iewels they had towards the making vp of this offering, which came to the weight of eight talents. In recompence whereof, to honour them withall, the Senate ordained that they ſhould be praiſed openly with funerall orations at their buriall, as they did vſe at honourable and noble mens obſequies. For before that law, it was not the manner to praiſe women openly at their funerals. Now there were appointed three of the nobleſt men of the city to go to cary this offering, and they ſent them out in a galley well manned, ſtored alſo with good mariners, and trimly ſet forth in all triumphing manner: howbeit both in ſtorme, and calme weather, they were in danger of their liues. For after that they had ſcaped drowning very narrowly by tempeſt, when the wind was downe againe, they fell into another daunger, which they eſcaped alſo beyond all hope. For hard by the Iles of Æolvs, the galleys of the Liparians fell vpon them, as if they had bene rouers. But when the Liparians ſaw they made no reſiſtance, and intreated them, holding vp their hands, they gaue no further charge vpon them, but onely faſtened their galley vnto theirs. So when they had haled them to the ſhore, they declared they were pirats, and offered to make port ſale of the men and goods, as if they had bene a lawfull priſe: and had ſold them indeed, had not the wiſedome and authority of Timeſitheus letted them, who was gouernour at that time of the city, and had great ado to perſwade them to let them go. And he did not ſo leaue them, but ſent out certaine of his owne ſhips to accompany them in their iourney, who did helpe them to go and performe their offering. For which curteſie of his, the Romaines afterwards did him great honour at Rome, according to his well deſeruing. The Tribunes of the people began now to ſet a foot againſt the law for the deuiding of the inhabitants of Rome vnto the city of Veies. But the warres of the Falisces fell out happily at that time, whereby the noble men did chuſe ſuch officers as they would. So they choſe Camillus, Tribunus militaris of the ſouldiers, and fiue others to aſſiſt him, the ſeruice in that caſe requiring a Generall that caried both authority and

and reputation among them, as an old experienced ſouldier in the warres. When the people had confirmed the election, Camillus immediatly entred the territories of the FALISCES with the ROMAINES army, where he layd ſiege vnto the city of the FALERIANS, being very well fortified, victualled and ſtored, with all other munition of warre. Knowing therefore that it was no ſmall attempt to win this city, and that it would not be done in a ſhort time, he politickely ſought (whatſoeuer came of it) to keepe his country men occupied about ſome thing, and to ſtay them for going home, leaſt by repairing to ROME, they ſhould haue many occaſions to rebell, and raiſe ſome ciuill diſſention. For the ROMAINES did wiſely vſe this remedy, to diſperſe abroad like good phiſitions, the humors which troubled the quiet ſtate of their common-weale at home. But the FALERIANS truſting in the ſituation of their city, which was very ſtrong in all parts, made ſo litle accompt of the ſiege, that thoſe which kept not watch vpon the wals, walked vp and downe in their gownes in the city, without any weapon about them, and their children went to ſchoole, the ſchoole-maiſter alſo would commonly leade them abroad out of the city a walking, to play and paſſe the time by the towne wals. For the whole city had one common ſchoole-maiſter, as the GRECIANS alſo haue, which do bring vp their children from litle ones in company together, becauſe one may be familiarly acquainted with another. This ſchoole-maiſter ſpying his time to do the FALERIANS a ſhrewd turne, did accuſtomably take all his ſcholers out of the city with him, to play not farre from the wals at the beginning, and afterwards brought them into the city againe after they had played their fill. Now after he had led them abroad thus once or twiſe, he trained them out euery day a litle further, to make them to be bold, perſwading them there was no danger. But at the length, one day hauing gotten all the citizens children with him, he led them within the watch of the ROMAINES campe, and there deliuered all his ſcholers into their hands, and prayed them they would bring him vnto their Generall. So they did. And when he came before Camillus, he began to tell him that he was ſchoole-maiſter vnto all theſe children, neuertheleſſe that he did more eſteeme to haue his grace and fauor, then regard his office he had by this name and title. Camillus hearing what he ſayd, and beholding his treacherous part, he ſayd to thoſe that were about him: Warre of it ſelfe ſurely is an euill thing, for in wars many iniuries and miſchiefes are done: neuertheleſſe, among good men there is a law and diſcipline, which doth forbid them to ſeeke victory by wicked and traiterous meanes, and that a noble and worthy generall ſhould make war, and procure victory, by truſting to his owne valiantneſſe, and not by anothers vileneſſe and villany. Therfore he commanded his ſergeants to teare the cloths off the backe of this vile ſchoole-maiſter, and to bind his hands behind him: and that they ſhould giue the children rods & whips in their hands, to whip the traytor backe againe into the city, that had betraied them, & grieued their parents. Now when the FALERIANS heard newes that the ſchoole-maſter had thus betrayed them, all the city fell a weeping (as euery man may thinke for ſo great a loſſe) and men & women ran together one in anothers necke, to the towne wals, and gates of the city, like people out of their wits, they were ſo troubled. When they came thither, they ſaw their children bringing their ſchoole-maiſter backe againe, ſtarke naked and bound, whipping of him, and calling Camillus their father, their god, and their ſauiour: ſo that not only the fathers and mothers of the children, but all other the citizens alſo in generall, did conceiue in themſelues a wonderfull admiration and great loue, of the wiſdome, goodneſſe, and iuſtice of Camillus. So that euen preſently they called a counſell, and there it was concluded they ſhould ſend ambaſſadors forthwith vnto him, to put their liues and goods to his mercy & fauor. Camillus ſent their ambaſſadors vnto ROME, where audience being giuen vnto thē by the Senate, the ambaſſadors ſaid: Becauſe the ROMAINES preferred iuſtice aboue victory, they taught them to be better contented to ſubmit themſelues vnto them, then to be their owne men at liberty: cōfeſſing their vertue did more ouercome them, then any force or power could do. The Senate diſpatched letters vnto Camillus, giuing him commiſſion to do and determine as he thought good. So he hauing taken a certaine ſum of mony of the FALERIANS, did furthermore make peace & league with all the reſt of the FALISCES: and thereupon returned backe againe to ROME. But the ſouldiers grudged maruellouſly at it. For they ſtood in hope to haue had the ſacking of the city. When there was no remedy, but they muſt needs returne home empty handed, they began to accuſe Camillus to the reſt of the citizens, as ſoone as they came to ROME, ſaying: he loued not the common people, and how for ſpite he diſappointed their army of the ſpoile. On the other ſide, the Tribunes of the people began to reuiue the law for the deuiding of the inhabitants of ROME, and were ready to paſſe

it by the voices of the people. Camillus not fearing the ill will of the commons, did boldly speake, and do in open presence, all he could against it. So that plainely he was the chiefest cause, that the people against their wils (intreate what they could) were driuen to let it alone. But withall they were so spitefull against him, that notwithstanding his sorow and misfortune for the death of his sonne (dying of a sickneſſe) was great: they would not of malice once take pity or compassion of him. The losse whereof (albeit he was of a very good and courteous nature) was so grieuous, and made him so vnquiet, that being accused before the people, he stirred not once out of his house, but was locked vp with the women, which lamented for his sonne departed. He that did accuse him, was one Lucius Apuleius, burthening him that he had stolne and taken away part of the spoile of the THVSCANES: and sayd they had seene certaine brasen gates at his house, which had bene brought out of THVSCANE. Now the people were so maliciously bent against him, that euery man might see, if they could once take him in a trip, vpon any aduantage whatsoeuer, they would doubtlesse haue condemned him. Wherefore calling together his friends and souldiers that had serued vnder him in the warres, or that had taken charge with him, which were many in number: he earnestly besought them, that they would not suffer him thus vilely to be condemned, through false and vniust accusations layd against him, nor to be so scorned and defamed by his enemies. His friends hauing layd their heads together, and consulted thereupon, made him answer: how for his iudgement they could not remedy it, but if he were condemned, they would all ioyne together with a very good wil, to helpe to pay his fine. But he being of mind not to beare such an open shame and ignominy, determined in choler to leaue the city, & to exile himselfe from it. And after he had taken his leaue of his wife & children, bidding them farewell: he went out of his house to the gates of the city, and sayd neuer a word. When he came thither, he stayed suddenly, and returning backe againe, he lift vp his hands towards the Capitoll, and made his prayers vnto the gods: that if it were of very spite and malice, and not of iust deseruing, that the common people compelled him thus shamefully to forsake the city, that the ROMAINES might quickly repent them, and in the face of the world might wish for him, and haue need of him. After he had made these prayers against the citizens (as Achilles did against the GRECIANS) he went his way, and was condemned for his contempt, in the summe of fifteene thousand Asses of the ROMAINE coyne, which make of Greekish mony, a thousand fiue hundred Drachmas of siluer: for an As was a litle peece of mony, whereof ten of them made a ROMAINE peny. Howbeit there was not a ROMAINE of any vnderstanding, but beleeued certainly that some great punishment would follow them incontinently, and that the wrong and iniury they had done him would be quickly requited, with some most sharpe and terrible reuenge, not onely vnpleasant to thinke vpon, but further most notable to be spokē of through the world. There fel out so suddenly vpon it, such mischiefe toward the city of ROME, and the present time also brought forth such occasion of daunger and destruction thereof, to their shame and infamy: that it was vncertaine whether it happened by chance, or else it was the handy worke of some god, that would not suffer vertue recompenced with ingratitude, to passe vnreuenged. Their first token that threatned some great mischiefe to light vpon them, was the death of Iulius, one of the Censors: for the ROMAINES do greatly reuerence the office of a Censor, and esteeme it as a sacred place. The second token that happened a litle before Camillus exile, was: that one Marcus Cæditius, a man but of meane quality, and none of the Senators (but otherwise a faire conditioned honest man, and of good conscience) told the Tribuni militares of a thing that was to be well considered of. For he sayd that the night before, as he was going on his way in the new streete, he heard one call him aloud: and returning backe to see what it was, he saw no liuing creature, but onely heard a voyce bigger thē a mans, which said vnto him: Marcus Cæditius, go thy way to morrow morning to the Tribuni militares, and bid them looke quickly for the GAVLES. The Tribunes were mery at the matter, and made but a iest at his warning, and straight after followed the condemnation of Camillus. Now as touching the GAVLES: they came (as they say) of the CELTÆ, whose country not being able to maintaine the multitudes of them, they were driuen to go seeke other countries to inhabit in: and there were amongst them many thousands of young men of seruice and good souldiers, but yet more women and litle children by a great number. Of these people, some of them went towards the North sea, passing the mountaines RIPHEI, and did dwell in the extreme parts of EVROPE. Other of them remained betweene the mountaines PIRENEI, and the greatest mountaines of the ALPES, neere vnto the SENONES, and the CELTORII. There they continued continued a long time, vntill they fortuned in the end to taſte of the wine, which was firſt brought out of ITALY vnto them. Which drinke they found ſo good, and were ſo delighted with it, that ſuddenly they armed themſelues, and taking their wiues and children with them, they went directly towards the ALPES, to go ſeeke out the country that brought forth ſuch fruit, iudging all other countries in reſpect of that, to be but wild and barren. It is ſayd, that the firſt man which brought wine vnto them, and that did procure them to paſſe into ITALY, was a nobleman of THVSCAN called Arron, and otherwiſe of no ill diſpoſed nature: howbeit he was ſubiect to this misfortune following. He was tutor vnto an orphan child, the richeſt that was at that time in all the countrey of THVSCAN, and of complexion was wonderfull faire: he was called Lucumo. This orphan was brought vp in Arrons houſe of a child, and though he was growne to mans ſtate, yet he would not go from him, faining he was well, and to his liking. But indeed the cauſe was, that he loued his miſtreſſe (Arrons wife) whom ſecretly he had enioyed a long time, and ſhe him, that made him like his continuance there. Howbeit in the end, loue hauing ſo poſſeſſed them both, that neither party could withdraw from other, much leſſe conceale it: the young man ſtole her away from him, and kept her ſtill by force. Arron put him in ſute, but he preuailed not: for Lucumo ouerweyed him with friends, money, gifts, and charges. But he tooke it ſo grieuouſly, that he left his countrey: and hauing heard talke of the GAVLES, he went vnto them, and was their guide to bring them into ITALY. So they conquered at their firſt comming all that countrey which the THVSCANES held in old time, beginning at the foote of the mountaines, and ſtretched out in length from one ſea vnto the other, which enuironeth ITALY, as the names themſelues do witneſſe. For they call yet that ſea which looketh vnto the North, the Adriaticke ſea: by reaſon of a city built ſometime by the THVSCANS, which was called Adria. The other, which lieth directly ouer againſt the South, is called the THVSCANE ſea. All that countrey is well planted with trees, and hath goodly pleaſant paſtures for beaſts and cattell to feed in, and is notably watered with goodly running riuers. There was alſo at that time eighteene faire great cities in that countrey, all of them very ſtrong and well ſeated, as well for to enrich the inhabitants thereof by trafficke, as to make them to liue delicately for pleaſure. All theſe cities the GAVLES had won, and had expulſed the THVSCANES, but this was done long time before. Now the GAVLES being further entred into THVSCAN, did beſiege the city of CLVSIVM. Thereupon the CLVSIANS ſeeking aide of the ROMAINES, beſought them they would ſend letters and ambaſſadors vnto theſe barbarous people in their fauour. They ſent vnto them three of the beſt and moſt honorable perſons of the city, all three of the houſe of the Fabians. The GAVLES receiued them very courteouſly, becauſe of the name of ROME: and leauing to aſſault the city, they gaue them audience. The ROMAINE ambaſſadours did aske them, what iniury the CLVSIANS had done vnto them, that they came to make warres with them. Brennus king of the GAVLES, hearing this queſtion, ſmiled, and anſwered them thus: The CLVSIANS do vs wrong in this: they being but few people together, and not able to occupy much land, do notwithſtanding poſſeſſe much, and will let vs haue no part with them, that are ſtrangers, and out of our country, and ſtand in need of ſeate and habitation. The like wrong was offered vnto you ROMAINES in old time, by thoſe of ALBA, by the FIDENATES, and the ARDEATES: and not long ſithens, by the VEIANS, and the CAPENATES: and partly by the FALISCES and the VOLSCES: againſt whom ye haue taken, and do take armes at all times: and as oft as they will let you haue no part of their goods, ye impriſon their perſons, rob and ſpoile their goods, and deſtroy their cities: and in doing this, ye do them no wrong at all, but follow the oldeſt law that is in the world, which euer leaueth vnto the ſtronger, that which the weaker cannot keepe and enioy; beginning with the gods, and ending with beaſts: the which haue this property in nature, that the bigger and ſtronger haue euer the vantage of the weaker and leſſer. Therefore, leaue your pity to ſee the CLVSIANS beſieged, leaſt you teach vs GAVLES to take compaſſion alſo of thoſe you haue oppreſſed. By this anſwer the ROMAINES knew very well, there was no way to make peace with king Brennus. Wherfore they entred into the city of CLVSIVM, and incouraged the inhabitants to ſallie out with them vpon theſe barbarous people: either becauſe they had a deſire to proue the valiantneſſe of the GAVLES, or elſe to ſhew their owne courage and manhood. So the citizens went out, & skirmiſhed with them hard by the wals: in the which one of the Fabians, called Quintus Fabius Ambuſtus, being excellently well horſed, and putting ſpurs to him, did ſet vpon a goodly bigge perſonage of the GAVLES, that had aduanced himſelfe farre before all the troupe of his companions.

Fabius Ambuſtus a Romaine breaketh the common lawes of all nations.

He was not knowne at the firſt encounter, aſwell for the ſudden meeting and skirmiſhing together, as for that his gliſtering armour dimmed the eyes of the enemies. But after he had ſlaine the Gavle, and came to ſtrip him, Brennus then knew him, and proteſted againſt him, calling the gods to witneſſe, how he had broken the law of armes, that comming as an ambaſſadour, he had taken vpon him the forme of an enemy. Hereupon Brennus foorthwith left skirmiſhing, and raiſing the ſiege from Clvsivm, marched with his army vnto Rome gates. And to the end the Romaines might know, that the Gavles were not well pleaſed for the iuiury they had receiued: to haue an honeſt colour to begin warres with the Romaines, he ſent an Herauld before to Rome, to demaund liuerie of the man that had offended him, that he might puniſh him accordingly. In the meane time, he himſelfe came marching after, by ſmall iourneys to receiue their anſwer. The Senate hereupon aſſembled, and many of the Senatours blamed the raſhneſſe of the Fabians: but moſt of all, the prieſts called Fæciales. For they followed it very earneſtly, as a matter that concerned religion, and the honour of the gods: declaring how the Senate, in diſcharge of all the reſidue of the city of the offence committed, ſhould lay the whole waight and burthen of it vpon him alone, that onely had done the fact. Numa Pompilius, the iuſteſt and moſt peaceable of all the Kings of Rome that had bene, was he that firſt erected the Colledge of theſe Fæciales, and did ordaine that they ſhould be the keepers of peace, and the iudges to heare and allow all the cauſes, for the which they ſhould iuſtly begin any warres. Neuertheleſſe, the Senate in the end turned ouer the ordering of the matter, vnto the whole will and iudgement of the people, before whom theſe prieſts Fæciales did alſo accuſe Fabius Ambuſtus. The people made ſo litle account of their propounded religion, and honour of the gods in that caſe: that in ſtead of deliuering of this Fabius vnto the enemy, they did chuſe him for one of the Tribunes of the ſouldiers with his brothers. The Gavles vnderſtanding this, were ſo furious and angry thereat, that they would no longer linger their iournies, but marched with all ſpeed vnto Rome. The people that dwelt by the high wayes where they ſhould paſſe by, were maruellouſly affraid to ſee the multitude of them, and their braue and vniuerſall furniture: and beginning to doubt the fury of their rage, they imagined firſt of all that they would deſtroy all the champion countrey before them, & afterwards would take all the ſtrong cities. They contrariwiſe did take nothing at all out of the filds, neither did any hurt or diſpleaſure vnto any body: but paſſing by their cities, cried out they went to Rome, and would haue no wars but with the Romaines, and how otherwiſe they deſired to be friends with all the world. Theſe barbarous people marching on in this wiſe towards Rome, the Tribunes of the ſouldiers brought their army to the field to encounter them. They were no leſſe in number then the Gavles, for they were 40000. footmen: howbeit moſt part of them were raw ſoldiers, that had neuer ſerued in the wars before. They were very careleſſe of the gods, and diſſolute in matters of religion: for they paſſed neither for good ſignes in their ſacrifices, neither to aske counſell of their ſoothſayers, which the Romaines were religiouſly wont to do, before they gaue any battell. To make the matter worſe, the number of the captaines hauing power & authority alike, did aſmuch (or more then the reſt) diſorder and confound their doings. For oft times before, in farre leſſer matters and dangers then theſe, they did vſe to chuſe ſpeciall officers that had ſole and ſoueraine authority, which they called Dictators: knowing very well of how great importance it is, in dangerous times to haue but one head and general, to command all, and to haue ſupreme authority of iuſtice in his hands, and not to be bound to deliuer account of his doings to any. The iniury alſo which they had too vngratefully done to Camillus, brought great miſchiefe & inconuenience then vpon them. For the captaines after him, durſt no more command the people roughly, but euer after did flatter them much. When their army was now brought into the field, they encãped thẽſelues by a litle riuer called Allia, about the eleuenth ſtone from Rome, and not farre from the place where the ſame riuer falleth into Tyber. Thither came the barbarous army to them, who ouerthrew them in battell, by their diſorder and lacke of gouernment. For the left point or wing of their battell was broken off at the firſt by the Gavles, who charged them ſo furiouſly, that they draue them headlong into the riuer. The right wing then retiring out of the plaine, before they had any charge giuen, and hauing gotten certaine hils hard by them: they had litle hurt, & moſt of them ſauing themſelues, did recouer Rome againe. The reſt that eſcaped after the enemies were weary of killing, fled by night vnto the city of Veies, thinking Rome had bene loſt, and all the city put to the ſword. This ouerthrow was on the longeſt day in ſommer, the Moone being at the full: and the day before fortuned the great great slaughter of the Fabians, of the which were slaine by the THVSCANES in one day 300. all of a name. The very day it selfe was afterwards called Alliade, of the name of the litle riuer, by the which the second ouerthrow was giuen. But for the difference of daies, that some of them are naturally vnfortunate, or that Heraclitus the Philosopher had reason to reproue the Poet Hesiodus, for making some dayes good, & some daies ill, as though he vnderstood they were not all of one nature: we haue written and declared our opinion thereof in other places. Yet, because the matter deliuereth present occasion to speake of the same, peraduenture it will not be amisse to alledge a few examples of it onely. It fortuned the BOEOTIANS on a time to win two honorable victories, on the first day of the moneth they call Hippodromus (and which the ATHENIANS call Hecatombæon) that is now the moneth of Iune, by either of the which they did still restore the GRECIANS to their liberty. One was the battell of LEVCTRES: the other was the battell of GERASTE, which was 200. yeares before, when they ouercame Lattamias, and the THESSALIANS in battell. The PERSIANS contrarily were ouercome in battell by the GRECIANS the 6. day of August, at the iorney of MARATHON. The third day, at the battel of PLATEES. And on the selfe same day, neere vnto MYCALA. On the fiue and twentieth day, at the fight of ARBELES, the ATHENIANS wan the battell by sea, neere vnto the Ile of NAXOS, vnder the charge & gouernment of Chabrias, about the full of the Moone, in the moneth of August. And on the twentieth of the same moneth, they wan the battell of SALAMINA: as we haue written more amply in our history of difference of daies. The moneth of Aprill also brought to the barbarous people many notable losses. For Alexander the great, ouercame the generall of the king of PERSIA, at the field of GRANICA, in the said moneth. The CARTHAGINIANS also were vanquished in CICILE by Timoleon, on the seuen and twentieth day thereof. On which day also it is thought the city of TROY was taken: as Ephorus, Calisthenes, Damastes, and Phylarchus, haue written in their histories. Now contrariwise: the moneth of Iuly, which the BOEOTIANS call Panemus, hath not bene gracious to the GRECIANS. For on the seuenth day of the same, they were ouerthrowne by Antipater at the battell of CRANON, which was their vtter destruction. They had before also lost a battell the same moneth, neere vnto the city of CHÆRONEA, by king Phillip. On the same day also, and in the very selfe moneth & yeare, those which came into ITALY with king Archidamus were slaine euery one of them, by the barbarous people of the countrey. The CARTHAGINIANS also feare the 27. day of the same moneth, as the day which had before time brought them into many great and sorowfull calamities. Contrarily also, I know very well, how about the feast of mysteries, the city of THEBES was destroyed by Alexander, and that the ATHENIANS were compelled to receiue a garison of souldiers into their city, about the 20. day of August, at which time they made the holy procession of the mysteries of Iacchus. And on the selfe day the ROMAINES lost their army, and their generall Cæpio, who was slaine by the CIMBRES. And how afterwards vnder the leading of Lucullus, they ouercame king Tigranes, and the ARMENIANS. And that Attalus, & Pompey also, died both on the selfe same day they were borne. To conclude, infinite examples of men might be brought, vnto whom after like reuolutions of time, there happened notable chances of good or ill. But to returne againe vnto our historie. The day of this ouerthrow, is one of those which the ROMAINES take for one of the vnfortunatest daies that euer came vnto them. And by reason of that day, they reckon two other dayes of euery moneth very vnfortunate, engendred through feare and superstition, which spreadeth farre (as commonly it doth) vpon such sinister misfortunes. But for this matter, we haue written in more largely and exquisitly in the booke we made, of the ceremonies & customes of the ROMAINES. Now after this battel lost, if the GAVLES had hotly pursued the chase of their flying enemies, nothing could haue saued ROME from being taken, and the inhabitants thereof from being put vnto the sword: for the ROMAINES that fled from the battel, brought such a feare vpon those that receiued them, and filled the whole city of ROME with such griefe and trembling, that they wist not what to do. The barbarous people againe, beleeuing litle their victory was so great as it was, fell to make good cheere for so great a ioy receiued, & deuided among thē the spoile of their enemies goods they found in the campe. So gaue they time & leisure by this meanes, to the multitude of people that fled out of ROME, to seeke them some place of safety: & to such as remained still, they left good hope to saue thēselues, and to make some prouision for defence. Thereupon they al fortified themselues within mount Capitoll, and storing it with all kind of victuall, armor, and munition, they wholly did forsake the rest of the city. But the first worke they tooke in hand was this: They did bring into their sayd fort, part of their ſacred reliques: and the profeſſed Veſtals brought thither alſo their holy fire and all other their holy monuments. Some writers ſay, that they had nothing elſe in keeping, but the ſempiternall fire, and were ſo conſecrated by king Numa, who did firſt inſtitute, that the fire ſhould be worſhipped, as the beginning of all things. For that it is the moſt motiue and quickeſt

ſubſtance that is of all naturall things: notwithſtanding, that generation alſo is a mouing, or at the leaſt not done without motion. For we ſeee, that all other ſubſtance which lacketh heate, remaineth idle, and without action, and ſtirreth not, no more then doth a dead thing, which craueth the force and heate of fire: as the ſoule it ſelfe recouering heate, beginneth ſomewhat to moue, and diſpoſeth it ſelfe to do, and ſuffer ſomething. Wherefore Numa being (as they ſay) a man of great learning and vnderſtanding, who for his wiſedome was reported to talke many times with the Muſes, did conſecrate the ſame as a moſt ſacred thing, and commaunded that they neuer ſhould ſuffer that fire to go out, but to keepe it, as they would preſerue the liuely image of the eternall God, the onely King and maker of the world. Other ſay, that the fire burned continually there before the holy and ſacred things, ſignifying a kind and maner of purification: which opinion the GRECIANS hold alſo: howbeit behind the ſame fire, there were certaine hidden things, which in no caſe any might ſeee, but thoſe holy Veſtall Nuns. Many alſo hold an opinion, that the Palladium of TROY (as much to ſay as, as Pallas image) is hidden alſo there, which was brought by Æneas into ITALY. Other do report alſo, that Dardanus, at that time when he firſt began to build the city of TROY, brought thither the holy images of the gods of SAMOTHRACIA, and he did offer them vp there: and how Æneas after the city was taken, did ſteale them away, and kept them vntill he came to dwell in ITALY. Some other alſo, that take vpon them to know more therein then the common ſort do, hold opinion, that there are two pipes not very great, whereof the one is empty and ſtandeth open, the other is full and faſt locked vp, howbeit they are not to be ſeene but by theſe holy Nunnes. Other thinke alſo, that theſe imaginers inuented that they ſpake of their owne heads, becauſe the Veſtall Nuns did caſt all that they could put in at that time, into two pipes, which they buried after in the ground, within the temple of Quirinus: and therefore that very place carieth the ſurname at this day of pipes. Howbeit they caried about them the moſt precious things they had, and fled alongſt the riuer. Where one Lucius Albinus (one of the common people) flying alſo, and hauing brought away his wife and litle children, & other houſhold ſtuffe he had in a cart, by chance he lighted vpon the Veſtall Nunnes in the way. But ſo ſoone as he perceiued theſe holy Nunnes (carying the bleſſed reliques and iewels in their armes, dedicated vnto the ſeruice of the gods) all alone, and that they were weary with going a foot: he cauſed his wife and his children to come out of the cart, and tooke downe all his goods alſo, & willed them to get them vp, & flye into ſome city or towne of GRECE. Thus, me thought I could not well paſſe ouer with ſilence, Albinus reuerence & deuotion he ſhewed vnto the gods, in ſo dangerous a time and pinch of extremity. Furthermore the prieſts of other gods, and the moſt honourableſt old men of the city of ROME (that had bene Conſuls before time, or had paſt the honour of triumph) had not the heart to forſake ROME: but putting on all their moſt holy robes and veſtments, did vow, & as it were willingly ſacrificed themſelues vnto the fortune that ſhould befall them for the ſafety of their countrey. And vſing certaine words and prayers which place, and did ſit them downe there, in chaires of iuory, expecting the goodwill & pleaſure of the gods what ſhould become of them. But within three daies after, Brennus came to ROME with his army: who finding the gates of the city all open, and the wals without watch, he doubted ſome deuiſe in it, and feared ſome priuy ambuſh had bene layd, as one hardly beleeuing to haue found the ROMAINES of ſo baſe a mind, as to forſake their city. After being enformed of the troth, he entred into ROME by the gate Collina, and tooke the ſame litle more then 360. yeares after it was firſt builded: if it be true at the leaſt that there hath remained any certaine chronicles of thoſe times vnto this preſent day, conſidering the trouble and confuſion of that time hath made many things more certaine then that, doubtfull vnto vs. But ſo it was, that the rumour ranne to GRECE incontinently how ROME was taken, but yet withall ſomewhat doubtfully and vncertainly. For Heraclides Ponticus (who was about that time) ſaith in a certaine booke he wrote of the ſoule, that there was newes come from the Weſt part, that an army which came from the HYPERBORIANS had taken a city of GRECE called ROME, ſituated in that countrey neare the great ſea. But I wonder not that Heraclides (who hath written ſo many other fables and lyes) did

amplifie the true newes of the taking of ROME, with adding too of his owne deuice, of the HYPERBORIANS, and by the great sea. It is a most true tale, that Aristotle the Philosopher had certaine knowledge it was taken by the GAVLES: howbeit he saith also it was recouered againe afterwards by one called Lucius: where indeed it was, by Marcus Camillus, and not by Lucius. But all this in manner is spoken by coniecture. Moreouer Brennus being entred ROME, did appoint part of his souldiers to besiege those which were gotten into mount Capitol. And he with the residue of his army, marched on towards the market place, where when he saw the auncient Senatours set so grauely in their chaires and spake neuer a word, nor offered once to rise, though they saw their enemies come armed against them, neither chaunged countenance nor colour at all, but leaned softly on their staues they had in their hands, seeming to be nothing afraid nor abashed, but looked one vpon another, he maruellously wondred at it. This their so straunge maner at the first did so dampe the GAVLES, that for a space they stood still, and were in doubt to come neare to touch them, fearing lest they had bene some gods: vntill such time as one of them went boldly vnto Marcus Papyrius, & laid his hand faire and softly vpon his long beard. But Papyrius gaue him such a rap on hispate with his staffe, that he made the bloud run about his ears. This barbarous beast was in such a rage with the blow, that he drew out his sword and slue him. The other soldiers also killed all the rest afterwards: and so the GAVLES continued many daies spoiling and sacking all things they found in the houses, and in the end did set them all a fire, and destroyed them euery one, for despite of those that kept the fort of the Capitoll, and would not yeeld vpon their summons, but valiantly repulsed them when they scaled the wals. For this cause they raced the whole citie, and put all to the sword that came in their hands, young and old, man, woman and child. Now this siege continuing long, and the ROMAINES holding them out very stoutly, victuals began to grow scant in the campe of the GAVLES, insomuch as they were driuen of force to seeke it abroad without the citie. Hereupon they deuided themselues, whereof some remained still with the King at the siege of the Capitoll: and the rest went a forraging and spoiling all the champion countrey and villages thereabouts, scattered as it were by bands and companies, some here some there, fearing nothing, nor passing vpon watch or ward, they liued in such securitie of their victorie. Howbeit the greatest company amongst them, went by fortune towards the citie of ARDEA where Camillus dwelt, liuing like a priuate man, medling with no matters of state from the time of his exile, vntill that present time. But then he began not to bethinke himselfe as a man that was in safetie, and might haue escaped the hands of his enemies, but rather sought to deuise and find out all the meanes he could to subdue them if occasion were so offered. Whereupon, considering that the inhabitants of ARDEA were enough in number to set vpon them, although faint hearted, and cowardly, by reason of the slouth and negligence of their gouernours and captaines, who had no manner of experience in the wars: he began to cast out these words among the young men: That they should not thinke the ROMAINES misfortune fell vpon them, through the valiantnesse of the GAVLES, nor that their calamitie (who had refused good counsell) had hapned vnto them by any work or act of the GAVLES, hauing done nothing for their part to make them carry away the victorie: but that they shold think it was no other thing, but fortune alone, that would needes shew her power. Therefore, that it were now a notable and honourable enterprise (although somewhat daungerous) to driue these strangers and barbarous people out of their countrie: considering that the only end of their victorie was, but to destroy and consume as fire, all that fell into their hands. Wherefore if they would but only take a good lustie heart and courage vnto them, he would with oportunitie and place, assure them the victory without any danger. The young men were pleased with these words of life and comfort. Wherupon Camillus went to breake the matter also vnto the magistrates and counsellers: and hauing drawne them by perswasion vnto this enterprise, he armed all that were of age to cary armour, and would not suffer a man to go out of the citie, for feare lest the enemies (which were not far off) should haue intelligence of the same. Now after the GAVLES had run ouer all the champion country, and were loden with all sorts of spoiles, they did encampe themselues negligently in open fields, and neuer charged watch nor ward: but hauing their full cariage of wine laid them downe to sleepe, and made no noise at all in their camp. Camillus being aduertised ther-of by his seuerall skouts, caused the ARDEANS with as litle noise as might be, forthwith to go out into the fields: and hauing marched somewhat roundly the distance betweene the citie and the campe of the GAVLES, they came thither much about midnight. Then he made his souldiers make great ſhouts and cries,and the trumpets to be ſounded on euery ſide, to put a feare in their enemies,who yet with all the loud noiſe they made,could hardly be made to wake, they were ſo deadly drunke. Yet there were ſome notwithſtanding,that for feare to be taken tardy, did buſtle vp at this ſudden noiſe: and coming to themſelues,fell to their weapons to reſiſt Camillus,which were ſlaine by and by. The reſt and the greateſt number of them lay here and there ſcattered in the midſt of the field without any weapon dead aſleepe, ſtarke drunk with wine,and were put to the ſword and neuer ſtrake ſtroke. Thoſe that fled out of the campe that night (which were but few in number) were ouerthrowne alſo the next day,by the horſemen which followed and killed them, as they tooke them ſtragling here and there in the fields. The brute of this victory was blowne abroad incontinently through all the towns and villages therabouts,which cauſed many yong men to come and ioyne themſelues to Camillus: but ſpecially the ROMAINES deſired the ſame,that had ſaued themſelues in the city of VEIES,after the battell loſt at ALLIA, who made their mones among themſelues there,ſaying: O gods what a captaine hath fortune taken from the citie of ROME? What honor hath the city of ARDEA by the valiantnes and worthy deedes of Camillus: and in the meane ſeaſon his naturall city that brought him forth,is now loſt and vterly deſtroyed? We, for lack of a captaine to lead vs,are ſhut vp here within others wals,and do nothing but ſuffer ITALIE in the meane ſpace to go to ruine and vtter deſtruction before our eyes. Why then do we not ſend to the ARDEANS for our captaine? or why do we not arme our ſelues to go vnto him? For he is now no more a baniſhed man,nor we poore citizens: ſince our city is poſſeſſed with the foraine power of our hatefull enemies. So they all agreed to this counſel,and ſent vnto Camillus to beſeech him to be their captaine,& lead them. But he made anſwer, he would in no caſe conſent vnto it,vnleſſe they that were beſieged in the Capitoll had lawfully firſt confirmed it by their voices. For thoſe (ſaid he) ſo long as they remaine within the city,do repreſent the ſtate & body therof. Therfore if they cõmanded him to take this charge vpon him, he wold moſt willingly obey thẽ: if otherwiſe they miſliked of it,that then he would not meddle againſt their goodwils & commandement. They hauing receiued this anſwer,there was not a ROMAINE amongſt thẽ,but greatly honored & extolled the wiſdome and iuſtice of Camillus. But now they knew not how to make them priuy vnto it,that were beſieged in the Capitoll: for they ſaw no poſſibilitie to conuey a meſſenger to thẽ: conſidering the enemies were lords of the city,and laid ſiege to it. Howbeit there was one Pontius Cominius among the yong men (a man of a meane houſe,but yet deſirous of honor and glory) that offred himſelfe very willingly to venter to get in if he could. So he took no letters to cary to them that were beſieged, for feare leſt they might be intercepted,and ſo they ſhold diſcouer Camillus intention: but putting on an ill fauoured gown vpon him, he conueyed certain peeces of cork vnder it,and trauelling at noone daies kept on his way without feare vntill he came to ROME, bringing dark night with him. And becauſe he could not paſſe by the bridge,for that the barbarous people kept watch vpon it,he wrapped ſuch clothes as he had about his necke (which were not many nor heauy) & tooke the riuer, & ſwimming with theſe corkes he had brought,at the length he got ouer to the other ſide where the city ſtood. Thẽ taking vp thoſe lanes alwaies where he thought the enemies were not,ſeeing fire,& hearing noiſe in other places,he went to the gate Carmental,where he found more ſilence then in other places: on the which ſide alſo,the hill of the Capitol was more ſteep & vpright, by reaſon of the great rockes that were hard to clime vp vpon. But he digged and crept vp ſo long amongſt thẽ,that he got vp with great pain vnto the wal of the fortreſſe,on the which ſide alſo the enemy kept no watch: and ſaluting the watch of the Capitol,he told them what he was. So they plucked him vp vnto them,& brought him to the magiſtrats that ruled then: who cauſed the Senate to aſſemble preſently,to whom he told the newes of Camillus victory, which they had not heard of before: & therwith alſo he did declare vnto them,the determination of the ROMAIN ſoldiers that were abroad,which was,to make Camillus their captain and generall,and did perſwade them alſo to grant him the charge,for that he was the only man abroad whom the citizens gaue their conſents to obey. When they heard this, all that were within the Capitol,conſulted thereupon amongſt themſelues,and ſo did chuſe Camillus Dictator, & returned the meſſenger Pontius Cominius backe againe the ſelfe ſame way he came vnto them. His fortune in returning backe was like vnto his comming thither: for the enemies neuer ſaw him. And ſo he brought report to them that were abroad,of the Senates decree and conſent,wherof they were all maruellous glad. Thus came Camillus to take this charge of general vpon him,and found there were twenty thouſand ſand good fighting men abroad,and well armed. Then got he further aide alſo of their allies and confederates, and prepared daily to go and ſet vpon the enemies. So was Camillus choſen now Dictator the ſecond time,and went into the citie of VEIES where he ſpake with the ROMAINE ſouldiers that were there, and leauied a great number of the allies beſides, to go fight with the enemies as ſoone as he could. But whilſt Camillus was thus a preparing, certaine of the barbarous people in ROME, walking out by chaunce on that ſide of the Capitoll where Pontius Cominius had gotten vp the night before: ſpied in diuers places the prints of his feet and hands, as he had griped and gotten hold,ſtill digging to get vp,and ſaw the weeds and herbes alſo growing vpon the rockes,and the earth in like maner flat troden downe. Whereupon they went preſently vnto the king to let him vnderſtand the ſame: who foorthwith came to view the place. And hauing conſidered it well,he did nothing at that time: but when darke night was come,he called a company of the lighteſt GAVLES together, and that vſed moſt to dig in mountaines, and ſaid vnto them: Our enemies themſelues do ſhew vs the way how to take them,which we could not haue found out but by themſelues. For they hauing gone vp before vs,do giue vs eaſily to vnderſtand it is no impoſſible thing for vs to clime vp alſo. Wherfore we were vtterly ſhamed,hauing alreadie begunne well,if we ſhould faile alſo to end well: and to leaue this place as vnuincible. For if it were eaſie for one man alone,by digging to clime vp to the height thereof: much leſſe is it hard for many to get vp one after another, ſo that one do helpe another. Therefore Sirs,I aſſure you, thoſe that do take paines to get vp, ſhall be honourably rewarded, according to their iuſt deſert. When the King had ſpoken theſe words vnto the GAVLES, they fell to it luſtily euery man to get vp: and about midnight,they began many of them to dig,and make ſteps vp to the rocke one after another,as ſoftly as could poſſibly, with catching hold the beſt they could, by the hanging of the rocke, which they found very ſteepe,but neuertheleſſe eaſier to clime, then they tooke it at the beginning. So that the formoſt of them being come to the top of the rocke, were now readie to take the wall,and to ſet vpon the watch that ſlept: for there was neither man nor dog that heard thē. It chanced then there were holy geeſe kept in the temple of Iuno,which at other times were wont to be fed till their crops were full: but victuals being very ſtraight and ſcant at that time euen to find the men,the poore geeſe were ſo hard handled, and ſo litle regarded, that they were in maner ſtarued for lacke of meat. This fowle indeed naturally is very quicke of hearing, and ſo is ſhe alſo very feareful by nature: and being in maner famiſhed with their hard allowance they were ſo much the more waking and eaſier to be afraid. Vpon this occaſion therefore, they heard the comming of the GAVLES,and alſo began to run vp and downe and cry for feare: with which noiſe they did wake thoſe that were within the caſtle. The GAVLES being bewrayed by theſe fooliſh geeſe,left their ſtealing vpon them,and came in with all the open noiſe and terrour they could. The ROMAINES hearing this larum, euery man tooke ſuch weapon as came firſt to his hand,and they ran ſuddenly to reſcue that place from whence they vnderſtood the noiſe: among thoſe,the formoſt man of all, was Marcus Manlius, a man that had bene Conſul, who had a luſty body,and as ſtout a hart. His hap being to meet with two of the GAVLES together,as one of them was lifting vp his axe to knock him on the head,he preuented him,and ſtrake off his hand with his ſword,and clapt his target on the others face ſo fiercely, that he threw him backward downe the rocke: and comming afterwards vnto the wall with others that ran thither with him, he repulſed the reſt of the GAVLES that were gotten vp, who were not many in number, neither did any great act. Thus the ROMAINES hauing eſcaped this danger,the next morning they threw the captaine downe the rocks from the caſtle, who had charge of the watch the night before: and gaue Manlius in recompence of the good ſeruice he had done,a more honorable then profitable reward,which was this: Euery man of them gaue him halfe a pound of the countrey wheat,which they call Far,and the fourth part of the meaſure of wine, which the GRECIANS call Cotile: and this might be about a quart, being the ordinary allowance of euery man by the day. After this repulſe, the GAVLES began to be diſcouraged, partly for that their victuals failed them, and durſt no more forage abroad in the fields for feare of Camillus: and partly alſo for that the plague came amongſt them, being lodged amongſt heapes of dead bodies, lying in euery place aboue ground without burial,and amongſt burnt houſes deſtroyed,where the aſhes being blowne very high by the wind and vehemency of heat,did giue a drie piercing aire, that did maruellouſly poiſon their bodies when they came to draw in the breath of it. But the greateſt cauſe of all their miſchiefe was,the chaunge of their wonted diet. Who comming out of a freſh country, where there were excellent pleasant places to retire vnto, to auoid the discommodity of the parching heat of the sommer, were now in a naughty plaine country for them to remain in, in the latter season of the yere. All these things together did heape diseases vpon them, besides the long continuance of the siege about the Capitoll (for it was then about the seuenth moneth) by reason whereof there grew a maruellous death in their campe, through the great numbers of them that died daily, and lay vnburied. But notwithstanding all the death and trouble of the GAVLES, the poore besieged ROMAINES were nothing holpen the more, the famine still did grow so fast vpon them. And because they could heare nothing of Camillus, they were grown almost vnto a despaire: and send vnto him they could not, the GAVLES kept so straight watch vpon them in the city. Wherupon both parties finding themselues in hard state, first the watch of either side began to cast out words of peace amongst themselues: and afterwards by consent of the heads, Sulpitius, Tribune of the soldiers, came to parle with Brennus. In which parle it was articled: that the ROMAINES should pay a thousand pound waight of gold, and that the GAVLES should incontinently after the receipt of the same, depart out of their city, and all their territories. This decree being passed by oath from both, the gold was brought. And when it came to be weyed, the GAVLES at the first priuily began to deale falsly with them: but afterwards they openly stayed the ballance, and would not let them wey no more, whereat the ROMAINES began to be angry with them. Then Brennus, in scorne and mockerie to despite them more, pluckt off his sword, girdle and all, and put it into the ballance where the gold was weyed. Sulpitius seeing that, asked him what he meant by it. Brennus answered him: What can it signifie else, but sorrow to the vanquished? This word euer after ran as a common prouerbe in the peoples mouths. Some of the ROMAINES tooke this vile part of theirs in such scorn, that they wold needs take the gold from them againe by force, and so returne into their hold, to abide the siege still, as they had done before. Other were of opinion to the contrarie, and thought it best with patience to put vp this scorne of theirs, and not to thinke it was a shame to pay more then they had promised: but only to pay it by compulsion as they did, by misfortune of time, was to thinke it rather necessarie, thē honourable. And as they were debating the matter thus, aswell amongst themselues, as with the GAVLES: Camillus came to ROME gates with his army, and vnderstanding all what had passed betweene them, he commanded the rest of the army to march faire and softly after him in good order, and he in the meane season with the best choise men he had, went before with all speed. Assoone as the other ROMAINES within the citie had spied him, they showted out for ioy, and receiued him euery one with great reuerence, without any more words, as their soueraigne captaine and prince, who had power ouer them all. And Camillus taking the gold out of the scales, gaue it vnto his men, and commanded the GAVLES presently to take vp their scales, and to get them going: for, saith he, it is not the ROMAINES maner to keepe their country with gold, but with the sword. Then Brennus beganne to be hote, and told him it was not honorably done of him, to breake the accord that had passed betweene them before by oath. Whereunto Camillus stoutly answered him againe, that accord was of no validity: for he being created Dictator before, all other officers and magistrates whatsoeuer, and their acts, by his election were made of no authority. And seeing therefore they had dealt with men, that had no power of themselues to accord to any matter, they were to speake to him, if they required ought: for he alone had absolute authoritie to pardon them if they repented, and would aske it: or else to punish them, and make their bodies answer the dammages and losse his countrey had by them sustained. These words made Brennus madde as a march hare, that out went his blade. Then they drew their swords of all sides, & laid lustily one at another as they could, within the houses, and in open streets, where they could set no battell in order. But Brennus suddenly remembring himselfe that it was no euen match for him, retired with his men about him into his campe, before he had lost many of his people. The next night following, he departed out of ROME with all his army, and went to encampe himself about a threescore furlongs from thence, in the high way that goeth towards the city of the GABIANS. Camillus with his whole army well appointed, went after him immediatly, and shewed at his campe by the breake of day. The ROMAINES hauing taken hart againe vnto them, did lustily giue them battell: the same continued long, very cruell and doubtfull, vntill the GAVLES at the length were ouerthrown, and their campe taken with great slaughter. As for those that did escape the furie of the battell, they were killed, some by the ROMAINES selues, who hotly followed the chase after the battell broken: the residue of them, and the greatest part were were ſlaine by thoſe of the cities and villages nere abouts, that did ſet vpon them as they fled ſcatteringly here and there in the fields. And thus was the city of ROME ſtrangely againe recouered that was before ſtrangely won and loſt, after it had continued ſeuen moneths in the hands of the barbarous people. For they entred ROME about the fifteenth day of Iuly: and they were driuen out againe, about the thirteenth day of February following. So Camillus triumphed as beſeemed him, and as one that had ſaued and deliuered his countrey out of the hands of their enemies, and ſet ROME again at liberty. Thoſe that had bene abroad all the time of this ſiege, came into ROME againe, following his triumphing chariot: and thoſe that had bene beſieged within the Capitoll (looking for no other but to haue died by famine) went and preſented themſelues before him, and each one embraced other, in weeping wiſe for ioy. The prieſts and miniſters of the temples alſo, preſented their holy iewels, whole and vndefaced, which ſome of them had buried in the ground within the city ſelfe: and other ſome had caried away with them, when they fled out of ROME. All theſe the people did as gladly ſee, as if the gods themſelues had returned home againe into their citie. After they had ſacrificed vnto the gods, and rendred them moſt humble thankes, and had purged their citie, as they had bene taught by men experienced in thoſe matters for ſatisfaction of the gods, Camillus began againe to build vp the temples that were there before, hard by the which he built another new one alſo to the god Aius Locutius, in that very place where Marcus Cæditius heard the voice warne him of the coming of the GAVLES. So by Camillus good diligence, and the prieſts great paine and trauell, the ſituations of theſe temples were with much ado found out againe. But when they were to build againe all the reſt of the citie, that was wholly burnt and deſtroyed to the ground: the people had no mind to it, but euer ſhrinked backe, to put any hand to the worke, for that they lacked all things neceſſarie to begin the ſame. Furthermore, weighing their late and long ſuſtained trouble and miſeries, they were fitter to take their eaſe and reſt, then to begin new labour and toyle, to kill their harts and bodies altogether. For neither were their bodies able to performe it, nor yet their goods to reach to the charge of it. Wherefore diſpoſing their minds to dwell in the citie of VEIES, which remained whole, vntouched, and furniſhed of all things to receiue them, they deliuered to the pratling Orators (whoſe tongues did neuer ceaſe to ſpeake placentia to the people) trimme occaſion to ſet this matter abroach. So they gaue good eare, and were willing to heare certaine ſeditious words ſpoken againſt Camillus, which were theſe: That for his priuate ambition he would depriue them of a citie well furniſhed alreadie, and would againſt their willes compell them to lodge in their owne houſes, wholly burnt and pulled downe. And moreouer, how he would make them to raiſe vp againe the great ruine the fire had made, to the end the people might call him, not onely Captaine and Generall of the ROMAINES, but the founder of ROME alſo, and ſo drowne Romulus honourable title thereof. The Senate conſidering of this matter, and fearing ſome tumult among the people: they would not ſuffer Camillus to leaue his Dictatorſhip before the end of the yeare, notwithſtanding no man euer enioyed that office aboue ſixe moneths. Then Camillus for his part did much indeuour himſelfe, to comfort and appeaſe the people, praying them all he could to tarie: and further pointed with his finger vnto the graues of their auncеſtours, and put them in mind alſo of the holy places dedicated to the gods, and ſanctified by King Numa, or by Romulus, or by other Kings. But amongſt many other tokens drawne out of holy and diuine things, he forgat not to bring for example, the head of a man found new and freſh, in making the foundations of the Capitoll, as if that place by fatall deſtinie had bene once choſen to be the head and chiefe of all ITALIE. And moreouer, that the holy fire of the goddeſſe Veſta (which ſince the wars had bin kindled againe by the holy Veſtal Nuns) would againe come to be put out by them, if they did forſake their naturall city: beſides the great ſhame and diſhonour it would be vnto them, to ſee it inhabited in time to come by vnknowne ſtrangers, or elſe to be left a common field and paſture, for beaſts and cattell to graze in. Such ſorrowfull examples and griefes, the honeſt naturall borne citizens, did euer blow into the peoples eares, aſwell priuately as openly. The people againe to the contrary, did make their hearts to yerne for pitie, when they laid before their eyes their penurie and pouerty they ſuſtained: and beſought them alſo not to enforce them to gather and ioyne together againe the broken peeces of a ſpoiled city (as of a ſhipwracke that had caſt them naked into the ſea, hauing only ſaued bare life and perſons) ſince that they had another citie neare at hand and ready to receiue them. So Camillus counſell was, that the Senat ſhould conſult vpon this matter, and deliuer their abſolute opinion herin: which was done. And in this counſell, he himſelfe brought foorth many probable reaſons, why they ſhould not leaue in any caſe, the place of their naturall birth and countrey: and ſo did many other Senatours in like caſe, fauouring that opinion. Laſt of all, after theſe perſwaſions, he commanded Lucius Lucretius (whoſe manner was to ſpeake firſt in ſuch aſſemblies) that he ſhould ſtand vp and deliuer his opinion, and that the reſt alſo in order as they ſate, ſhould ſay their minds. So euery man keeping ſilence, as Lucretius was ready to ſpeake, at that preſent time there paſſed by their counſell houſe, a captaine with his band that warded that day, who ſpake aloud to his enſigne bearer that went formoſt, to ſtay, and ſet downe his enſigne there: for, ſaid he, here is a very good place for vs to dwell in. Theſe words being heard vp into the Senate houſe, euen as they ſtood all in a doubt and maze what would be the reſolution of this matter: Lucretius began to ſay, that he moſt humbly thanked the gods; and allowed of the captaines iudgement, and ſo euery one of the reſt in their order, ſaid as much. Moreouer there was a wonderfull change and alteration of mind ſodainly among the common people: for euery man did perſwade and encourage his fellow liuely to put his hand to this work. Inſomuch as tarying for no diuiſion or appointing out of ſtreets, nor ſetting out euery man his place he ſhould build in, they fell to worke of all hands, euery one choſing that place he liked beſt, and was moſt commodious for their building, without any other order or diuiſion amongſt them. Wherupon, they running to this building on a head, the ſtreets were confuſed on heaps together, and their houſes all built out of order and vniformitie. For the report goeth, that the whole citie (aſwell common as priuate buildings) was built vp new againe in a yeare. But the ſuruciors, to whom Camillus had giuen charge to find out all the holy places where the temples had bene ouerthrowne: as they went about mount Pallatine, they came by chance to the place, where the chappell of Mars had ſtood, which the GAVLES had wholy burnt and deſtroyed, as they had done all the reſt. They making cleane the place, and ſurueying euery corner, did find by chance Romulus augures crooked ſtaffe hidden vnder a great mount of aſhes. This ſtaffe is crooked at one of the ends, and they call it Lituus, which ſoothſayers do vſe to quarter out the regions of the element, when they will behold the flying of birds to tell of things to come. Romulus that was very skilfull in this art, did vſe this ſtaffe: and after he was taken away from all mens ſights, the prieſts tooke it, and kept it as a holy relique, ſuffering no creature to lay hands on it. Now whē they found this ſtaffe whole & vnbrokē, where all things elſe were conſumed and periſhed by fire, they were in a maruellous ioy thereat: for they interpreted this to be a ſigne of the euerlaſting continuance of the city of ROME. But before they could make an end of all their building, there grew a new war againe vpon them. For at one very inſtant, all the ÆQVES, the VOLCSES, and the LATINES, entred with all their might and maine into the territories of the ROMAINES. The THVSCANES alſo went then and beſieged SVTRIVM, that was in league and amity with the ROMAINES. The Tribuni militares got them ſtraight to the field with their army, and encamped about mount Martian. The LATINES beſieged them ſo ſtraightly, that their army ſtood in great danger to be ouerthrowne, and they were driuen to ſend to ROME for a new ſupply. Therupon the ROMAINES did chooſe Camillus Dictator againe the third time. The occaſion of this war is reported two maner of waies: whereof I will declare the firſt, which I do conceiue to be but a tale. They ſay the LATINES ſent vnto the ROMAINS, to demand ſome of their free maides in mariage: which they did either to make a quarrell of warre, or elſe as deſirous indeed to ioyne both the peoples againe by new mariages. The ROMAINES were amazed very much at this, and ſore troubled, as not knowing how to anſwer them, they were ſo afraid of wars. For they were yet ſcant new ſetled at home, and dreaded much leſt this demand of their daughters, was but a ſummons made to giue them hoſtages, which they finely cloaked vnder the name of alliance in mariage. Some ſay that there was at that time a bond maid called Tutola, or as ſome ſay, Philotis, that went vnto the Senat, and counſelled them they ſhold ſend her away with ſome other faire maides ſlaues, dreſſed vp like gentlewomen, and then let her alone. The Senate liked very well of this deuice, and choſe ſuch a number of bond maids as ſhe deſired to haue, and trimming them vp in fine apparell, begawded with chaines of gold and iewels, they ſent them forth to the LATINES, who were encamped not far from the city. When night was come, the other maids hid their enemies ſwords. But this Tutola, or Philotis (call her as you will) did clime vp to the top of a wild fig tree, from which ſhe ſhewed a burning torch vnto the ROMAINES, hauing made ſhift to hang ſomwhat behind her, to keepe the light from ſight of the enemies. For this ſignall the Senate of ROME had ſecretly appointed her to ſet vp, which was the cauſe that the iſſuing issuing out of the souldiers, being commanded to go out in the night, was full of trouble and tumult. For being pressed by their captains, they called one another, and there was great a do to put them in order of battell. Thus they went to take their enemies sleeping, who nothing mistrusting the same, were slaine the most part of them within their campe. This was done on the fift day of the moneth called then Quintilis, and now is named Iuly: at which time they do yet celebrate a certain feast in remembrance of that act. For first of al, going out of the city, they cal aloud many of their fellowes names which are most common: as Caius, Marcus, and Lucius, shewing thereby how one of them called another after that sort, as they went in great haste out of the city. Afterwards all the maide-seruants of the citie being trimly apparelled, go playing vp and downe the towne, pleasantly iesting with those they meet: and in the end they make as though they fought together, in token that they did help the ROMAINES at that time to destroy the LATINES. Then they are feasted, sitting vnder bowers made with wild figge tree boughes: and this feast is called Nonæ Capratinæ, by reason of the wild figge tree (as some thinke) from the top whereof, the bond maide shewed to the ROMAINES the burning torch. For the ROMAINES cal the wild figge tree, Caprificus. Other say, that all these things are done and spoken, in remembrance of the mischance that happened vnto Romulus, whē he was taken out of their sight, the same day without the gates of the citie, at which time there arose a sodain mist and dark cloud. Or as some other say, that then was the eclypse of the Sun: and they hold opinion that the day was named Nonæ Capratinæ, because Capra in the ROMAINE tongue, signifieth a goate. Romulus vanished out of mens sights, as he was making an oration vnto his people, neare vnto the place which is called goat marsh, as we haue mentioned more at large in his life. The second occasion and beginning of this war (according to the opinion of most writers) was, that Camillus being chosen Dictator the third time, and knowing that the Trib. militares with their army were straightly besieged by the LATINES and VOLSCES, he was enforced to arme all the old men, who for very age were priuiledged from further seruice in warres. And hauing fetched a great compasse about mount Martian, because he would not be seen of his enemies, he came to lodge his camp behind them, where he raised fiers, to make the ROMAINES know that were besieged, how he was come: which as soone as they perceiued, they tooke to them courage againe, and determined to fight. But the LATINES and VOLSCES kept within their camp, and did intrench and fortifie themselues with a wall of wood, which they laid a crosse, because they saw they were beset both before and behind: and determined to tarie the releefe of a new supply, aswell of their owne, as of some further aide besides from the THVSCANS: which thing Camillus perceiuing, and fearing least they should serue him, as he had already handled them, by compassing of him againe behind, he thought it necessarie to preuent this. So considering the inclosure and fortification of their camp was all of wood, and that euery morning commonly, there came a great wind from the side of the mountaines, he made prouision of a number of fire brands. And leading out his armie into the fields by breake of day, he appointed one part of them to giue charge vpon the enemies on the one side, with great noise and shouting: and he with the other part determined to raise fire on the contrarie side, from whence the wind should come, looking for oportunitie to do the same. When he saw the Sunne vp, and the wind beginning to whistle, blowing a good gale from the side of the hils, and that the skirmish was begun on the other side: then he gaue a signall vnto the companie he led with him, to set vpon the enemies, and made them throw into the inclosure of their campe, diuers pots and dartes with fire, so that the flame finding matter to catch hold of, in this inclosure of wood, and trees laid ouerthwart, did raise straight an exceeding great flame in the aire, and still got way inwards into the LATINES campe. Whereupon the LATINES being vnprouided of present remedy to quench the flame, and seeing their camp a fire all about their eares, they gathered themselues together at the first in a very small roome. Neuertheless, they were inforced in the end to get them into the field, and there they found their enemies ready armed, and in battell ray. So as few of those escaped that came into the field, and their fellowes that remained within their campe, were burnt to death with fire, vntill the ROMAINES themselues came to quench it for greedinesse of their spoile & goods. When all this was done, Camillus left his son in the camp, to keepe the prisoners and spoiles: and he himself, with the rest of the army, went to inuade his enemies country, where he took the city of ÆQVES. Then after he had ouercome the VOLSCES, he led his army presenty from thence vnto the city of SVTRIVM. For he had not yet heard of their misfortune. Therfore he hasted himself to aid thē, because he thought they were yet besieged by the THVSCANS. But ſuch was their hard fortune, that they had alreadie yeelded vp their citie by compoſition, and ſaued no part of their goods, but the very clothes they had on their backes. So being turned out of all they had, they met Camillus by the way as they were wandring abroad, lamenting their miſerie with their wiues and litle yong children: whoſe miſerie went to the very heart of Camillus, when he beheld their lamentable ſtate. Furthermore, when he ſaw the ROMAINES weepe for pitie alſo, to ſee the mone that theſe vnfortunate people made vnto him, and that it grieued them heartily to behold their great miſchance: he determined with himſelfe not to deferre reuenge, but preſently to go the ſelfe ſame day before the citie of SVTRIVM, imagining that he ſhould find the THVSCANS out of order, without keeping watch, and attending nothing but making good cheere, becauſe they had newly taken a wealthy rich citie, where they had left neuer an enemie in the ſame to hurt them, neither feared any abroade to come neare to aſſault them. And in deede it fell out rightly as he geſſed. For he had not only paſſed through the territories of the citie, without any intelligence giuen to the enemies within the ſame: but he was come to the very gates, and had taken the walles before they heard any thing of his comming, by reaſon they neither kept watch nor ward, but were diſperſed abroade in the citie, in euery houſe, eating and drinking drunke together. Inſomuch as when they knew their enemies were alreadie within the citie, they were ſo full fraught with meate and wine, that the moſt of their wits ſerued them not ſo much as to flie, but taried vntill they were ſlaine or taken, like beaſts in the houſes.

Thus was the citie of SVTRIVM twiſe taken in one day. And it chaunced that thoſe which had won it, loſt it: and thoſe which had loſt it, recouered it againe by Camillus meanes. Who deſerued both the honour and entrie of triumph into ROME: the which wan him no leſſe good will and glorie, then the two firſt before had done praiſe, and gotten fame. For euen his greateſt enemies that moſt ſpited and enuied his former noble actes, aſcribing them rather to fortune that fauoured him, then to his valiantneſſe or worthineſſe: were forced now by this deed of his to confeſſe, that his wiſedome and valiantneſſe deſerued praiſe and commendation to the skies.

Marcus Manlius Capitolinus moueth ſedition.

Camillus of all his enemies had one moſt bitter to him, which was Marcus Manlius, that was the firſt man that gaue the GAVLES the repulſe that night they had entred the walles of the Capitoll, & had thought to haue taken it: wherupon they gaue him the ſurname of Capitolinus. He aſpiring to be the chiefe of the citie, and finding no direct way to exceed the glory of Camillus, tooke the broade high way of them that practiſe tyrannie. For he began to flatter the common people, and ſpecially thoſe that were indebted: he tooke vpon him to defend their cauſes, and pleaded their caſe at the barre againſt their creditours. Sometimes he tooke the debters out of the creditours hands, and caried them away by force, that for lacke of abilitie to pay, were by rigour of the law condemned to be bond ſlaues. But by this practiſe, in ſhort time he got him a maruellous number of ſuch needie followers, and poore men, that the noble men and honeſt citizens were afraid of the inſolent parts they played, and of the continuall troubles and tumults they daily ſtirred vp in the market place. Therefore ſuſpecting the worſt in this caſe, they did chuſe Quintus Capitolinus Dictator: who cauſed the ſaid Manlius immediatly to be apprehended, and committed him to priſon. Whereupon the people began to change their apparell: which they were neuer wont to do, but in great and common calamities. But the Senate fearing leaſt ſome commotion would riſe hereupon, they did ſet him at libertie againe. He being thus out of priſon, was no whit the better, nor wiſer thereby, but did ſtill ſtirre vp the commons, more boldly and ſeditiouſly then before. Then was Camillus choſen againe Tribunus militaris, and Manlius was accuſed in his time of office. But when this matter came to pleading, the ſight of the Capitoll troubled his accuſers much. For the very place it ſelfe where Manlius had repulſed the GAVLES by night, and defended the Capitoll, was eaſily ſeene from the market place, where the matter was a hearing: and he himſelfe pointing with his hand, ſhewed the place vnto the gods, and weeping tenderly, he laid before them the remembrance of the hazard of his life, in fighting for their ſafetie. This did moue the iudges hearts to pitie, ſo as they knew not what to do, but many times they did put ouer the hearing of his caſe vnto another day, and neither would they giue iudgement, knowing he was conuicted by manifeſt proofes: neither could they vſe the ſeuerity of the law vpon him, becauſe the place of his ſo notable good ſeruice was euer ſtill before their eyes. Wherefore Camillus finding the cauſe of delay of iuſtice, did make the place of iudgement to be remoued without the citie, into a place called the wood Petelian, from whence they could not ſee the Capitoll. And there the accuſers gaue apparent euidence againſt him: and the iudges considering all his wicked practises, conceiued a iust cause to punish him, as he had deserued. So they gaue sentence of death against him: that he should be caried to the mount Capitol, and there to be throwne downe headlong the rockes thereof. Thus, one and the selfe place was a memorie both of his notable good seruice, and also of his miserable and vnfortunate end. Besides all this, they razed his house, and built in the same place a temple to the goddesse they call Moneta: and made a law also, that no Patrician from thenceforth should dwell any more in the mount Capitol. Camillus after this, being called again to take the office of Tribunus militaris the sixt time: he sought to excuse himselfe, aswell for that he saw he was well stept in yeares, as also for that he feared fortunes spite, or some mishap, after he had obtained such glorie for his noble actes and seruice. Howbeit the most apparent cause of his excuse, was his sickneſſe, which troubled him much at that time. But the people would allow no excuse by any meanes, but cried out, they did not desire he should fight on foote nor on horsebacke, but that he should onely giue counsel, and commaund: and therefore they compelled him to take the charge, and to leade the armie with one of his companions named Lucius Furius, against their enemies the PRÆNESTINES, and the VOLSCES, who ioyning together, did inuade the confines of the ROMAINES friends. So he led his armie out immediatly to the field, and camped as neare the enemie as he could: being minded for his part to draw the wars out in length, that he might fight afterwads (if need required) whē he had recouered strength. But Furius contrarily coueting glory, was wholy bent to hazard the battell, whatsoeuer perill came of it: and to this end he stirred vp, and incouraged the Captaines of euery priuate band. Wherfore Camillus fearing lest they should think, for ill will he bare the yong men, that he went about to hinder and take away the means to win their honor, and to do some noble act: suffered Furius against his will to put his men in order of battel, and he in the meane season by reason of his sickneſſe, remained with a few about him in the campe. So went Lucius vpon a head to present battell to the enemie, and so was he as headily also ouerthrowne. But Camillus hearing the ROMAINES were ouerthrowne, sick as he was vpon his bed, got vp, and taking his household seruants with him, he went in haste to the gates of the campe, and passed thorough those that fled, vntill he came to meete with the enemies that had them in chase. The ROMAINES seeing this that were alreadie entred into the campe, they followed him at the heeles forthwith: and those that fled also without, when they saw him, they gathered together, and put themselues againe in array before him, and perswaded one another not to forsake their Captaine. So their enemies hereupon stayd their chasing, and would pursue no further that day. But the next morning, Camillus leading his armie into the field, gaue them battell, and wanne the field of them by plaine force: and following the victorie hard, he entred amongst them that fled into their camp pelmell, or hand ouer head, and slue the most part of them euen there. After this victory, he was aduertised how the THVSCANS had taken the city of SVTRIVM, and had put to the sword all the inhabitants of the same, which were ROMAINE citizens. Whereupon he sent to ROME the greatest part of his armie, and keeping with him the lightest and lustiest men, went and gaue assault vnto the THVSCANS, that now were harbored in the citie of SVTRIVM. Which when he had won again, he slue part of them, and the other saued themselues by flight. After this, he returned to ROME with an exceeding spoile, confirming by experience, the wisedome of the ROMAINES, who did not feare the age nor sickneſſe of a good captaine that was expert and valiant, but had chosen him against his will, though he was both old and sicke: and preferred him far before the yonger and lustier that made sute to haue the charge. Newes being brought vnto the Senate, that the THVSCVLANIANS were reuolted, they sent Camillus thither again, willing him of fiue other companions to take out one he liked best, euery of the which desired to be chosen, and made their sute vnto him for the same. But he refusing al other, did chuse againe Lucius Furius beyond all expectation of men, seeing not long before he needes would against his will hazard battell, in which he was ouerthrowne. Howbeit Camillus, hauing a desire (as I thinke) to hide his fault and shame he had receiued: did of courtesie preferre him before all other. Now the THVSCVLANIANS hearing of Camillus comming against them, subtilly sought to colour the fault they had alreadie committed. Wherefore they put out a great number of people into the fields, some to plough, other to keepe the beastes, as if they had bene in best peace: and did set the gates of the citie wide open, sent their children openly to schoole, their artificers wrought their occupation in their shoppes, the men of hauiour and honest citizens walked in the market place in their long gownes, and the officers and gouernours of the citie went vp and downe to euery house, commanding them to prepare lodgings for the ROMAINES, as if they had stood in no feare at all, and as though they had committed no fault. Howbeit al these fine fetches could not make Camillus beleeue, but that they had intent to rebell against the ROMAINES: yet they made Camillus pitie them, seeing they repented them of that they had determined to do. So he commaunded them to go to ROME to the Senate, to craue pardon for their fault: and he himselfe did helpe them, not onely to purge their citie of any intent of rebellion, but also to get them the priuiledge and fredome of ROME. And these be the chiefest acts Camillus did in the sixt time of his Tribuneship. After this, one Licinius Stolo moued great sedition in the citie, betweene the common people and the Senate. For he would in any case that of the two Consuls, which were chosen yearely, the one of them should be a commoner, and not that both of them should be of the auncient noble families, called Patricians. The Tribunes of the people were chosen, but the election of the Consuls, the people staid: so that the common wealth went to decay, and declined to greater troubles, then euer it did before, for lacke of gouernement. But to suppresse this, the Senate created Camillus the fourth time Dictator: but this was sore against his will, because it misliked the people much. Furthermore, he would not complaine of the people, for that they hauing serued him in many warres and battels, might boldly and truly say vnto him: that he had done more notable actes by them in the warres, then he had done by the Patricians in peace. Yet was he created Dictator in despite, to rule the people, and of enuie in the noble men towards them. Thus necessitie did vrge him, either by force to suppresse the people, if he were the stronger in this diffention: or else that he himselfe should be suppressed, if he became the weaker. Camillus notwithstanding, preparing to preuent this mischiefe, and knowing the day the Tribunes had determined, to preferre the passing of their law by voices of the people: he gaue warning by proclamations set vpon posts, that the same very day he would muster the people: and all was but to draw them from the market place into the field of Mars, and did set great penalties vpon those that should be lacking at the musters, and would presume to disobey. The Tribunes of the people on the contrary part, did withstand his threats, and sware they would condemne Camillus self in fifty thousand Drachmas of siluer, if he did not let the people alone, but would go about to disturb them for giuing their voices to such a law as they liked of. Camillus perceiuing this, and fearing to be condemned and banished once againe, which would fall out very ill for him, being now an old man, and one that had done so many great and notable acts, or els for that he thought himselfe not strong enough to withstand the force of the people: he kept his house that day, fayning himselfe to be sicke, and certaine other dayes following, and in the end he gaue vp his office. Thereupon the Senate chose in his place another Dictator, who named the same Licinius Stolo Generall of the horsemen, that was the authour and furtherer of all this sedition: and besides did suffer him to preferre another law, and to passe it by voices of the people, that aboue all other lawes, did most trouble the Patricians. Which law did forbid any citizen of ROME, to haue, or occupie aboue fiue hundred iugera, which amount to 330. acres and a halfe, 12. pole, and 121. parts of a pole. Then was this Stolo aloft, and of great estimation at that time: for that he had in despite of the Senate established this law. Howbeit shortly after it was found out, that himself had more number of acres then his owne law permitted: by reason whereof, he receiued the iust punishment of his own deuised forfeiture. Yet the most weightie matter of all this dissention that began first, and most of all troubled the Senate, touching the election of the Consuls, remained still vndetermined. But while these matters were thus in talk, the ROMAINES had certaine intelligence, how the GAVLES were departed once againe from the Adriatick sea, and were comming with a great power straight vnto ROME: vpon report of which news, the wars folowed immediatly. For the GAVLES destroyed the champion countrey as they went: and the poore countrey men that could not recouer ROME, were scattered here and there amongst the mountaines. The feare of this did somewhat appease the dissention. The people then assembling with the Senate, and the baser sort with the noble, did all with one voice and assent chuse Camillus Dictator the fift time. He was now a very old man, lacking litle of fourescore yeares: but neuerthelesse, considering the necessitie and present daunger, without framing any excuse, or starting as he had before, he vndertooke the charge. Now that he had taken it vpon him, he presently leauied men, and prepared his armie. And knowing very well how the fiercenesse of these barbarous GAVLES consisted in downe right blowes with their swordes, with which they would stike off heads and shoulders of men at a blow, mangling them like butchers, without any art or skill of fight: he caused caused yron sallets, & morians to be made for the most of his men, as smoothly wrought on the outside as could be, that their swords lighting on them, should either slide off, or breake. Moreouer, he caused their shields to haue barres made about them of copper, because the wood selfe was not able to abide their blowes. Furthermore, he did teach his souldiers to carie long Iauelins or punchion staues, wherewith they might wound their enemies lifting vp their swords to strike them. Now when the GAVLES were come neare ROME, hauing pitched their campe vpon the riuer of Anian, and being full loden and stuffed with all kinds of spoile and booties: then Camillus brought his armie also into the field, and went to lodge on a litle hill which was easie to get vpon, where there were many litle caues, so that the most of his armie was all hidden and couered, and those that were seene, seemed to be retired thither into those high places for an aduantage, and of feare. Camillus to increase this opinion more in his enemies, and to make them the bolder, did suffer them to come and spoile euen to the foote of the hill where he was lodged, and stirred not once out to trouble them, but kept himselfe quiet in his campe and well fortified: vntill such time as he spied occasion of aduantage, that the best part of their armie were scattered here and there, a forraging all about the fields: and those which remained in their campe, fell to eating and drinking as they vsed carelesly at all houres. Then Camillus sent very early before day, his lightest armed men, to vexe and trouble the barbarous people in comming out of their camp, and to let them in any case from putting their men in order of battell: and he at the breake of day came downe into the plaine, and did set his other men being well armed, in good array, which were a great number, and lustie fellowes, and were not as the barbarous people thought, few, and fearefull. This at the very first discouraged the hearts of the GAVLES maruellously, because they thought themselues dishonoured, that the ROMAINES should charge them first. Afterwards also Camillus vaunt-guard did set vpon the GAVLES, and that on a sodaine, before they had leisure to put themselues in battell, or to order their troupes: compelling them to fight without order, as they met out of order by chance. In the end also, Camillus came vpon the neckes of them, with all his whole force and armie together: against whom they ranne notwithstanding, holding vp their naked swordes aloft in their hands. But the ROMAINES thrusting with their armed Iauelins, receiued their enemies blowes vpon them, and thereby so rebated the edges of their swords (their blades being very sharpe and thinne ground, and of so soft a temper) that they bowed againe, and stood crooked vnreasonably: and furthermore, hauing pierced their shields through with their punching staues, the GAVLES armes were so clogd and wearied with them, the ROMAINES plucking them backe to them againe, that they threw away their swordes and shields, and flying in, closed with the ROMAINES and caught hold of their iauelins, thinking by plaine force to haue wrested them out of their hands. Howbeit they perceiuing then the GAVLES were naked, fell straight to their swordes: and so was the slaughter of their first rankes very great. The other fled scatteringly here and there, all about the plaine: because Camillus had caused all the hilles and mountaines about them to be occupied and possessed. Neither did they retire towards their camp, for that it was vnfortified, and also knew wel inough it would be easily taken. This battell (as they say) was thirteene yeares after their taking of ROME before. But after that field, the ROMAINES courages were good enough against these barbarous GAVLES, whom they stood in feare of before: thinking the first time they came, that they had not ouercome them by force, but by reason of the plague that fell amongst them, or through some other strange chaunce. For they did so feare them at that time, that they made a law, how their priests should be exempted from warres, so it were not against the GAVLES. This ouerthrow was the last marshal act Camillus did in the wars. For, the taking of the citie of VELITRES, was an accident depending vpon this iourney: because they yeelded straight vnto him, without striking any stroke. But the seditiousnesse of the people of ROME about gouernement, and the chusing of the yeare Consuls, was the hardest matter he euer had in hand. For they returning home to ROME strong and of great power, by their late obtained victorie: would in any case haue one of the Consuls to be chosen of a commoner, which was directly against their ancient custome. But the Senate stoutly withstood it, and would not suffer Camillus to be put out of office: hoping the better by meanes of his authoritie, which was great then, that they should maintaine and continue their auncient dignitie, and prerogatiue of their nobilitie. But as Camillus was set in his chaire in the market place, where he heard and dispatched causes, there came a sergeant to him, sent from the Tribunes of the people, who commaunded him to follow him, and therewithall layd violent hands vpon him, as he would haue caried him away by force. This made such a terrible tumult and vprore, that the like was neuer seene before in the market place. For Camillus friends draue the sergeant backe behind the chaire. The common people cried out againe to the sergeant from beneath, Pull him out of his chaire. This so amazed Camillus, that he knew not well what to say to the matter. Notwithstanding, he would not resigne vp his office, but taking those Senators he had about him, he went vnto the place where the Senate was wont to be kept: and there, before he would go into it, he returned backe againe vnto the Capitoll, and made his prayer vnto the gods, that it would please them to bring his troubles againe to a quiet, and so made a solemne vow and promise (if these tumults and troubles might be pacified) that he would build a temple of Concord. When this matter came to debating before the Senate, there fell great contention and diuersitie of opinions among them: yet in the end, the easiest way did carie it, and that was to graunt the common peoples desire, that a commoner should be chosen Consull with a noble man. The Dictator hauing openly published to the people the Senates decree, confirming their desire: the common people were so ioyfull, that at that present they let fall all their malice against the Nobilitie and Senate, and brought Camillus home to his house, with great shouts of ioy, and clapping of hands. The next morning all the people being assembled together in the market place, it was there decreed: that the temple of Concord should be built at the common-wealths charge (according to the vow Camillus had made) in such a place, as it might be seene from the market place selfe, where all the assemblies for matters of counsell were made. And further, it was ordered that one day more should be added to the feasts of the LATINES: and that from thenceforth they should solemnize foure festiuall dayes, and should presently make generall sacrifices vnto the gods, in euery temple of the citie, to giue them thankes: and in token of ioy they should all weare garlands vpon their heads for this reconciliation. So Camillus proceeding to election, there were chosen two Consuls, Marcus AEmilius of the noble Patricians, and Lucius Sextus of the Plebeians or commoners. And this was the last act that euer Camillus did. For the next yeare after the plague was in ROME, and tooke away an infinite number of the people that died, besides many Magistrates and Officers of the citie that departed: among whom, Camillus also left his life. Who notwithstanding he had liued a long time, and had ended a reasonable course of life, and was ripe for death: yet the ROMAINES made more mone and lamentation for his death alone, then for all the rest the plague had already consumed.

THE LIFE OF Pericles.

CÆSAR seeing in ROME one day certaine rich and wealthy ſtrangers, hauing litle dogs and monkies in their armes, and that they made maruellous much of them, he asked thē if the women in their country had no children: wiſely reprouing them by this queſtion, for that they beſtowed their naturall loue and affection vpon brute beaſts, which they ſhould with all kindneſſe and loue beſtow vpon men. Nature in like caſe alſo, hauing planted in our minds a naturall deſire to learne & vnderſtand, we are in reaſon to reproue thoſe that vainly abuſe this good deſire, fondly diſpoſing it to learne things vaine and vnprofitable: and to caſt behind them in the meane ſeaſon things honeſt and neceſſarie to be learned. For as touching our outward ſenſe, which with paſſion receiueth impreſſion of the thing it ſeeth, peraduenture it will be neceſſarie to conſider indifferently the thing ſeene, whether it will fall out beneficiall or hurtfull vnto him: but ſo fareth it not with our vnderſtanding, for euery man may at his pleaſure turne and diſpoſe that to the thing he taketh delight in, the reaſon whereof we muſt alwaies employ to the beſt part, and that not only to conſider and looke vpon the thing, but alſo to reape the benefite & commodity of the thing we ſee. For like as the eye is moſt delighted with the lighteſt and freſheſt colors: euen ſo we muſt giue our minds vnto thoſe ſights, which by looking vpon them do draw profit and pleaſure vnto vs. For ſuch effects doth vertue bring: that either to heare or reade them, they do print in our harts an earneſt loue and deſire to follow them. But this followeth not in all other things we eſteeme, neither are we alwaies diſpoſed to deſire to do the things we ſee well done: but contrarily oftentimes, when we like the work, we miſlike the workman, as commonly in making theſe perfumes and purple colours. For both the one and the other do pleaſe vs well: but yet we take perfumers and dyers to be men of a meane occupation. Therefore Antiſthenes aunſwered one very wiſely, that told him Iſmenias was an excellent player of the flute. But yet he is a naughty man, ſaid he: otherwiſe he could not be ſo cūning at the flute as he is. Euen ſo did Philip king of MACEDON ſay to his ſonne Alexander the great on a time: that at a certaine feaſt had ſung paſſing ſweetly, and like a maiſter of muſicke: Art thou not aſhamed ſon to ſing ſo well? It is enough for a King to beſtow his leiſure ſometime to heare muſitians ſing, and he doth much honor to the Muſes to heare the maſters of the ſcience otherwhile, when one of them ſingeth to excell another. Antiſthenes ſaying of a flute player.

cising any meane science: bringeth his paines he hath taken in matters vnprofitable, a witnesse against himselfe, to prooue that he hath bene negligent to learne things honest and profitable. And there was neuer any yong gentleman nobly borne, that seeing the image of Iupiter (which is in the city of PISA) desired to become Phidias: nor Polycletus, for seeing of Iuno in the citie of ARGOS: nor that desired to be Anacreon, or Philemon, or Archilocus, for that they tooke pleasure somtime to reade their works. For it followeth not of necessity, that though the worke delight, the workman must needes be praised. So in like case, such things do not profite those which behold them, because they do not moue affection in the harts of the beholders to follow them, neither do stir vp affection to resemble them, and much lesse to conforme our selues vnto them. But vertue hath this singular propertie in all her actions: that she maketh the man that knoweth her to affect her so, that straight he liketh all her doings, and desireth to follow those that are vertuous. For, as for riches, we only desire to haue them in possession: but of vertue, we chiefly loue the deeds. Wherfore we are contented to haue goods from other men: but good deeds we wold other should haue from vs. For vertue is of this power, that she allureth a mans mind presently to vse her, that wisely considereth of her, and maketh him very desirous in his heart to follow her: and doth not frame his manners that beholdeth her by any imitation, but by the only vnderstanding and knowledge of vertuous deedes, which suddenly bringeth vnto him a resolute desire to do the like. And this is the reason, why me thought I should continue still to write on the liues of noble men, and why I made also this tenth booke: in the which are contained the liues of Pericles and Fabius Maximus, who maintained wars against Hannibal. For they were both men very like together in many sundry vertues, and specially in curtesie and iustice: and for that they could patiently beare the follies of their people, and companions that were in charge of gouernement with them, they were maruellous profitable members for their country. But if we haue sorted them well together, comparing the one with the other: you shall easily iudge that reade our writings of their liues. Pericles was of the tribe of the Acamantides, of the town of CHOLARGVS, and one of the best and most ancient families of the city of ATHENS, both by his father and mother. For Xantippus his father (who ouercame in battell the lieutenants of the king of PERSIA in the iourny of MYCALA) maried Agariste that came of Clisthenes, he who draue out of ATHENS Pysistratus offspring, and valiantly ouerthrew their tyranny. Afterwards he established lawes, and ordained a very graue forme of gouernment, to maintaine his citizens in peace and concord together. This Agariste dreamed one night that she was brought to bed of a Lion: and very shortly after she was deliuered of Pericles, who was so well proportioned in all the parts of his body, that nothing could be mended, sauing that his head was somewhat too long and out of proportion to the rest of his body. And this is the onely cause why all the statues and images of him almost, are made with a helmet on his head: because the workmen as it should seeme (and so it is most likely) were willing to hide the blemish of his deformitie. But the ATTICAN Poets did call him Schinocephalos, as much to say as, headed like an onion. For those of ATTICA do somtime name that which is called in the vulgar toung Scilla, that is to say, an onion of Barbarie, Schinos. And Cratinus the Comicall Poet in his comedy he intituled Chirones, said:

Old Saturne he, and dreadfull dire Debate, begotten haue, betweene them carnally,
this tyrant here, this heauy iolting pate,
in court of gods so tearmed worthely.

And againe also in that which he nameth Nemesis, speaking of him, he saith:

Come Iupiter, come Iupiter,
Come iolt head, and come inkeeper.

And Teleclides mocking him also, saith in a place:

Sometimes he stands amaz'd when he perceiues,
that hard it were sufficiently to know,
in what estate his gouernment he leaues.
And then will he be seldome seene below,
such heauie heapes within his braines do grow.
But yet sometimes out of that monstrous pate,
he thundreth fast, and threatneth euery state.

And Eupolis in a comedy which he intituled Demi: being very inquisitiue, & asking particularly larly of euery one of the Oratours (whom he fained were returned out of hell) when they named Pericles the laſt man vnto him, he ſaid:

And as for muſicke, the moſt authors write, that Damon did teach him muſicke, of whoſe name (as men ſay) they ſhould pronounce the firſt ſillable ſhort. Howbeit Ariſtotle ſaith, that he was taught muſicke by Pythoclides. Howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that this Damon was a man of deepe vnderſtanding, and ſubtill in matters of gouernment: for, to hide from the people his ſufficiencie therein, he gaue it out he was a muſitian, and did reſort vnto Pericles as a maiſter wreſtler or fencer: but he taught him how he ſhould deale in matters of ſtate. Notwithſtanding, in the end he could not ſo cunningly conuey this matter, but the people ſaw his harping and muſicke, was only a vizer to his other practiſe: wherefore they did baniſh him ATHENS for fiue yeares, as a man that buſily tooke vpon him to change the ſtate of things, and that fauoured tyrannie. And this gaue the Comicall Poets matter to play vpon him finely, among which Plato in a comedy of his, bringeth in a man that asketh him:

Pericles studies and teachers.

O Chiron, tell me firſt: art thou indeed the man, which did inſtruct Pericles thus? make anſwer if thou can.

He was ſometime alſo ſcholer to the Philoſopher Zenon, who was borne in the citie of ELEA, and taught naturall Philoſophie, as Parmenides did: but his profeſſion was to thwart and contrarie all men, and to alledge a world of obiections in his diſputation, which were ſo intricate, that his aduerſary replying againſt him, knew not how to anſwer him, nor to conclude his argument. The which Timon Phliaſius witneſſeth in theſe words:

Zenon Elean.

Zenon was ſubtill ſure, and very eloquent,
and craftily could wind a man by way of argument,
if ſo he were diſpoſed, his cunning to deſcrie,
or ſhew the ſharpneſſe of his wit to practiſe pollicie.

But Anaxagoras Clazomenian was he that was moſt familiar and conuerſant with him, and did put in him the maieſty and grauity he ſhewed in all his ſayings, and doings, who did farre excell the common courſe of ordinarie Orators that pleaded before the people: and to be ſhort, he it was that did faſhion his manners, altogether to carie that graue countenance which he did. For they called Anaxagoras in his time, Nus, as much to ſay, as vnderſtanding. Either becauſe they had his ſingular wit and capacitie in ſuch great admiration, being growne to ſearch out the cauſe of naturall things: or that he was the firſt man, who did aſcribe the diſpoſition and gouernement of this world, not vnto fortune or fatall neceſſitie, but vnto a pure, ſimple, and vnderſtanding mind, which doth ſeparate at the firſt mouing cauſe, the ſubſtance of ſuch like parts as are medled and compounded of diuerſe ſubſtances, in all other bodies through the world. Pericles made maruellous much of Anaxagoras, who had fully inſtructed him in the knowledge of naturall things, and of thoſe ſpecially that worke aboue in the ayre and firmament. For he grew not only to haue a great mind and an eloquent tongue, without any affectation, or groſſe countrey termes: but to a certaine modeſt countenance that ſcantly ſmiled, very ſober in his gate, hauing a kind of ſound in his voice that he neuer loſt nor altered, and was of very honeſt behauiour, neuer troubled in his talke for any thing that croſſed him, and many other ſuch like things, as all that ſaw them in him, and conſidered them, could but wonder at him. But for proofe hereof, the report goeth, there was a naughtie buſie fellow on a time, that a whole day together did nothing but raile vpon Pericles in the market place, and reuile him to his face, with all the villanous words he could vſe. But Pericles put all vp quietly, and gaue him not a word againe, diſpatching in the meane time matters of importance he had in hand, vntill night came, that he went ſoftly home to his houſe, ſhewing no alteration nor ſemblance of trouble at all, though this lewd varlet followed him at the heeles, with words of open defamation. And as he was ready to enter in at his owne dores, being darke night, he commanded one of his men to take a torch, and to bring this man home to his houſe. Yet the Poet Ion ſaith, that Pericles was a very proud man, and a ſtately, and that with his grauitie and noble mind, there was mingled a certaine ſcorne and contempt of other: and contrarily, he greatly praiſeth the ciuilitie, humanitie and courteſie of Cimon, becauſe he could faſhion himſelfe to all companies. But letting paſſe that which the Poet Ion ſaid: who would that vertue ſhould be full of tragicall diſcipline, bringing in with it, a certaine satyricall discourse to moue laughter. Now Zenon contrariwise did counsell all those that said Pericles grauitie was a presumption, and arrogancie: that they should also follow him in his presumption. For to counterfeit in that sort things honest and vertuous, doth secretly with time breed an affection and desire to loue them, and afterwards with custome euen effectually to vse and follow them. So Pericles by keeping Anaxagoras companie, did not onely profite himselfe in these things, but he learned besides to put away all superstitious feare, of celestiall signes and impressions seene in the ayre. For to those that are ignorant of the causes thereof, such sights are terrible, and to the godly also fearefull, as if they were vtterly vndone: and all is, because they haue no certaine knowledge of the reason that naturall Philosophie yeeldeth, which in stead of a fearefull superstition, would bring a true religion accompanied with assured hope of goodnesse. Some say a man brought Pericles one day from his farme out of the countrey, a Rammes head that had but one horne, and that the Prognosticator Lampon considering this head, that had but one strong horne in the middest of his forehead, interpreted, that this was the signification thereof. That being two tribes and seuerall factions in the city of ATHENS touching gouernment, the one of Pericles, and the other of Thucydides: the power of both should be brought into one, and specially into his part, in whose house this signe did happen. Further, it is said that Anaxagoras being present, did cause the Rammes head to be clouen in two peeces, and shewed vnto them that stood by, that the braine of this Ramme did not fill the pan of his natural place, but inclosed it selfe in all parts, being narrow like the point of an egge, in that part where the horne tooke his first roote of budding out. So Anaxagoras was maruellously esteemed at that present by all those that stood by: but so was Lampon, soone after that Thucydides was driuen away, and that the gouernment of the whole common weale fell into the hands of Pericles alone. And it is not to be wondred at (in my opinion) that the naturall Philosopher and the Prognosticator did rightly meete together in troth: the one directly telling the cause, and the other the end of the euent as it fell out. For the profession of the one, is to know how it commeth: and of the other, wherefore it commeth, and to foretell what it betokeneth. For where some say, that to shew the cause, is to take away the signification of the signe: they do not consider that in seeking to abolish by this reason the wonderfull tokens and signes in the ayre, they do take away those also which are done by art. As the noise of basons, the lights of fire by the sea side, and the shadowes of needles or points of dyals in the sunne: all which things are done by some cause and handiworke, to be a signe and token of some thing. But this argument peraduenture may serue better in another booke. And now againe to Pericles. Whilest he was yet but a young man the people stood in awe of him, because he somewhat resembled Pysistratus in his countenance: and the ancientest men of the city also were much afeard of his soft voice, his eloquent tongue, and readie vtterance, because in those he was Pysistratus vp and downe. Moreouer he was very rich and wealthie, and of one of the noblest families of the citie, and those were his friends also that caried the only sway and authoritie in the state: whereupon, fearing lest they would banish him with the banishment of Ostracismon, he would not meddle with gouernment in any case, although otherwise he shewed himselfe in warres very valiant and forward, and feared not to venter his person. But after that Aristides was dead, that Themistocles was driuen away, and that Cimon being euer in seruice in the warres as Generall in forraine countries, was a long time out of GREECE: then he came to leane to the tribe of the poore people, preferring the multitude of the poore communaltie, aboue the small number of Nobilitie and rich men, the which was directly against his nature. For of himselfe he was not popular, nor meanely giuen: but he did it (as it should seeme) to auoid suspition, that he should pretend to make himselfe King. And because he saw Cimon was inclined also to take part with the Nobilitie, and that he was singularly beloued and liked of all the honester sort: he to the contrarie enclined to the common people, purchasing by this meanes safetie to himselfe, and authoritie against Cimon. So he presently beganne a new course of life, since he had taken vpon him to deale in matters of state: for they neuer sawe him afterwards at any time go into the citie, but to the market place, or to the Senate house. He gaue vp going to all feastes where he was bidden, and left the entertainement of his friends, their companie and familiaritie. So that in all his time wherein he gouerned the commonweale, which was a long time, he neuer went out to supper to any of his friendes, vnlesse it were that he was once at a feast at his nephew Euryptolemus mariage: and then he taried there no longer, but while the ceremonie was a doing, when they offer wine to the gods, and so he rose roſe from the table. For theſe friendly meetings at ſuch feaſtes, do much abaſe any counterfeit maieſtie or ſet countenance: and he ſhall haue much ado to keepe grauity and reputation, ſhewing familiaritie to euery knowne friend in ſuch open places. For in perfect vertue, thoſe things truely are euer moſt excellent, which be moſt common: and in good and vertuous men there is nothing more admirable vnto ſtraungers, then their daily conuerſation is to their friends. Pericles now to preuent that the people ſhould not be glutted with ſeeing him too oft, nor that they ſhould come much to him: they did ſee him but at ſome times, and then he would not talke in euery matter, neither came much abroad among them, but reſerued himſelfe (as Critolaus ſaid they kept the SALAMINIAN galley at ATHENS) for matters of great importance. And in the meane ſeaſon, in other matters of ſmall moment, he dealt by meanes of certaine Orators his familiar friends, amongſt whom Ephialtes (as they ſay) was one: he who tooke away the authoritie and power from the court of Areopagus, and did giue too much liberty to the people, as Plato ſaid. Vpon which occaſion, as the Comicall Poets ſay, he became ſo ſtout and head-ſtrong, that they could no more hold him backe, then a young vnbridled colt: and tooke ſuch a courage vpon him, that he would obey no more, but inuaded the Iſle of EVBOEA, and ſet vpon the other Ilands. Pericles alſo becauſe he would faſhion a phraſe of ſpeech, with a kind of ſtile altogether agreable to the manner of life and grauitie he had taken vpon him: he gaue himſelfe to all matters which he had learned of Anaxagoras, ſhadowing his reaſons of natural Philoſophie, with artificiall Rhetoricke. For hauing obtained a deepe vnderſtanding by ſtudying of Philoſophie, and a readie way effectually to end any matter he vndertooke to prooue, (beſides that nature had endued him with an excellent wit and capacitie, as the deuine Plato doth write, to bring any thing to ſerue his purpoſe) he did ſo artificially compaſſe it with eloquence, that he farre paſſed all the Orators in his time. And for this cauſe was he (as they ſay) ſurnamed Olympius, as much to ſay, as heauenly or diuine. But ſome are of opinion he had that ſurname, by reaſon of the common buildings and ſtately workes he raiſed vp in the city of ATHENS, that did much ſet forth the ſame. Other thinke it was giuen him for his great authority and power he had in gouernment, as well in wars as in peace. But it is no maruell that this glory was giuen him, conſidering the many other qualities and vertues that were in him. Howbeit the Comedies the Poets cauſed to be played in thoſe times (in which there were many words ſpoken of him, ſome in earneſt, ſome in ſport and ieaſt) do witneſſe that he had that ſurname giuen him, chiefly for his eloquence. For it is reported, that he thundred and lightned in his orations to the people, and that his tongue was a terrible lightning. And touching this matter, they tell of an anſwer Thucydides, Mileſius ſon, ſhould pleaſantly make concerning the force of Pericles eloquence. Thucydides was a noble man, and had long time contended againſt Pericles in matters of the common-weale. Archidamus, king of LACEDÆMON, asked Thucydides on a time: whether he or Pericles wreſtled beſt. Thucydides made him anſwer: When I haue giuen him an open fall before the face of the world, he can ſo excellently denie it, that he maketh the people beleeue he had no fall at all, and perſwadeth them the contrarie of that they ſawe. Notwithſtanding he was euer very graue and wiſe in ſpeaking. For euer when he went vp into the pulpit for orations to ſpeake to the people, he made his prayers vnto the gods, that nothing might eſcape his mouth, but that he might conſider before, whether it would ſerue the purpoſe of his matter he treated on: yet are there none of his workes extant in writing, vnleſſe it be ſome few lawes he made, and but very few of his notable ſayings are brought to light, ſaue onely theſe. He ſaid on a time, that they muſt take away the citie of ÆGINA, becauſe it was a ſtrawe lying in the eye of the hauen PIRÆA. And another time, he ſaid that he ſawe the warres a farre off, comming from PELOPONNESVS. Another time, as he tooke ſhippe with Sophocles (his companion in commiſſion with him as Generall of the armie) who commended a faire young boy they met as they came to the hauen: Sophocles, ſaid he, a gouernour muſt not onely haue his hands, but alſo his eyes cleane. And Steſimbrotus writeth, that in a funerall oration he made in the praiſe of thoſe that were ſlaine in the warre of SAMOS: he ſaid they were immortall as the gods. For we do not ſee the goddes (ſaid he) as they be, but for the honour that is done to them, and the great happineſſe they enioy, we do coniecture they are immortall: and the ſame things are in thoſe that dye in ſeruice, and defence of their countrey. Now where Thucydides doth write the gouernement of the Commonweale vnder Pericles to be as a gouernment of Nobilitie, and yet had apparance of a popular ſtate: it is true that in effect it was a Kingdome, becauſe one alone did rule and gouerne the whole ſtate. And many other ſay alſo, he was the firſt that brought in the cuſtome to deuide the enemies landes wonne by conqueſt among the people, and of the common money to make the people ſee playes and paſtimes, and that appointed them reward for all things. But this cuſtome was ill brought vp. For the common people that before were contented with litle, and got their liuing painefully with ſweat of their browes, became now to be very vaine, ſumptuous, and riotous, by reaſon of theſe things brought vp then. The cauſe of the alteration doth eaſily appeare by thoſe things. For Pericles at his firſt comming, ſought to winne the fauour of the people, as we haue ſaid before, onely to get like reputation that Cimon had wonne. But comming farre ſhort of his wealth and abilitie, to carie out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poore, keeping open houſe to all commers, clothing poore old people, breaking open beſides all incloſures and pales through all his landes, that euery one might with more libertie come in, and take the fruites thereof at their pleaſure: and ſeeing himſelfe by theſe great meanes out-gone farre in goodwill with the common people, by Demonides counſell and procurement (who was borne in the Iſle of Ios) he brought in this diſtribution of the common money, as Ariſtotle writeth. And hauing wonne in a ſhort time the fauour and goodwill of the common people, by diſtribution of the common treaſure, which he cauſed to be deuided among them, aſwell to haue place to ſee theſe playes, as for that they had reward to be preſent at the iudgements, and by other ſuch like corruptions: he with the peoples helpe, did inueigh againſt the court of the Areopagites, whereof he neuer was any member. For it neuer came to be his happe to be yearely gouernour, nor keeper of the lawes, nor King of the ſacrifices, nor maiſter of the warres: all which were offices choſen in auncient time by lot. And further, thoſe on whom the lot fell, if they had behaued themſelues well in their office, they were called forwards, and raiſed to be of the body of this court of the Areopagites. Pericles now by theſe meanes hauing obtained great credite and authoritie amongſt the people, he troubled the Senate of the Areopagites in ſuch ſort, that he pluckt many matters from their hearing, by Ephialtes helpe: and in time made Cimon to be baniſhed Athens, as one that fauoured the Lacedæmonians, and contraried the commonwealth and authoritie of the people. Notwithſtanding he was the nobleſt and richeſt perſon of all the citie, and one that had wonne ſo many glorious victories, and had ſo repleniſhed Athens with the conquered ſpoiles of their enemies, as we haue declared in his life: ſo great was the authoritie of Pericles amongſt the people. Now the baniſhment wherwith he was puniſhed (which they called Oſtraciſmon) was limited by the law for ten yeres. In which ſpace the Lacedæmonians being come downe with a great army into the country of Tanagra, the Athenians ſent out their power preſently againſt them. There Cimon willing to ſhew the Athenians by his deeeds, that they had falſly accuſed him for fauouring the Lacedæmonians: did arme himſelfe, and went on his country mens ſide, to fight in the company of his tribe. But Pericles friends gathered together, and forced Cimon to depart thence as a baniſhed man. And this was the cauſe that Pericles fought that day more valiantly then euer he did, and he wanne the honour and name to haue done more in the perſon of himſelfe that day, then any other of all the armie. At that battell alſo, all Cimons friends, whom Pericles had burdened likewiſe to fauour the Lacedæmonians doings, died euery man of them that day. Then the Athenians repented them much that they had driuen Cimon away, and wiſhed he were reſtored, after they had loſt this battell vpon the confines of the countrey of Attica: becauſe they feared ſharpe wars would come vpon them againe at the next ſpring. Which thing when Pericles perceiued, he ſought alſo to further that the common people deſired: wherefore he ſtraight cauſed a decree to be made, that Cimon ſhould be called home againe, which was done accordingly. Now when Cimon was returned, he aduiſed that peace ſhould be made betweene both cities: for the Lacedæmonians did loue Cimon very wel, and contrarily they hated Pericles, and all other gouernours. Some notwithſtanding do write, that Pericles did neuer paſſe his conſent to call him home againe, before ſuch time as they had made a ſecret agreement amongſt themſelues (by meanes of Elpinice, Cimons ſiſter) that Cimon ſhould be ſent out with an army of two hundred galleys, to make warres in the king of Persia his dominions, and that Pericles ſhould remaine at home with the authoritie of gouernement within the citie. This Elpinice, (Cimons ſiſter) had once before intreated Pericles for her brother, at ſuch time as he was accuſed before the Iudge of treaſon. For Pericles was one of the committies, to whom this accuſation was referred by the people. Elpinice went vnto him, and beſought him him not to do his worſt vnto her brother. Pericles anſwered her merily: Thou art too old Elpinice, thou art too old to go through with theſe matters. Yet when this matter came to iudgement, and that his cauſe was pleaded: he roſe but once to ſpeake againſt him (for his owne diſcharge as it were) and went his way when he had ſaid, doing leſſe hurt to Cimon then any other of his accuſers. How is Idomeneus to be credited now, who accuſeth Pericles that he had cauſed the orator Ephialtes to be ſlaine by treaſon (that was his friend, and did alwayes counſell him, and take his part in all kind of gouernment of the common weale) only for the ielouſie and enuy he did beare to his glory? I can but muſe why Idomeneus ſhould ſpeake ſo ſlanderouſly againſt Pericles, vnleſſe it were that his melancholy humour procured ſuch violent ſpeech: who though peraduenture he was not altogether blameleſſe, yet he was euer nobly minded, and had a naturall deſire of honor, in which kind of men ſuch furious cruel paſſions are ſeldom ſeene to breed. But this orator Ephialtes being cruell to thoſe that took part with the Nobilitie, becauſe he would ſpare or pardon no man for any offence whatſoeuer committed againſt the peoples authoritie, but did follow and perſecute them with all rigour to the vttermoſt: his enemies laid waite for him by meanes of one Ariſtodicus TANAGRIAN, and they killed him by treaſon, as Ariſtotle writeth. In the meane Cimon died in the Ile of CYPRVS, being generall of the army of the ATHENIANS by ſea. Wherefore thoſe that tooke part with the Nobility, ſeeing Pericles was now growne very great, and that he went before all other citizens of ATHENS, thinking it good to haue ſome one to ſticke on their ſide againſt him, and to leſſen thereby ſomewhat his authoritie, that he might not come to rule all as he would: they raiſed vp againſt him, one Thucydides, of the towne of ALOPECIA, a graue wiſe man, and father in law to Cimon. This Thucydides had leſſe skill of warres then Cimon, but vnderſtood more in ciuill gouernement then he, for that he remained moſt part of his time within the city: where continually inueighing againſt Pericles in his pulpit for oratiõs to the people, in ſhort time he had ſtirred vp a like companie againſt the faction of Pericles. For he kept the gentlemen and richer ſort (which they call Nobilitie) from mingling with the common people, as they were before, when through the multitude of the commons their eſtate and dignitie was obſcured, and troden vnder foot. Moreouer he did ſeparate them from the people, and did aſſemble them all as it were into one body, who came to be of equall power with the other faction, and did put (as a man will ſay) a counterpoiſe into the ballance. For at the beginning there was but a litle ſecret grudge onely betweene theſe two factions, as an artificiall flower ſet in the blade of a ſword, which made thoſe ſhew a litle, that did leane vnto the people: and the other alſo ſomewhat that fauoured the Nobilitie. But the contention betweene theſe two perſons, was as a deep cut, which deuided the citie into two factions: of which the one was called the Nobilitie, and the other the communaltie. Therefore Pericles giuing yet more libertie vnto the people, did all things that might be to pleaſe them, ordaining continuall plaies and games in the citie, many feaſtes, bankets, and open paſtimes to entertaine the commons with ſuch honeſt pleaſures and deuiſes: and beſides all this, he ſent yerely an armie of threeſcore gallies vnto the warres, into the which he put a great number of poore citizens that tooke pay of the ſtate for nine moneths of the yere, and thereby they did learne together, and practiſe to be good ſea men. Furthermore he ſent into the countrie of CHERRONESVS, a thouſand free men of the citie to dwell there, and to deuide the lands amongſt them: fiue hundred alſo into the Ile of NAXOS: into the Ile of ANDROS, two hundred and fiftie: into THRACIA, a thouſand to dwell with the BISALTES: and other alſo into ITALY, when the citie of SYBARIS was built againe, which afterwards was ſurnamed the city of the THVRIANS. All this he did to rid the citie of a nũber of idle people, who through idleneſſe began to be curious, and to deſire chaunge of things, as alſo to prouide for the neceſſitie of the poore townes-men that had nothing. For, placing the naturall citizens of ATHENS neere vnto their ſubiects and friends, they ſerued as a garriſon to keepe them vnder, and did ſuppreſſe them alſo from attempting any alteration or chaunge. But that which delighteth moſt, and is the greateſt ornament vnto the citie of ATHENS, which maketh ſtrangers moſt to wonder, and which alone doth bring ſufficient teſtimonie, to confirme that which is reported of the auncient power, riches, and great wealth of GREECE, to be true and not falſe: are the ſtately and ſumptuous buildings, which Pericles made to be built in the citie of ATHENS. For it is the onely act of all other Pericles did, and which made his enemies moſt to ſpite him, and which they moſt accuſed him for, crying out vpon him in all counſels and aſſemblies: that the people of ATHENS were openly defamed, for carying away the ready mony of all

GRECE, which was left in the Ile of DELOS to be safely kept there. And although they could with good honestie haue excused this fact, saying, that Pericles had taken it from them, for feare of the barbarous people, to the end to lay it vp in a more stronger place, where it should be in better safetie: yet was this too ouergreat an iniury offered vnto all the rest of GRECE, and too manifest a token of tyrannie also, to behold before their eyes, how we do employ the money, which they were inforced to gather for the maintenance of the warres against the barbarous people, in gilding, building, and setting forth our city, like a glorious woman, all to be gauded with gold and precious stones, and how we do make images, and build vp temples of wonderfull and infinite charge. Pericles replied to the contrary, and declared vnto the ATHENIANS, that they were not bound to make any account of this money vnto their friends and allies, considering that they fought for their safety, and that they kept the barbarous people far from GRECE without troubling them to set out any one man, horse or ship of theirs, the mony onely excepted, which is no more theirs that paid it, thē theirs that receiued it, so they bestow it to that vse they receiued it for. And their city being already well furnished, and prouided of all things necessary for the warres, it was good reason they should employ and bestow the surplus of the treasure in things which in time to come (and being throughly finished) would make their fame eternall. Moreouer he said that whilest they continue building, they should be presently rich, by reason of the diuersitie of works of all sorts, and other things which they should haue need of: and to compasse these things the better, and to set them in hand, all maner of artificers and workmen (that would labor) should be set a worke. So should all the towne-men, and inhabitants of the city, receiue pay and wages of the common treasure: and the citie by this meanes should be greatly beautified, and much more able to maintaine it selfe. For such as were strong, and able men of body, and of yeares to cary weapon, had pay and entertainement of the common-wealth, which were sent abroade vnto the warres: and other that were not meete for warres, as craftes-men, and labourers: he would also they should haue part of the common treasure, but not without they earned it, and by doing somewhat. And this was his reason, and the cause that made him occupie the common people with great buildings, and deuises of workes of diuerse occupations, which could not be finished of long time: to the end that the citizens remainiug at home, might haue a meane and way to take part of the common treasure, and enrich themselues, as well as those that went to the wars, & serued on the sea, or els that lay in garrison to keepe any place or fort. For some gained by bringing stuffe: as stones, brasse, iuory, gold, ebany, and cypres. Other got, to work and fashion it: as carpenters, grauers, founders, casters of images, masons, hewers of stone, diers, goldsmiths, ioyners working in iuory, painters, men that set in sundry colours of peeces of stone or wood, & turners. Other gained to bring stuffe, and to furnish them, as merchants, mariners, and shipmaisters, for things they brought them by sea. And by land other got also: as cart-makers, cariers, carters, cord-makers, sadlers, coller-makers, and pyoners to make wayes plaine, and miners, and such like. Furthermore euery science & craft, as a captain hauing souldiers, had also their army of the workmen that serued them, labouring truly for their liuing, who serued as aprentises and iourneymen vnder the workemaisters: so the worke by this meanes did disperse abroad a common gaine to all sorts of people and ages, what occupation or trade soeuer they had. And thus came the buildings to rise in greatnesse and sumptuousnesse, being of excellent workmanship, and for grace and beautie not comparable: because euery workeman in his science did striue what he could to excell others, to make his worke appeare greatest in sight, and to be most workmanly done in shew. But the greatest thing to be wondred at, was their speed and diligence. For where euery man thought those workes were not likely to be finished in many mens liues and ages, and from man to man: they were all done and finished, whilest one onely gouernour continued still in credite and authoritie. And yet they say, that in the same time, as one Agatarchus boasted him selfe, that he had quickly painted certaine beasts: Zeuxis another painter hearing him, answered: And I contrarily do reioyce, that I am a long time in drawing of them. For commonly slight and sodaine drawing of any thing, cannot take deepe colours, nor giue perfect beauty to the worke: but length of time, adding to the painters diligence and labour in making of the worke, maketh the colours to continue for euer. For this cause therefore the workes Pericles made, are more wonderfull: because they were perfectly made in so short a time, and haue continued so long a season. For euery one of those which were finished vp at that time, seemed then to be very auncient touching the beauty thereof: and yet for the grace and continuance of the same, it it looketh at this day as if it were but newly done and finiſhed, there is ſuch a certain kind of flouriſhing freſhneſſe in it, which letteth that the iniury of time cannot impaire the ſight therof. As if euery of thoſe foreſaid workes, had ſome liuing ſpirit in it, to make it ſeeme yong and freſh: and a ſoule that liued euer, which kept them in their good continuing ſtate. Now the chiefe ſurueyour general of al theſe works, was Phidias, albeit that there were many other excellent workmaſters in euery ſcience & occupation. For the temple of Pallas, which is called Parthénon (as a man would ſay, the temple of the virgine, and is ſurnamed Hecatompedon, for that it is a hundred foote euery way) was built by Ictinus, and Callicrates: and the chappell of Eleuſin (where the ſecret ceremonies of the myſteries were made) was firſt founded by Corœbus, who raiſed vp the firſt pillars in order, ſtanding beneath on the ground, and did ſet them vp vnto the maiſter chaptrels. But after he was dead, Metagenes, borne in the towne of XYPETA, turned the arches ouer, and then did ſet the pillars in order alſo which are aboue: and Xenocles of the towne of CHOLARGEA, was he that made the lanterne or top of the ſteeple which couereth the ſanctuary: but the long wall which Socrates heard Pericles himſelfe giue order for the building of it, was done by Callicrates, who vndertooke the worke. Cratinus the Poet, in a comedie he made, laugheth at this worke, to ſee how ſlowly it went forward, and how long it was a doing, ſaying:

Pericles long a go, did end this worke begunne, and build it high, with glorious words, if ſo it had bene done.
But as for deedes (in deede) he built nothing at all,
but let it ſtand: as yet it ſtands, much liker for to fall.

And as for the Theater or place appointed for muſicke, where they heare all muſitions play, and is called Odeon: it is very well made within with diuers ſeates and degrees, and many ranges of pillars, but the top of the roofe is altogether round, which is ſomewhat hanging downeward round about of it ſelfe, comming together into one point. And it is ſaid that this was made after the patterne and faſhion of King Xerxes royall pauilion, and that Pericles was the firſt deuiſer and maker of it. Wherefore Cratinus in another place of his comedie he maketh of the THRACIANS, doth play very pretily vpon him, ſaying:

The Odeon.

Pericles here doth come, Dan Iupiter ſurnamed,
(and onions head) which hath in his great noddle finely framed
The plot of Odeon, when he deliuered was from baniſhment, and dangers deepe, wherein he long did paſſe.

Pericles was the firſt that made maruellous earneſt labour to the people that they would make an order, that on the day of the feaſt called Panathenæa, they would ſet vp games for muſicke. And he himſelfe being choſen ruler of theſe games, as iudge to reward the beſt deſeruer: ordained the manner the muſitions ſhould euer after keepe in their ſinging, playing on their flutes, or vpon the citherne, or other inſtruments of muſicke. So the firſt games that euer were for muſick, were kept within the Odeon: and ſo were the other after them alſo, euer celebrated there. The gate and entring into the caſtle was made and finiſhed within the ſpace of fiue yeares, vnder the charge of Meneſicles, that was maiſter of the workes. And whileſt theſe gates were a building, there happened a wonderfull chance, which declared very well that the goddeſſe Minerua did not miſlike the building, but that it pleaſed her maruellouſly. For one of the moſt painefulleſt workemen that wrought there, fell by miſchance from the height of the caſtle to the ground, which fal did ſo ſore bruſe him, and he was ſo ſick withal, that the phiſitions and ſurgeons had no hope of his life. Pericles being very ſory for his miſchance, the goddeſſe appeared to him in his ſleep in the night, & taught him a medicine, with the which he did eaſily heale the poore bruſed man, and that in ſhort time. And this was the occaſion why he cauſed the image of the goddeſſe Minerua (otherwiſe called of health) to be caſt in braſſe, and ſet vp within the temple of the caſtle, neare vnto the altar which was there before, as they ſay. But the golden image of Minerua was made by Phidias, and grauen round about the baſe: who had the charge in manner of all other workes, and by reaſon of the good will Pericles bare him, he commanded all the other workmen. And this made the one to be greatly enuied, and the other to be very ill ſpoken of. For their enemies gaue it out abroade, that Phidias receiued the gentlewomen of the citie into his houſe, vnder colour to go ſee his workes, and did conuey them to Pericles. Vpon this brute, the Comicall poets taking occaſion, did caſt out many ſlaunderous ſpeeches againſt Pericles, accuſing him that he kept one Menippus wife, who was his friend and lieutenant in the warres:

and burdened him further, that Pyrilampes, one of his familiar friends also, brought vp foule, and specially peacockes, which he secretly sent vnto the women that Pericles kept. But we must not wonder at those Satyres, that make profession to speake slaunderously against all the world, as it were to sacrifice the iniuries and wrongs they cast vpon honorable & good men, to the spite and enuy of the people, as vnto wicked spirits: considering that Stesimbrotus THASIAN durst falsly accuse Pericles of detestable incest, and of abusing his owne sons wife. And this is the reason, in my opinion, why it is so hard a matter to come to the perfect knowledge of the truth of auncient things, by the monuments of historiographers: considering long processe of time, doth vtterly obscure the truth of matters, done in former times. For euery written historie speaking of men that are aliue, and of the time of things, whereof it maketh mention: sometime for hate and enuy, sometime for fauour or flatterie, doth disguise and corrupt the truth. But Pericles perceiuing that the orators of Thucydides faction, in their common orations did stil crie out vpon him, that he did vainely waste and consume the common treasure, and that he bestowed vpon the workes, all the whole reuenue of the citie: one day when the people were assembled together, before them all he asked them, if they thought that the cost bestowed were too much. The people answered him: a great deale too much. Well, said he then, the charges shall be mine (if you thinke good) and none of yours: prouided that no mans name be written vpon the workes, but mine onely. When Pericles had said so, the people cried out aloud, they would none of that (either because that they wondred at the greatnesse of his mind, or else for that they would not giue him the only honour and praise to haue done so sumptuous and stately works) but willed him that he should see them ended at the common charges, without sparing for any cost. But in the end, falling out openly with Thucydides, and putting it to an aduenture which of them should banish other, with the banishment of Ostracismon: Pericles got the vpper hand, and banished Thucydides out of the citie, and therewithal also ouerthrew the contrarie faction against him. Now when he had rooted out all factions, and brought the citie againe to vnitie and concord, he found then the whole power of ATHENS in his hands, and all the ATHENIANS matters at his disposing. And hauing all the treasure, armour, galleys, the Iles, and the sea, and a maruellous seigniorie and kingdome (that did enlarge it selfe partly ouer the GRECIANS, and partly ouer the barbarous people) so well fortified and strengthened with the obedience of nations subiect vnto them, with the friendship of Kings, and with the alliance of diuers other Princes and mightie Lords: then from that time forward he beganne to change his manners towards the people, and not so easily to giue place and frame himselfe to the peoples wils and desires, no more then as it were to contrary winds. Furthermore he altered his ouer gentle and popular manner of gouernement which he vsed vntill that time, as too delicate and too effeminate an harmony of musicke, and did conuert it vnto an imperious gouernement, or rather to a kingly authoritie: but yet held still a direct course, and kept himselfe euer vpright without fault, as one that did, said, and counselled that, which was most expedient for the common-weale. He many times brought on the people by perswasions and reasons, to be willing to gaunt that he preferred vnto them: but many times also, he draue them to it by force, and made them against their wils do that, which was best for them. Folowing therein the deuise of a wise phisition: who in a long and changeable disease, doth graunt his pacient sometime to take his pleasure of a thing he liketh, but yet after a moderate sort: and another time also, he doth giue him a sharpe or bitter medicine that doth vexe him, though it heale him. For (as it falleth out commonly vnto people that enioy so great an empire) many times misfortunes did chance, that filled the full of sundry passiõs, the which Pericles alone could finely steere and gouerne with two principall rudders, feare, and hope: brideling with the one, the fierce and insolent rashnesse of the common people in prosperitie, and with the other comforting their griefe and discouragement in aduersitie. Wherein he manifestly proued, that Rhetoricke and Eloquence (as Plato saith) is an art which quickneth mens spirits at her pleasure, & her chiefest skill is, to know how to moue passions and affections throughly, which are as stops and sounds of the soule, that would be plaid vpon with a fine fingred hand of a cunning maister. All which, not the force of eloquence only brought to passe, as Thucydides witnesseth: but the reputation of his life, and the opinion & confidence they had of his great worthinesse, because he would not any way be corrupted with gifts, neither had he any couetousnes in him. For, when he had brought his citie not onely to be great, but exceeding great and wealthy, and had in power and authoritie exceeded many Kings and tyrants, yea euen those which by their willes and testaments might haue haue left great poſſeſſions to their children: he neuer for all that increaſed his fathers goods & patrimony left him, the value of a grote in ſiluer. And yet the hiſtoriographer Thucycidides doth ſet forth plainely inough, the greatneſſe of his power. And the Comicall poets alſo of that time do report it maliciouſly vnder couert words, calling his familiar friends, the new Pyſiſtratides, ſaying, how they muſt make him ſweare and proteſt he would neuer be King: giuing vs thereby to vnderſtand, that his authority was too exceeding great for a popular gouernement. And Telecides (amongſt other) ſaith, that the ATHENIANS had put into his hands the reuenue of the townes and cities vnder their obedience, and the towns themſelues, to bind the one, and looſe the other, and to pull downe their wals, or to build them againe at his pleaſure. They gaue him power, to make peace and alliance: they gaue all their force, treaſure, and authority, and all their goods wholy into his hands. But this was not for a litle while, nor in a geere of fauour, that ſhould continue for a time: but this held out forty yeares together, he being alwayes the chiefe of his city amongſt the Ephialtes, the Leocrates, the Mironides, the Cimons, the Tolmides, and the Thucydides. For after he had preuailed againſt Thucydides, and had baniſhed him, he yet remained chiefe aboue all other, the ſpace of fifteene yeares. Thus hauing attained a regall dignity to commaund all, which continued as aforeſaid, where no other captaines authority endured but one yeare: he euer kept himſelfe vpright from bribes and mony, though otherwiſe he was no ill husband, and could warily looke to his owne. As for his lands and goods left him by his parents, that they miſcaried not by negligence, nor that they ſhould trouble him much, in buſying himſelf to reduce them to a value: he did ſo husband them, as he thought was his beſt and eaſieſt way. For he ſold in groſſe euer the whole yeares profit and cõmodity of his lands, and afterwads ſent to the market daily to buy the cates, and other ordinarie prouiſion of houſhold. This did not like his ſonnes that were men growne, neither were his women contented with it, who would haue had him more liberall in his houſe: for they complained of his ouerhard and ſtraight ordinary, becauſe in ſo noble and great a houſe as his, there was neuer any great remaine left of meate, but all things receiued into the houſe, ranne vnder accompt, and were deliuered out by proportion. All this good husbandry of his, was kept vpright in this good order, by one Euangelus, ſteward of his houſe, a man very honeſt and skilful in all his houſhold prouiſion: and whether Pericles had brought him vp to it, or that he had it by nature, it was not knowne. But theſe things were farre contrary to Anaxagoras wiſedome. For he deſpiſing the world, and caſting his affection on heauenly things: did willingly forſake his houſe, and ſuffered all his land to run to layes and to paſture. But (in my opinion) great is the diuerſitie betweene a contemplatiue life, and a ciuill life. For the one employeth all his time vpon the ſpeculation of good and honeſt things: and to attaine to that, he thinketh he hath no need of any exteriour help or inſtrument. The other applying all his time vpon vertue, to the common profit and benefit of men: he thinketh that he needeth riches, as an inſtrument not onely neceſſary but alſo honeſt. As, looke vpon the example of Pericles: who did relieue many poore people. And Anaxagoras ſpecially among other: of whom it is reported, that Pericles being occupied about matters of ſtate at that time, hauing no leiſure to thinke vpon Anaxagoras, he ſeeing himſelfe old and forſaken of the world, laid him downe, and couered his head cloſe, determining to ſtarue himſelf to death with hunger. Pericles vnderſtanding this, ran preſently to him as a man halfe caſt away, and prayed him as earneſtly as he could, that he would diſpoſe him ſelfe to liue, being not onely ſory for him, but for himſelfe alſo, that he ſhould looſe ſo faithfull and wiſe a counſeller, in matters of ſtate and gouernement. Then Anaxagoras ſhewed his face, and told him: O Pericles, thoſe that will ſee by the light of a lampe, muſt put oyle to it, to make the light burne. Now began the LACEDÆMONIANS to grow iealous of the greatneſſe of the ATHENIANS, wherefore Pericles to make the ATHENIANS hearts greater, and ſo draw their minds to great enterpriſes: ſet downe an order they ſhould ſend ambaſſadours to perſwade al the GRECIANS (in what part ſoeuer they dwelt in EVROPE, or ASIA, as well the litle as the great cities) to ſend their deputies vnto ATHENS, to the generall aſſembly that ſhould be holden there to take order for the temples of the gods which the barbarous people had burnt, and touching the ſacrifices they had vowed for the preſeruation of GRECE, when they gaue battel vpon them: and touching ſea matters alſo, that euery man might ſaile in ſafety where he would, and that all might liue together in good peace and loue one with another. To performe this commiſſion, twenty perſons were ſent of this ambaſiate, euery one of them being fifty yeares of age and vpward. Wherof fiue of them went to the DORIANS, dwelling in ASIA, and to the inhabitants of the Iles, euē vnto the Iles of LESBOS, & of the RHODES. Fiue other went through al the country of HELLESPONT, & of THRACIA, vnto the city of BIZANTIVM. Other fiue were commanded to go into BOEOTIA, into PHOCIDES, and through all PELOPONNESVS, & from thence by the country of the LOCRIANS, into the vpland country ioyning to it, vntil they came into the country of ACARNANIA, and of AMBRACIA. And the other fiue went first into the Ile of EVBOEA, and from thence vnto the OETÆIANS, and through all the gulfe of MALEA, vnto the PHTIOTES, vnto the ACHAIANS, and the THESSALIANS: declaring to all the people where they came, the ATHENIANS commission, perswading them to send vnto ATHENS, and to be present at the counsell which should be holden there, for the pacification and vnion of all GREECE. But when all came to all, nothing was done, and the said cities of GREECE did not assemble, by practise of the LACEDÆMONIANS (as it is reported) who were altogether the let: for the first refusall that was made of their summons, was at PELOPONNESVS. This haue I written to make Pericles noble courage to be knowne, and how profound a wise man he shewed himselfe vnto the world. Furthermore, when he was chosen General in the warres, he was much esteemed, because he euer tooke great regard to the safety of his souldiers. For by his good will he would neuer hazard battell, which he saw might fall out doubtfull, or in any thing daungerous: and moreouer, he neuer praised them for good generals, neither would he follow them that had obtained great victories by hazard, howsoeuer other did esteeme or commend them. For he was wont to say, that if none but himselfe did leade them to the shambles, as much as lay in him, they should be immortall. And when he saw Tolmides, the sonne of Tolmæus (trusting to his former victories, and the praise and commendation of his good seruice) did prepare vpon no occasion, and to no purpose, to enter into the countrey of BOEOTIA, and had procured also a thousand of the lustiest and most valiant men of the citie, to be contented to go with him in that iourney, ouer and aboue the rest of the army he had leauied: he went about to turne him from his purpose, and to keepe him at home, by many perswasions he vsed to him before the peoples face, and spake certaine words at that time, that were remembred long after, and these they were: That if he would not beleeue Pericles counsell, yet that he would tary time at the least, which is the wisest counseller of men. These words were pretily liked at that present time. But within few dayes after, when news was brought that Tolmides self was slaine in a battel he had lost, neare vnto the citie of CORONEA, wherein perished also, many other honest and valiant men of ATHENS: his wordes spoken before, did then greatly increase Pericles reputation and good wil with the common people, because he was taken for a wise man, and one that loued his citizens. But of all his iourneys he made, being Generall ouer the army of the ATHENIANS, the iourney of CHERRONESVS was best thought of and esteemed, because it fell out to the great benefite and preseruation of all the GRECIANS inhabiting in that countrey. For besides that he brought thither a thousand citizens of ATHENS to dwell there (in which doing he strengthened the cities with so many good men) he did fortifie the barre also, which did let it from being of an Ile, with a fortification he drew from one sea to another: so that he defended the country against all the inuasions and piracies of the THRACIANS inhabiting thereabouts, aud deliuered it of extreame warre, with the which it was plagued before, by the barbarous people their neighbours, or dwelling amongst them, who only liued vpon piracie & robbing on the seas. So was he likewise much honored and esteemed of strangers, when he did enuirone all PELOPONNESVS, departing out of the hauen of PEGES, on the coast of MEGARA, with a fleet of a hundred gallies. For he did not only spoile the townes all alongst the sea side, as Tolmides had done before him: but going vp further into the maine land, farre from the sea, with his souldiers he had in the gallies, he draue some of them to retire within their walles, he made them so afraid of him: and in the country of NEMEA, he ouercame the SICYONIANS in battell, that taried him in the field, & did erect a pillar for a notable mark of his victorie. And imbarking in his ships a new supply of souldiers which he took vp in ACHAIA, being friends with the ATHENIANS at that time, he passed ouer to the firme land that lay directly against it. And pointing beyond the mouth of the riuer of Achelous, he inuaded the countrey of ACHARNANIA, where he shut vp the OENEADES within their walles. And after he had laid waste and destroyed all the champion countrey, he returned home againe to ATHENS: hauing shewed himselfe in this iourney, a dreadfull captaine to his enemies, and very carefull for the safetie of his souldiers. For there fell out no manner of misfortune all this iourney (by chaunce or otherwise) vnto the souldiers vnder his charge. And afterwardes, going with a great great nauy maruellous well appointed vnto the Realme of PONTVS, he did there gently vse and intreat the cities of GREECE, and granted them all that they required of him: making the barbarous people inhabiting thereabouts, and the Kings and Princes of the same also, to know the great force and power of the ATHENIANS, who sailed without feare all about where they thought good, keeping all the coasts of the sea vnder their obedience. Furthermore, he left with the SINOPIANS thirteene galleys, with certaine number of soldiers vnder captaine Lamachus, to defend them against the tyrant Timesileus: who being expulsed and driuen away with those of his faction, Pericles caused proclamation to be made at ATHENS, that sixe hundred free men of the citie, that had any desire to go, without compulsion, might go dwell at SINOPA, where they should haue deuided among them the goods and lands of the tyrant and his followers. But he did not follow the foolish vaine humors of his citizens, nor would not yeeld to their vnsatiable couetousnesse, who being set on a iolitie to see themselues so strong, and of such a power, and besides, to haue good lucke, would needs once againe attempt to conquer ÆGYPT, and to reuolt all the countries vpon the sea coasts, from the empire of the king of PERSIA: for there were many of them whose minds were maruellously bent to attempt the vnfortunate enterprise of entring SICILIA, which Alcibiades afterwards did much pricke forward. And some of them dreamed besides, of the conquest of THVSCAN, and the empire of CARTHAGE. But this was not altogether without some likelihood, nor without occasion of hope, considering the large bounds of their Kingdome, and the fortunat estate of their affaires, which fell out according to their own desire. But Pericles did hinder this going out, and cut of altogether their curious desire, employing the most part of their power and force, to keepe that they had already gotten: iudging it no small matter to keepe downe the LACEDÆMONIANS from growing greater. For he was alwaies an enemie to the LACEDÆMONIANS, as he shewed himselfe in many things, but specially in the war he made, called the holy warre. For the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing put the PHOCIANS from the charge of the temple of Apollo, in the city of DELPHES, which they had vsurped, and hauing restored the DELPHIANS again vnto the same: so soone as they were gone thence, Pericles went also with another army, and restored the PHOCIANS in againe. And whereas the LACEDÆMONIANS had caused to be grauen in the forehead of a Wolfe of brasse, the priuiledge the DELPHIANS had granted them, to be the first that should make their demands of the oracle: he hauing attained the like priuiledge of the PHOCIANS, made his image also to be grauen on the right side of the same image, of the brasen Wolfe. Now how wisely Pericles did gouerne GREECE by the power of the ATHENIANS, his deeds do plainly shew. For first of all, the countrey of EVBOEA did rebell, against whom he brought the army of the ATHENIANS. And suddenly in the necke of that, came newes from another coast, that the MEGARIANS also were in armes against them: and how they were already entred into the country of ATTICA with a great army, led by Plistonax King of LACEDÆMON. This occasion drew him homeward againe, and so he marched backe with speed into his country, to make preparation to encounter his enemies, that were already entred into the territories of ATTICA. He durst not offer them battell, being so great a number of valiant soldiers: but hearing that king Plistonax was yet but a yong man, and was ruled altogether by Cleandrides counsell and direction (whom the Ephores had placed about him to counsell and direct him) he sought priuily to corrupt Cleandrides. When he had won him soone with his money, he perswaded him to draw backe the PELOPONNESIANS out of their countrey of ATTICA: and so he did. But when the LACEDÆMONIANS saw their army cassed, and that the people were gone their way, euery man to his owne city or towne, they were so mad at it, that the king was condemned in a great sum. The king being vnable to answer his fine, which was so extreme great, he was driuen to absent himselfe from LACEDÆMON. Cleandrides on the other side, if he had not fled in time, euen for spite had bene condemned to death. This Cleandrides was Gylippus father, that afterwards ouercame the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, in whom it seemed nature bred couetousnes, as a disease inheritable by succession from the father to the son. For he being shamefully conuicted also, for certaine vile parts he had plaid, was likewise banished from SPARTA: as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lysander. And Pericles deliuering vp the account of his charge, and setting downe an article of the expence of tenne talents he had employed, or should employ in needfull causes: the people allowed them him, neuer asking question how, nor which way, nor whether it was true that they were bestowed. Now there are certaine writers (amongst whom the Philosopher Theophrastus is one) who write that Pericles sent yearely vnto SPARTA ten talents, with the which he entertained those that were in authoritie there, because they should make no wars with them: not to buy peace of them, but time, that he might in the meane season, with better commodity, and that leysure, prouide to maintaine the wars. After that, as the army of the PELOPONNESIANS were out of the country of ATTICA, he returned against the rebels, and passed into the Ile of EVBOEA with fifty saile, and fiue thousand footmen well armed: and there he ouercame all the cities that had taken armes against him, and draue away the Hyppobotes, who were the most famous men of all the CHALCIDIANS, as well for their riches, as for their valiantnes. He draue away also all the HESTIÆIANS, whom he chased cleane out of all the country, and placed in their city, onely the citizens of ATHENS. And the cause why he dealt so rigorously with them was, because they hauing taken a galley of the ATHENIANS prisoner, had put all the men to death that were in her. And peace being concluded afterwards betweene the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS for thirty yeares: he proclaimed open wars against those of the Isle of SAMOS, burdening them, that they being commaunded by the ATHENIANS, to pacifie the quarrels which they had against the MILESIANS, they would not obey. But because some hold opinion, that he tooke vpon him this warre against SAMOS, for the loue of Aspasia: it shall be no great digression of our story, to tell you by the way, what manner of woman she was, and what a maruellous gift and power she had, that she could entangle with her loue the chiefest rulers and gouernors at that time of the commonweale, and that the Philosophers themselues did so largely speake and write of her. First of all, it is certaine that she was borne in the city of MILETVM, and was the daughter of one Axiochus: she following the steps and example of an old curtisan of IONIA, called Thargelia, gaue her selfe only to entertaine the greatest persons and chiefest rulers in her time. For this Thargelia being passing faire, and carying a comely grace with her, hauing a sharpe wit and pleasant tong, she had the acquaintance and friendship of the greatest persons of all GREECE, and wanne all those that did haunt her company, to be at the king of Persiaes commaundement. So that she sowed through all the cities of GREECE, great beginnings of the faction of the MEDES: for they were the greatest men of power and authoritie of euery city that were acquainted with her. But as for Aspasia, some say that Pericles resorted vnto her, because she was a wise woman, and had great vnderstanding in matters of state and gouernement. For Socrates himselfe went to see her sometimes with his friends: and those that vsed her company also, brought their wiues many times with them to heare her talke: though her traine were, to entertaine such as would warme them by her fire. Æschines writeth, that Lysicles a grasier, being before but a meane man, and of a clubbish nature, came to be the chiefe man of ATHENS, by frequenting the company of Aspasia, after the death of Pericles. And to Platoes booke intituled Menexenus, although the beginning of it be but pleasantly written, yet in that, this story is written truely: that this Aspasia was repaired vnto by diuers of the ATHENIANS, to learn the art of rhetorick of her. Yet notwithstanding it seemeth most likely that the affection Pericles did beare her, grew rather of loue, then of any other cause. For he was maried vnto a kinswoman of his owne, and that before was Hipponicus wife, by whom she had Callias, surnamed the rich: and had afterwards by Pericles, Xantippus and Paralus. But not liking her company, he gaue her with her owne goodwill and consent vnto another, and maried Aspasia whom he dearely loued. For euer when he went abroad, and came home againe, he saluted her with a kisse. Whereupon in the auncient Comedies, she is called in many places, the new Omphale, and somtimes Deianira, and sometimes Iuno. But Cratinus plainly calleth her whore in these verses:

Pericles makeih warre with the Samians.

Aspasia a passing wise woman.

The description of Aspasia. Thargelia.

Callias the rich

Pericles maried Aspasia the famous curtisan.

His Iuno she him brought, Aspasia by name, which was indeed an open whore, and past all kind of shame.

And it seemeth that he had a bastard: for Eupolis in a comedie of his called Demosij, bringeth him in, asking Pironides thus:

I pray thee is my bastard sonne yet aliue?

And then Pironides answered him:

A perfect man long since, he surely had bene found, if that this lewd and naughty whore, his vertue had not drownd.

To conclude, this Aspasia was so famous, that Cyrus (he that fought against king Artaxerxes his brother, for the empire of PERSIA) called Aspasia his best beloued of all his concubines, which before was called Milto, and was borne in PHOCIDES, being Hermotimus daughter. And

Cyrus

Cyrus being slaine in the field, Aspasia was caried to the King his brother, with whom afterwards she was in great fauor. As I was writing this life, this story came in my mind: and me thought I should haue dealt hardly, if I should haue left it vnwritten. But to our matter againe. Pericles was charged that he made warres against the SAMIANS, on the behalfe of the MILESIANS, at the request of Aspasia: for these two cities were at wars together, for the citie of PRIENA, but the SAMIANS were the stronger. Now the ATHENIANS commanded them to lay aside their armes, and to come & plead their matter before them, that the right might be decided: but they refused it vtterly. Wherfore Pericles went thither and tooke away the gouernment of the small number of Nobility, taking for hostages, fiftie of the chiefest men of the citie, and so many children besides, which he left to be kept in the Ile of LEMNOS. Some say euery one of these hostages offered to giue him a talent: and besides those, many other offered him the like, such as wold not haue the soueraigne authority put into the hands of the people. Moreouer Pissuthnes the PERSIAN, lieutenant to the king of PERSIA, for the goodwill he bare those of SAMOS, did send Pericles ten thousand crownes to release the hostages. But Pericles neuer tooke penny: and hauing done that he determined at SAMOS, and established a popular gouernment, he returned againe to ATHENS. Notwithstanding, the SAMIANS rebelled immediatly after, hauing recouered their hostages againe by meanes of this Pissuthnes that stale them away, and did furnish them also with all their munition of warre. Wherupon Pericles returning against them once more, he found them not idle, nor amazed at his comming, but resolutely determined to receiue him, and to fight for the seignorie by sea. So there was a great battell fought betweene them, neare the Ile of TRACIA. And Pericles wan the battell: hauing with 44. saile onely nobly ouercome his enemies, which were three score and ten in number, wherof twenty of them were ships of war. And so following his victory forthwith, he wan also the port of SAMOS, and kept the SAMIANS besieged within their owne citie: where they were yet so bold, as they wold make sallies out many times, and fight before the wals of the citie. But when there arriued a new supply of ships bringing a greater aide vnto Pericles: then were they shut vp of all sides. Pericles then taking three-score galleys with him, lanched out into the sea, with intent (as some say) to go meete certaine ships of the PHOENICIANS (that came to aide the SAMIANS) as far from SAMOS as he could: or as Stesimbrotus saith, to go into CYPRVS, which me thinketh is not true. But whatsoeuer was his intent, he committed a foule fault. For Melissus (the son of Ithagenes, a great Philosopher) being at that time general of the SAMIANS, perceiuing that few ships were left behind at the siege of the city, and that the captaines also that had the charge of them were no very expert men of war, perswaded his citizens to make a sallie vpon them. Wherupon they fought a battel, and the SAMIANS ouercame: the ATHENIANS were taken prisoners, and they sunke many of their ships. Now they being lords againe of the sea, did furnish their city with all maner of munition for wars, whereof before they had great want. Yet Aristotle writeth, that Pericles selfe was once ouercome in a battell at sea by Melissus. Furthermore the SAMIANS, to be euen with the ATHENIANS for the iniury they had receiued of them before: did brand them in the forehead with the stampe of an owle, the owle being then the stampe of their coine at ATHENS, euen as the ATHENIANS had branded the SAMIAN prisoners before with the stampe of Samæna. This Samæna is a kind of ship amongst the SAMIANS, low afore, and well laid out in the mid-ship, so that it is excellent good to rise with the waues of the sea, and is very swift vnder saile: and it was so called, because the first ship that was made of this fashion, was made in the Isle of SAMOS, by the tyrant Polycrates. It is said that the Poet Aristophanes, couertly conueying the stampe of the SAMIANS, speaking merily in a place of his Comedies, saith:

The Samians are great learned men.

Pericles being aduertised of the ouerthrow of his armie, returned presently to the rescue. Melissus went to meet him, and gaue him battell: but he was ouerthrowne, and driuen back into his city, where Pericles walled them in round about the citie, desiring victorie rather by time and charge, then by danger, and losse of his souldiers. But when he saw that they were wearie with tract of time, and that they would bring it to hazard of battell, and that he could by no meanes withhold them: he then deuided his armie into eight companies, whom he made to draw lots, and that company that lighted vpon the white beane, they should be quiet and make good cheare, while the other seuen fought. And they say that from thence it came, that when any haue made good cheare, and taken pleasure abroad, they do yet cal it a white day, because of the white

beane. Ephorus the hiſtoriographer writeth, that it was there, where firſt of all they began to vſe engines of warre to plucke downe great wals, and that Pericles vſed firſt this wonderfull inuention: and that Artemon an enginer was the firſt deuiſer of them. He was caried vp and downe in a chaire, to ſet forward theſe workes, becauſe he had a lame legge: and for this cauſe he was called Periphoretos. But Heraclides Ponticus confuteth Ephorus therein, by the verſes of Anacreon, in the which Artemon is called Periphoretos, many yeares before this warre of SAMOS began: and ſaith this Periphoretos was a maruellous tender man, and ſo fooliſhly afeard of his owne ſhadow, that the moſt part of his time he ſtirred not out of his houſe, and did ſit alwaies hauing two of his men by him, that held a copper target ouer his head, for feare leſt any thing ſhould fall vpon him. And if vpon any occaſion he were driuen to go abroad out of his houſe: he would be caried in a litle bed hanging neare the ground, and for this cauſe he was ſurnamed Periphoretos. At the laſt, at nine moneths end, the SAMIANS were compelled to yeeld. So Pericles tooke the city & raſed their wals to the ground: he brought their ſhips away, and made them pay a maruellous great tribute, whereof part he receiued in hand, and the reſt payable at a certaine time, taking hoſtages with him for aſſurance of payment. But Duris the SAMIAN dilateth theſe matters maruellous pitifully, burdening the ATHENIANS, and Pericles ſelfe with vnnaturall cruelty: whereof neither Thucydides, nor Ephorus, nor Ariſtotle himſelfe maketh mention. And ſure I cannot beleeue it is true that is written: That he brought the captaines of the gallies, and the ſoldiers themſelues of SAMIA, into the market place of the city of MILETVM, where he made them to be bound faſt vnto boords for the ſpace of tenne dayes, and at the end of the ſame, the poore men halfe dead, were beaten downe with clubbes, and their heads paſhed in peeces: and afterwards they threw out their bodies to the crowes, and would not burie them. So Duris being accuſtomed to ouerreach, and to lye many times in things nothing touching him, ſeemeth in this place out of all reaſon to aggrauate the calamities of his countrey, onely to accuſe the ATHENIANS, and to make them odious to the world. Pericles hauing won the citie of SAMOS, he returned againe to ATHENS, where he did honorably burie the bones of his ſlaine citizens in this warre: and himſelfe (according to their manner and cuſtome) made the funerall oration, for the which he was maruellouſly eſteemed. In ſuch ſort, that after he came downe from the pulpit where he made his oration, the ladies and gentlewomen of the citie came to ſalute him, and brought him garlands to put vpon his head, as they do to noble conquerers when they returne from games, where they haue wonne the prize. But Elpinicé comming to him, ſaid: Surely Pericles, thy good ſeruice done, deſerueth garlands of triumph: for thou haſt loſt vs many a good and valiant citizen, not fighting with the MEDES, the PHOENICIANS, and with the barbarous people as my brother Cimon did, but for deſtroying a citie of our owne nation and kindred. Pericles to theſe words, ſoftly anſwered Elpinicé, with Archilochus verſe, ſmiling:

When thou art old, paint not thy ſelfe.

But Ion writeth, that he greatly gloried, and ſtood much in his own conceipt, after he had ſubdued the SAMIANS, ſaying: Agamemnon was ten yeares taking of a citie of the barbarous people: and he in nine moneths only had won the ſtrongeſt citie of the whole nation of IONIA. Indeed he had good cauſe to glory in his victorie: for truely (if Thucydides report be true) his conqueſt was no leſſe doubtfull, then he found it daungerous. For the SAMIANS had almoſt bene lords of the ſea, and taken the ſeignorie thereof from the ATHENIANS. After this, the wars of PELOPONNESVS being hote againe, the CORINTHIANS inuading the Ilanders of CORPHV: Pericles did perſwade the ATHENIANS to ſend aide vnto the CORPHIANS, and to ioyne in league with that Iland, which was of great power by ſea, ſaying: that the PELOPONNESIANS (before it were long) would haue war with them. The ATHENIANS conſented to his motion, to aide thoſe of CORPHV. Whereupon they ſent thither Lacedæmonius (Cimons ſon) with ten gallies onely for a mockerie: for all Cimons family and friends, were wholly at the LACEDÆMONIANS deuotion. Therefore did Pericles cauſe Lacedæmonius to haue ſo few ſhips deliuered him, and further, ſent him thither againſt his will, to the end that if he did no notable exploit in this ſeruice, that they might then the more iuſtly ſuſpect his goodwill to the LACEDÆMONIANS. Moreouer whileſt he liued, he did euer what he could to keepe Cimons children backe from riſing: becauſe that by their names they were no naturall borne ATHENIANS, but ſtraungers. For the one was called Lacedæmonius, the other Theſſalus, and the third Elius: and the mother to all them three, was an ARCADIAN woman borne. But Pericles being blamed for that he sent but ten galleys only, which was but a slender aide for those that had requested them, and a great matter to them that spake ill of him: he sent thither afterwards a great number of other galleys, which came when the battell was fought. But the CORINTHIANS were marueilous angry, and went and complained to the counsell of the LACEDÆMONIANS, where they laid open many grieuous complaints and accusations against the ATHENIANS, and so did the MEGARIANS also: alleadging that the ATHENIANS had forbidden them their hauens, their staples and all trafficke of merchandise in the territories vnder their obedience, which was directly against the common lawes and articles of peace, agreed vpon by oath among all the GRECIANS. Moreouer, the ÆGINETES finding themselues very ill and cruelly handled, did send secretly to make their mone and complaints to the LACEDÆMONIANS, being afraid openly to complaine of the ATHENIANS. While these things were a doing, the city of POTIDÆA, subiect at that time vnto the ATHENIANS (and was built in old time by the CORINTHIANS) did rebell, and was besieged by the ATHENIANS, which did hasten on the warres. Notwithstanding this, ambassadors were first sent vnto ATHENS vpon these complaints: and Archidamus, king of the LACEDÆMONIANS did all that he could to pacifie the most part of these quarrels and complaints, intreating their friends and allies. So as the ATHENIANS had had no wars at all, for anie other matters wherewith they were burdened, if they would haue graunted to haue reuoked the decree they had made against the MEGARIANS. Whereupon, Pericles, that aboue all other stood most against the reuocation of that decree, and that did stir vp the people, and made them stand to that they had once decreed, and ordered against the MEGARIANS: was thought the originall cause and author of the PELOPONNESIAN warres. For it is said that the LACEDÆMONIANS sent ambassadors vnto ATHENS for that matter only. And when Pericles alledged a law that did forbid them to take away the table whereupon before time had bene written any common law or edict: Poliarces, one of the LACEDÆMON ambassadors, said vnto him: Well, said he, take it not away then, but turne the table onely: your law I am sure forbiddeth not that. This was pleasantly spoken of the ambassadour, but Pericles could neuer be brought to it for all that. And therefore it seemeth he had some secret occasion of grudge against the MEGARIANS: yet as one that would finely conuey it vnder the common cause and cloke, he tooke from them the holy lands they were breaking vp. And to bring this to passe, he made an order, that they should send an herauld to summon the MEGARIANS to let the land alone, and that the same herauld should go also vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS to accuse the MEGARIANS vnto them. It is true that this ordinance was made by Pericles meanes, as also it was most iust and reasonable: but it fortuned so, that the messenger they sent thither died, and not without suspition that the MEGARIANS made him away. Wherfore Charinus made a law presently against the MEGARIANS: that they should be proclaimed mortall enemies to the ATHENIANS for euer, without any hope of after reconciliation. And also if any MEGARIAN should once put his foote within the territories of ATTICA, that he should suffer the paines of death. And moreouer, that their captains taking yearely their ordinary oath, should sweare among other articles, that twise in the yeare they should go with their power, and destroy some part of the MEGARIANS land. And lastly, that the herauld Anthemocritus should be buried by the place called then the gates Thriasienes, and now called Dipylon. But the MEGARIANS stoutly denying, that they were any cause of the death of this Anthemocritus: did altogether burthen Aspasia and Pericles with the same, alleadging for proofe thereof, Aristophanes verses the Poet, in his Comedie he intituled the Acharnes, which are so common, as euery boy hath them at his toungs end.

The Athenians accused of Lacedæmon.

Pericles author of the wars against Peloponnesus.

Pericles malice against the Megarians.

The young men of our land (to drunken bibbing bent) ran out one day vnrulily, and towards Megara went:
From whence in their outrage, by force they tooke away,
Simetha noble curtisan, as she did sport and play.
Wherewith enraged all (with pepper in the nose)
the proud Megarians came to vs, as to their mortall foes,
And tooke by stealth away of harlots eke a paire, attending on Aspasia, which were both young and faire.

But in very deed, to tell the originall cause of this warre, and to deliuer the troth thereof, it is very hard. But all the historiographers together agree, that Pericles was the chiefest authour of the warre: because the decree made against the MEGARIANS, was not reuoked backe againe.

Yet some hold opinion, that Pericles did it of a noble mind and iudgement, to be constant in that he thought most expedient. For he iudged that this commandement of the LACEDÆMONIANS was but a triall, to proue if the ATHENIANS would grant them: and if they yeelded to them in that, then they manifestly shewed that they were the weaker. Other contrarily say, that it was done of a selfe-will and arrogancie, to shew his authoritie and power, and how he did despise the LACEDÆMONIANS. But the shrewdest proofe of all, that bringeth best authoritie with it, is reported after this sort. Phidias the image-maker (as we haue told you before) had vndertaken to make the image of Pallas: and being Pericles friend, was in great estimation about him: but that procured him many ill willers. Then they being desirous to heare by him what the people would iudge of Pericles, they intised Menon, one of the workemen that wrought vnder Phidias, and made him come into the market place to pray assurance of the people that he might openly accuse Phidias, for a fault he had committed about Pallas image. The people receiued his obedience, and his accusation was heard openly in the market place, but no mention was made of any theft at all: because that Phidias (through Pericles counsell and deuise) had from the beginning so laid on the gold vpon the image, that it might be taken off and weyed euery whit. Whereupon Pericles openly said vnto his accusers, take off the gold and wey it. The glorie of his works did purchase him this enuy. For he hauing grauen vpon the scutchion of the goddesse, the battell of the AMAZONS, had cut out the portraitnre of himselfe maruellous liuely, vnder the person of an old bald mã, lifting vp a great stone with both his hands. Further, he had cut out Pericles image, excellently wrought and artificially, seeming in manner to be Pericles selfe, fighting with an AMAZON in this sort: the AMAZONS hand being lift vp high, holdeth a dart before Pericles face, so passing cunningly wrought, as it seemed to shadow the likenesse and resemblance of Pericles: and yet notwithstanding appeareth plainely to be Pericles selfe on either side of the portraiture. So Phidias was clapt vp in prison, and there died of a sicknes, or else of poison (as some say) which his enemies had prepared for him: and all to bring Pericles into further suspition, and to giue them the more cause to accuse him. But howsoeuer it was, the people gaue Menon his freedome, and set him free for paiment of all subsidies, following the order Glycon made, and gaue the captains charge they should see him safely kept, and that he took no hurt.

And about the same time also Aspasia was accused, that she did not beleeue in the gods: and her accuser was Hermippus, maker of the Comedies. He burdened her further, that she was a bawd to Pericles, and receiued citizens wiues into her house, which Pericles kept. And Diopithes at the same time made a decree, that they should make search and enquirie for heretikes that did not beleeue in the gods, and that taught certaine new doctrine and opinion touching the operations of things aboue in the element, turning the suspition vpon Pericles, because of Anaxagoras. The people did receiue and confirm this inquisition: and it was moued also then by Dracontides, that Pericles should deliuer an account of the mony he had spent, vnto the hands of the Prytanes, who were treasurers of the common fines and reuenues, and that the Iudges deputed to giue iudgement, should giue sentence within the citie vpon the altar. But Agnon put that word out of the decree, and placed in stead thereof, that the cause should be iudged by the 15. hundred Iudges, as they thought good, if any man brought this action for theft, for battery, or for iniustice. As for Aspasia, he saued her, euen for the very pity & cõpassion the Iudges took of him, for the teares he shed in making his humble sute for her, all the time he pleaded her case: as Æschines writeth. But for Anaxagoras, fearing that he could not do so much for him: he sent him out of the city, & himselfe did accompany him. And furthermore, seeing he had incurred the ill will of the people for Phidias fact, and for this cause fearing the issue of the iudgment: he set the wars a fire againe, that alwaies went backward, and did but smoke a litle, hoping by this means to weare out the accusations against him, and to root out the malice some did beare him. For the people hauing waighty matters in hand, and very dangerous also: he knew they wold put all into his hands alone, he hauing won already such great authority & reputation among them. And these be the causes why he would not (as it is said) suffer the ATHENIANS to yeeld vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS in any thing: howbeit the truth cannot certainely be knowne. But the LACEDÆMONIANS knowing well, that if they could weed out Pericles, and ouerthrow him, they might then deale as they would with the ATHENIANS: they commanded them they should purge their city of Cylons rebellion, because they knew well inough that Pericles kin by the mothers side were to be touched withall, as Thucydides declareth. But this practise fell out contrary to their hope and expectation, that were ſent to ATHENS for this purpoſe. For, weening to haue brought Pericles into further ſuſpition and diſpleaſure, the citizens honoured him the more, and had a better affiance in him then before, becauſe they ſaw his enemies did ſo much feare and hate him. Wherefore, before King Archidamus entred with the army of the PELOPONNESIANS into the country of ATTICA, he told the ATHENIANS, that if King Archidamus fortuned to waſte and deſtroy all the country about, and ſhould ſpare his lands and goods for the old loue and familiaritie that was betweene them, or rather to giue his enemies occaſion falſly to accuſe him: that from thenceforth, he gaue all the lands and tenements he had in the country, vnto the common wealth. So it fortuned that the LACEDÆMONIANS with all their friends and confederates, brought a maruellous army into the countrey of ATTICA, vnder the leading of King Archidamus: who burning and ſpoiling all the country he came alongſt, they came vnto the towne of ACHARNES, where they encamped, ſuppoſing the ATHENIANS would neuer ſuffer them to approach ſo neare, but that they would giue them battell for the honour and defence of their countrey, and to ſhew that they were no cowards. But Pericles wiſely conſidered how the daunger was too great to hazard battell, where the loſſe of the citie of ATHENS ſtood in perill, ſeeing they were threeſcore thouſand footmen of the PELOPONNESIANS, and of the BOEOTIANS together: for ſo many was their number in the firſt voyage they made againſt the ATHENIANS. And as for thoſe that were very deſirous to fight, and to put themſelues to any hazard, being mad to ſee their country thus waſted and deſtroyed before their eyes, Pericles hid comfort & pacifie them with theſe words: That trees being cut and hewne downe, did ſpring againe in ſhort time: but men being once dead, by no poſſibilitie could be brought againe. Therefore he neuer durſt aſſemble the people in counſell, fearing leſt he ſhould be inforced by the multitude, to do ſomething ſtill againſt his will. But as a wiſe Pilote, when he ſeeth a ſtorme comming on the ſea, doth ſtraight giue order to make all things ſafe in the ſhippe, preparing euery thing ready to defend the ſtorme, according to his art and skill, not hearkening to the paſſengers fearefull cries and pitifull teares, who thinke themſelues caſt away: euen ſo did Pericles rule all things according to his wiſedome, hauing walled the city ſubſtantially about, and ſet good watch in euery corner: and paſſed not for thoſe that were angry and offended with him, neither would be perſwaded by his friends earneſt requeſts and intreaties, neither cared for his enemies threats nor accuſations againſt him, nor yet reckoned of all their fooliſh ſcoffing ſongs they ſung of him in the citie, to the ſhame and reproch of his gouernment, ſaying that he was a cowardly captaine, and that for daſtardlineſſe he let the enemies take al, and ſpoile what they would. Of which number Cleon was one that moſt defamed him, and began to enter into ſome pretie credite and fauour with the common people, for that they were angry, and miſliked with Pericles: as appeareth by theſe ſlaunderous verſes of Hermippus, which were then abroade:

The Lacedæmonians inuade Attica.

An excellent compariſon to ſtay the ſeditious deſire to fight.

Cleon accuſeth Pericles.

O King of Satyres thou, who with ſuch manly ſpeach, of bloudy warres and doughty deeds, doſt dayly to vs preach:
Why art thou now afraid to take thy launce in hand,
or with thy pike againſt thy foes, couragiouſly to ſtand?
Since Cleon ſtout and fierce, doth dayly thee prouoke, with biting words, with trenchant blades, and deadly daunting ſtroke.

All this notwithſtanding, Pericles was neuer mooued any thing, but with ſilence did patiently beare all iniuries and ſcoffings of his enemies, and did ſend for all that a nauie of a hundred ſaile vnto PELOPONNESVS, whither he would not go in perſon, but kept himſelfe at home, to keepe the people in quiet, vntill ſuch time as the enemies had raiſed their campe, and were gone away. And to entertaine the common people that were offended and angry at this war: he comforted the poore people againe, with cauſing a certaine diſtribution to be made amongſt them of the common treaſure, and diuiſion alſo of the lands that were got by conqueſt. For after he had driuen all the ÆGINETES out of their conntrey, he cauſed the whole Ile of ÆGINA to be deuided by lot amongſt the citizens of ATHENS. And then it was a great comfort to them in this aduerſitie, to heare of their enemies hurt and loſſe in ſuch manner as it did fall out. For their army that was ſent by ſea vnto PELOPONNESVS, had waſted and deſtroyed a great part of the champion country there, and had ſacked beſides many ſmall cities and townes. Pericles ſelfe alſo entring into the MEGARIANS countrey by land, did waſte the whole country all afore him. So the PELOPONNESIANS receiuing by ſea as much hurt and loſſe at the ATHENIANS hands, as they before had done by land vnto the ATHENIANS: they had not holden out warres so long with the ATHENIANS, but would soone haue giuen ouer (as Pericles had told them before) had not the gods aboue secretly hindred mans reason and pollicie. For first of all there came such a sore plague among the ATHENIANS, that it tooke away the flower of ATHENS youth, and weakened the force of the whole citie besides. Furthermore the bodies of them that were left aliue being infected with this disease, their hearts also were so sharply bent against Pericles, that the sickenesse hauing troubled their braines, they fell to flat rebellion against him, as the patient against his phisition, or children against their father, euen to the hurting of him, at the prouocation of his enemies: who bruted abroade, that the plague came of no cause else, but of the great multitude of the country men that came into the city on heapes, one vpon anothers necke in the heart of the sommer, where they were compelled to lie many together, smothered vp in litle tents and cabines, remaining there all day long, cowring downewards, and doing nothing, where before they liued in the countrey in a fresh open ayre, and at libertie. And of all this, (say they) Pericles is the only cause, who procuring this war, hath pent and shrouded the country men together within the walles of a citie, employing them to no manner of vse nor seruice, but keeping them like sheep in a pinfold, maketh one to poison another with the infection of their plague sores running vpon them, and giuing them no leaue to change aire, that they might so much as take breath abroad. Pericles to remedy this, and to do their enemies a litle mischief, armed a hundred and fifty ships, and shipped into them a great number of armed footmen and horsemen also. Hereby he put the citizens in good hope, and the enemies in great feare, seeing so great a power. But when he had shipped all his men, and was himselfe also in the admirall ready to hoise sayle: sodainely there was a great eclypse of the Sunne, and the day was very darke, that all the army was striken with a maruellous feare, as of some dangerous and very ill token towards them. Pericles seeing the maister of his gally in a maze withall, not knowing what to do, cast his cloake ouer the maisters face, and hid his eyes, asking him whether he thought that any harme or no. The maister answered him, he thought it none. Then said Pericles againe to him: There is no difference betweene this and that, sauing that the body which maketh the darknesse is greater, then my cloke which hideth thy eyes. These things are thus disputed of in the schooles of the philosophers. But Pericles hoising saile notwithstanding, did no notable nor speciall seruice, answerable to so great an army and preparation. For he laying siege vnto the holy citie of EPIDAVRVM, whē euery man looked they should haue taken it, was compelled to raise his siege for the plague that was so vehement: that it did not onely kill the ATHENIANS themselues, but all other also (were they neuer so few) that came to them or neare their campe. Wherefore perceiuing the ATHENIANS were maruellously offended with him, he did what he could to comfort them, and put them in heart againe: but all was in vaine, he could not pacifie them: for by the most part of voices, they depriued him of his charge of General, and condemned him in a maruellous great fine and summe of money, the which those that tell the least, do write, that it was the summe of fifteene talents: and those that say more, speake of fiftie talents. The accuser subscribed in this condemnation, was Cleon, as Idomeneus, or Simmias say, or as Theophrastus writeth: yet Heraclides Pōticus saith, one Lacratidas. Now his common griefes were soone blowen ouer: for the people did easily let fall their displeasures towards him, as the waspe leaueth her sting behind her with them she hath stung. But his owne priuate affaires and houshold causes were in very ill case: both for that the plague had taken away many of his friends and kinsemen from him, as also for that he and his house had continued a long time in disgrace. For Xantippus (Pericles sonne and heire) being a man of a very ill disposition and nature, and hauing married a young woman very prodigall and lauish of expence, the daughter of Isander, sonne of Epilychus, he grudged much at his fathers hardnesse, who scantly gaue him mony and but a litle at a time. Whereupon he sent on a time to one of his fathers friends in Pericles name, to pray him to lend him some money, who sent it vnto him. But afterwardes when he came to demaund it againe, Pericles did not onely refuse to pay it him, but further also he put him in sute. But this made the young man Xantippus so angrie with his father, that he spake very ill of him in euery place where he came: and reported in way of mockery, how his father spent his time when he was at home, and what talke he had with the Sophisters, and the maister Rhetoritians. For a mischaunce fortuning on a time, at the game of the throwing of the dart, who should throw best, that he that threw, did vnfortunately kill one Epitimius a THESSALIAN: Xantippus went pratling vp and downe the towne, that his father Pericles was a whole day disputing with Protagoras the Rhetorician, to know which of the three by law and reason should be condemned for this murther. The dart: he that threw the dart: or the deuiser of the game. Moreouer Stesimbrotus writeth, that the brute that ranne thorough the citie, how Pericles did keepe his wife, was sowne abroade by Xantippus himselfe. But so it is, this quarrell and hate betwixt the father and the sonne continued without reconciliation vnto the death. For Xantippus died in the great plague, and Pericles owne sister also: moreouer he lost at that time by the plague, the more part of his friends and kinsfolkes, and those specially that did him greatest pleasure in gouerning of the state. But al this did neuer pull downe his countenance, nor any thing abate the greatnesse of his mind, what misfortunes soeuer he had sustained. Neither saw they him weep at any time, nor mourne at the funerals of any of his kinsmen or friends, but at the death of Paralus, his yongest and lawful begotten sonne: for, the losse of him alone did onely melt his heart. Yet he did striue to shew his naturall constancie, and to keepe his accustomed modestie. But as he would haue put a garland of flowers vpon his head, sorrow did so pierce his heart when he saw his face, that then he burst out in teares and cried amaine: which they neuer saw him do before all the dayes of his life. Furthermore the people hauing proued other captaines and gouernours, and finding by experience that there was no one of them of iudgement & authority sufficient, for so great a charge: in the end, of themselues they called him againe to the pulpit for orations to heare their counsels, and to the state of a captaine also to take charge of the state. But at that time he kept himselfe close in his house, as one bewailing his late grieuous losse and sorrow. Howbeit Alcibiades, and other his familiar friends, perswaded him to shew himself vnto the people: who did excuse themselues vnto him, for their ingratitude towards him. Pericles then taking the gouernement againe vpon him, the first matter he entred into was: that he prayed them to reuoke the statute he had made for base borne children, fearing least his lawful heires would faile, and so his house and name should fal to the ground. But as for that law, thus it stood: Pericles when he was in his best authoritie, caused a law to be made, that they onely should be counted citizens of ATHENS, which were naturall ATHENIANS borne by father and mother. Not long time after, it fortuned that the king of ÆGYPT hauing sent a gift vnto the people of ATHENS, of 40. thousand bushels of corne, to be distributed among the citizens there: many by occasion of this law were accused to be base borne, & specially men of the baser sort of people, which were not knowne before, or at the least had no reckoning made of them, and so some of them were falsly and wrongfully condemned. Whereupon so it fell out, that there were no lesse then fiue thousand of them conuicted and sold for slaues: and those that remained as free men, and were iudged to be naturall citizens, amounted to the number of fourteene thousand and fortie persons. Now this was much misliked of the people, that a law enacted, and that had bene of such force, should by the selfe same maker and deuiser of the same be againe reuoked and called in. Howbeit Pericles late calamitie that fortuned to his house, did breake the peoples hardened hearts against him: who thinking these sorrowes smart, to be punishment enough vnto him for his former pride, and iudging that by Gods diuine iustice and permission, this plague and losse fell vpon him, and that his request also was tollerable: they suffered him to entrole his base borne sonne in the register of the lawfull citizens of his family, giuing him his owne name, Pericles. It is the selfesame Pericles, who after he had ouercome the PELOPONNESIANS in a great battell by sea, neare vnto the Iles of ARGINVSES, was put to death by sentence of the people, with other captaines his companions. Now was Pericles at that time infected with the plague, but not so vehemently as other were, but more temperatly: which by long space of time, with many alterations and chaunges, did by litle and litle decay and consume the strength of his body, and ouercame his senses and noble mind. Therefore Theophrastus in his morals declareth, in a place where he disputeth, whether mens manners do chaunge with their misfortunes, and whether corporall troubles and afflictions do so alter men, that they forget vertue, and abandon reason: that Pericles in his sickenesse shewed a friend of his that came to see him, I cannot tell what a preseruing charme, that the women had tied (as a carkanet) about his necke, to let him vnderstand he was very ill, since he suffered them to apply such a fooliſh bable to him. In the end, Pericles drawing fast vnto his death, the Nobilitie of the citie, and such his friends as were left aliue, standing about his bed, beganne to speake of his vertue, and of the great authoritie he had borne, considerig the greatnesse of his noble acts, and counting the number of his victories he had wonne (for he had wonne nine foughten battels being Generall of the ATHENIANS, and had set vp so many tokens and triumphs in honour of his country) they reckened vp among themselues all these matters, as if he had not vnderstood them, imagining his senses had bene gone. But he contrarily being yet of perfect memorie, heard all what they had said, and thus he began to speake vnto them: That he maruelled why they had so highly praised that in him, which was common to many other captaines, and wherin fortune dealt with them in equalitie alike,& all this while they had forgotten to speake of the best and most notable thing that was in him, which was, that no ATHENIAN had euer worne blacke gowne through his occasion. And sure so was he a noble and worthy person. For he did not onely shew himselfe mercifull and courteous, euen in most weightie matters of gouernment among so enuious people and hatefull enemies: but he had this iudgement also to thinke, that the most noble acts he did were these, that he neuer gaue himself to hatred, enuy, nor choler, to be reuenged of his most mortal enemy, without mercy shewed towards him, though he had committed vnto him such absolute power & sole gouernment among them. And this made his surname be Olympius (as to say, diuine or celestiall) which otherwise for him had bene too proud and arrogant a name, because he was of so good and gentle a nature, and for that in so great libertie he had kept cleane hands and vndefiled: euen as we esteeme the gods authors of all good, and causers of no euill, and so worthy to gouerne and rule the whole monarchy of the world. And not as Poets say, which do confound our wits by their follies, and fond fainings, and are also contrary to themselues, considering that they call heauen (which containeth the gods) the euerlasting seate, which trembleth not, and is not driuen nor moued with winds, neither is darkned with cloudes, but is alwayes bright and cleare, and at all times shining equally with a pure bright light, as being the onely habitation and mansion place of the eternall God, onely happy and immortall: and afterwards they describe it themselues, full of dissentions, of enmities, of anger, and passions, which do nothing become wise and learned men. But this discourse peraduenture would be better spoken of in some other booke. Now the troubles the ATHENIANS felt immediatly after Pericles death, made them then lament the losse of so noble a member. For those who vnpatiently did brooke his great authoritie while he liued, because it drowned their owne; when they came after his death to proue other speakers, and gouernours, they were compelled then to confesse, that no mans nature liuing could be more moderate nor graue, with lenitie and mercy, then was his. And that most hated power, which in his life time they called monarchie, did then most plainely appeare vnto them, to haue bene the manifest ramper and bulwarke of the safety of their whole state and common-weale: such corruption and vice in gouernement of the state did then spring vp immediatly after his death, which when he was aliue, he did euer suppresse and keepe vnder, in such sort, that either it did not appeare at all, or at the least it came not to that head and libertie, that such faults were committed, as were vnpossible to be remedied.

THE LIFE OF Fabius Maximus.

HAVING already declared vnto you ſuch things worthy memory as we could collect, and gather of the life of Pericles: it is now good time we ſhould proceede to write alſo of the life of Fabius Maximus. It is ſaid the firſt Fabius, from whom the houſe and family of the Fabians did deſcend (being the greateſt and nobleſt houſe of all other in ROME) was begotten by Hercules, whom he got of a Nymph (or as other ſay, a woman of the countrey by the riuer of Tyber.) And ſome ſay, that the firſt of this houſe, were called at the beginning Fodians, becauſe they did hunt wild beaſts, with pitfals and ditches. For vnto this preſent the ROMAINES cal ditches, Foſſæ: and to dig Fodere. Since that time, the two ſecond letters haue bene chaunged, and they haue called them Fabians. But howſoeuer it was, this is certaine, that many noble men haue come out of that houſe: and among other, there was one of that houſe called Fabius Rullus, whom the ROMAINES for his noble acts did ſurname Maximus, very great. After him Fabius Maximus, whoſe life we haue now in hand, was the fourth lineally deſcended of the ſame line, and he was ſurnamed Verrucoſus, becauſe of a certaine birth-marke he had vpon one of his lips, like a litle wart. And he was alſo ſurnamed Ouicula, a litle lambe, for his ſoftneſſe, ſlowneſſe, and grauity of his doings whileſt he was a child. But becauſe of nature he was dull, ſtil, and very ſilent, and that he was ſeldome ſeene to play at any paſtime among the boyes, and for that they ſaw he was but of ſlow capacitie, and hard to learne and conceiue, and withall that the boyes might do to him what they would, he was ſo lowly to his fellowes: this made men iudge that looked not into him, that he would proue a very foole and idiot. Yet other were of contrary opinion of him: who conſidering more deeply the man, perceiued in his nature a certaine ſecret conſtancie and the maieſtie of a lion. But Fabius ſelfe when he was called to ſerue the common-weale, did quickly ſhew to the world, that which they tooke for dulneſſe in him, was his grauity, which neuer altered for no cauſe or reſpect: and that which others iudged fearefulneſſe in him, was very wiſedome. And where he ſhewed himſelf not haſtie, nor ſodaine in any thing: it was found in him an aſſured and ſetled conſtancy. Wherefore when he came to conſider the great ſoueraignte of their common-weale, and the continuall warres it was in: he did vſe his body to all hardneſſe, and brought vp himſelfe therewithal, that he might be the better able to ſerue in the field: and he gaue himſelfe much to eloquence alſo, as a neceſſary inſtrument to perſwade ſouldiers vnto reaſon. His tongue likewiſe did agree with his conditions, and manner of life. For he had no maner of affectation, nor counterfeit fineneſſe in his ſpeech, but his words were euer very graue and profound, and his ſentences euen grafted in him by nature, and (as ſome ſay) were much like Thucydides ſayings. As appeareth in a funerall oration he made before the people in the praiſe of his ſonne, who died when he came out of his Conſulſhip, which is yet extant to be ſeene. Now as for him, hauing bene fiue times choſen Conſull, in his firſt yeare of his Conſulſhip, he triumphed ouer the LIGVRIANS (which be people of the mountaines, and vpon the coaſt of GENVA) who being ouerthrowne by him in a great battell, where they had loſt many men, they were compelled to go their way, and to take the ALPES for their ſuccour, and durſt no more appeare vpon the borders of ITALY, whereupon they did confine. Hannibal entring ITALY afterwards with a great army, and hauing wonne the firſt battell neare vnto the riuer of TREBIA: he paſſed further, and went through THVSCAN, waſting and deſtroying all the countrey as he paſſed by. This made ROME quake for feare. Beſides they ſaw many ſignes and tokens, ſome common vnto them, as thundring, lightning, and ſuch other like: but other alſo more ſtrange, neuer ſeene nor heard of before. For it was reported that certaine targets were waxen all bloudy of themſelues, and that about the citie of ANTIVM they found wheate eares, which were all bloudy when they were reaped: that there fell from heauen, burning ſtones all in a flame of fire: and in the countrey of the PHALERIANS how the clement ſeemed to open, and many litle written ſcroles fell downe vpon the ground, in one of the which were written theſe words, word for word: Mars doth now handle his weapons. But all theſe ſignes and wonders did nothing appaule nor daunt the boldneſſe of Caius Flaminius, Conſull then: who beſides the naturall great courage, and aſpiring mind he had to honour, yet was it beyond all reaſon increaſed in him, by the wonderfull good ſucceſſe he had before. For, notwithſtanding the Senate called him home againe, and that his fellow Conſull ſtood againſt his intent: he for all that did giue battell to the GAVLES, in deſpite of them all, and wanne the victory. Likewiſe, though all theſe ſignes and wonders in the ayre, did greatly trouble and amaze multitudes of poeple: yet did they nothing trouble Fabius, for he ſaw no apparant cauſe to be troubled withall. But he vnderſtanding the ſmal number of his enemies, & the lack of mony that was among them: gaue counſell, and was of opinion they ſhould patiently forbeare a litle, and not to hazard battell againſt a man, whoſe armie had bene long trained in warres, and by many foughten fields was growne valiant and expert. Moreouer, he thought good they ſhould ſend aide to their ſubiects, and other their allies and confederates, as need required, to keepe their cities ſtill vnder their obedience: and in the meane ſeaſon by tract of time, to weare out Hannibals force and power, which was like ſtraw ſet on fire, that ſtraight giueth forth a blaſe, and yet hath no ſubſtance to hold fire long. When Fabius had thus ſaid inough to perſwade Flaminius, yet it would not ſinke into Flaminius head: for, ſaid he, I will not tarie vntill the warres come to ROME gates, neither will I be brought to fight vpon the walles of the city, to defend it, as Camillus did, that fought within the citie ſelfe in old lime. Whereupon he commanded his captaines to ſet out their bands to the field, and he himſelfe tooke his horſe-backe: which vpon the ſodaine, without any cauſe was ſo afeard, and tooke ſo on with himſelfe, that he caſt the Conſull to the ground with his head forward. For all this fall he would not change his mind, but held on his iourney toward Hannibal, and preſented him battell in THVSCAN, by the lake called Thraſimena, which is the lake of PERVSIA. This battell was ſo fiercely fought on both ſides, that notwithſtanding there was ſuch a terrible earthquake therewhile, that ſome cities were ouerthrowne and turned topſie turuey, ſome riuers had their ſtreames turned againſt their courſe, and the foote of the mountaines were torne in ſunder, and brokē open: yet not one of them that were fighting, heard any ſuch thing at al. Flaminius the Conſul ſelf was ſlaine at that battel, after he had in his owne perſon done many a valiant act, and many of the worthieſt gentlemen and valianteſt ſouldiers of his army lay dead about him: the reſidue being fled, the ſlaughter was great, for the bodies ſlaine were fifteene thouſand, & ſo many priſoners left aliue. After this ouerthrow, Hannibal made all the ſearch he could poſſible to find the body of Flaminius, to bury him honourably, becauſe of his valiantneſſe: but he could neuer be found amongſt the dead bodies, neither was it euer heard what became of it. Now as touching the firſt ouerthrow at TREBIA, neither the General that wrote it, nor the poſt that brought the firſt newes to ROME, told the troth of it as it was, but fained that the end was doubtfull, and that they could not tell who had the beſt. But of this battell, ſo ſoone as the Prætor Pomponius had receiued the newes, he called all the people to counſell, where without diſguiſing or diſſembling at all, he plainly ſaid thus vnto them: My Lords, we haue loſt the battel, our army is ouerthrown, and

and the Consull himselfe is slaine in the field: wherefore, consider what you haue to do, and prouide for your safety. These words spoken to the people, as it had bene a boysterous storme of weather that had fallen on them from the sea to put them in daunger, did so terrifie the multitude, and trouble the whole citie for feare, that they were all in a maze, and knew not what to determine. Yet in the ende they all agreed that it stood them vpon to haue a chiefe magistrate, called in Latine Dictatura, that should be a man of courage, and could stoutly vse it without sparing or fearing any person. And for this, Fabius Maximus was thought the onely man meete to be chosen, as he, whose noble courage and graue behauiour was aunswerable, to the dignitie and soueraignetie of the office: and moreouer, that to his grauitie and wisedome there was ioyned (by reasonable age) strength of body, and valiantnesse with experience. This counsell being confirmed by them all, Fabius was chosen Dictator, who named Lucius Minutius generall of the horsemen. Then he first required the Senate, that they would graunt him he might haue his horse in the warres: the which was not lawfull for the Dictator, but expressely forbidden by an auncient order. Either because they thought the chiefest force of their armie did consist in their footemen, which caused the making of this law: whereby the Generall should be amongst them in the day of the battell, and in no wise should forsake them. Or else because the authoritie of this magistrate in all other things was so great, that it was in manner after the state of a King: yet all this notwithstanding, they were willing thereunto, and that the Dictator should haue absolute power ouer the people. Fabius at his first comming, because he would shew the maiestie and dignitie of his office, that euery man should be the more obedient and ready at his commaundement: when he went abroad, he had foure and twenty sergeants before him, carying the bundels of rods, and axes. And when one of the Consuls came to him, he sent a sergeant to command his bundell of rods that were caried before him, to be put downe, and all other tokens of dignitie to be layd aside: and that he should come and speake with him, as a priuate man. And first to make a good foundation, & to begin with the seruice of the gods: he declared vnto the people, that the losse they had receiued, came through the rashnesse and wilfull negligence of their captaine, who made no reckoning of the gods nor religion: and not through any default and cowardlinesse of the souldiers. And for this cause he did perswade them not to be affraid of their enemies, but to appease the wrath of the gods, and to serue and honour them. Not that he made them hereby superstitious, but did confirme their valiancie with true religion and godlinesse: and besides did vtterly take away and asswage their feare of their enemies, by giuing them certaine hope and assurance of the ayde of the gods. Then were the holy bookes of the Sibylles propheties perused, which were kept verie secret, and therein they found certaine auncient propheties and oracles, which spake of the present misfortunes of the time. But what were contained therein, it is not lawfull to be vttered to any person. Afterwards the Dictator, before the open assemblie of the people, made a solemne vow vnto the gods, that he would sacrifice all the profits and fruits that should fall the next yeare, of sheepe, of sowes, of milch-kine, and of goats in all the mountaines, champion countrey, riuers, or medowes of ITALIE. And he would celebrate playes of musicke, and shew other sights in the honour of the gods, and would bestow vpon the same the summe of three hundreth three and thirtie Sestercians, and three hundreth three and thirtie ROMAINE pence, and a third part ouer. All which sum reduced into GRECIAN mony, amounteth to foure score & three thousand, fiue hundreth, and foure score and three siluer drachmas, and two oboles. Now it were a hard thing to tell the reason why he doth mention this summe so precisely, and why he did deuide it by three, vnlesse it were to extoll the power of the number of three: because it is a perfect number by the nature, and is the first of the odde numbers, which is the beginning of diuerse numbers, and containeth in it selfe the first differences, and the first elements and principles of all the numbers vnited and ioyned together. So Fabius hauing brought the people to hope, and trust to haue the ayde and fauour of the gods: made them in the end the better disposed to liue well afterwards. Then Fabius hoping after victory, and that the gods would send good lucke and prosperity vnto men through their valiantnesse and wisedome: did straight set forwards vnto Hanniball, not as minded to fight with him, but fully resolued to weare out his strength and power, by delayes and tract of time: and to increase his pouertie by the long spending of his owne money, and to consume the small number of his people, with the great number of his souldiers. Fabius camped alwaies in the strong and high places of the mountaines, out of all danger of his enemies horsemen, and coasted still after the enemy: so that when Hannibal stayed in any place, Fabius also stayed: if Hannibal remoued, he followed him straight, and would be alwayes neere him, but neuer forsooke the hils, neither would he come so neere him, as that he should be inforced to fight against his will. Yet alwayes he followed the enemy at his taile, and made him euer afeard of him, thinking still that he sought to get the vantage, to giue the charge vpon him. Thus by delaying, and prolonging the time in this sort, he became disliked of euery body: for euery man both in his owne campe, and abroad, spake very ill of him openly: and as for his enemies, they tooke him for no better then a rancke coward, Hannibal onely excepted. But he perceiuing his great reach and pollicy, and foreseeing his manner of fight, saw there was no remedie, but by plaine force or slight to bring him to the fight: for otherwise his delay would ouerthrow the CARTHAGINIANS, when they should not come to handie strokes with him, wherein onely consisted all their hope and strength, and in the meane time his souldiers should fall away, and dye, and his money waxe scant, and himselfe should grow the weaker. Thereupon Hannibal began to bethinke him, and deuise all the stratagemes and pollicies of warre he could imagine: and like a cunning wrestler, to seeke out all the trickes he could to giue his aduersarie the fall. For suddenly, he would go and giue alarum to his campe: by and by againe he would retire. Another time he would remoue his campe from one place to another, and giue him some aduantage, to see if he could plucke his lingring deuise out of his head, and yet to hazard nothing. But as for Fabius, he continued still resolute in his first determination: that delay of fight was the best way so to ouerthrow him. Howbeit Minutius, generall of his horsemen, did trouble him much: for he being earnestly bent to fight without discretion, and brauing of a lustie courage, crept into opinion with the souldiers, by his hot fury and desire to fight. Which wrought much in them, and so stirred vp their courages, that they mocked Fabius altogether: and called him Hannibals schoole-maister: and contrariwise they commended Minutius, for a valiant captaine, and worthy ROMAINE. This made Minutius looke high, and haue a proud opinion of himselfe, mocking Fabius becausse he euer lodged on the hils, with saying, the Dictator would make them goodly sports, to see their enemies waste and burne ITALIE before their faces. Moreouer, he asked Fabius friends, whether he would in the end lodge his campe in the skie, that he did climbe vp so high vpon mountaines, mistrusting the earth: or else that he was so affraide, his enemies would find him out, that he went to hide himselfe in the cloudes. Fabius friends made report of these iests, and aduised him rather to hazard battell, then to beare such reprochfull words as were spoken of him. But Fabius aunswered them: If I should yeeld to that you counsell me, I should shew my selfe a greater coward then I am taken for now: by leauing my determination, for feare of their mockes and spitefull wordes. For it is no shame for a man to stand fearefull and iealous, of the welfare and safetie of his countrey: but otherwise to be afeard of the wagging of euery straw, or to regard euerie common prating, it is not the part of a worthy man of charge, but rather of a base minded person, to seeke to please those whom he ought to commaund and gouerne, becausse they are but fooles. After this, Hannibal chaunced to fall into a great errour: for intending to leaue Fabius to bring his armie into the plaines, where there was plentie of victuals, and store of pasture to feede his horse and cattell: he commanded his guides to bring him straight after supper, into the plaine of CASINVM. They mistaking his words, and not vnderstanding well what he sayd, becausse his ITALIAN tongue was but meane, tooke one thing for another, and so brought him and his armie to the ende of a field neere the citie of CASILINVM, through the middest of the which runneth a riuer, the ROMAINES call Vulturnus. Now the countrey lying by it, was a valley compassed in with mountaines round about, sauing that the riuer went to the sea: where leauing his owne bankes, it spreadeth abroad into the marrishes, and banckes of sand verie deepe, and in the end fell into that part of the sea which is most daungerous, and where was neither succour nor couert. Hannibal being now fallen as it were into the bottome of a sacke, Fabius that knew the countrey, and was very perfect in all the wayes thereabouts, followed him steppe by steppe, and stopped his passage, where he should haue come out of the valley, with foure thousand footemen, which he planted there to keepe the straight, and disposed the rest of his army vpon the hangings of the hilles, in the most apt and fit places all about. Then with his light horsemen he gaue a charge, vpon the rereward of his enemies battell: which put all Hannibals armie by and by out of order, and so there were slaine ſlaine eight hundreth of his men. Whereupon Hannibal would haue remoued his campe thence immediatly, and knowing then the fault his guides had made, taking one place for another, and the daunger wherein they had brought him: he roundly truſſed them vp, and hung them by the neckes. Now to force his enemies to come downe from the tops of the hils, and to win them from their ſtrength, he ſaw it was vnpoſſible, and out of all hope. Wherfore, perceiuing his ſouldiers both affraid and diſcouraged, for that they ſaw themſelues hemmed in on all ſides, without any order to eſcape, Hannibal determined to deceiue Fabius by a deuiſe. He cauſed ſtraight two thouſand oxen to be choſen out of the heard, which they had taken before in their ſpoiles, and tied to their hornes light bundels of reedes, and ſallow faggots, or bunches of the dead cuttings of vines: and commaunded the drouers that had the charge of them, that when they ſaw any ſignall or token lift vp in the ayre in the night, they ſhould then ſtraight ſet fire on thoſe bundels and bunches, and driue vp the beaſts to the hils, toward the wayes where the enemies lay. Whileſt theſe things were a preparing, he on the other ſide ranged his army in order of battell, and when night came, cauſed them to march faire and ſoftly. Now theſe beaſts, whileſt the fire was but litle that burnt vpon their hornes, went but faire and ſoftly vp the hill from the foote of the mountaines from whence they were driuen: in ſo much as the heardmen that were on the top of the mountaines, wondered maruellouſly to ſee ſuch flames and fires about the hornes of ſo many beaſts, as if it had bene an army marching in order of battell with lights and torches. But when their hornes came to be burnt to the ſtumpes, and that the force of the fire did frie their very fleſh: then beganne the oxen to fight together, and to ſhake their heads, whereby they did ſet one another on fire. Then left they their ſoft pace, and went no more in order as they did before, but for the extreme paine they felt, began to runne here and there in the mountaines, carying fire ſtill about their hornes, and in their tailes, and ſet fire of all the boughes and coppeſies they paſſed by. This was a ſtrange ſight to looke vpon, and did much amaze the Romaines that kept the paſſages of the mountaines, for they thought they had bene men that ranne here and there with torches in their hands. Whereupon they were in a maruellous feare and trouble, ſuppoſing they had bene their enemies that ranne thus towards them, to enuiron them on all ſides: ſo as they durſt no more keepe the paſſages which they were commaunded, but forſaking their ſtraights, began to flye towards their maine and great campe. Thereupon Hannibals light horſemen immediatly poſſeſſed the ſtraights that were kept: by reaſon whereof, all the reſt of his army marched out at their eaſe and leyſure, without feare or daunger, notwithſtanding that they were loden and troubled with maruellous great ſpoiles, and of all kind of ſorts. Fabius then perceiued very well the ſame night, that it was but a ſlight of Hannibal: for ſome of the oxen that fled here and there fell vpon his army. Whereupon fearing to fall vpon ſome ambuſh by reaſon of the darke night, he kept his men in battell raye, without ſtirring, or making any noyſe. The next morning by breake of day, he began to follow his enemie by the tracke, and fell vpon the taile of the rereward, with whom he skirmiſhed within the ſtraights of the mountaines: and ſo did diſtreſſe ſomewhat Hannibals army. Hannibal thereupon ſent out of his vauntgard a certaine number of Spaniards (very luſtie and nimble fellowes, that were vſed to the mountaines, and acquainted with climing vp vpon them) who comming downe, and ſetting vpon the Romaines that were heauie armed, ſlue a great number of them, and made Fabius to retire. Thereupon they deſpiſed Fabius the more, and thought worſe of him then they did before: becauſe his pretence and determination was not to be brought to fight with Hannibal, but by wiſedome and pollicy to ouerthrow him, whereas he himſelfe by Hannibal was firſt finely handled and deceiued. Hannibal then to bring Fabius further in diſliking and ſuſpition with the Romaines, commaunded his ſouldiers when they came neare any of Fabius lands, that they ſhould burne and deſtroy all round about them, but gaue them in charge in no wiſe to medle with Fabius lands, nor any thing of his, & did purpoſely appoint a garriſon to ſee that nothing of Fabius ſhould miſcarie, nor yet take hurt. This was ſtraight caried to Rome, which did thereby the more incenſe the people againſt him. And to helpe it forward, the Tribunes neuer ceaſed crying out vpon him in their orations to the people, and all by Metellus ſpeciall procurement and perſwaſion: who of himſelfe had no cauſe to miſlike with Fabius, but only becauſe he was Minutius kinſman (generall of the horſemen) and thought that the ill opinion they bare to Fabius, would turne to the praiſe and aduancement of Minutius. The Senate alſo were much offended with Fabius, for the compoſition he made with Hannibal, touching the prisoners taken of either side. For it was articled betweene them, that they should change prisoners, deliuering man for man, or else two hundreth and fiftie siluer drachmas for a man, if the one chaunced to haue moe prisoners then the other. When exchange was made betweene them, it appeared that Hannibal had left in his hands of ROMAINE prisoners, two hundred and fortie moe then Fabius had to exchange of his. The Senate commanded there should be no money sent to redeeme them, and greatly found fault with Fabius for making this accord: becausе it was neither honourable, nor profitable for the common-weale, to redeeme men that cowardly suffered themselues to be taken prisoners of their enemies. Fabius vnderstanding it, did patiently beare this displeasure conceiued against him by the Senate. Howbeit hauing no mony, and meaning to keepe his word, & not to leaue the poore citizens prisoners behind him: he sent his son to ROME, with commission to sell his lands, and to bring him money immediatly. The young man went his way to ROME, and sold his fathers farmes, and brought him money forthwith to the campe: Fabius therewith redeemed the prisoners, and sent their ransome vnto Hannibal. Many of the prisoners whom he had redeemed, offered to repay him their ransome: but he would neuer take any thing againe, and gaue them all their ransome freely. Afterwards being called to ROME by the priests to do certaine solemne sacrifices, he left the army in charge with Minutius, to gouerne the same in his absence, with condition not to set vpon the enemy, nor to fight with him at all: the which not onely by his authority he did expressely forbid him, but also as his very friend, he did warne and intreate him in no wise to attempt. Howbeit Minutius litle regarding his commandements or requests, so soone as Fabius backe was turned, began to be somewhat lustie, and doing with his enemies. So one day amongst the rest, Minutius perceiuing Hannibal had sent a great part of his army abroad to forrage and get victuals, came and set vpon them that remained behind, and draue them into their campe, with great slaughter, and did put them in a maruellous feare that were saued, as men that looked for no lesse, but to haue bene besieged in their campe. Afterwards also, when their whole army came together againe, he retired backe in spite of them all, and lost not a man. This exploit set Minutius in a pride, and brought the souldiers to be more rash then they were before. The newes of this ouerthrow went with speed to ROME, and there they made it a great deale more then it was. Fabius hearing of it, sayd: he was more afeard of Minutius prosperity, then of his owne aduersitie. But the common people reioyced maruellously, and made great shew of ioy vp and downe the market place. Whereupon Metellus one of the Tribunes going vp into the pulpit, made an oration vnto the people, in the which he highly magnified Minutius, and commended his courage: and contrarily charged Fabius no more of cowardlinesse, but with flat treason. Furthermore, he did accuse the Nobility and greatest men of ROME, saying: that from the first beginning they had layd a plot to draw these warres out at length, onely to destroy the peoples power and authority, hauing brought the whole common-weale to the state of a monarchie, and into the hands of a priuate person: who by his remissenesse and delayes, would giue Hannibal leysure to plant himselfe in ITALIE, and by time giue open passage to the CARTHAGINIANS, at their pleasure to send Hannibal a second ayde and armie, to make a full conquest of all ITALIE. Fabius hearing these words, rose vp straight, and spake to the people, and taried not about the aunswering of the accusations the Tribune had burthened him withall, but prayed them they would dispatch these sacrifices and ceremonies of the gods, that he might speedily returne againe to the campe, to punish Minutius, for breaking his commandement, in fighting with the enemie. He had no sooner spoken these words, but there arose a maruellous tumult and hurley burly presently among the people, for the daunger Minutius stood in then, becausе the Dictator had absolute power and authority to imprison and put to death whom he thought good, without ordinarie course of law or araignement. Moreouer, they did iudge, since Fabius had of late left his accustomed mildnesse and affabilitie, that he would grow to such seueritie in his anger, that it would be a hard thing to appease him. Wherefore euery man held their peace for feare, sauing only Metellus the Tribune: he hauing authority by vertue of his office, to say what he thought good, and who only of all other kept still his place and authority, when any Dictator was chosen. Then all the officers that were put downe, instantly besought the people not to forsake Minutius, nor to suffer the like to be done to him, as Manlius Torquatus did of late to his sonne, who stroke off his head, after he had valiantly fought with his enemies and ouercome them, for breaking his commandement. And began to perswade them further, further, to take this tyrannicall power of the Dictatorſhip from Fabius: and to put their affaires into the hands of him, that would and could tell how to bring them ſafely to paſſe. The people were tickled maruellouſly with theſe ſeditious words, but yet they durſt not force Fabius to reſigne his Dictatorſhip, though they bare him great grudge, and were angry with him in their harts. Howbeit they ordained that Minutius thenceforth ſhould haue equall power and authority with the Dictator in the warres; a thing that was neuer ſeene nor heard of before, and yet the very ſame done in that ſort againe, after the battell of CANNES. For Marcus Iunius being at that time Dictator in the campe, they did chuſe another Dictator at ROME, which was Fabius Buteo, to name and create new Senators in the place of thoſe that were ſlaine in the battell. But after he had named them, and reſtored the full number againe of the counſell of the Senate, he diſcharged the ſelfe ſame day the ſergeants that caried the axes before him, and ſent away the traine that waited vpon him, and did ſo put himſelfe in preaſe of the people in the market place, and followed his owne peculiar buſineſſe as a priuate perſon. Now the ROMAINES imagined, that when Fabius ſhould ſee how they had made Minutius equall in authority with him, it would grieue him to the heart for very anger: but they came ſhort to iudge of his nature, for he did not thinke that their folly ſhould hurt or diſhonour him at all. But as wiſe Diogenes anſwered one that ſayd vnto him, looke, they mocke thee: tuſh (ſayd he) they mocke not me. Meaning thereby, that he tooke them to be mocked, that were offended with their mockes. Thus Fabius tooke euery thing quietly, that the people offered him, and did comfort himſelfe with the Philoſophers rules and examples: who did maintaine, that an honeſt and wiſe man, can no way be iniured nor diſhonored. For all the diſpleaſure he receiued by the peoples folly, was in reſpect of the commonwealth: becauſe they had put a ſword into a mad mans hand, in giuing Minutius authority to follow his raſh humor, and fond ambition in the wars. Wherefore, fearing leaſt he being blinded with vaine glory, and preſumptuous opinion of himſelfe, ſhould raſhly (and vpon a head) haſten to do ſome great hurt before he came to the campe, he departed ſuddenly out of ROME without any mans knowledge, to returne againe to the campe, where he found Minutius ſo proud and ſtout, that he was not to be dealt with. For he would needs haue the authority to commaund the whole army when it came to his turne. But Fabius would not conſent to that, but deuided the one halfe of the army betweene them: thinking it better he ſhould alone command the one halfe, then the whole army by turnes. So he choſe for himſelfe, the firſt and third legion: and gaue vnto him, the ſecond and fourth, and deuided alſo betweene them the aide of their friends. And when Minutius made his boaſt, that the maieſty of the higheſt magiſtrate was brought lower for his ſake: Fabius told him that he might thinke, if he were wiſe, he had not to fight with him, but with Hanniball: and if he would needes contend againſt his companion, yet he ſhould haue a ſpeciall regard and conſideration, that hauing wonne now the citizens good wils, by whom he was ſo much honored, he ſhould haue no leſſe care of their health and ſafety, then he had, who was now troden vnder foote, and ill intreated by them. Minutius tooke his leſſon for a counterfeit mocke, after old mens maners and faſhion: & ſo taking the one halfe of the army vnto him, went and lodged alone by himſelfe. Hanniball hearing of their iarre and ſquaring together, ſought ſtraight oportunity to make their diſcord finely to ſerue his turne. Now there was a hil betweene both their campes not very hard to be won, and it was an excellent place to lodge a campe ſafely in, and was very fit and commodious for all things. The fields that were about it, did ſeeme a far off to be very plaine and euen ground, becauſe they had no couert of wood to ſhadow them, yet were there many ditches and litle vallies in them: wherefore Hanniball though he might eaſily haue taken it at his pleaſure if he had liſted, did let it alone in the middeſt betweene them, for a baite to draw out his enemies to battell. Now when Hanniball ſaw Fabius and Minutius lodged aſunder, he placed certaine bands in the night among thoſe ditches and vallies. Afterwards the next morning by breake of day, he ſent a ſmall number of men openly to win this hill: hoping by this pollicy to traine Minutius out to the field, as it fell out indeed. For firſt Minutius ſent thither his light horſemen, and afterwards all his men at armes: and laſtly perceiuing that Hanniball himſelfe came to releeue his men that were vpon the hill, he himſelfe marched forward alſo with all the reſt of his army in order of battell, and gaue a hote charge vpon them that defended the hill, to driue them thence. The fight continued equall a good ſpace betweene them both, vntill ſuch time as Hanniball ſaw his enemie come directly within his daunger, and ſhewed the rereward of his battell naked vnto his men, whom before he had layd in ambuſh: he ſtraight raiſed the ſignall he had giuen them. They vpon that diſcouered all together, and with great cries did ſet vpon the rereward of the Romaines, & ſlue a great number of them at the firſt charge: and did put the reſt in ſuch a feare and diſorder, as it is vnpoſſible to expreſſe it. Then was Minutius raſh brauery and fond boaſts much cooled, when he looked firſt vpon one captaine, then vpon another, and ſaw in none of them any courage to tary by it, but rather that they were all ready to run away. Which if they had done, they had bene caſt away euery man: for the Nvmidians finding they were the ſtronger, did diſperſe themſelues all about the plaine, killing all ſtraglers that fled. Minutius ſouldiers being brought to this danger and diſtreſſe, which Fabius foreſaw they would fall into, and hauing vpon this occaſion his army ready ranged in order of battell, to ſee what would become of Minutius, not by report of meſſengers, but with his owne eyes: he got him to a litle hill before his campe, where when he ſaw Minutius & all his men compaſſed about on euery ſide, and euen ſtaggering and ready to flie, & heard beſide their cries not like men that had harts to fight, but as men ſcared, & ready to flie for feare to ſaue themſelues: he clapped his hand on his thigh, and fetched a great ſigh, ſaying to thoſe that were about him: O gods, how Minutius is gone to caſt himſelfe away, ſooner then I looked for, and later then he deſired? But in ſpeaking theſe words, he made his enſignes march on in haſte, crying out aloud: O my friends, we muſt diſpatch with ſpeed to ſuccour Minutius: for he is a valiant man of perſon, and one that loueth the honor of his country. And though with ouermuch hardineſſe he hath ventred too farre, and made a fault, thinking to haue put the enemies to flight: time ſerueth not now to accuſe him, we will tell him of it hereafter. So he preſently brake the Nvmides, and diſperſed them, that lay waiting in the fields for the Romaines, which they thought would haue fled. Afterwards he went further, & did ſet vpon them that had giuen charge vpon the rereward of Minutius battel, where he ſlue them that made head againſt him. The reſidue, fearing leaſt they ſhould fall into the danger they had brought the Romaines vnto: before they were enuironed in of all ſides, did turne taile ſtraight to Fabius. Now Hanniball ſeeing this change, and conſidering how Fabius in perſon, with more courage then his age required, did make a lane in the middeſt of thoſe that fought againſt the ſide of the hill, to come to the place where Minutius was: he made the battell to ceaſe, and commanded to ſound the retreate, & ſo drew backe his men againe into his campe, the Romaines being very glad alſo they might retire with ſafety. They ſay Hanniball in his retiring, ſaid merrily to his friends: haue not I told you (Sirs) many a time and oft, of the hanging cloud we ſaw on the top of the mountaines, how it wold breake out in the end with a tempeſt that would fall vpon vs? After this battell, Fabius hauing ſtript thoſe that were left dead in the field, retired againe to his owne campe, and ſpake not an ill word of Minutius his companion. Minutius then being come to his campe, aſſembled his ſouldiers, and ſpake thus to them: My friends, not to erre at all, enterpriſing great matters, it is a thing paſſing mans nature: but to take warning hereafter, by faults that are paſt and done, it is the part of a wiſe and valiant man. For my ſelfe, I acknowledge I haue no leſſe occaſion to praiſe fortune, then I haue alſo cauſe to complaine of her. For that which long time could neuer teach me, I haue learned by experience in one litle peece of a day: and that is this. That I am not able to command, but am my ſelfe fitter to be gouerned and commanded by another: and that I am but a foole to ſtand in mine owne conceipt, thinking to ouercome thoſe, of whom it is more honour for me to confeſſe my ſelfe to be ouercome. Therefore I tell you, that the Dictator Fabius henceforth ſhall be he, who alone ſhall command you in all things. And to let him know that we do all acknowledge the fauour which we haue preſently receiued at his hands, I will leade you to giue him thanks, and will my ſelfe be the firſt man to offer to obey him in all that he ſhall command me. Theſe words being ſpoken, he commanded his enſigne-bearers to follow him, & he himſelfe marched formoſt towards Fabius campe. When he came thither, he went directly to the Dictators tent: whereat euery man wondered, not knowing his intent. Fabius came out to meete him. Minutius after he had ſet downe his enſignes at his feete, ſaid with a loud voice; ô father: and his ſouldiers vnto Fabius ſouldiers; ô maiſters, which name the bondmen that are infranchiſed, do vſe to them that haue manumiſſed them. Afterwards euery man being ſilent, Minutius began aloud to ſay vnto him: My lord Dictator, this day you haue won two victories. The one of Hanniball, whom valiantly you haue ouercome: the ſecond, of my ſelfe your companion, whom alſo your wiſedome and goodneſſe hath vanquiſhed. By the one, you haue ſaued our liues: and by the other, you haue wiſely taught vs. So haue we alſo bene ouercome in two ſorts: the one by Hanniball to our ſhame, and the other by you;

your ſelfe, to our honor and preſeruation. And therefore do I now call you my father, finding no other name more honorable to call you by, wherewith I might honor you: acknowledging my ſelfe more bound vnto you for the preſent grace and fauour I haue receiued of you, then vnto my naturall father that begot me. For by him only I was begotten: but by you, mine, and all theſe honeſt citizens liues haue bene ſaued. And hauing ſpoken theſe words, he embraced Fabius: and ſo did the ſouldiers alſo, hartily embrace together, and kiſſe one another. Thus the ioy was great through the whole campe, and one were ſo glad of another, that the teares trickled downe their cheekes for ioy. Now when Fabius was afterwards put out of his office of Dictatorſhip, there were new Conſuls choſen againe: the two firſt followed directly Fabius former order he had begun: for they kept themſelues from giuing Hannibal any battell, and did alwayes ſend ayd to their ſubiects & friends, to keepe them from rebellion: vntill that Terentius Varro (a man of meane birth, and knowne to be very bold and raſh) by flattering of the people, wan credit among them to be made Conſull. Then they thought that he by his raſhneſſe and lacke of experience, would incontinenty hazard battell: becauſe he had cried out in all the aſſemblies before, that this war would be euerlaſting, ſo long as the people did chuſe any of the Fabians to be their generals, and vanted himſelfe openly, that the firſt day he came to ſee his enemies, he would ouerthrow them. In giuing out theſe braue words, he aſſembled ſuch a power, that the Romaines neuer ſaw ſo great a number together, againſt any enemy that euer they had: for he put into one campe, 88000. fighting men. This made Fabius and the other Ronaines, men of great wiſedome and iudgement, greatly affraid: becauſe they ſaw no hope for Rome to riſe againe, if it fortuned that they ſhould looſe ſo great a number of goodly youth. Therefore Fabius talked with the other Conſull, called Paulus Æmilius, a man very skilfull and expert in wars, but ill beloued of the common people, whoſe furie he yet feared, for that they had condemned him a litle before to pay a great fine to the treaſury: and after he had ſomewhat comforted him, he began to perſwade and encourage him to reſiſt the fond raſhneſſe of his companion, telling him, that he ſhould haue aſmuch to do with Terentius Varro for the preſeruation and ſafety of his countrey, as to fight with Hannibal for defence of the ſame. For they were both Marſhall men, and had a like deſire to fight: the one becauſe he knew not wherein the vantage of his ſtrength conſiſted, and the other becauſe he knew very well his weakneſſe. You ſhall haue reaſon to beleeue me better, for matters touching Hannibal, then Terentius Varro: for I dare warrant you, if you keepe Hannibal from battel but this yeare, he ſhall of neceſſity, if he tarry, cõſume himſelfe, or elſe for ſhame be driuen to flie with his army. And the rather, becauſe hitherto (though he ſeeme to be lord of the field) neuer one yet of his enemies came to take his part: and moreouer becauſe there remaines at this day in his campe not the third part of his army, he brought with him out of his countrey. Vnto theſe perſwaſions, the Conſull (as it is reported) anſwered thus: When I looke into my ſelfe, my lord Fabius, me thinkes my beſt way were rather to fall vpon the enemies pikes, then once againe to light into the hands & voices of our citizens. Therefore, ſith the eſtate of the common-wealth ſo requireth it, that it behoueth a man to do as you haue ſayd, I will do my beſt indeuour to ſhew my ſelfe a wiſe captaine, for your ſake onely, rather then for all other that ſhould aduiſe me to the contrary. And ſo Paulus departed from Rome with this mind. But Terentius his cõpanion wold in any caſe, they ſhould command the whole army by turnes, each his day by himſelfe: & went to encampe hard by Hannibal, by the riuer of Aufide, neere vnto the village called Cannes. Now when it came to his day to cõmand by turnes, early in the morning he cauſed the ſignal of battell to be ſet out, which was a coate-armour of skarlet in graine, that they did lay out vpon the pauilliõ of the generall: ſo that the enemies at the firſt ſight, began to be affeard, to ſee the luſtines of this new come Generall, and the great number of ſouldiers he had alſo in his hoaſt, in compariſon of them that were not halfe ſo many. Yet Hannibal of a good courage, commanded euery man to arme, and to put themſelues in order of battell: and himſelfe in the meane time taking his horſe backe, followed with a few, gallopped vp to the top of a litle hill not very ſteepe, from whence he might plainely diſcerne all the Romaines campe, and ſaw how they did range their men in order of battell. Now one Giſcon (a man of like ſtate and nobility as himſelfe) being with him at that time, told him, that the enemies ſeemed a farre off to be a maruellous number. But Hannibal rubbing his forehead, anſwered him: Yea, ſayd he, but there is another thing more to be wõdred at then you thinke of Giſcon. Giſcon ſtraight asked him: What? mary ſaith he, this: that of all the great number of ſouldiers you ſee yonder, there is not a man of them called Giſcon as you are. This merry answer deliuered contrary to their expectation that were with him, looking for some great waighty matter, made them all laugh a good. So downe the hill they came laughing aloud, and told this prety iest to all they met as they rode, which straight from one to another ran ouer all the campe, in so much as Hannibal himselfe could not hold from laughing. The CARTHAGINIAN souldiers perceiuing this, began to be of a good courage, imagining that their generall would not be so merily disposed as to fall a laughing, being so neere daunger, if he had not perceiued himselfe a great deale to be the stronger, and that he had good cause also to make no reckoning of his enemies. Furthermore, he shewed two pollicies of a skilfull captaine in the battell. The first was, the situation of the place, where he put his men in order of battell, so as they had the wind on their backes: which raging like a burning lightning, raised a sharpe dust out of the open sandy vally, and passing ouer the CARTHAGINIANS squadron, blew full in the ROMAINES faces, with such a violence, that they were compelled to turne their faces, and to trouble their owne rankes. The second pollicy was, the forme and order of his battell. For he placed on either side of his wings, the best and valianteſt souldiers he had in all his army: and did fill vp the middest of his battell with the worst of his men, which he made like a point, and was farther out by a great deale, then the two wings of the front of his battell. So he commaunded those of the wings, that when the ROMAINES had broken his first front, and followed those that gaue backe, whereby the middest of his battell should leaue an hollow place, and the enemies should come in still increasing within the compasse of the two wings: that then they should set vpon them on both sides, and charge their flankes immediatly, and so inclose them in behind. And this was cause of greater slaughter. For when the middle battell began to giue backe, and to receiue the ROMAINES within it, who pursued the other very hotly, Hannibals battell changed her forme: and where at the beginning it was like a point, it became now in the middest like a creſſant or halfe Moone. Then the captaines of the chosen bands that lay out in both the wings, made their men to turne, some on the left hand, & some on the right, & charged the ROMAINES on the flankes, and behind, where they were all naked: so they killed all those that could not saue themselues by flying before they were enuironed. They say also, that there fell out another mischiefe by misfortune, vnto the horsemen of the ROMAINES, and by this occasion. The horse of Paulus Æmilius the Consull being hurt, did throw his maister on the ground: whereupon those that were next him, did light from their horse backes to helpe him. The residue of the horsemen that were a great way behind him, seeing them light, thought they had bene all commaunded to light: hereupon euery man forsooke their horse, and fought it out on foote. Hannibal when he saw that, said: yea mary, I had rather haue them so, then deliuered me bound hand and foote. But for these matters, the historiographers do delate more at large. Furthermore, of the two Consuls, Varro saued himselfe by his horse, with a few following him, within the city of VENVSA. Paulus being in the middest of the throng of all the army, his body full of arrowes that stucke fast in his wounds, and his heart sore loden with grieuous sorrow and anguish, to see the ouerthrow of his men: was set downe by a rocke, looking for some of his enemies, to come and rid him out of his paine. But few could know him, his head and face was on such a gore-bloud: insomuch as his friends & seruants also passed by him & knew him not. And there was but one yong gentleman of a noble house of the Patricians, called Cornelius Lentulus, that knew him, who did his best endeuor to saue him. For he lighted on foote presently, and brought him his horse, praying him to get vp vpon him, to proue if he could saue himselfe for the necessity of his countrey, which now more then euer had need of a good and wise captaine. But he refused the gentlemans offer & his intreatie, & compelled him to take his horse backe againe, though the teares ran downe his cheeks for pity: and raising himselfe vp to take him by the hand, he sayd vnto him: I pray you tell Fabius Maximus from me, & witnesse with me, that Paulus Æmilius euen to his last houre hath followed his counsell, and did neuer swarue from the promise he made him: but that first he was forced to it by Varro, and afterwards by Hannibal. When he had deliuered these words, he bad Lentulus farewell: and running againe into the fury of the slaughter, there he died among his slaine companies. It is thought there were slaine at this battell, 50000 ROMAINES, and 4000 taken prisoners: and other 10000 that were taken prisoners in two campes after the battell. When this noble victory was gotten, Hannibals friends gaue him counsell to follow his good fortune: and to enter ROME after the scattered number that fled thither: so as within few dayes following he might sup in their Capitoll. A man cannot easily gesse what was the cause that stayed him, that he

he went not, vnleſſe it was (as I thinke) ſome good fortune, or fauourable God toward the Romaines that withſtood him, and made him afeard and glad to retire. Whereupon they ſay, that one Barca a Carthaginian, in his anger ſayd to Hannibal: Sir, you haue the way to ouercome, but you cannot vſe victory. Notwithſtanding, this victory made a maruellous chaunge for him: for hereupon, all Italy in maner came in to ſubmit themſelues to him, where before he had no towne at commandement, nor any ſtorehouſe or port through all Italy: yea he did maruellous hardly, and with much ado victuall his army with that he could daily rob and ſpoile, hauing no certaine place to retire vnto, nor grounded hope to entertaine theſe wars, but kept the field with his army, remouing from place to place, as they had bin a great number of murtherers & theeues together. For the moſt part of the country, did yeeld immediatly vnto him: as the city of Capva, being the chiefeſt and greateſt city of all Italy but Rome, and did receiue Hannibal, and were at his deuotion. Thus we may plainely ſee, that as the poet Euripides ſaith: It is a great miſchiefe not onely to be driuen to make triall of friends, but proofe alſo of captaines wiſedome. For that which before they accounted cowardlineſſe and faint heart in Fabius, immediatly after the battell, they thought it more then mans reaſon, and rather an heauenly wiſedome and influence, that ſo long foreſaw the things to come, which the parties ſelues that afterwards felt them, gaue little credit vnto before. Vpon this occaſion, Rome repoſed incontinently all their hope and truſt in Fabius, and they repaired to him for counſell, as they would haue run vnto ſome temple or altar for ſanctuary. So as the firſt and chiefeſt cauſe of ſtaying the people together from diſperſing themſelues abroad, as they did when Rome was taken by the Gavles, was the only opinion & confidence they had in Fabius wiſdome. For where before he ſeemed to be a coward, and timerous, when there was no danger nor misfortune happened: then when euery man wept and cried out for ſorow, which could not helpe, and that all the world was ſo troubled that there was no order taken for any thing, he contrarily went alone vp and downe the city very modeſtly, with a bold conſtant countenance, ſpeaking curteouſly to euery one, and did appeaſe their womaniſh cries & lamentations, & did forbid the common aſſemblies and fond ceremonies, of lamenting the dead corſe at their burials. Then he perſwaded the Senate to aſſemble in counſell, and did comfort vp thoſe that were magiſtrates, and he alone was the only force and power of the city: for there was not a man that bare any office, but did caſt his eye vpon Fabius, to know what he ſhould do. He it was that cauſed the gates of the city ſtraight to be warded, and to keepe thoſe in for going their way, that would haue forſaken the city. He moreouer did appoint the time & place of mourning, and did command whoſoeuer was diſpoſed to mourne, that he ſhould do it priuatly in his owne houſe, and to continue only but 30 daies. Then he willed all mourning to be left off, and that the city might be cleane from ſuch vncleane things. So the feaſt of Ceres falling about that time, he thought it better to leaue off the ſacrifices and proceſſion they were wont to keepe on Ceres day: then by their ſmall number that were left, and ſorow of thoſe that remained, to let their enemies vnderſtand their exceeding great loſſe. For the gods delight to be ſerued with glad and reioyſing hearts, and with thoſe that are in proſperity. But all this notwithſtanding, whatſoeuer the prieſts wold haue done, either to pacifie the wrath of the gods, or to turne away the threatnings of theſe ſiniſter ſignes, it was forthwith done. For they did ſend to the oracle of Apollo, in the city of Delphes, one of Fabius kinſmen ſurnamed Pictor. And two of the Veſtall Nuns being defloured: the one was buried aliue according to the law and cuſtome, and the other made her ſelfe away. But herein the great courage and noble clemency of the Romaines, is maruellouſly to be noted and regarded. For the Conſull Terentius Varro returning backe to Rome, with the ſhame of his extreme misfortune & ouerthrow, that he durſt not looke vpon any man: the Senate notwithſtanding, and all the people following them, went to the gates of the city to meete him, & did honorably receiue him. Nay furthermore, thoſe that were the chiefe magiſtrates and Senators, among whom Fabius was one, when ſilence was made, they commended Varro much: becauſe he did not deſpaire of the preſeruation of the common-weale after ſo great a calamity, but did returne againe to the city, to helpe to reduce things to order, in vſing the authority of the law, & the ſeruice of the citizens, as not being altogether vnder foot, but ſtanding yet in reaſonable termes of good recouery. But when they vnderſtood that Hannibal after the battell was gone into other parts of Italy: then they began to be of good cheere againe, & ſent a new army and generals to the field, among which, the two chiefe generals were Fabius Maximus, & Claudius Marcellus, both which by contrary meanes in maner, wan alike glory and reputation. For Marcellus (as we haue declared in his life) was a man of ſpeedy execution, of a quicke hand, of a valiant nature, & a right martiall man, as Homer calleth them, that valiantly put themſelues in any danger: by reaſon whereof, hauing to deale with another captaine alike venturous and valiant as himſelfe, in all ſeruice and execution, he ſhewed the ſelfe boldneſſe and courage that Hannibal did'. But Fabius perſiſting ſtill vpon his firſt determination, did hope that though he did not fight with Hanniball, nor ſtirre him at all, yet continuall warres would conſume him and his army in the end, and bring them both to nought: as a common wreſtler that forceth his body aboue his naturall ſtrength, doth in the end become a lame and bruſed man. Hereupon Poſſidonius writeth, that the one was called the Romaines ſword, and the other their target. And that Fabius conſtancy and reſoluteneſſe in wars to fight with ſecurity, and to commit nothing to hazard and danger, being mingled with Marcellus heate and fury, was that only, which preſerued the Romaines empire. For Hanniball meeting alwaies in his way the one that was furious, as a ſtrong running ſtreame, found that his army was continually turmoyled & ouerharried, and the other that was ſlow as a litle prety riuer, he found that his army ran ſoftly vnder him without any noiſe, but yet continually by litle & litle it did ſtill conſume & diminiſh him, vntil he ſaw himſelfe at the laſt brought to that paſſe, that he was weary with fighting with Marcellus, and affraid of Fabius, becauſe he fought not. For during all the time of theſe wars, he had euer theſe two captaines almoſt againſt him, which were made either Prætors, Conſuls, or Proconſuls: for either of them both had bene fiue times before choſen Conſull.

Poſſidonius words of Fabius and Marcellus.

Yet as for Marcellus, Hanniball had layd an ambuſh for him in the fift & laſt yeare of his Conſulſhip, where he ſet vpon him on a ſudden, and ſlue him. But as for Fabius, he layd many baites for him, and did what he could by all the skill and reach he had, by ambuſhes, and other warlike pollicies to entrap him, but he could neuer draw him within his danger. Howbeit at one time he put him to a litle trouble, and was in good hope then to haue made him fall vpon his ambuſh he had layd for him: and by this pollicy. He had counterfeited letters written & ſent vnto him from the city of Metapont, to pray him to come to them, and they would deliuer their city into his hands: and withall, that ſuch as were priuy to the contents of the ſame, deſired no other thing but his repaire thither. Theſe letters pretily quickned Fabius: inſomuch as he was determined one night to haue taken part of his army, & to haue gone to them. But becauſe the ſignes of the birds did promiſe him no good ſucceſſe, he left off his purpoſe. Soone after he vnderſtood they were counterfeit letters, made by Hannibals fine deuiſe to haue drawne him out, & to haue entrapped him, for whom himſelfe lay in perſon in ambuſh neare the city, looking and waiting for his comming: but the gods who would haue him ſaued, were onely to be thanked for his happy ſcape.

Marcellus ſlaine by an ambuſh of Hannibals.

Hannibals ambuſh layd for Fabius.

Furthermore, concerning the reuolt of the cities that were ſubiect vnto him, & the riſing of their allies and friends againſt them: Fabius thought it farre better to intreat them curteouſly, making them aſhamed without occaſion to rebell againſt them, rather then openly to ſuſpect them, and to deale ſtraightly with thoſe that were ſo to be ſuſpected. Now for this matter, it is reported that Fabius had a ſouldier in his campe that was a Marsian borne by nation, a valiant man of his perſon, & alſo of as noble a houſe, as any that were of all the allies of the Romaines: who had practiſed with other his fellowes of the band he ſerued in, to go ſerue the enemy. Fabius hearing of this practiſe he went about, gaue him no ill countenance for it, but calling him to him, he ſaid: I muſt confeſſe there is no reckoning made of you, as your good ſeruice doth deſerue: wherefore for this time (ſaith he) I blame the pety captaines only, which in ſuch ſort do beſtow their goodwill and fauour at aduenture, and not by deſert. But henceforth it ſhall be your owne fault if you do not declare your mind vnto me, and betweene you and me make me priuy of your lacke and neceſſity. When he had ſpoken theſe words to him, he gaue him a very good horſe for ſeruice, and did reward him with other honorable gifts, as men of good ſeruice and deſert haue commonly beſtowed on him. And this did ſo incourage the ſouldier thencefoorth, that he became a very faithfull and ſeruiceable ſouldier to the Romaines. For Fabius thought it more fit, that hunters, riders of horſes, and ſuch like as take vpon them to tame brute beaſts, ſhould ſooner make them leaue their ſauage and churliſh nature by gentle vſage and manning of them: then by beating, and ſhackling of them. And ſo a gouernour of men, ſhould rather correct his ſouldier by patience, gentleneſſe, & clemency: then by rigour, violence, or ſeuerity. Otherwiſe he ſhould handle them more rudely, and ſharply, then husbandmen do figge-trees, oliue-trees, and wild pomegarnets: who by diligent pruning and good handling of them, do alter their hard and wild nature, and cauſe them in the end to bring forth good figs, oliues and pomgarnets. Another time certaine captaines captaines of his brought him word, that there was one of their ſouldiers which would euer go out of the campe, and leaue his enſigne. He asked them, what maner of man he was. They aunſwered him all together that he was a very good ſouldier, & that they could hardly find out ſuch another in all their bands as he: and therewithall they told him of ſome notable ſeruice they had ſeene him do in perſon. Whereupon Fabius made a diligent enquiry to know what the cauſe was that made him go ſo oft out of the campe: in the end, he found he was in loue with a yong woman, and that to go ſee her was the cauſe he did ſo oft leaue his enſigne, and did put his life in ſo great danger, for that ſhe was ſo farre off. When Fabius vnderſtood this, he ſent certaine ſouldiers (vnknowing to the ſouldier) to bring the woman away he loued, and willed them to hide her in his tent, and then called he the ſouldier to him, that was a LVCANIAN borne, and taking him aſide, ſayd vnto him thus: My friend, it hath bene told me, how thou haſt lyen many nights out of the campe, againſt the law of armes, and order of the ROMAINES, but therewithall I vnderſtand alſo that otherwiſe thou art an honeſt man, and therefore I pardon thy faults paſt, in conſideration of thy good ſeruice: but from henceforth I will giue thee in cuſtody to ſuch a one, as ſhall make me accompt of thee. The ſouldier was blanke when he heard theſe words. Fabius with that, cauſed the woman he was in loue with to be brought forth, and deliuered her into his hands, ſaying vnto him: This woman hereafter ſhall aunſwere me thy body to be forth comming in the campe amongſt vs: and from henceforth thy deeds ſhall witneſſe for the reſt, that thy loue vnto this woman, may be no cloke of thy departing out of the campe for any wicked practiſe or intent. Thus much we find written concerning this matter. Moreouer, Fabius after ſuch a ſort, recouered againe the city of TARENTVM, and brought it to the obedience of the ROMAINES, which they had loſt by treaſon. It fortuned there was a yong man in his campe, a TARENTINE borne, that had a ſiſter within TARENTVM, which was very faithfull to him, and loued him maruellous dearely: now there was a captaine, a BRVTIAN borne, that fell in loue with her, & was one of thoſe to whō Hannibal had committed the charge of the city of TARENTVM. This gaue the yong ſouldier the TARENTINE, very good hope, and way, to bring his enterpriſe to good effect: whereupon he reuealed his intent to Fabius, and with his priuity fled from his campe, and got into the city of TARENTVM, giuing it out in the city, that he would altogether dwell with his ſiſter. Now for a few daies at his firſt comming, the BRVTIAN captaine lay alone by himſelfe, at the requeſt of the maid his ſiſter, who thought her brother had not knowne of her loue: and ſhortly after the yong fellow tooke his ſiſter aſide, and ſaid vnto her: My good ſiſter, there was a great ſpeech in the ROMAINES campe, that thou wert kept by one of the chiefeſt captaines of the garriſon: I pray thee if it be ſo, let me know what he is: for ſo he be a good fellow, and an honeſt man (as they ſay he is) I care not: for warres that turneth all things topſi-turuey, regardeth not of what place or calling he is of, and ſtill maketh vertue of neceſſity, without reſpect of ſhame. And it is a ſpeciall good fortune, at ſuch time as neither right nor reaſon rules, to happen yet into the hands of a good and gracious Lord. His ſiſter hearing him ſpeake theſe words, ſent for the BRVTIAN captaine to bring him acquainted with her brother, who liked well of both their loues, and indeuored himſelfe to frame his ſiſters loue in better ſort towards him, then it was before: by reaſon whereof, the captaine alſo began to truſt him very much. So this yong TARENTINE ſaw it was very eaſie to win and turne the mind of this amorous and mercenary man, with hope of great gifts that were promiſed him, and Fabius ſhould performe. Thus do the moſt part of writers ſet downe this ſtory. Howbeit ſome writers ſay, that this woman who wan the BRVTIAN captaine, was not a TARENTINE, but a BRVTIAN borne, whom Fabius it is ſayd, kept afterwards for his concubine: and that ſhe vnderſtanding the captaine of the BRVTIANS (who lay in garriſon within the city of TARENTVM) was alſo a BRVTIAN borne, and of her owne natiue country, made Fabius priuy to her intent, & with his conſent, ſhe comming to the wals of the city, ſpake with this BRVTIAN captaine, whom ſhe handled in ſuch ſort, that ſhe wan him. But whileſt this geare was a brewing, Fabius, becauſe he would traine Hannibal out of thoſe quarters, wrote vnto the ſouldiers of RHEGIO, which belonged to the ROMAINES, that they ſhould enter the borders of the BRVTIANS, and lay ſiege to the city of CAVLONIA, and raſe it to the ground. Theſe RHEGIAN ſoldiers were about the number of 8000, and the moſt of them traytors, and runagates, from one campe to another: and the worſt ſort of them, and moſt defamed of life, were thoſe that Marcellus brought thither out of SICILE, ſo that in looſing them all, the loſſe were nothing to the common-weale, and the ſorrow much leſſe. So Fabius thought, that putting theſe fellowes out for a pray to Hannibal (as a ſtale to draw him from thoſe quarters) he ſhould plucke him by this meanes from TARENTVM: and ſo it came to paſſe. For Hannibal incontinently went thence with his army to intrap them: and in the meane time Fabius went to lay ſiege to TARENTVM, where he had not lien ſix daies before it, but the yong man (who together with his ſiſter had drawne the BRVTIAN captaine to this treaſon) ſtale out one night to Fabius, to enforme him of all, hauing taken very good markes of that ſide of the wall the BRVTIAN captaine had taken charge of, who had promiſed him to keepe it ſecret, and to ſuffer them to enter, that came to aſſault that ſide. Yet Fabius would not ground his hope altogether vpon the BRVTIANS executing this treaſon, but went himſelfe in perſon to view the place appointed, howbeit without attempting any thing for that time: and in the meane ſeaſon, he gaue a generall aſſault to all parts of the city (as well by ſea as by land) with great ſhouts & cries. Then the BRVTIAN captaine ſeeing all the citizens and garriſon run to that part, where they perceiued the noiſe to be greateſt: made a ſignall vnto Fabius, that now was the time. Who then cauſed ſcaling ladders to be brought a pace, wherupon himſelfe with his cõpany ſcaled the wals, and ſo wan the city. But it appeareth here, that ambition ouercame him: for firſt he commaunded they ſhould kill all the BRVTIANS, becauſe it ſhould not be knowne he had won the city by treaſon. But this bloudy pollicy failed him: for he miſſed not only of the glory he looked for, but moſt deſeruedly he had the reproch of cruelty and falſhood. At the taking of this city, a maruellous number of the TARENTINES were ſlaine, beſides there were ſold 30000 of the chiefeſt of them, and all the city was ſacked: and of the ſpoile thereof was caried to the common ſtore treaſure at ROME, 3000 talents. It is reported alſo, that when they did ſpoile and carie away all other ſpoiles left behind, the recordor of the city asked Fabius, what his pleaſure was to do with the gods, meaning the tables, and their images: and to that Fabius anſwered him: Let vs leaue the TARENTINES their gods that be angrie with them. This notwithſtanding, he caried from thence Hercules ſtatue, that was of a monſtrous bigneſſe, and cauſed it to be ſet vp in the Capitoll, and withall did ſet vp his owne image in braſſe on horſe backe by him. But in that act he ſhewed himſelfe farre harder hearted then Marcellus had done, or to ſay more truly, thereby he made the world know how much Marcellus curteſie, clemency, and bounty was to be wondred at: as we haue written in his life. Newes being brought to Hannibal, that TARENTVM was beſieged, he marched preſently with all ſpeed poſſible to raiſe the ſiege: and they ſay he had almoſt come in time, for he was within forty furlongs of the city when he vnderſtood the troth of the taking of it. Then ſayd he out aloud, Sure the ROMAINES haue their Hannibal to: for as we wan TARENTVM, ſo haue we loſt it. But after that, to his friends he ſayd priuatly (and that was the firſt time they euer heard him ſpeake it) that he ſaw long before, and now appeared plainly, that they could not poſſibly with this ſmall power keepe ITALY. Fabius made his triumph and entry into ROME the ſecond time, by reaſon of taking this city: & his ſecond triumph was much more honorable then the firſt, as of a valiant captaine that held out ſtill with Hannibal, and eaſily met with all his fine pollicies, much like the ſlight trickes of a cunning wreſtler, which caried not now the former roughneſſe and ſtrength any more, becauſe that his army was giuen to take their eaſe, and growne to delicaſie, partly through the great riches they had gotten, and partly alſo for that it was ſore waſted and diminiſhed, through the ſundry foughten battels and blowes they had bene at. Now there was one Marcus Liuius a ROMAINE, that was gouernour of TARENTVM at that time, when Hannibal tooke it, and neuertheleſſe kept the caſtell ſtill out of Hannibals hands, and ſo held it vntill the city came againe into the hands of the ROMAINES. This Liuius ſpited to ſee ſuch honour done to Fabius, ſo that one day in open Senate, being drowned with enuy and ambition, he burſt out and ſaid: that it was himſelfe, not Fabius, that was cauſe of taking of the city of TARENTVM again. Fabius ſmiling to heare him, anſwered him opẽly: Indeed thou ſaieſt true, for if thou hadſt not loſt it, I had neuer won it again. But the ROMAINES in all other reſpects did greatly honor Fabius, and ſpecially for that they choſe his ſon Conſull. He hauing already taken poſſeſſion of his office, as he was diſpatching certaine cauſes touching the wars, his father (whether it was for debility of his age, or to proue his ſon) tooke his horſe to come to him, and rode through the preaſe of the people that thronged about him, hauing buſineſſe with him. But his ſon ſeeing him comming a farre off, would not ſuffer it, but ſent an officer of his vnto him, to cõmand him to light off his horſe, and to come on foote if he had any thing to do with the Conſull. This commandement miſliked the people that heard it, and they all looked vpon Fabius, but ſayd not a word: thinking with themſelues, that the Conſull did great wrong to his fathers greatneſſe. So he

he lighted ſtraight, and went a good round pace to embrace his ſonne, and ſayd vnto him: You haue reaſon ſonne, and do well to ſhew ouer whom you command, vnderſtanding the authority of a Conſull, which place you haue receiued. For it is the direct courſe, by the which we and our anceſters haue increaſed the ROMAINE empire: preferring euer the honor and ſtate of our countrey, aboue father, mother, or children. And truly they ſay, that Fabius great grandfather being the greateſt and moſt noble perſon of ROME in his time, hauing fiue times bene Conſull, & had obtained many triumphs, for diuerſe honorable and ſundry victories he had won: was contented after all theſe, to be his ſonnes lieutenant, and to go to the warres with him, he being choſen Conſull. And laſt of all, the Conſull his ſonne returning home to ROME a conqueror, in his triumphing chariot drawne with foure horſes, he followed him on horſebacke alſo, in troope with the reſt: thinking it honor to him, that hauing authority ouer his ſon in the right of a father, and being alſo the nobleſt man of all the citizens, ſo taken and reputed, neuertheleſſe he willingly ſubmitted himſelfe to the law and magiſtrate, who had authority of him. Yet beſides all this, he had far more excellent vertues to be had in admiration, then thoſe already ſpoken of. But it fortuned that this ſon of Fabius died before him, whoſe death he tooke patiently, like a wiſe man, and a good father. Now the cuſtome being at that time, that at the death of a noble man, their neereſt kinſman ſhould make a funerall oration in their praiſe at their obſequies: he himſelfe made the ſame oration in honor of his ſon, & did openly ſpeake it in the market place, and moreouer wrote it, and deliuered it out abroad. About this time, Cornelius Scipio was ſent into SPAINE, who draue out the CARTHAGINIANS from thence, after he had ouerthrowne them in many battels, and had conquered many great cities, and greatly aduanced the honor and eſtimation of the ſtate of ROME: for the which at his returne, he was aſmuch, or rather more honored, beloued and eſteemed, then any other that was in the city of ROME. Hereupon Scipio being made Conſull, conſidered that the people of ROME looked for ſome great matter at his hands, aboue all other. Therefore he thought, to take vpon him to fight againſt Hannibal in ITALY, he ſhould but folow the old maner, and tread too much in the ſteps of the old man: whereupon he reſolued immediatly to make warres in AFRICKE, and to burne and deſtroy the country euen vnto CARTHAGE gates, and ſo to transferre the wars out of ITALY into LIBYA, procuring by all poſſible deuiſe he could, to put it into the peoples heads, & to make thē like of it. But Fabius contrarily, perſwading himſelfe that the enterpriſe this yong raſh youth tooke in hand, was vtterly to ouerthrow the cōmon-weale, or to put the ſtate of ROME in great daunger: deuiſed to put ROME in the greateſt feare he could poſſible, without ſparing ſpeech or deed he thought might ſerue for his purpoſe, to make the people change from that mind. Now he could ſo cunningly worke his purpoſe, what with ſpeaking and doing, that he had drawne all the Senate to his opinion. But the people iudged, it was the ſecret enuie he bare to Scipioes glory, that drew him to encounter this deuiſe, only to blemiſh Scipioes noble fortune, fearing, leaſt if he ſhold happen to do ſome honorable ſeruice (as to make an end altogether of this warre, or otherwiſe to draw Hanniball out of ITALY) that then it would appeare to the world, he had bene too ſoft, or too negligent, to draw this war out to ſuch a length. For my part, me thinkes the only matter that moued Fabius from the beginning to be againſt Scipio, was the great care he had of the ſafety of the common-weale, by reaſon of the great danger depending vpon ſuch a reſolution. And yet I do thinke alſo, that afterwards he went further then he ſhould, contending too ſore againſt him (whether it was through ambition or obſtinacie) ſeeking to hinder and ſuppreſſe the greatneſſe of Scipio: conſidering alſo he did his beſt to perſwade Craſſus, Scipioes companion in the Conſulſhip, that he ſhould not graunt vnto him the leading of the army, but if he thought good to go into AFRICKE, to make wars vpon the CARTHAGINIANS, that he ſhould rather go himſelfe. And moreouer, he was the let that they gaue him no mony for maintenance of theſe wars. Scipio hereupon being turned ouer to his owne credit, to furniſh himſelfe as he could, he leauied great ſums of mony in the cities of THVSCAN, who for the great loue they bare him, made contribution towards his iourny. And Craſſus remained at home, both becauſe he was a ſoft and no ambitious nor contentious man of nature: as alſo, becauſe he was the chiefeſt prelate and high biſhop, who by the law of their religion, was conſtrained to keepe ROME. Fabius ſeeing his labour loſt that way, tooke againe another courſe to croſſe Scipio, deuiſing to ſtay the yong men at home, that had great deſire to go this iourney with him. For he cried out with open mouth, in all aſſemblies of the Senate and people, that Scipio was not contented only to flie Hanniball, but that he would carie with him beſides the whole force of ITALY that remained: alluring the youth with ſweete baites of vaine hope, and perſwading them to leaue their wiues, their fathers, mothers, and their countrey, euen now when their enemy knocked at ROME gates, who did euer conquer, and was yet neuer conquered. Theſe words of Fabius did ſo dampe the ROMAINES, that they appointed Scipio ſhould furniſh his iourney onely with the army that was in SICILIA, ſauing that he might ſupply to them if he would, 300 of the beſt ſoldiers that had ſerued him faithfully in SPAINE. And ſo it doth appeare euen to this preſent, that Fabius both did and ſaid all things, according to his wonted maner, and naturall diſpoſition. Now Scipio was no ſooner arriued in AFRICKE, but newes were brought to ROME incontinently, of wonderfull exploits, and noble ſeruice done beyond meaſure: and of great ſpoiles taken by him, which argued the troth of the newes. As, the king of the NVMIDIANS taken priſoner, two campes of the enemies burnt and deſtroyed at a time, with loſſe of a great number of people, armor, & horſes, that were conſumed in the ſame: letters & poſts for life running in the necke one of another from CARTHAGE to call Hanniball home, and to pray him to hunt no longer after vaine hope that would neuer haue end, haſting himſelfe with all ſpeed poſſible to come to the reſcue of his country. Theſe wonderfull great fortunes of Scipio, made him of ſuch renowne and fame within ROME, that there was no talke but of Scipio. Fabius notwithſtanding deſiſted not to make a new requeſt, being of opinion they ſhould ſend him a ſucceſſor, alledging no other cauſe nor reaſon, but a common ſpeech of euery body: that it was a dangerous thing to commit to the fortune of one man alone, ſo great exceeding proſperity and good ſucceſſe, becauſe it is a rare matter to ſee one man happie in all things. Theſe words did ſo much miſlike the people, that they thought him an enuious troubleſome man, or elſe they thought his age had made him fearefull: and that his courage failed with his ſtrength, feating Hanniball more doubtfully then he needed. For now though Hanniball was forced to leaue ITALIE, and to returne into AFRICKE, yet Fabius would not graunt, that the peoples ioy & ſecurity they thought they were in, was altogether cleare, and without feare and miſtruſt: but gaue it out that then they were in greateſt daunger, and that the common-weale was breeding more miſchiefe now then before. For when Hanniball (ſaid he) ſhall returne home into AFRICKE, and come before CARTHAGE wals, the ROMAINES ſhall be leſſe able to abide him there, then they haue bene before: & Scipio moreouer, ſhall meete with an army yet warme, and embrued with the bloud of ſo many Prætors, Dictators, and Conſuls of ROME, which they haue ouercome, and put to the ſword in ITALY. With theſe vncomfortable ſpeeches, he ſtill troubled and diſquieted the whole city, perſwading them that notwithſtanding the warre was transferred out of ITALY into AFRICKE, yet that the occaſion of feare was no leſſe neere vnto ROME, then it was euer before. But within ſhort ſpace after, Scipio hauing ouercome Hanniball in plaine battell in the field, and troden vnder foote the glory and pride of CARTHAGE, he brought a greater ioy to ROME, then they euer looked for: and by this noble victorie of his, he ſhored vp againe the declining ſtate of the empire of ROME, which a litle before was falling downeright. Howbeit Fabius liued not to the end of this warre, nor euer heard while he liued the ioyfull newes of Hannibals happy ouerthrow, neither were his yeares prolonged to ſee the happy aſſured proſperity of his country: for about that time that Hanniball departed out of ITALY, a ſickneſſe tooke him, whereof he died. The ſtories declare, that the THEBANES buried Epaminondas, at the common charges of the people: becauſe he died in ſo great pouerty, that when he was dead, they found nothing in the houſe but a litle iron ſpit. Now the ROMAINES buried not Fabius ſo, at the common charge of the city, but euery man of beneuolence gaue towards his funerall charges, a peece of coine that caried the leaſt value of their currant mony: not for that he lacked ability to bring him to the ground, but only to honor his memory: in making his obſequies at their charges, as of one that had bene their common father. So had his vertuous life, an honourable end and buriall.

THE COMPARISON OF
Pericles with Fabius.

HERE haue you heard what is written of theſe two great perſons. And for as much as they haue both left behind them, many noble examples of vertue, aſwell in martiall matters, as in ciuill gouernement, let vs begin to compare them together. Firſt of all, Pericles began to gouerne the commonweale, at what time the people of ATHENS were in their chiefeſt proſperity, & of greater power and wealth, then euer they had bene of before or ſince. The which might ſeeme to be a cauſe of the continuall maintenance of the ſame in ſecurity without daunger of falling, not ſo much for their worthineſſe, as for their common power and felicity: where contrariwiſe Fabius acts fell out in the moſt diſhonourable and vnfortunate time, that euer happened to his countrey, in the which he did not onely keepe the city in good ſtate from declining, but raiſed it vp, and deliuered it from calamity, and brought it to be better then he found it. Furthermore, Cimons great good fortune and ſucceſſe, the victories and triumphs of Myronides, and of Leocrates, and many notable valiant deeds of armes of Tolmides, gaue good cauſe to Pericles, to entertaine his city in feaſts, and playes, whileſt he did gouerne the ſame: and he did not find it, in ſuch ill caſe and diſtreſſe that he was driuen to defend it by force of armes, or to conquer that againe which before was loſt. But Fabius in contrary manner, when he ſaw before him many ouerthrowes, great flying away, much murder, great ſlaughters of the generals of the ROMAINE armies, the lakes, the plaines, the woods filled with ſcattered men, the people ouercome, the flouds and riuers running all a gore-bloud (by reaſon of the great ſlaughter) and the ſtreame carying downe the dead bodies to the maine ſea: did take in hand the gouernement of his country, and by a courſe farre contrary to all other, he did ſo vnderprop and ſhore vp the ſame, that he kept it from falling flat to the ground, amongſt thoſe ruines and ouerthrowes other had brought it to before him. Yet a man may ſay alſo, that it is no matter of ſo great difficulty to rule a city already brought low by aduerſitie, & which compelled by neceſſity, is contented to be gouerned by a wiſe man: as it is to bridle and keepe vnder the inſolency of a people, puft vp with pride, and preſumption of long proſperity, as Pericles found it amongſt the ATHENIANS. The great multitude alſo of ſo many grieuous calamities, as lighted on the ROMAINES neckes at that time, did plainly ſhew Fabius to be a graue and a conſtant man, which would neuer giue way vnto the importunate cries of the common people, nor could euer be remoued from that he had at the firſt determined. The winning and recouering againe of TARENTVM, may well be compared to the taking of SAMOS, which Pericles wan by force: and the cities of CAMPANIA, vnto the Ile of EVBOEA: excepting the city of CAPVA, which the Conſuls Fuluius and Appius recouered againe. But it ſeemeth that Fabius neuer wan battel, ſaue that only for which he triumphed the firſt time: where Pericles ſet vp nine triumphs, of battels and victories he had won, aſwell by ſea as by land. And ſo alſo, they cannot alledge ſuch an act done by

by Pericles, as Fabius did, when he reſcued Minutius out of the hands of Hannibal, and ſaued a whole army of the ROMAINES: which doubtleſſe was a famous act, and proceeded of a noble mind, great wiſedome, and an honorable hart. But Pericles, againe did neuer commit ſo groſſe an error as Fbains did when he was outreached, and deceiued by Hannibals fine ſtratageme of his oxen: who hauing found his enemy by chance to haue ſhut himſelfe vp in the ſtraight of a vally, did ſuffer him to eſcape in the night by a ſubtilty, & in the day by plaine force: for he was preuẽted by ouermuch delay, and fought withall by him he kept incloſed. Now if it be requiſite, a good captaine do not only vſe well that he hath in his hands, but that he wiſely iudge alſo what will follow after, then the warres of the ATHENIANS fell out in ſuch ſort, as Pericles ſayd they wold come to paſſe: for with ambitiõ to imbrace too much, they ouerthrow their eſtate. But the ROMAINES contrariwiſe, hauing ſent Scipio into AFRICKE to make wars with the CARTHAGINIANS, wan all that they tooke in hand: where their generall did not ouercome the enemy by fortune, but by valiantneſſe. So that the wiſdom of the one is witneſſed, by the ruine of his country: and the error of the other teſtified, by the happy euent of that he would haue let. Now the fault is alike in a generall, to fall into danger, for lacke of forecaſt: as for cowardlineſſe to let ſlip a fit oportunity offered, to do any notable peece of ſeruice. For like default & lacke of experience, maketh the one too hardy, and the other too fearfull. And thus much touching the wars. Now for ciuill gouernment: it was a foule blot to Pericles, to be the author of wars. For it is thought, that he alone was the cauſe of the ſame, for that he wold not haue them yeeld to the LACEDÆMONIANS in any reſpect. And yet me thinkes Fabius Maximus alſo would no more giue place vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, but ſtood firme and bold in all danger, to maintaine the empire of his country againſt them. But the goodneſſe & clemency Fabius ſhewed vnto Minutius, doth much condemne Pericles accuſations and practiſes, againſt Cimon and Thucydides: both of them being noble and good men, and taking part with the Nobility, whom he expulſed out of ATHENS, and baniſhed for a time. So was Pericles power and authority in the commonweale greater: by reaſon whereof he did euer foreſee, that no generall in all his time did raſhly attempt any thing hurtfull vnto the commonweale, except Tolmides only: who fled from him, and in deſpite of him went to fight with the BOEOTIANS where he was ſlaine. As for all other generals, they wholly put themſelues into his hands, and did obey him for the greatneſſe of his authority. But Fabius, although for his part he neuer committed any fault, and that he went orderly to worke in all gouernment: yet becauſe he was not of power to keepe other from doing ill, it ſeemeth in this reſpect he was defectiue. For if Fabius had caried like authority in ROME, as Pericles did in ATHENS: the ROMAINES had not fallen into ſo great miſery as they did. And for liberality: the one ſhewed it, in refuſing the mony offered him: and the other, in giuing vnto thoſe that needed, and redeeming his poore captiue countrey men. And yet Fabius might diſpend no great reuenue, for his whole receipts came only to ſixe talents. But for Pericles, it is hard to ſay how rich he was, who had comming in to him, great preſents by his authority, as well of the ſubiects, as of the friends and allies of the ATHENIANS, as alſo of Kings and ſtrange Princes: yet he neuer tooke bribe for all that, of any perſon liuing. And to conclude, as for the ſumptuous building of temples, the ſtately workes and common buildings: put all the ornaments together that euer were in ROME, before the times of the Cæſars, they are not to be compared with thoſe, wherewith Pericles did beautifie and adorne the city of ATHENS. For neither in quality nor quantity was there any proportion or like compariſon, betweene the exceeding ſumptuouſneſſe of the one, and of the other.

THE LIFE OF Alcibiades.

ALCIBIADES by his fathers ſide, was anciently deſcended of Euryſaces, that was the ſonne of Aiax, and by his mothers ſide of Alcmæon: for his mother Dinomacha, was the daughter of Megacles. His father Clinias hauing armed, & ſet forth a galley at his owne proper coſts & charges, did win great honour in the battell by ſea, that was fought alongſt the coaſt of ARTEMISIVM, and he was ſlaine afterwards in another battell fought at CORONEA, againſt the BOEOTIANS. His ſonne Alcibiades tutors, were Pericles, and Ariphron Xantippus ſonnes: who were alſo his neere kinſmen. They ſay, and truly, that Socrates good will and friendſhip did greatly further Alcibiades honor. For it appeareth not, neither was it euer written, what were the names of the mothers of Nicias, of Demoſthenes, of Lamachus, of Phormion, of Thraſibulus, and of Theramenes: all which were notable famous men in their time. And to the contrary, we find the nource of Alcibiades, that ſhe was a LACEDÆMONIAN borne, and was called Amicla, and that his ſchoolemaiſter was called Zophyrus: of the which, Antiſthenes mentioneth the one, and Plato the other. Now for Alcibiades beauty, it made no matter if we ſpake not of it, yet I will a litle touch it by the way: for he was wonderfull faire, being a child, a boy, and a man, and that at all times, which made him maruellous amiable, and beloued of euery man. For where Euripides ſaith, that of all the faire times of the yeare, the Autumne or latter ſeaſon is the faireſt: that commonly falleth not out true. And yet it proued true in Alcibiades, though in few other: for he was paſſing faire euen to his latter time, and of good temperature of body. They write of him alſo, that his tongue was ſomewhat fat, and it did not become him ill, but gaue a certaine naturall pleaſant grace in his talke: which Ariſtophanes mentioneth, mocking one Theorus that did counterfeit a liſping grace with his tongue:

This Alcibiades, with his fat liſping tongue, into mine eares, this truſty tale, and ſong full often ſung:
Looke vpon Theolus (quoth he) lo there he bowes, behold his comely crow-bright face with fat and flatling blowes.*
The ſonne of Clinias, would liſpe it thus ſomewhiles, and ſure he liſped neuer a lye, but rightly hit his wiles.

And Archippus another poet alſo, mocking the ſonne of Alcibiades, ſaith thus:

Alcibiades ſlocke.

Alcibiades tutors.

The mothers of famous men neuer knowne what they were.

Alcibiades beauty.

Alcibiades liſped by nature.

* The equiuocation of theſe 2. Greeke words Κορα and Κολα, is hard to be expreſſed in Engliſh, inſtead whereof I haue ſet flatling blowes, for flattering browes, obſerning the grace of liſping as neere as I could, like to the Latine and French trãſlations, likewiſe Theolus for Theorus.

Becauſe he would be like his father euery way, in his long trailing gowne he would go ietting day by day.
And counterfaite his ſpeech, his countenance and face:
as though dame nature had him giuen, therein a perfect grace.
To liſpe and looke aſide, and hold his head awry, euen as his father lookt and liſpt, ſo would he prate and pry.

For his manners they altered and changed very oft with time, which is not to be wondered at, ſeeing his maruellous great proſperity, as alſo aduerſitie that followed him afterwards. But of all the great deſires he had, and that by nature he was moſt inclined to, was ambition, ſeeking to haue the vpper hand in all things, and to be taken for the beſt perſon: as appeareth by certaine of his deeds, and notable ſayings in his youth, extant in writing. One day wreſtling with a companion of his, that handled him hardly, and thereby was likely to haue giuen him the fall: he got his fellowes arme in his mouth, and bit ſo hard, as he would haue eaten it off. The other feeling him bite ſo hard, let go his hold ſtraight, and ſaid vnto him: what Alcibiades, biteſt thou like a woman? No marie do I not (quoth he) but like a lyon. Another time being but a litle boy, he playd at skailes in the middeſt of the ſtreet with other of his companions, & when his turne came about to throw, there came a cart laden by chance that way: Alcibiades prayed the carter to ſtay awhile, vntill he had played out his game, becauſe the skailes were ſet right in the high way where the cart ſhould paſſe ouer. The carter was a ſtubborne knaue, and would not ſtay for any requeſt the boy could make, but draue his horſe on ſtill, in ſo much as other boyes gaue backe to let him go on: but Alcibiades fell flat to the ground before the cart, and bad the carter driue ouer and he durſt. The carter being affraid, plucked backe his horſe to ſtay them: the neighbours flighted to ſee the danger, ran to the boy in all haſte crying out. Afterwards when he was put to ſchoole to learne, he was very obedient to all his maſters that taught him any thing, ſauing that he diſdained to learne to play on the flute or recorder: ſaying, that it was no gentlemanly quality. For, ſaid he, to play on the violl with a ſticke, doth not alter mans fauour, nor diſgraceth any gentleman: but otherwiſe, to play on the flute, his countenance altereth and chaungeth ſo oft, that his familiar friends can ſcant know him. Moreouer, the harpe or violl doth not let him that playeth on them, from ſpeaking, or ſinging as he playeth: where he that playeth on the flute, holdeth his mouth ſo hard to it, that it taketh not only his words from him, but his voyce. Therefore, ſayd he, let the children of the THEBANS ploy on the flute, that cannot tell how to ſpeake: as for the ATHENIANS, we haue (as our forefathers tell vs) for protectors and patrones of our countrey, the goddeſſe Pallas, and the god Apollo: of the which the one in old time (as it is ſayd) brake the flute, and the other pulled his skinne ouer his eares, that played vpon a flute. Thus Alcibiades alledging theſe reaſons, partly in ſport, and partly in good earneſt, did not onely himſelfe leaue to learne to play on the flute, but he turned his companions minds alſo quite from it. For theſe words of Alcibiades, ran from boy to boy incontinently: that Alcibiades had reaſon to deſpiſe playing on the flute, and that he mocked all thoſe that learned to play on it. So afterwards, it fell out at ATHENS, that teaching to play on the flute, was put out of the number of honeſt and liberall exerciſes, and the flute it ſelfe was thought a vile inſtrument, and of no reputation. Furthermore, in the accuſations Antiphon wrote againſt Alcibiades, it is declared: that when he was a boy, he fled out of his tutors houſe, into the houſe of Democrates one of his louers, and how Ariphron one of his tutors thought to haue made a beadle cry him through the city: but Pericles wold not ſuffer him, ſaying: that if he were dead, they ſhould know it but one day ſooner by crying of him: and if he were aliue, that it would be ſuch a ſhame to him while he liued, that he had bin better he had neuer bene heard of againe. The ſame Antiphon accuſeth him further, that he had killed a ſeruant of his that attended on him, in the wreſtling place of Sibyrtius, with a blow of a ſtaffe. But there is no reaſon to credit his writing, who confeſſeth he ſpeaketh all the ill he can of him, for the ill will he did beare him. Now ſtraight there were many great and rich men that made much of of Alcibiades, and were glad to get his goodwill. But Socrates loue vnto him had another end and cauſe, which witneſſed that Alcibiades had a naturall inclination to vertue. Who perceiuing that vertue did appeare in him, and was ioyned with the other beauty of his face and body, and fearing the corruption of riches, dignity and authority, and the great number of his companions, as well of the chiefeſt of the city, as of ſtrangers, ſeeking to entiſe him by flattery, & by many other pleaſures: he tooke vpon him to protect him from them all, and not to ſuffer ſo goodly an ympe to looſe the the hope of the good fruit of his youth. For fortune doth neuer ſo intangle nor ſnare a man without, with that which they commonly call riches, as to let & hinder him ſo, that philoſophy ſhold not take hold on him with her free, ſeuere, & quicke reaſons. So Alcibiades was at the beginning, aſſaied with all delights, & ſhut vp as it were in their company that feaſted him with all pleaſures, only to turne him that he ſhould not hearken to Socrates words, who ſought to bring him vp at his charge, & to teach him. But Alcibiades notwithſtanding, hauing a good naturall wit, knew what Socrates was, and went to him, refuſing the company of all his rich friends and their flatteries, and fell in a kind of familiar friendſhip with Socrates. Whom when he had heard ſpeake, he noted his words very well, that they were no perſwaſions of a man ſeeking his diſhoneſty, but one that gaue him good counſell, and went about to reforme his faults and imperfections, and to plucke downe the pride and preſumption that was in him: then, as the common prouerbe ſaith,

Like to the crauen cocke, he drooped downe his wings, which cowardly doth runne away, or from the pit out flings.

And did thinke with himſelf, that all Socrates loue & following of yong men, was indeed a thing ſent from the gods, and ordeined aboue for them, whom they would haue preſerued, and put into the pathway of honor. Therefore he began to deſpiſe himſelfe, and greatly to reuerence Socrates, taking pleaſure of his good vſing of him, and much imbraced his vertue: ſo as he had (he wiſt not how) an image of loue grauen in his hart, or rather (as Plato ſaith) a mutuall loue, to wit, an holy and honeſt affection towards Socrates. Inſomuch as all the world wondred at Alcibiades, to ſee him commonly at Socrates boord, to play, to wreſtle, and to lodge in the wars with Socrates: and contrarily to chide his other welwillers, who could not ſo much as haue a good looke at his hands, and beſides became dangerous to ſome, as it is ſayd he was vnto Anytus, the ſon of Anthemion, being one of thoſe that loued him well. Anytus making good cheere to certaine ſtraungers his friends that were come to ſee him, went and prayed Alcibiades to come and make merie with them: but he refuſed to go. For he went to make mery with certaine of his companions at his owne houſe, and after he had well taken in his cups, he went to Anytus houſe to counterfeit the foole amongſt them, and ſtaying at the hall doore, and ſeeing Anytus table and cubberd full of plate of ſiluer and gold, he commanded his ſeruants to take away halfe of it, and cary it home to his houſe. But when he had thus taken his pleaſure, he would come no neerer into the houſe, but went his way home. Anytus friends and gueſts miſliking this ſtraunge part of Alcibiades, ſayd it was ſhamefully and boldly done ſo to abuſe Anytus. Nay, gently done of him, ſaid Anytus: for he hath left vs ſome, where he might haue taken all. All other alſo that made much of him, he ſerued after that ſort, ſauing a ſtranger that came to dwel in Athens: who being but a poore man as the voice went, ſold all that he had, whereof he made about a hundred ſtateres, which he brought vnto Alcibiades, and prayed him to take it at his hands. Alcibiades began to be mery, and being very glad to vnderſtand his goodwill towards him, tooke his honeſt offer, & prayed him to come to ſupper to him: ſo he welcomed him very hartily, and made him good cheere. When ſupper was done, he gaue him his mony againe, and commanded him not to faile the next morning to meete him where the farmes and lands of the city are wont to be let out to thoſe that bid moſt, & charged him he ſhould outbid all. The poore man would faine haue excuſed himſelfe, ſaying, the farmes were too great for him to hire: but Alcibiades threatned to whip him, if he would not do it. For beſides the deſire he had to pleaſure him, he bare a priuate grudge againſt the ordinary farmers of the city. The next morning the ſtrãger was ready in the market place, where they did cry out the letting of their farmes, and he raiſed one to a talent more then all other did offer. The other farmers were as mad with him as they could be, that they all did ſet vpon him, crying out: let him put in ſuretie ſtraight, ſuppoſing he could haue found none. The ſtranger was maruellous blanke thereat, and began to ſhrinke backe. Then cried Alcibiades out aloud to the officers that ſate there to take the beſt offers: I will be his ſurety, ſaith he, put me in the booke, for he is a friend of mine. The farmers hearing him ſay ſo, were at their wits end, and wiſt not what to do. For they being alwayes accuſtomed to pay their yearely rent as it went before, by the helpe of the reſt of the yeares that followed after: perceiuing now that they ſhould not be able to pay the arrerages of the rents due to the common-weale, and ſeeing no other remedie, they prayed him to take a peece of money, and to leaue the bargaine. Then Alcibiades would in no wiſe he ſhould take leſſe then a talent, which they gaue him willingly. So Alcibiades ſuffered the ſtranger then to depart, and made him gaine by his deuiſe. Now Socrates loue which he bare him, though it had many mighty and great aduerſaries, yet it did ſtay much Alcibiades, ſometime by gentle nature, ſometime by his graue counſell and aduiſe: ſo as the reaſon thereof tooke ſo deepe roote in him, and did ſo pierce his heart, that many times the teares ranne downe his cheekes. Another time alſo being caried away with the entiſement of flatterers, that held vp his humour with all pleaſure and delights, he ſtole away from Socrates, and made him run after him to fetch him againe, as if he had bene a ſlaue that had runne away from his maiſters houſe: for Alcibiades ſtood in awe of no man but of Socrates onely, and indeed he did reuerence him, and did deſpiſe all other. And therefore Cleanthes was wont to ſay, that Alcibiades was held of Socrates by the eares: but that he gaue his other louers hold, which Socrates neuer ſought for: for to ſay truly, Alcibiades was much giuen ouer to luſt and pleaſure. And peraduenture it was that Thucydides meant of him, when he wrote that he was incontinent of body, and diſſolute of life. Thoſe that marred Alcibiades quite, did ſtill pricke forward his ambition and deſire of honour, and did put him in the head to thruſt himſelf into great matters betimes, making him beleue that if he did but once begin to ſhew himſelfe to deale in matters of ſtate, he would not onely blemiſh and deface all other gouernours, but farre excell Pericles, in authority and power among the GRECIANS. For like as iron by fire is made ſoft, to be wrought in any forme, and by cold alſo is ſhut and hardened againe: euen ſo Alcibiades being puffed vp with vanity and opinion of himſelfe, as oft as Socrates tooke him in hand, was made faſt and firme againe by his good perſwaſions, in ſo much that when he ſaw his owne fault and folly, and how farre wide he had ſtrayed from vertue, he became ſuddenly very humble and lowly againe. Now on a time when he was growne to mans ſtate, he went into a grammer ſchoole, and asked the ſchoolemaiſter for one of Homers bookes. The ſchoolemaiſter anſwered him, he had none of them: Alcibiades vp with his fiſt and gaue him a good boxe on the eare, and went his way. Another grammarian told him on a time he had Homer which he had corrected. Alcibiades replied, why what meaneſt thou, to ſtand teaching litle children their abce, when thou art able to correct Homer, and to teach yong men, not boyes? Another time he came and knocked at Pericles gate, deſirous to ſpeake with him: aunſwer was made him, he was not at leyſure now, for that he was buſily occupied by himſelfe, thinking on his reckonings he had to make with the ATHENIANS. Why, ſayd he, going his way, it were better he were occupied, thinking how to make no accompt at all. Moreouer, being but a young boy, he was at the iourney of POTIDÆA, where he lay ſtill with Socrates, who would neuer let him be from him in all battels and skirmiſhes he was in: among which there was one, very hote and bloudy, where they both fought valiantly, and Alcibiades was hurt. But Socrates ſtepped before him, and did defend him ſo valiantly before them all, that he ſaued him and his weapon out of the enemies hands. So the honor of this fight out of doubt, in equity and reaſon, was due vnto Socrates: but yet the captaines would faine haue iudged it on Alcibiades ſide, becauſe he was of a noble houſe. But Socrates, becauſe he would increaſe his deſire of honour, and would pricke him forward to honeſt and commendable things, was the very firſt that witneſſed Alcibiades had deſerued it: and therefore prayed the captaines to iudge him the crowne and complet armor. Afterwards, in the battell of DELION, the ATHENIANS hauing receiued the ouerthrow, Socrates retired with a few other on foot. Alcibiades being on horſe backe, and ouertaking him, would not go from him, but kept him company, and defended him againſt a troupe of his enemies that followed him, and ſlue many of his company. But that was a prety while after, and before he gaue a boxe on the eare vnto Hipponicus, Callias father: who was one of the greateſt men of power in the city, being a noble man borne, & of great poſſeſſions, which was done vpon a brauery & certaine luſtineſſe, as hauing layd a wager with his companions he would do it, and for no malice or quarrell that he bare the man. This light part was ſtraight ouer all the city, and euery one that heard it, ſayd it was lewly done. But Alcibiades the next morning went to his houſe, and knocking at his gate was let in: ſo he ſtripping himſelfe before him, deliuered him his body to be whipped, and puniſhed at his pleaſure. Hipponicus pardoned him, and was friends with him, and gaue him his daughter Hipparete afterwards in mariage. Howbeit ſome ſay, it was not Hipponicus that gaue her to him, but Callias ſonne, with ten talents of gold with her. Afterwards at the birth of the firſt child he had by her, he asked ten talents more, ſaying: they were promiſed him vpon the contract, if his wife had children. But Callias fearing leaſt this was an occaſion ſought of him to lye in waite to kill him for his goods: declared openly to the people, that he made him his heire generall, if he died without heires ſpeciall of his body. This gentlewoman Hipparete being an honeſt honeſt true wife to Alcibiades, miſliking her husband did ſo much miſuſe her, as to entertaine cõmon light ſtrũpets, aſwell citizens as ſtrangers: ſhe went abroad one day to her brothers houſe, & told him of it. Alcibiades paſſed not for it, & made no further reckoning of the matter: but only bad his wife, if ſhe would, preſent her cauſe of diuorce before the Iudge. So ſhe went thither her ſelfe, to ſue the diuorce betweene thẽ, according to the law: but Alcibiades being there alſo, tooke her by the hand, & caried her through the market place home to his houſe, & no man durſt meddle betweene them, to take her from him. And ſo ſhe continued with him all the daies of her life, which was not long after: for ſhe died, when Alcibiades was in his iourny he made to EPHESVS. This force Alcibiades vſed, was not thought altogether vnlawfull, nor vnciuill, becauſe it ſeemeth that the law was grounded vpon this cauſe: that the wife which wold be diuorced from her huſband, ſhould go her ſelf openly before the Iudge to put vp her complaint, to the end, that by this meanes, the husband might come to ſpeake with his wife, and ſeeke to ſtay her if he could. Alcibiades had a maruellous faire great dog, that coſt him three ſcore and ten minas, and he cut off his taile that was his chiefe beauty. When his friends reproued him, and told him how euery man blamed him for it: he fell a laughing, and told them he had that he ſought. For, ſaith he, I would haue the ATHENIANS rather prate vpon that, then they ſhould ſay worſe of me. Moreouer, it is ſayd, the firſt time that Alcibiades ſpake openly in the common-weale, and began to deale in matters, was vpon a gift of mony he gaue vnto the people, and not of any pretence or former purpoſe he had to do it. One day as he came through the market place, hearing the people very loud, he asked what the matter was: they told him it was about mony certaine men had giuen to the people. Then Alcibiades went to them, and gaue them mony out of his owne purſe. The people were ſo glad at that, as they fell to ſhouting and clapping of their hands, in token of thankfulneſſe: and himſelfe was ſo glad for company, that he forgat a quaile he had vnder his gowne, which was ſo afeard of the noiſe, that ſhe tooke her flight away. The people ſeeing the quaile, made a greater noiſe then before, and many roſe out of their places to run after her: ſo that in the end, it was taken vp by a maſter of a ſhip called Antiochus, who brought him the quaile againe, & for that cauſe Alcibiades did loue him euer after. Now albeit the nobility of his houſe, his goods, his worthines, and the great number of his kinſmen and friends made his way open to take vpon him gouernement in the cõmonweale: yet the only way he deſired to win the fauor of the cõmon people by, was the grace of his eloquence. To proue he was eloquent, all the Comicall poets do teſtifie it: & beſides thẽ, Demoſthenes the prince of orators alſo doth ſay, in an oration he made againſt Medias, that Alcibiades aboue all other qualities he had, was moſt eloquent. And if we may beleeue Theophraſtus, the greateſt ſearcher of antiquities, and beſt hiſtoriographer aboue any other philoſopher: he hath written, that Alcibiades had as good a wit to deuiſe & conſider what he would ſay, as any man that was in his time. Howbeit ſometimes ſtudying what he ſhould ſay, as alſo to deliuer good words, not hauing them very readily at his toungs end, he many times tooke breath by the way, and pauſed in the middeſt of his tale, not ſpeaking a word, vntill he had called it to mind, that he would ſay. His charge was great, and much ſpoken of alſo, for keeping of running horſes at games: not only becauſe they were the beſt and ſwifteſt, but for the number of coaches he had beſides. For neuer priuate perſon, no nor any prince, that euer ſent ſeauen ſo well appointed coaches, in all furniture vnto the games Olympicall, as he did: nor that at one courſe hath borne away the firſt, the ſecond, and the fourth priſe, as Thucydides ſaith: or as Euripides reporteth, the third. For in that game, he excelled all men in honour and name that euer ſtriued for victory therein. For Euripides pronounced his praiſe, in a ſong he made of him, as followeth:

Hipparete ſueth to be diuorced from Alcibiades.

Alcibiades great dogge.

Alcibiades largeſſe.

Alcibiades comming into the common wealth.

Alcibiades maruellous eloquent.

Alcibiades wit and imperfection.

Alcibiades victory at the games Olympicall.

O ſonne of Clinias, I will reſound thy praiſe:
for thou art bold in martiall deeds, and ouercom'ſt alwayes.
Thy victories therewith, do farre exceed the reſt, that euer were in Greece ygot, therefore I compt them beſt.
For at th'Olympike games, thou haſt with chariots wonne
the firſt priſe, ſecond, third and all, which there in race were ronne.
With praiſe and litle paine, thy head hath twiſe bene crownd, with oliue boughes for victory, and twiſe by trumpets ſound,
The Heraulds haue proclaim'd thee victor by thy name:
aboue all thoſe which ranne with thee, in hope to get the game.

Howbeit the good affection diuers cities did beare him, cõtending which ſhold gratifie him beſt, did much increaſe his fame and honor. For the EPHESIANS did ſet vp a tent for him, very ſumptuouſly and richly furniſhed. Thoſe of the city of CHIO, furniſhed him with prouander for his horſe, & gaue him muttons beſides, & other beaſts to ſacrifice withall. They of LESBOS alſo ſent him in wine & other prouiſion of victuals, to helpe him to defray the great charges he was at in keeping open houſe, & feeding ſuch a number of mouths daily. Yet the ſpite they did beare him, or rather his breach of promiſe which he often made, with this magnificence & ſtate he ſhewed, gaue the people more cauſe to ſpeake of him then before. For they ſay there was one Diomedes at ATHENS, a friend of Alcibiades, and no ill man, who deſired once in his life to win a game at the playes Olympical. This mã being enformed that the ARGIVES had a coach excellẽtly furniſhed, belõging to the cõmonweale, and knowing that Alcibiades could do very much in the city of ARGOS, becauſe he had many friends in the ſame: he came to intreat Alcibiades to buy this coach for him. Alcibiades therupon bought it, but kept it to himſelf, not regarding Diomedes requeſt he had made. Diomedes ſeeing that, fell ſtarke mad for anger, and called the gods & men to witneſſes, that Alcibiades did him open wrong: and it ſeemeth, that there fell out ſute in law vpon the ſame. For Iſocrates wrote an oration, and drew a plea in defence of Alcibiades, being yet but a child, touching a couple of horſes: yet in this plea, his aduerſarie was called Tiſias, & not Diomedes. Furthermore, Alcibiades being yet but a yong man, when he came to practiſe and pleade publickly, he put all other orators to ſilence, but only two that were euer againſt him: the one was Phæax the ſonne of Eraſiſtratus, & the othér Nicias the ſon of Niceratus. Of theſe two, Nicias was a man growne, and had won the name and reputation of a good captaine. And Phæax began alſo to come forward as he did, being of a good and honorable houſe: but he lacked many things, and among other, eloquence ſpecially. For, he could more properly talke and diſcourſe among his friends priuatly, thẽ he had any good grace to open a matter openly before the people. For he had, as Eupolis ſaith:

Alcibiades a breaker of promiſe.

Alcibiades aduerſaries in the commonwealth when he came to pleade.

Phæax lacked eloquence.

Words enow, but no eloquence.

There is a certaine oration extant in writing againſt Alcibiades & Phæax: where among other accuſations is brought in, how Alcibiades was ordinarily ſerued in his houſe, with gold & ſiluer plate that belonged to the commonweale, and which were vſed to be borne for ſtate & magnificence, in ſolemne proceſſions before them, and how he vſed them as boldly, as if they had bin his owne. Now there was one Hyperbolus in ATHENS at that time, borne in the village of PERITHOIDE: of whom Thucydides maketh mention, as of a naughty wicked man, ſeruing as a fit ſubiect and matter to all the taunts and mockes of the Comicall poets of that time: but he was ſo impudent a perſon, and cared ſo litle what men ſayd of him, that he paſſed not though he were defamed, neither did any thing grieue him, whatſoeuer they reported of him: which ſome do call boldneſſe, and courage, being no better indeed then plaine impudency, extreme madneſſe, and deſperate folly. He would neuer pleaſe any man: and if the common people had any grudge to any noble man or magiſtrate, whom they would any way accuſe, Hyperbolus wicked toung was their inſtrumẽt to vtter their ſpite. Now the people (by Hyperbolus procurement) being aſſembled, were ready to proceed to the baniſhment of Oſtraciſmon by moſt voices. The maner & cuſtome of this kind of baniſhment was for a time to baniſh out of their city ſuch a one, as ſeemed to haue too great authority & credit in the city: and that was, rather to ſatisfie their enuy, then for to remedy their feare. And becauſe it was manifeſt it would fall out to one of them three to be baniſhed (to wit, Alcibiades, Nicias, or Phæax) Alcibiades found meanes to ioyne all their three factions in one, becomming friends one to another: & hauing conferred with Nicias about it, he made Hyperbolus ſelfe to be baniſhed, who was the chiefe inſtrument to prepare the way of their baniſhment. Howbeit other ſay, he ſpake not with Nicias about it, but with Phæax, & ioyning his part with Phæax, he cauſed Hyperbolus to be baniſhed, who feared nothing leſſe: for it was neuer ſeene before, that a man of meane countenance, and of ſmall authority, fell into the hap of this baniſhment: As Plato the comicall poet teſtifieth, ſpeaking of Hyperbolus:

The manner of the puniſhment of the Oſtraciſmon.

Hyperbolus baniſhed for ten yeares.

Although for his deſert, this paine to him is due,
or greater puniſhment prepar'd, the which might make him rue:
Yet ſince he was by birth, a perſon meane and baſe, ſuch puniſhment therefore did ſeeme (for him) too great of grace.
Since Oſtraciſmon was, not made at firſt to be, nor yet deuiſd as puniſhment, for ſuch meane folke as he.

But of this matter, we haue ſpoken more at large before: and now to returne againe to Alcibiades.

Nicias

Nicias had great reputation among ſtrangers, and his enemies grieued at it no leſſe, then at the honour the citizens ſelues did vnto him. For his houſe was the common Inne for all LACEDÆMONIANS when they came to ATHENS, and they euer lay with him: moreouer he had very well entertained the LACEDÆMON priſoners that were takē at the fort of PYLE. And afterwards whē peace was concluded betweene LACEDÆMON and ATHENS, and their priſoners redeliuered home againe by Nicias meanes only and procurement, they loued him more then euer they did before. This was blowne abroad through GRECE, that Pericles had kindled the wars amongſt them, and Nicias had quenched it: ſo ſome called this peace Nicium, as one would ſay, Nicias worke. But Alcibiades ſtomaking this, and enuying Nicias glory, determined to breake the peace whatſoeuer came of it. Wherefore to compaſſe this matter, knowing firſt of all that the ARGIVES had no liking of the LACEDÆMONIANS, but were their mortall enemies, and that they did but ſeeke matter to fall out with them: he ſecretly put them in hope of peace and league with the ATHENIANS. Moreouer he did perſwade them to it, both by letters and word of mouth, ſpeaking with the magiſtrates, and ſuch as had greateſt authority and credit amongſt the people: declaring vnto them, that they ſhold not feare the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yeeld to them at all, but to ſticke to the ATHENIANS, who would ſoone repent them of the peace they had made, and breake it with them. Afterwards whē the LACEDÆMONIANS had made league with the BOEOTIANS, and had redeliuered the city of PANACTVM tō the ATHENIANS, all defaced and ſpoyled, contrary to the league: Alcibiades perceiuing how the people were much offended thereat, made them more earneſt againſt them, and therewithall brought Nicias in diſgrace with the people, & charged him with many matters of great likelihood. As at that time when he was generall: that he would neuer take any of the LACEDÆMONIANS, when they were ſhut vp within the Ile of SPHACTERIA, and much leſſe diſtreſſe thē when he might: and moreouer that when other had taken them priſoners by force, that he had found the meanes to deliuer thē, and ſend them home againe, to gratifie the LACEDÆMONIANS. Furthermore, that being their friend, he did not his duty to diſſwade the people from making of league offenſiue and defenſiue with the BOEOTIANS and the CORINTHIANS: and againe alſo, if there were any people of GRECE that had a deſire to become friends and allies with the ATHENIANS, that he did the beſt he could to let them, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had no liking of the matter. Now as Nicias was thus in diſgrace with the people, for the cauſes aboueſayd: in the middeſt of this ſtir, ambaſſadours came by chance from LACEDÆMON to ATHENS, who at their comming gaue very good words, ſaying they had full power and commiſſion to compound all controuerſies, vnder reaſonable and equall conditions. The Senate heard them, and receiued them curteouſly, & the people the next day ſhould aſſemble in counſell to giue them audience: which Alcibiades fearing much, he went to labor the ambaſſadors, and ſpake with them apart in this ſort. What meane you, my Lords of SPARTA: do ye not know that the Senate hath alwayes accuſtomed to be gracious and fauourable vnto thoſe that ſue vnto them for any matter, and that the people contrarily are of a proud nature, and deſirous to imbrace all great matters? If therefore at the firſt ſight, ye do giue them to vnderſtand that you are come hither with full power, to treat freely with them in all maner of cauſes: do you not thinke that they will make you ſtretch your authority, to grant them all that they will demaund? Therefore, my Lords ambaſſadors, if you looke for indifferency at the ATHENIANS hands, and that they ſhall not preaſe you too farre againſt your wils, to graunt them any thing of aduantage: I would wiſh you a litle to couer your full commiſſion, and in open maner to propound certaine articles, and reaſonable capitulations of peace, not acquainting them otherwiſe with your full power to agree in all things: and for my part, I will aſſure you of my goodwill in fauour of the LACEDÆMONIANS. When he had told them this tale, he gaue them his faithful promiſe, and vowed as it were to performe his word. Hereupon Alcibiades turned the ambaſſadours from the truſt they repoſed in Nicias, and wanne them on his ſide: in ſo much as they gaue credit to no man but to him, wondering much at his great wiſedome and ready wit, and they thought him a rare and notable man. The next morning the people were aſſembled tō giue the ambaſſadors audience: they were ſent for, and brought into the market place. There Alcibiades gently asked them, what was the cauſe of their comming. They aunſwered: that they were come to treate of peace, but they had no power to determine any thing. Then began Alcibiades to be angry with them, as if they had done him wrong, and not he any to them: calling them vnfaithfull, vnconſtant, and fickle men, that were come neither to do, nor ſay any thing worth the hearing.

Nicias peace. Alcibiades breaketh the peace of the Grecians.

Alcibiades beguileth the Lacedemonians.

The Senate alſo were offended with them, and the people rated them very roughly: where at Nicias was ſo aſhamed and amazed withall, that he could not tell what to ſay, to ſee ſo ſudden a chaunge, knowing nothing of Alcibiades malice and ſubtill practiſe with the ambaſſadors. So the ambaſſadors of LACEDÆMON were diſpatched without any thing done, and Alcibiades choſen Generall: who preſently brought the ARGIVES, the ELIANS, & the MANTINEANS in league with the ATHENIANS. Though no man did commend this practiſe of his, in working it after this ſort: yea it was a maruellous thing of him to deuiſe to put all PELOPONNESVS in armes, & to procure ſuch a number of ſouldiers againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, as he did before the city of MANTINEA, and to ſhift off the miſeries of war and hazard of battell, ſo farre from ATHENS. Which if the LACEDÆMONIANS did win, could not profit them much: and if they loſt it, they could hardly ſaue their city of SPARTA. After this battell of MANTINEA, the thouſand men whom the city by an ancient order did keepe continually in pay, aſwell in peace as in war, within the city of ARGOS, thinking now oportunity ſerued them very trimly: attempted to take the ſoueraigne authority from the common people, and to make themſelues Lords of the city. And to bring this to paſſe, the LACEDÆMONIANS comming in the meane time, did aide them in their purpoſe, and ſo did put downe the gouernment of the people: notwithſtanding immediatly after the people tooke armes againe, and became the ſtronger. Alcibiades comming thither euen at that time, did warrant them the victorie, and ſo ſet vp againe the authority of the people.

Alcibiades choſen generall.

Then he perſwaded them to make their wals longer to ioyne the city to the ſea, to the end they might more eaſily be aided by ſea, by the ATHENIANS. He brought them alſo from ATHENS, many carpenters, maſons, ſtone-hewers, & other workmen: and to conclude, he ſhewed them by all the meanes and wayes he could, that he did beare goodwill vnto them, and thereby wan himſelfe no leſſe fauour particularly among them, then generally he did good vnto his country. He did perſwade alſo the citizens of PATRAS to ioyne their towne to the ſea, by making long wals, which they built out euen to the cliffes of the ſea. And when one ſaid vnto them, alas, poore people of PATRAS, what do you meane? the ATHENIANS will eate you out: Alcibiades anſwered him, it may well be, but it ſhall be by litle & litle, beginning firſt at the feet: but the LACEDÆMONIANS will deuoure you all at once, & begin at the head. Now although Alcibiades did make the city of ATHENS ſtrong by ſea, yet he did not leaue to perſwade the ATHENIANS alſo, to make themſelues ſtrong by land. For he did put the young men oftentimes in mind of the oath they were made to ſweare in AGRAVLOS, and did aduiſe them to accompliſh it indeed. Which was, that they ſhould take all corne-fields, vines, and oliue-trees, to be the borders & confines of ATTICA, whereby they were taught to reckon all land theirs, that was manured, and did bring forth fruite.

The walles brought to the ſea by the Argiues.

Yet with all theſe goodly deeds and faire words of Alcibiades, and with this great courage and quickneſſe of vnderſtanding, he had many great faults & imperfections. For he was too dainty in his fare, wantonly giuen vnto light women, riotous in bankets, vaine and womaniſh in apparell: he ware euer a long purple gowne that ſwept the market place as he walked vp and downe, it had ſuch a traine, and was too rich and coſtly for him to weare. And following theſe vaine pleaſures and delights, when he was in his galley, he cauſed the plankes of the poope thereof to be cut and broken vp, that he might lye the ſofter: for his bed was not layd vpon the ouerlop, but lay vpon girthes ſtrained ouer the hole, cut out and faſtened to the ſides, and he caried to the warres with him a gilded ſcutchion, wherein he had no cognizance, nor ordinary deuiſe of the ATHENIANS, but only had the image of Cupid in it, holding lightning in his hand. The noblemen, and beſt citizens of ATHENS perceiuing this, they hated his faſhions and conditions, and were much offended at him, and were afeard withall of his raſhneſſe and inſolency: he did ſo contemne the lawes and cuſtomes of their country, being manifeſt tokens of a man that aſpired to be king, and would ſubuert and turne all ouer-hand. And as for the goodwill of the common people towards him, the poet Ariſtophanes doth plainly expreſſe it in theſe words:

Alcibiades vyot.

The people moſt deſire, what moſt they hate to haue:
and what their mind abhorres, euen that they ſeeme to craue.

And in another place he ſayd alſo, aggrauating the ſuſpition they had of him:

For ſtate or common weale, much better ſhould it be,
to keepe within the country none ſuch lyons lookes as he:
But if they needs will keepe, a lyon to their coſt,
then muſt they needs obey his will, for he will rule the roſt.

For

For to say truely: his curtesies, his liberalities, and noble expences to shew the people so great pleasure and pastime as nothing could be more: the glorious memory of his auncestors, the grace of his eloquence, the beauty of his person, the strength and valiantnesse of his body, ioyned together with his wisedome and experience in martiall affaires: were the very causes that made them to beare with him in all things, and that the ATHENIANS did patiently endure all his light parts, and did couer his faults, with the best words and termes they could, calling them youthfull, and gentlemens sports. As when he kept Agartharcus the painter prisoner in his house by force, vntill he had painted all his wals within: and when he had done, did let him go, and rewarded him very honestly for his paines. Againe, when he gaue a boxe on the eare to Taureas, who did pay the whole charges of a company of common players, in spite of him, to caric away the honour of the games. Also when he tooke away a young woman of MELIA by his authority, that was taken among certaine prisoners in the warres, and kept her for his concubine: by whom he had a child, which he caused to be brought vp: which they called a worke of charitie, albeit afterwards they burthened him, that he was the only cause of murdering of the poore MELIANS, sauing the litle children, becaus he had fauoured and perswaded that vnnaturall and wicked decree, which another had propounded. Likewise where one Aristophon a painter, had painted a curtisan named Nemea, holding Alcibiades in her armes, and sitting in her lap, which all the people ranne to see, and tooke great pleasure to behold it: the graue and auncient men were angry at these fooliſh parts, accompting them impudent things, and done against all ciuill modestie and temperancie. Wherefore it seemed Archestratus words were spoken to good purpose, when he said: that GREECE could not abide two Alcibiades at once. And on a day as he came from the counsell and assembly of the city, where he had made an excellent oration, to the great good liking and acceptation of all the hearers, and by means thereof had obtained the thing he desired, and was accompanied with a great traine that followed him to his honour: Timon surnamed Misanthropus (as who would say, Loup-garou, or the man-hater) meeting Alcibiades thus accompanied, did not passe by him, nor gaue him way (as he was wont to do all other men) but went straight to him, and tooke him by the hand, and said: O, thou dost well my sonne, I can thee thanke, that thou goest on, and climest vp still: for if euer thou be in authoritie, wo be vnto those that follow thee, for they are vtterly vndone. When they heard these words, those that stood by fell a laughing: other reuiled Timon, other againe marked well his words, and thought of them many a time after: such sundry opinions they had of him for the vnconstancie of his life, and waiwardnesse of his nature and conditions. Now for the taking of SICILE, the ATHENIANS did maruellously couet it in Pericles life, but yet they did not meddle withall, vntill after his death: and then they did it at the first vnder colour of friendship, as ayding those cities which were oppressed, and spoiled by the SYRACVSANS. This was in manner a plaine bridge made, to passe afterwards a greater power and armie thither. Howbeit the onely procurer of the ATHENIANS, and perswader of them, to send small companies thither no more, but to enter with a great army at once to conquer all the countrey together, was Alcibiades: who had so allured the people with his pleasant tongue, that vpon his perswasion, they built castles in the aire, and thought to do greater wonders, by winning onely of SICILIA. For where other did set their mindes vpon the conquest of SICILE, being that they onely hoped after: it was to Alcibiades, but a beginning of further enterprises. And where Nicias commonly in all his perswasions, did turne the ATHENIANS from their purpose to make warres against the SYRACVSANS, as being too great a matter for them to take the citie of SYRACVSA: Alcibiades againe had a further reach in his head, to go conquer LYBIA, and CARTHAGE, and that being conquered, to passe from thence into ITALY, and so to PELOPONNESVS: so that SICILIA should serue but to furnish them with victuals, & to pay the souldiers for their conquests which he had imagined. Thus the yong men were incontinently caried away with a maruellous hope and opiniō of this iourny, and gaue good eare to old mens tales that told them wonders of the countries: insomuch as there was no other pastime nor exercise among the youth in their meetings, but companies of men to sit round together, draw plats of SICILE, and describe the situation of LYBIA and CARTHAGE. And yet they say, that neither Socrates the Philosopher, nor Meton the Astronomer did euer hope to see any good successe of this iourny. For the one by the reuealing of his familiar spirit, who told him all things to come, as was thought, had no great opinion of it: and Meton, whether it was for the feare of the successe of the iourney he had by reason, or that he knew by diui-nation of his art what would follow, he counterfeited the mad man, and holding a burning torch in his hand, made as though he would haue set his house a fire. Other say, that he did not counterfeit, but like a mad man indeed did set his house a fire one night, and that the next morning betimes he went into the market place to pray the people, that in consideration of his great losse and his grieuous calamity so late happened him, it would please them to discharge his son for going this voyage. So by this mad deuice, he obtained his request of the people for his son, whom he abused much. But Nicias against his will was chosen captaine, to take charge of men in these wars: who misliked this iourney, aswell for his companion and associate in the charge of these wars, as for other misfortunes he foresaw therein. Howbeit the ATHENIANS thought the warre would fall out well, if they did not commit it wholly to Alcibiades rashnesse and hardinesse, but did ioyne with him the wisedome of Nicias: and appointed Lamachus also for their third captaine, whom they sent thither, though he were waxen now somwhat old, as one that had shewed himselfe no lesse venturous and hardy in some battels, then Alcibiades himselfe. Now when they came to resolue of the number of souldiers, the furniture and order of these wars, Nicias sought crookedly to thwart this iourney, and to breake it off altogether: but Alcibiades withstood him, and got the better hand of him. There was an orator called Demostratus, who moued the people also, that the captaines whom they had chosen for these wars, might haue full power and authority to leauie men at their discretion, and to make such preparation as they thought good: whereunto the people condescended, and did authorise them. But when they were euen ready to go their way, many signes of ill successe lighted in the necke one of another: and amongst the rest this was one. That they were commanded to take ship on the day of the celebration of the feast of Adonia, on the which the custome is, that women do set vp in diuers places of the city, in the midst of the streetes, images like to dead corses which they cary to buriall, and they represent the mourning and lamentations made at the funerals of the dead, with blubbering and beating themselues, in token of the sorrow the goddesse Venus made, for the death of her friend Adonis.

Images hewne and mangled at Athens.

Moreouer, the Hermes (which are the images of Mercury, and were wont to be set vp in euerie lane and streete) were found in a night all hacked and hewed, and mangled specially in their faces: which put diuerse in great feare and trouble, yea euen those that made no accompt of such toyes. Whereupon it was alledged that it might be the CORINTHIANS that did it, or procured that leud act to be done, fauouring the SYRACVSANS, who were their neere kinsemen, and had bene the first founders of them, imagining vpon this ill token, it might be a cause to breake off the enterprise, and to make the people repent them, that they had taken this warre in hand. Neuertheless, the people would not allow this excuse, neither hearken to their words that said, they should not recken of any such signs or tokens, and that they were but some light brained youths, that being tipled, had played this shamefull part in their brauery, or for sport. But for all these reasons, they tooke these signes very grieuously, and were indeed not a litle afeard, as thinking vndoubtedly that no man durst haue bene so bold to haue done such an abhominable fact, but that there was some conspiracie in the matter. Hereupon, they looked vpon euery suspition and coniecture that might be (how litle or vnlikely soeuer it were) and that very seuerely: and both Senate and people also met in counsell vpon it, very oft in few daies. Now whilest they were busily searching out the matter, Androcles a common counseller, and Oratour in the Commonwealth, brought before the counsell certaine slaues and straungers that dwelt in ATHENS: who deposed that Alcibiades, and other of his friends and companions, had hacked and mangled other images after that sort, and in a mockerie had counterfeited also in a banket that he made, the ceremonies of the holy mysteries; declaring these matters particularly: How one Theodorus counterfeited the herauld, that is wont to make the proclamations: Polytion the torch-bearer, and Alcibiades the priest, who sheweth the holy signes and mysteries: and that his other companions were the assistants, as those that make sute to be receiued into their religion and order, and into the brotherhood of their holy mysteries, whom for this cause they call Mystes. These very words are written in the accusation Thessalus (Cimons sonne) made against Alcibiades, charging him that he had wickedly mocked the two goddesses, Ceres, and Proserpina. Whereat the people being maruellously moued and offended, and the Oratour Androcles his mortall enemy, aggrauating and stirring them vp the more against him: Alcibiades a litle at the first beganne to be amazed at it. But afterwards, hearing that the mariners which were prepared for the voyage of SICILIA, and the souldiers also that were gathered, did beare him great goodwill, and specially cially how the aide, that came from ARGOS, and MANTINEA (being a thousand footmen well armed and appointed) did say openly, how it was for Alcibiades sake they did take vpon them so long a voyage beyond sea, and that if they went about to do him any hurt or wrong, they would presently returne home againe from whence they came: he began to be of a good courage againe, and determined with this good fauourable oportunitie of time, to come before the counsell, to answer to all such articles and accusations as should be laid against him. Thereupon his enemies were a litle cooled, fearing lest the people in this iudgement would haue shewed him more fauour, because they stood in need of him. Wherfore to preuent this danger, they had fed other Oratours, who set a good face on the matter, as they had bene Alcibiades friends, & yet they wished him no lesse euill, then the rankest enemies he had. These fine fellows rose vp in open assembly, and said: it was no reason, that he that was now chosen one of the generals of so mightie and puissant an armie (being ready to hoise saile, and the aide also of their allies and friends) should be driuen to stay now, and to lose time and occasion of well doing, whilest they should go about to choose Iudges, and appoint him his houres and time of aunswer. Therefore they said, it was fit he should take his iourney betimes, and when warres were done, that he should present himselfe to require iustice, and to purge himselfe of such matters as shold be obiected against him. But Alcibiades smelling straight their fetch, and perceiuing the practise of his stay, stept vp, and declared how they did him great wrong, to make him depart with the charge of a Generall of so great an army, his mind being troubled with continuall feare of so grieuous curses, as he should leaue vpon him: and that he deserued death, if he could not purge and iustifie himselfe, of all the vniust and surmized accusations against him. And if he had once cleared himselfe of all things, and had published his innocencie, he should then haue nothing in his head to trouble him, nor to thinke vpon, but to go on lustily to fight with his enemies, and to cast behind him the danger of all his slanderous detracters. But all this could not perswade them. And so he was presently commaunded in the behalfe of the people, to imbarke and ship away his men. Thus he was compelled to take the seas with his other companions, hauing in their naue about a hundred and forty galleys, all hauing three owers to a bancke: and fiue thousand one hundred footmen, very well armed and appointed, and throwers with slings, archers, and other light armed men, to the number of thirteene hundred, sufficiently furnished of all warlike and necessarie munition. Now after they were arriued on the coast of ITALY, they landed in the city of RHEGIO: where, holding counsell in what sort they should direct these wars, it was resolued in the end that they shold straight go vnto SICILIA. This opinion was followed, although Nicias did contrarie it, when Lamachus gaue his consent thereunto, and at his first comming, he was the occasion of winning the city of CATANA. But he neuer after did any exploite, for he was called home immediatly by the ATHENIANS, to come and answer certaine accusations laid to his charge. For as we told you before, there was at the beginning, certaine light suspitions and accusations put vp against him, by some slaues and strangers. But afterwards when he was gone, his enemies enforced them, and burthened him more cruelly, adding to his former fault, that he had broken the images of Mercury: and had committed sacriledge, in counterfeiting in ieast and mockerie the holy ceremonies of the mysteries: and blew into the eares of the people, that both the one and the other proceeded of one set conspiracie, to change and alter the gouernment of the state of the citie. Vpon these informations, the people tooke it in so ill part, that they committed all to prison, that were in any sort accused or suspected therof, and would neuer let them come to their answer: and moreouer did much repent them that they had not condemned Alcibiades, vpon so great complaints and informations as were exhibited against him, while his offence was in question before them. And the furie and hatred of the people was such towards him, that if any of Alcibiades friends and acquaintance came within their danger, they were the worse handled for his sake. Thucydides did not name his accusers, but some other do name Dioclides and Teucer: amongst whom, Phrynicus the comicall Poet is one, who discouereth it in his verses, by bringing in one that speaketh thus to the image of Mercury:

Alcibiades accused for prophaning the holy mysteries.

The craft of Alcibiades enemies.

Alcibiades iourney into Sicile.

Phrynicus the Comicall Poet.

My good friend Mercury, I pray thee take good heed, that thou fall not and breake thy necke: for so thou mights me breed both danger and distrust, and though I guiltlesse be, some Dioclides falsely might accuse and trouble me.

Mercury answereth:

Take thou no thought for me, my ſelfe I ſhall well ſaue:
and will foreſee full well therewith, that Teucer (that falſe knaue) ſhall not the money get, which he by law hath wonne, for his promouters bribing part and accuſation.

And yet for all this, theſe tokens do ſhew no certaintie of any thing. For one of them being asked, how he could know them by their faces in the night, that had broken and defaced theſe images? he anſwered, that he knew them well enough by the brightneſſe of the Moone. And hereby it appeareth plainely that he was periured, becauſe that the ſame night, on the which this fact was committed, there was a coniunction of the Moone. This did a litle trouble and ſtay men of iudgement: howbeit the common ſort of people this notwithſtanding, did not leaue to be as ſharpe ſet, to receiue all accuſations and informations, that were brought in againſt him, as euer they were before. Now there was among the priſoners whoſe cauſe was hanging before them, the Orator Andocides (whom Hellanicus the hiſtoriographer deſcribeth to deſcend of the race of Vlyſſes) whom they tooke to be a man that hated the gouernment of the common people, and bent altogether to fauor the ſmall number of the nobility. But one of the chiefeſt occaſions why he was ſuſpected to be one of them that had broken the images, was: for that hard by his houſe there was a faire great image ſet vp in old time by the family or tribe of the Ægeides, and that alone amongſt all the reſt of ſo many famous images, was left whole and vnbroken: whereupon it is called at this day, the Mercury of Andocides, and is ſo called generally of euery body, albeit the inſcription ſheweth the contrarie. Andocides being in priſon, chanced to fall in acquaintance with one Timæus, with whome he was more familiar then with all the reſt, who was alſo priſoner with him for the ſelfe cauſe. This Timæus was a man not ſo well knowne as he, but beſides, a wiſe man, and very hardy. He perſwaded him, and put into his head, that he ſhould accuſe himſelfe, and certaine other with him: for taking the matter vpon him, and confeſſing it, he ſhould receiue grace and pardon, according to the courſe and promiſe of the law: where contrarily, if he ſhould ſtand vpon the courteſie of the Iudges ſentence, he might eaſily endanger himſelfe: becauſe iudgements in ſuch caſes are vncertaine to all people, and moſt to be doubted and feared toward the rich. And therefore he told him it were his beſt way, if he looked into the matter wiſely, by lying to ſaue his life, rather then to ſuffer death with ſhame, and to be condemned vpon this falſe accuſation. Alſo he ſaid, if he would haue regard to the commonwealth, that it ſhould in like caſe be wiſely done of him, to put in daunger a few of thoſe (which ſtood doubtfull whether in troth they were any of them or not) to ſaue from the furie of the people, and terrour of death, many honeſt men, who indeed were innocent of this lewd fact. Timæus words and perſwaſions wrought ſuch effect with Andocides, that they made him yeeld vnto them, and brought him to accuſe himſelfe, and certaine other with him: by meanes whereof Andocides according to the law had his pardon: but all ſuch as he named and accuſed, were euery man put to death, ſauing ſuch as ſaued themſelues by running away. Furthermore, to ſhadow his accuſation with ſome apparance of troth, Andocides among thoſe that were accuſed, did accuſe alſo certaine of his owne ſeruants. Now though the people had no more occaſion to occupie their buſie heades about the breakers of theſe images, yet was not their malice thus appeaſed againſt Alcibiades, vntill they ſent the galley called Salaminiana, commaunding thoſe they ſent by a ſpeciall commiſſion to ſeeke him out, in no caſe to attempt to take him by force, nor to lay hold on him by violence: but to vſe him with all the good words and courteous maner that they poſſibly could, and to will him only to appeare in perſon before the people, to anſwer to certain accuſations put vp againſt him. If otherwiſe they ſhould haue vſed force, they feared much leſt the army wold haue mutined on his behalfe within the country of their enemies, and that there would haue growne ſome ſedition amongſt their ſouldiers. This might Alcibiades haue eaſily done, if he had bene diſpoſed: for the ſouldiers were very ſory to ſee him depart, perceiuing that the warres ſhould be drawne out now in length, and be much prolonged vnder Nicias, ſeeing Alcibiades was taken from them, who was the only ſpurre that pricked Nicias forward to do any ſeruice: and that Lamachus alſo, though he were a valiant man of his hands, yet he lacked honor and authoritie in the armie, becauſe he was but a meane man borne, and poore beſides. Now Alcibiades for a farewell, diſappointed the ATHENIANS of winning the citie of MESSINA: for they hauing intelligence by certaine priuate perſons within the citie, that it would yeeld vp into their hands, Alcibiades knowing them very well by their names, bewrayed them vnto thoſe

that were the SYRACVSANS friends: wherupon all this practise was broken vtterly. Afterwards when he came to the citie of THVRIES, so soone as he had landed, he went and hid himselfe incontinently in such sort, that such as sought for him, could not find him. Yet there was one that knew him where he was, and said: Why, how now Alcibiades, darest thou not trust the iustice of thy country? Yes very well (quoth he) and it were in another matter: but my life standing vpon it, I would not trust mine owne mother, fearing lest negligently she should put in the blacke beane, where she should cast in the white: for by the first, condemnation of death was signified; & by the other, pardon of life. But afterwards, hearing that the ATHENIANS for malice had condemned him to death: well, quoth he, they shall know I am yet aliue. Now the manner of his accusation and inditement framed against him, was found written in this sort: Thessalus the sonne of Cimon, of the village of LACIADES, hath accused, and doth accuse Alcibiades, the son of Clinias, of the village of SCAMBONIDES, to haue offended against the goddesses, Ceres and Proserpina, counterfeiting in mockery their holy mysteries, and shewing them to his familiar friends in his house, himselfe apparelled and arrayed in a long vestment or cope, like vnto the vestment the priest weareth when he sheweth these holy sacred mysteries: and naming himselfe the priest, Polytion the torch-bearer, and Theodorus of the village of PHYGEA the verger, and the other lookers on brethren, and fellow scorners with them, and all done in manifest contempt and derision, of holy ceremonies and mysteries of the Eumolpides, the religious priests and ministers of the sacred temple of the city of ELEVSIN. So Alcibiades for his contempt and not appearing, was condemned, and his goods confiscate. Besides this condemnation, they decreed also, that all the religious priests and women should ban and accurse him. But hereunto answered one of Nuns called Theano, the daughter of Menon, of the village of AGRAVLA, saying that she was professed religious, to pray and to blesse, not to curse and ban. After this most grieuous sentence and condemnation passed against him, Alcibiades departed out of the city of THVRIES, and went into the countrey of PELOPONNESVS, where he continued a good season in the city of ARGOS. But in the end fearing his enemies, and hauing no hope to returne againe to his owne countrey with any safety: he sent vnto SPARTA to haue safe conduct and licence of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that he might come and dwell in their country, promising them he wold do them more good being now their friend, then he euer did them hurt, while he was their enemie. The LACEDÆMONIANS granted his request, & receiued him very willingly into their city: where euen vpon his first comming, he did three things. The first was: that the LACEDÆMONIANS by his perswasion and procurement, did determine speedily to send aide to the SYRACVSANS, whom they had long before delayed: and so they sent Gylippus their captaine to ouerthrow the ATHENIANS armie, which they had sent thither. The second thing he did for them, was: that he made them of GREECE to begin war vpon the ATHENIANS. The third, and greatest matter of importance, was: that he did counsel them to fortifie the citie of DECELEA, which was within the territories of ATTICA selfe: which consumed, and brought the power of the ATHENIANS lower then any other thing whatsoeuer he could haue done. And if he were welcome, and well esteemed in SPARTA, for the seruice he did to the common wealth: much more he wan the loue and goodwils of priuate men, for that he liued after the LACONIAN maner. So as they that saw his skin scraped to the flesh, and saw him wash himselfe in cold water, and how he did eate browne bread, and sup of their blacke broth: would haue doubted (or to say better, neuer haue beleeued) that such a man had euer kept cooke in his house, nor that he euer had seene so much as a perfuming pan, or had touched cloth of tissue made at MILETVM. For among other qualities and properties he had (whereof he was full) this as they say was one, whereby he most robbed mens harts: that he could frame altogether with their manners and fashions of life, transforming himselfe more easily to all manner of shapes, then the Camelion. For it is reported, that the Camelion cannot take white colour: but Alcibiades could put vpon him any maners, customes or fashions, of what nation soeuer, and could follow, exercise, and counterfeit them when he would, as well the good as the bad. For in SPARTA, he was very painefull, and in continuall exercise: he liued sparingly with litle, and led a streight life. In IONIA, to the contrary: there he liued daintily and superfluously, and gaue himselfe to all mirth and pleasure. In THRASIA, he dranke euer or war alwaies on horsebacke. If he came to Tissaphernes, lieutenant of the mighty king of PERSIA: he farre exceeded the magnificence of PERSIA in pompe and sumptuousnesse. And these things notwithstanding, neuer altered his naturall condition from one fashion to another, neither did his manners (to say truely) receiue all sorts of chaunges. But because peraduenture, if he had shewed his naturall disposition, he might in diuers places where he came, haue offended those whose company he kept, he did with such a vizard and cloke disguise himselfe, to fit their manners, whom he companied with, by transforming himselfe into their naturall countenance, as he that had seene him when he was at SPARTA, to haue looked vpon the outward man, would haue said as the common Prouerbe saith:

It is not the sonne of Achilles, but Achilles selfe.

Euen so it is euen he, whom Lycurgus brought vp. But he that had inwardly seene his naturall doings, and goodwill indeed lye naked before him, would contrarily, haue vsed this common saying:

This woman is no chaungeling.

Alcibiades got Timæa king Agis wife with child.

For he entertained Queene Timæa, king Agis wife of SPARTA, so well in his absence, he being abroad in the wars, that he got her with child, and she her selfe denyed it not. For she being brought a bed of a sonne, who was named Leotychides, openly to the world called him by that name: but when she was amongst her familiars and very friends, she called him softly Alcibiades, she was so farre in loue with him. And Alcibiades iesting out the matter, said he had done it for no hurt, nor for any lust of flesh to satisfie his desire: but only to leaue of his race, to raigne amongst the LACEDÆMONIANS. This matter was brought by diuers vnto King Agis eares, who at the length beleeued it: but specially when he began to make a reckening of the time, how long it was since he lay with his wife. For lying with his wife one night when there was a terrible earthquake, he ran out of his chamber for feare the house would fall on his head: so that it was ten moneths after ere he lay againe with her. Whereupon her son Leotychides being borne at the end of ten moneths, he said he was none of his: and this was the cause that Leotychides did not succeed afterwards in the Kingdome, because he was not of the bloud royall. After the vtter ouerthrow of the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, those of the Isles of CHIO and LESBOS, with the CYZICENIANS, did send altogether their ambassadours to SPARTA, to let the LACEDÆMONIANS vnderstand, they had good will to leaue the ATHENIANS, so they would send them aide to defend them. The BOEOTIANS fauoured those of LESBOS: Pharnabazus, the King of PERSIAES Lieutenant, fauoured the CYZICENIANS. This notwithstanding, the LACEDÆMONIANS were better affected to helpe those of CHIO first, by the perswasion of Alcibiades, who tooke their matter in hand: and he took sea himself and went into ASIA, where he almost turned the countrey of IONIA against the ATHENIANS: and keeping alwaies with the Generals of the LACEDÆMONIANS, he did much hurt the ATHENIANS. Yet notwithstanding, king Agis did beare him ill will, partly for the iniurie he did him in dishonouring and defiling his wife, and partly also, for that he enuied his glorie: because the rumor ranne all about, that the most part of the goodly exploits of these warres did happen well by Alcibiades meanes. Other also of the greatest authoritie among the SPARTANS, that were most ambitious among them, began in their minds to be angrie with Alcibiades, for the enuie they bare him: who were of so great power, that they procured their Gouernours to write letters to their captaines in the field to kill him. Alcibiades hearing of this, did no whit desist to do all that he could for the benefite of the LACEDÆMONIANS: yet he had an eye behind him, flying all occasions to fall into their hands. So in the end, for more surety of his person, he went vnto Tisaphernes, one of the king of PERSIAES Lieutenants, with whom he wanne incontinently such credite, that he was the first and chiefest person he had about him. For this barbarous man being no simple person, but rather malicious, and subtill of nature, and that loued fine and craftie men: did wonder how he could so easily turne from one manner of liuing to another, and also at his quicke wit and vnderstanding. Moreouer, his company and manner to passe the time away, was commonly maruellous full of mirth and pleasure, and he had such pleasant comely deuices with him, that no man was of so sullen a nature, but he would make him merie, nor so churlish, but he would make him gentle. So that both those that feared him, & also they that enuied him, were yet glad to see him, and it did them good to be in his companie, and vse talke with him. Insomuch as this Tisaphernes (that otherwise was a churlish man, and naturally hated the GREGIANS) did giue himselfe so much vnto Alcibiades flatteries, and they pleased him so well, that he himselfe did studie to flatter Alcibiades againe, and make much of him. For he called Alcibiades his faire house of pleasure, and goodly prospect: notwithstanding he had many goodly gardens, sweete springs, greene arbours, and pleasant meadowes, and those in all royall and magnificent manner. Alcibiades despairing vtterly to find any safetie or friendship among the SPARTANS, and fearing on the other side King Agis also: he began to speake ill of them, and to disgrace all that they did, to Tisaphernes. By this practise he stayed Tisaphernes from aiding them so friendly as he might; and that he did not vtterly destroy the ATHENIANS: for he perswaded him that he should furnish the LACEDÆMONIANS but with litle money, to let them diminish and consume by litle and litle: to the end that after one had troubled and weakened the other, they both at the length should be the easier for the King to ouercome. This barbarous man did easily consent to this deuice. All the world then saw he loued Alcibiades, and esteemed of him very much: insomuch as he was sought to, and regarded of all hands of the GRECIANS. Then were the ATHENIANS sorie, and repented them when they had receiued so great losse and hurt, for that they had decreed so seuerely against Alcibiades, who in like maner was very sorrowfull, to see them brought to so hard termes, fearing, if the citie of ATHENS came to destruction, that he himselfe should fall in the end into the hands of the LACEDÆMONIANS, who maliced him to the death. Now about that time, all the power of the ATHENIANS were almost in the Ile of SAMOS, from whence with their army by sea, they sought to suppresse the rebels that were vp against them, and to keepe all that which yet remained. For they were yet pretily strong to resist their enemies, at the least by sea: but they stood in feare of the power of Tisaphernes, and of the hundred & fifty gallies which were reported to be comming out of their country of PHOENICIA to the aide of their enemies, which if they had come, the city of ATHENS had bene vtterly spoiled, and for euer without hope of recouery. The which Alcibiades vnderstanding, sent secretly vnto the chiefest men that were in the army of the ATHENIANS at SAMOS, to giue them hope he would make Tisaphernes their friend: howbeit not of any desire he had to gratifie the people, nor that he trusted to the communalty of ATHENS, but onely to the honourable and honest citizens, and that conditionally, so as they had the heart and courage, to bridle a litle the ouer licentiousnes and insolency of the common people, and that they would take vpon them the authoritie to gouerne, and to redresse their state, and to preserue the city of ATHENS from finall and vtter destruction. Vpon this aduertisement, al the heads and chiefe men did giue very good eare vnto it: sauing only Phrynichus, one of the captains, & of the town of DIRADES: who mistrusting (that was true indeed) that Alcibiades cared not which end went forward, nor who had the chiefe gouernment of ATHENS, the nobility, or the communalty, & did but seek all the deuises & waies he could, to returne again if it might be possible, in any maner of sort, and that he did but curry fauour with the nobility, blaming and accusing the people: he stood altogether against the motion, wherupon Alcibiades deuise was not followed. And hauing now shewed himselfe open enemy to Alcibiades, he did secretly aduertise Astiochus then Admiral to the LACEDÆMONIANS, of Alcibiades practise, and warned him to take heed of him, & to lay him vp safe, as a double dealer, & one that had intelligence with both sides: but he vnderstood not how it was, but one traitour to speake to another. For this Astiochus was a folower of Tiserphernes for his priuate commodity: and perceiuing Alcibiades in such credit with him, he did discouer to Alcibiades all that Phrynichus had aduertised him. Alcibiades straight sent men of purpose to SAMOS, vnto the captains there, to accuse Phrynichus of the treason he had reuealed against them. Those of the counsel there, receiuing this intelligence, were highly offended with Phrynichus. So, he seeing no better way to saue himself for making of this fault, went about to make amends with committing a worse fault. Therupon he sent againe to Astiochus, complaining much he had disclosed him: and yet neuertheless he promised him, if he would keepe his counsell, that he would deliuer the whole fleet & army of the ATHENIANS into his hands. Howbeit this treason of Phrynichus did the ATHENIANS no hurt at all, by reason of Astiochus countertreason: for he did let Alcibiades againe vnderstand what offer Phrynichus had made him. Phrynichus looking to be charged with this againe the second time before the counsell, by means of Alcibiades, did first aduertise the chiefe of the army of the ATHENIANS: that their enemies would come and set vpon them, and where and how: and gaue them warning to keepe neare their ships, to make a strong watch, and to fortifie themselues with all speed, the which forthwith they did. And as they were about it, there came other letters from Alcibiades, by the which he did warne them againe to take heed of Phrynichus, because he had practised againe with their enemies, to deliuer the whole army of ATHENS into their hands. But they gaue no credit to his second letters: for they thought that he knowing the preparation and minds of the enemies, would serue his owne turne with the falſe accuſing of Phrynichus. Notwithſtanding this, there was ſome falſhood in felowſhip: for one Hermon, openly in the market place ſtabbed Phrynichus in with a dagger and killed him. The fact being pleaded in law, and throughly conſidered of: the dead body by the ſentence of the people was condemned for a traitour: and Hermon the murtherer and his fellowes, were crowned in recompence of their fact they had done to kill a traitour to the common wealth. Wherfore thoſe that were Alcibiades friends, being at that time the ſtronger, and greateſt men of the counſell in the army at SAMOS: they ſent one Piſander to ATHENS, to attempt to alter the gouernment, and to encourage the noble men to take vpon them the authority, and to pluck it from the people: aſſuring them that Tiſaphernes would giue them aide to do it, by meanes of Alcibiades, who would make him their friend. This was the colour and cloke wherewith they ſerued their turnes, that did change the gouernement of ATHENS, & that brought it into the hands of a ſmall number of nobility: for they were in all but foure hundred, and yet they called themſelues fiue thouſand. But ſo ſoone as they felt themſelues ſtrong, and that they had the whole authority of gouernement, without contradiction in their hands, they made then no more reckoning of Alcibiades, and ſo they made wars more coldly and ſlackly then before. Partly becauſe they miſtruſted their citizens, who found the change of gouernmẽt very ſtrange: and partly alſo becauſe they were of opinion that the LACEDÆMONIANS (who at all times did moſt fauour the gouernement of Nobility) would be better inclined to make peace with them. Now the common people that remained ſtil in the city, ſtirred not, but were quiet againſt their wils, for feare of daunger, becauſe there were many of them ſlaine, that boldly tooke vpon them in open preſence to reſiſt theſe foure hundred. But thoſe that were in the camp in the Ile of SAMOS, hearing theſe newes, were ſo grieuouſly offended: that they reſolued to returne incontinently againe, vnto the hauen of PYRÆA. Firſt of all, they ſent for Alcibiades, whom they choſe their captaine, then they commanded him ſtraightly to leade them againſt theſe tyrants, who had vſurped the liberty of the people of ATHENS. But neuertheleſſe he did not therein, as another would haue done in this caſe, ſeeing himſelf ſo ſodainely crept againe in fauour with the common people: for he did not thinke he ſhould incontinently pleaſe and gratifie them in all things, though they had made him now their generall ouer all their ſhips, & ſo great an army, being before but a baniſhed man, a vacabond, and a fugitiue. But to the contrary, as it became a generall worthy of ſuch a charge, he conſidered with himſelfe, that it was his part wiſely to ſtay thoſe, who would in a rage & fury careleſly caſt themſelues away, and not ſuffer them to do it. And truly Alcibiades was the cauſe of the preſeruing of the city of ATHENS at that time from vtter deſtruction. For if they had ſodainely (according to their determination) departed from SAMOS to go to ATHENS: the enemies finding no man to let them, might eaſily haue won all the countrey of IONIA, of HELLESPONT, and of all the other Iles without ſtroke ſtriking, whileſt the ATHENIANS were buſie fighting one againſt another in ciuil wars, and within the compaſſe of their owne wals. This Alcibiades alone, & no other, did preuent, not only by perſwading the whole army, and declaring the inconuenience thereof, which would fall out vpon their ſodain departure: but alſo by intreating ſome particularly apart, and keeping a number back by very force. To bring this about, one Thraſibulus of the towne of STIRA, did helpe him much: who went through the army, and cried out vpon them that were bent to enterpriſe this iourney: for he had the biggeſt and loudeſt voice as they ſay, of any man that was in all the citie of ATHENS. This was a notable act, and a great peece of ſeruice done by Alcibiades: that he promiſed the 5. hundred ſaile of the PHOENICIANS (which the LACEDÆMONIANS aſſuredly looked for, in their aid from the King of PERSIA) ſhould not come at all, or els if they came, it ſhould be in the fauor of the ATHENIANS. For he departed immediatly, & went with great ſpeed to Tiſaphernes: whom he handled in ſuch ſort, that he brought not the ſhippes that lay at rode before the city of ASPENDA, and ſo he brake promiſe with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Therefore Alcibiades was maruellouſly blamed and accuſed, both of the one and the other ſide, to haue altred Tiſaphernes mind, but chiefly the LACEDÆMONIANS: who ſaid, that he had perſwaded this barbarous captaine, he ſhould neither aide the one nor the other, but rather to ſuffer them one to deuoure and deſtroy each other. For it had bene out of doubt, if this great fleet & nauy of the kings had come, to ioyne their force with either party: that they had taken from the one of them, the ſigniory and domination of the ſea. Shortly after, the 4. hundred noble men that had vſurped the authority & gouernment of ATHENS, were vtterly driuen away and ouerthrowne, by meane of the friendly aide and aſſiſtance that Alcibiades friends gaue thoſe that that tooke the peoples part. So the citizens were very well pleased with Alcibiades, insomuch as they sent for him to returne when he thought good. But he esteeming it no honour vnto him to returne without some wel deseruing, and before he had done some greater exploit, as onely vpon the peoples fauour and good will: to the end that his returne might be glorious and triumphant; he departed first from SAMOS with a small number of gallies, and went sailing vp and downe the Iles of COS and of GNIDOS. There he was aduertised, that Mindarus, the Admirall of the LACEDÆMONIANS, was gone with all his fleete vnto the straight of HELLESPONT, and that the captaines of the ATHENIANS gaue chase vnto him. Thereupon he went also and sailed thither with speede, to aide the ATHENIANS: and by very good fortune came with 18. gallies euen at the very instant when they were both in the midst of their fight, with al their ships before the city of ABYDOS. The battel was cruelly foughten betweene them from morning till night, both the one and other hauing the better in one part of the battell, and the worst in another place. Now at the first discouery of Alcibiades comming, both parts had in deed contrary imaginations of him. For the enemies tooke heart vnto them: and the ATHENIANS began to be afeard. But Alcibiades setting vp a flag in the top of his admirall gally, to shew what he was, he presently set vpon the PELOPONNESIANS that had the better, and had certaine gallies of the ATHENIANS in chase: whereupon the PELOPONNESIANS gaue ouer their chase, and fled. But Alcibiades followed them so lustily, that he ran diuerse of them a ground, and brake their ships, and slue a great number of men that leapt into the sea, in hope to saue themselues by swimming a land: notwithstanding that Pharnabazus was come thither to aid the LACEDÆMONIANS, and did his best indeuour to saue their gallies by the sea shore: yet the ATHENIANS in the end wan 30. gallies of their enemies, and saued all their owne, and so did set vp certain flags of triumph and victory. Alcibiades hauing now happily gotten this glorious victory, would needs go shew himself in triumph vnto Tisaphernes. So hauing prepared to present him with goodly rich presents, and appointed also a conuenient traine and number of saile meet for a Generall, he tooke his course directly to him. But he found not that entertainment he hoped for: for Tisaphernes standing in great hazard of displeasure, and feare of punishment at the Kings hands, hauing long time before bin defamed by the LACEDÆMONIANS, who had complained of him, that he did not fulfil the Kings cõmandement, thought that Alcibiades was arriued in very happy houre: whereupon he kept him prisoner in the citie of SARDIS, supposing the wrong he had done, would by this meanes easily discharge & purge him to the king. Yet at the end of 30. daies, Alcibiades by fortune got a horse, & stealing frõ his keepers, fled vnto the city of CLAZOMENES: & this did more increase the suspitiõ they had of Tisaphernes, because they thought that vnderhand he had wrought his liberty. Alcibiades took then sea again, & went to seek out the army of the ATHENIANS. Which when he had found, & heard news that Mindarus & Pharnabazus were together in the city of CIZYCVM, he made an oration to his souldiers, & declared vnto them how it was very requisite they should fight with their enemies, both by sea and by land, and moreouer that they should assault them within their forts and castles, because otherwise they could haue no money to defray their charges. His oration ended, he made them immediatly hoise saile, & so to go lie at anker in the Ile of PROCONNESVS: where he took order that they should keep all the pinnases and brigantines among the ships of war, that the enemy might haue no manner of intelligence of his comming. The great shoures of raine also, with thunder and darke weather that fell out sodainely vpon it, did greatly further him in his attempt and enterprise: insomuch as not onely his enemies, but the ATHENIANS that were there before, knew nothing of his comming. So some made their reckoning, that the could do litle or nothing all that day: yet he made them sodainely imbarke, and hoise saile. They were no sooner in the maine sea, but they descried a farre off the gallies of their enemies, which lay at rode before the hauen of CYZICVM. And fearing least the great number of his fleet would make them flie, and take land before he could come to them: he commaunded certaine captaines to stay behind, and to row softly after him, and himselfe with forty gallies with him, went towards the enemies to prouoke them to fight. The enemies supposing there had bene no more ships then those that were in sight: did set out presently to fight with them. They were no sooner ioyned together, but Alcibiades ships that came behind, were also descried: the enemies were so afeard thereat, that they cast about and fled straight. Alcibiades leauing his fleete, followed the chase with twentie of the best gallies he had, and draue them a land. Thereupon he landed also, and pursued them so couragiously at their heeles, that he slue a great number of them on the maine land, who thought by flying to haue ſaued themſelues. Moreouer, Mindarus and Pharnabazus, being come out of the city to reſcue their people, were ouerthrown both. He ſlue Mindarus in the field, fighting valiantly: as for Pharnabazus, he cowardly fled away. So the ATHENIANS ſpoiled the dead bodies (which were a great number) of a great deale of armour and riches, and took beſides all their enemies ſhips. After they tooke the citie of CIZYCVM, Pharnabazus hauing left it. Then the PELOPONNESIANS being ſlaine, they had not onely the poſſeſſion of the whole country of HELLESPONT, which they kept: but they draue their enemies by force out of all parts of the ſea. There were at that time certain letters intercepted, whereby a ſecretary gaue aduertiſement vnto the Ephori at SPARTA, of the ouerthrow in this ſort. All is loſt, Mindarus is ſlaine, our people die for hunger, and we know not what to do. Now the ſouldiers of ATHENS that had bene at this iourney and ouerthrow, grew to ſuch a pride and reputation of themſelues, that they would not, and diſdained alſo to ſerue with the other ſouldiers that had bene beaten many times, and went away with the worſe: where they to the contrary had neuer bin ouercome, as a litle before it happened, that the captaine Thraſyllus had bene ouerthrowne by the citie of EPHESVS: and for this ouerthrow, the EPHESIANS had ſet vp a triumph, and token of braſſe, to the vtter ſhame and ignominy of the ATHENIANS. For the which Alcibiades ſouldiers did very much rebuke Thraſyllus men, and did exceedingly extoll their captaine and themſelues, and would neither encampe with them, neither haue to do with them, nor yet keepe them company: vntill ſuch time as Pharnabazus came with a great army againſt them, as well of footmen as horſemen, when they ranne a forraging vpon the ABYDENIANS: and then Alcibiades went to the reſcue of them, and gaue Pharnabazus battell, and ouerthrew him once againe, and did together with Thraſyllus chaſe him euen vntil dark night. Then both Alcibiades and Thraſyllus ſouldiers did company together, one reioycing with another: and ſo returned all with great ioy into one campe. The next morning Alcibiades ſet vp a triumph for the victory he had the day before, and then went to ſpoile and deſtroy Pharnabazus countrey, where he was gouernour, and no man durſt once come out to meete him. In this rode there were taken priſoners, certaine Prieſts and Nuns of the country: but Alcibiades freely deliuered them afterwards without ranſome. And preparing to make warre againſt the CHALCEDONIANS, who were reuolted from the ATHENIANS, and had receiued a garriſon and gouernor of the LACEDÆMONIANS into their city: he was aduertiſed that they had brought all their goods and cattels out of their fields, and had deliuered them to the ſafe cuſtody of the BITHYNIANS, who were their neighbors and friends. Herupon he led his army into their borders, and ſent a herauld to ſummon the BITHYNIANS, to make amends for the wrong they had done the ATHENIANS. The BITHYNIANS fearing leaſt Alcibiades would ſet vpon them, did ſtraight deliuer him the goods they had as before in their cuſtody, and moreouer, made a league with the ATHENIANS beſides. That done, he went and laid ſiege to the citie of CHALCEDON, the which he enuironed all about from the one ſide of the ſea to the other. Pharnabazus came thither, thinking to haue raiſed the ſiege. And Hippocrates, a captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that was gouernor of the citie, aſſẽbled all the force he was able to make within the ſame, & made a ſally out alſo vpon the ATHENIANS at the very ſame time. Wherupon Alcibiades putting his men in order of battell, ſo as they might giue charge vpõ them both at one inſtant: fought ſo valiantly, that he forced Pharnabazus to run his way with ſhame enough, & ſlue Hippocrates in the field, with a great number of his men. Then took he the ſeas again, to go towards the country of HELLESPONT, to get ſome money, whereon the ſodaine he did take the citie of SELYBREA: becauſe he valiantly put himſelfe in hazard before the time appointed him. For certaine of his friends within, with whom he had ſecret practiſe, had giuen him a token, that when time ſerued, they would ſhew a burning torch in the aire at midnight: but they were compelled to ſhew this fire in the aire before they were ready, for feare leaſt one of their confederacy would bewray the matter, who ſodainly repented him. Now this torch burning in the aire, was ſet vp before Alcibiades was ready with his company. But he perceiuing the ſigne ſet, tooke about thirty men with him in his company, and ranne with them to the wals of the city, hauing commanded the reſt of his army to follow him with all ſpeede poſſible. The gate was opened to him, and to his thirtie men: beſides them there followed twentie other light armed men. Howbeit they were no ſooner entred the citie, but they heard the citizens armed come againſt them: ſo that there was no hope to ſcape, if they did tarie their comming. Neuertheleſſe, conſidering that vntill that preſent time, he was neuer ouercome in battel, where he had takẽ charge, it grieued him very much to fly: wherefore wherfore it ſtraight came in his head to make ſilence by ſound of trumpet, and after ſilence made, he cauſed one of thē that were about him to make proclamation with a loud voice, that the SELYBRIANIANS ſhould not take armes againſt the ATHENIANS. This cooled thē a litle that would faine haue bene doing, becauſe they ſuppoſed that all the army of the ATHENIANS had bene already in the citie: the other on the contrary ſide, were very glad to talke of peace, without any further daunger. And as they began to parle vpon compoſition, the reſt of Alcibiades army was come on. Now he thinking in deed (which was true) that the SELYBRIANIANS ſought nothing but peace, and fearing leaſt the THRACIANS which were many in number (and came with good will to ſerue him in that iourney) would ſacke and ſpoile the citie, he made them all to go out againe: and ſo concluding peace with the chiefe of the SELYBRIANIANS, he did them no more hurt vpō their humble ſubmiſſion, but made them pay him a ſum of mony, and ſo leauing a garriſon of the ATHENIANS within the citie, he departed thence. Whilſt Alcibiades was in treaty with the SELYBRIANIANS, the other ATHENIAN captaines that lay at the ſiege of CHALCEDON, made an agreement with Pharnabazus, that he ſhould giue them a ſumme of mony, & giue vp the towne into the ATHENIANS hands, to enioy it as they had before. And with expreſſe condition alſo, that the ATHENIANS ſhould make no rodes into Pharnabazus dominions, to hurt or ſpoile any of his: & he likewiſe ſhould be bound to giue good ſafe conduct vnto the ambaſſadours of the ATHENIANS, to go and come ſafe from time to time, to the King of PERSIA. The other captaines being ſworne to this peace, Pharnabazus conditioned alſo that Alcibiades at his returne ſhould likewiſe be ſworne to the peace and conditions thereof. But Alcibiades ſaid he would not be ſworne at all, vnleſſe Pharnabazus were firſt ſworne for his part. Thus when oaths were taken of either ſide, Alcibiades went alſo againſt thoſe of BYZANTIVM, who in like caſe had rebelled againſt the ATHENIANS. At his firſt comming thither, he enuironed the city round about with a wall. Afterwards he practiſed with two ſecret friends of his, Anaxilaus and Lycurgus, and certaine other within the citie, who promiſed him to deliuer it into his hands, ſo they might be aſſured he would do them no hurt. To colour this practiſe, he gaue it out, that he muſt needs leaue the ſiege, and depart with ſpeed, for certain news that were come out of IONIA: and thereupon he imbarked preſently, and went out of the hauen at none daies with all his ſhips, howbeit he returned againe the ſame night. And going a land with the choiſeſt and beſt armed men he had, he approched the wals of the citie, without any manner of noiſe, and hauing left order with them that remained in the ſhips, that in the meane ſeaſon they ſhould row with all force into the hauen, with as great cries and ſhouts as might be, to feare and trouble the enemies: partly to feare the BIZANTINES the more with their ſodain comming among them, and partly that his confederates within the citie, might with better oportunity receiue him and his company, into the towne with the more aſſured ſafety, whilſt euery man ranne to the hauen, to reſiſt them that were vpon the gallies. Neuertheleſſe they went not away vnfought with. For thoſe that lay in garriſon within the citie, ſome of them PELOPONNESIANS, other BOEOTIANS, and other MEGARIANS, did ſo valiantly repulſe them that came out of their gallies, that they draue them to retire abord againe. Afterwards hearing how the ATHENIANS were entred the city on the other ſide, they put themſelues in battell ray, & went to meet thē. The battell was terrible of both parts: but Alcibiades in the end obtained victory, leading the right wing of his battell, & Theramenes the left. The victory being gotten, he took 300. of his enemies priſoners, who had eſcaped the fury of the battel. But after the battel, there was not a BYZANTINE put to death, neither baniſhed, nor his goods confiſcated: becauſe it was capitulated by Alcibiades with his confederates, that neither he nor his, ſhould hurt any of the BYZANTINES either in perſon or goods, nor any way ſhould riſle them. And Anaxilaus being afterwards accuſed of treaſon in LACEDÆMON for this practiſe: he anſwered & iuſtified himſelf in ſuch ſort, that they could not find he had committed the fault laid vnto his charge. For he ſaid that he was no LACEDÆMONIAN, but a BYZANTINE: and that he ſaw not LACEDÆMON in daunger, but BYZANTIVM, which the enemies had compaſſed about with a wall they had built, that it was vnpoſſible to bring any thing into the citie. Moreouer he alleaged, that they hauing very ſmall ſtore of corne within the city (as was true indeed) the PELOPONNESIANS and BOEOTIANS that lay there in garriſon did eate it vp, while the poore BYZANTINES themſelues, their wiues and children, died for very hunger. Therefore it could not be ſaid of him, that he had betraid his country, but rather that he had deliuered it from the miſeries & calamities the wars brought vpon it: wherein he had folowed the example of the honeſteſt men of

LACEDÆMON, who did acknowledge nothing honeſt and iuſt, but that which was neceſſary and profitable for their countrey. The LACEDÆMONIANS hearing his reaſons alleaged for his purgation, were aſhamed to condemne him, and therefore they let him go. Now Alcibiades deſirous in the end to ſee his natiue countrey againe (or to ſpeake more truly, that his country men ſhould ſee him) after he had ſo many times ouerthrowne their enemies in battell: he hoiſed ſaile and directed his courſe towards ATHENS, bringing with him all the gallies of the ATHENIANS, richly furniſhed and decked all about with skutchines and targets, and other armour and weapon gotten amongſt the ſpoiles of his enemies. Moreouer, he brought with him many other ſhippes which he had wonne and broken in the warres, beſides many enſignes and other ornaments: all which being counted together one with the other, made vp the number of two hundred ſhips. Furthermore, where Duris SAMIAN writeth (who challengeth that he came of his houſe) that at his returne one Chryſogonus, an excellent player on the flute (that had wonne certaine of the Pythian games) did play ſuch a note, that at the ſound thereof the galley-ſlaues would keepe ſtroke with their owers, and that Callipides another excellent player of Tragedies, playing the part of a comedie, did ſtirre them to row, being in ſuch players garments as euery maſter of ſuch ſcience vſeth commonly to weare, preſenting himſelfe in Theater or ſtage before the people to ſhew his art: and that the admirall galley wherein himſelfe was, entred the hauen with a purple ſaile, as if ſome maske had come into a mans houſe after ſome great banquet made: neither Ephorus, nor Theopompus nor Xenophon, make any mention of this at al. Furthermore, me thinkes it ſhould not be true, that he (returning from exile after ſo long a baniſhment, and hauing paſſed ouer ſuch ſorrowes and calamities as he had ſuſtained) would ſo proudly and preſumptuouſly ſhew himſelfe vnto the ATHENIANS. But meerely contrary, it is moſt certaine, that he returned in great feare and doubt. For when he was arriued in the hauen of PIRÆA, he would not ſet foot a land, before he firſt ſaw his nephew Euryptolemus, and diuers other of his friends from the hatches of his ſhip, ſtanding vpon the ſands in the hauen mouth. Who were come thither to receiue and welcome him, and told him that he might be bold to land, without feare of any thing. He was no ſooner landed, but all the people ranne out of euery corner to ſee him, with ſo great loue and affection, that they tooke no heed of the other captaines that came with him, but cluſtred all to him onely, and cried out for ioy to ſee him. Thoſe that could come neere him, did welcome and imbrace him: but all the people wholly followed him. And ſome that came to him, put garlands of flowers vpon his head: and thoſe that could not come neere him, ſaw him a far off, and the old folkes did point him out to the yonger ſort. But this common ioy was mingled notwithſtanding with teares and ſorrow, when they came to thinke vpon their former misfortunes and calamities, and to compare them with their preſent proſperity: waying with themſelues alſo how they had not loſt SICILIA, nor their hope in all things elſe had failed them, if they had deliuered themſelues and the charge of their army into Alcibiades hands, when they ſent for him to appeare in perſon before them. Conſidering alſo how he found the citie of ATHENS in maner put from the ſegniorie and commaundement of the ſea, and on the other ſide how their force by land was brought into ſuch extremitie, that ATHENS ſcantly could defend her ſuburbs, the citie ſelfe being ſo deuided and turmoiled with ciuill diſſention: yet he gathered together thoſe few, and ſmall force that remained, and had not onely reſtored ATHENS to her former power and ſoueraigntie on the ſea, but had made her alſo conquerer by land. Now the decree for his repaire home againe, was paſt before by the people, at the inſtant requeſt of Callias, the ſonne of Callæſchrus, who did preferre it: as he himſelfe did teſtifie in his Elegies, putting Alcibiades in remembrance of the good turne he had done him, ſaying:

I was the firſt that moued in open conference, the peoples voice to call thee home, when thou wert baniſht hence,
So was I eke the firſt which thereto gaue conſent, and therefore may I boldly ſay, by truth of ſuch intent:
I was the onely meane, to call thee home againe,
by ſuch requeſt ſo rightly made, to moue the peoples vaine.
And this may ſerue for pledge, what friendſhip I thee beare:
faſt ſealed with a faithfull tongue, as plainely ſhall appeare.

But notwithſtanding, the people being aſſembled all in counſel, Alcibiades came before them, and made an oration: wherein he firſt lamented all his miſhaps, and found himſelf grieued a litle

with the wrongs they had offered him, yet he imputed all in the end to his curſed fortune, and ſome ſpitefull god that enuied his glorie and proſperitie. Then he dilated at large the great hope their enemies had to haue aduantage of them: and therewithall perſwaded the people to be of good courage, and afeard of nothing that was to come. And to conclude, the people crowned him with crownes of gold, and choſe him Generall againe of ATHENS, with ſoueraigne power and authoritie both by land and by ſea. And at that very inſtant it was decreed by the people, that he ſhould be reſtored againe to his goods, and that the prieſts Eumolpides ſhould abſolue him of all their curſes, and that the heraulds ſhould with open proclamation reuoke the execrations and curſings they had thundered out againſt him before, by commaundement of the people. Whereto they all agreed, and were very willing, ſauing Theodorus the Biſhop, who ſaid: I did neither excommunicate him, nor curſe him, if he hath done no hurt to the commonwealth. Now Alcibiades flouriſhed in his chiefeſt proſperitie, yet were there ſome notwithſtanding that miſliked very much the time of his landing: ſaying it was very vnluckie and vnfortunate. For the very day of his returne and arriuall, fell out by chance on the feaſt which they call Plynteria, as you would ſay, the waſhing day, which they celebrate in honour of Minerua: on the which day, the prieſts that they call Praxiergides, do make certaine ſecret and hidden ſacrifices and ceremonies, being the fiue and twentieth day of the moneth of September, and do take from the image of this goddeſſe all her rayment and iewels, and keepe the image cloſe couered ouer. Hereupon the ATHENIANS do aſcribe that day for a moſt vnfortunate day, and are very circumſpect to do any matter of importance on it. Moreouer, it was commonly ſcanned abroad of euery body, that it ſeemed the goddeſſe was not content, nor glad of Alcibiades returne: and that ſhe did hide her ſelfe, becauſe ſhe would not ſee him, nor haue him come neare her. Notwithſtanding all theſe toyes and ceremonies, when Alcibiades found euery thing fall out well at his returne, and as he would haue wiſhed it: he armed a hundred galleys preſently, to returne againe to the warres. Howbeit he wiſely regarded the time and ſolemnitie of celebration of theſe myſteries, and conſiderately ſtayed vntill they had finiſhed all. And it fell out, that after the LACEDÆMONIANS had taken and fortified the citie of DECELEA, within the territorie of ATTICA, and that the enemies being the ſtronger in the field, did keepe the way going from ATHENS to ELEVSIN, ſo as by no poſſible meanes they could make their ſolemne proceſſion by land, with ſuch honor & deuotion as they were before accuſtomed to do: and therby all the ſacrifices, daunces, and many other holy deuout ceremonies they were wont to do by the way, in ſinging the holy ſong of Iacchus, came of very neceſſitie to be left off, and cleane laid aſide. Then Alcibiades thought he ſhould do a meritorious deed to the gods, and an acceptable to men, to bring the old ceremonies vp againe vpon the ſaid feaſt: and thereupon purpoſed to accompany the proceſſion, and defend it by power againſt all inuaſion and diſturbance by the enemies: as one that foreſaw one of theſe two things would come to paſſe: Either that Agis king of the LACEDÆMONIANS would not ſtirre at all, and that he by this meanes ſhould ſo much imbaſe and diminiſh his reputation and glorie: or if he did come out to the field, that he would make the battell very gratefull to the goddes, conſidering it ſhould be in defence of their moſt holy feaſt and worſhip, and in the ſight of his countrey, where the people ſhould ſee and witneſſe both his valiantneſſe, and alſo his courage. Alcibiades being fully reſolued vpon this proceſſion, went and made the prieſts Eumolpides, their vergers, and other their miniſters and officers of theſe myſteries, priuie to his determination. Then he ſent out skoutes to watch on the ſide of the hilles thereabouts, and to view the way of their perambulation. The next morning very early he ſent out light horſemen alſo to ſcowre the countrey. Then he made the prieſts, the profeſſed, and all the miniſters of religion, go in proceſſion, together with thoſe that followed the ſame: and he himſelfe compaſſed them about with his armie on euery ſide, marching in battell ray, and very good order, and with great ſilence. This was an honourable and deuout leading of an armie, and ſuch as if his greateſt enemies would confeſſe a troth, they could not but ſay, Alcibiades had as much ſhewed the office of a high biſhop, as of a noble ſouldier and good captaine. So he ended this proceſſion, returning to ATHENS in all ſafe order againe, and not an enemie that durſt once looke out into the field to ſet vpon them. Now this did more increaſe the greatneſſe of his mind, and therewith the peoples good opinion of his ſufficiencie, and wiſe conduction of an armie: inſomuch as they thought him vnuincible, hauing the ſoueraigne power and authoritie of a Generall. Furthermore, he ſpake ſo faire to the poore people, and meaner ſort, that they chiefly wiſhed and deſired he would take vpon him like a King: yea, and many went to him to perſwade him in it, as though he ſhould thereby withſtand all enuie, and driue away the lawes and cuſtomes of trying of matters by the voyces of the people, and all ſuch fond deuices, as did deſtroy the ſtate of the commonweale. And furthermore, they ſaid it was very needfull that he alone ſhould take vpon him the whole rule and gouernement of the citie, that he might diſpoſe all things according to his will, and not ſtand in feare of ſlaunderous and wicked toungs. Now, whether Alcibiades euer had any mind to vſurpe the kingdome, the matter is ſomewhat doubtfull. But this is certaine, the greateſt men of the citie fearing leſt indeed he meant ſome ſuch thing, did haſten his departure as ſoone as they could poſſible, doing all other things according to his mind: and did aſſigne him ſuch aſſociates in his charge of General, as he himſelfe beſt liked. So in the end he departed with a fleete of an hundred galleys, and firſt of all he fell with the Iſle of ANDROS, where he ouercame by fight the inhabitants of the ſaid Iſle, and certaine LACEDÆMONIANS that were amongeſt them: but he tooke not the citie, which was one of the firſt matters his enemies did accuſe him for. For if euer man was ouerthrowne and enuied for the eſtimation they had of his valure and ſufficiencie, truely Alcibiades was the man. For the notable and ſundry ſeruices he had done, wonne him ſuch eſtimation of wiſedome and valiantneſſe, that where he ſlacked in any ſeruice whatſoeuer, he was preſently ſuſpected, iudging the ill ſucceſſe not in that he could not, but for that he would not: and that where he vndertooke any enterpriſe, nothing could withſtand or lye in his way. Hereupon the people perſwading themſelues, that immediatly after his departure, they ſhould heare that the Ile of CHIO was taken, with all the country of IONIA, they were angry they could haue no newes ſo ſuddenly from him as they looked for. Moreouer, they did not conſider the lacke of mony he had, and ſpecially making war with ſuch enemies, as were euer releeued with the great King of PERSIAES aide, and that for neceſſity ſake he was ſundry times driuen to leaue his campe, to ſeeke mony where he could get it, to pay his ſouldiers, and to maintaine his army. Now for teſtimony hereof, the laſt accuſation that was againſt him, was only for this matter. Lyſander being ſent by the LACEDÆMONIANS for admirall and generall of their army by ſea, vſed ſuch pollicy with Cyrus the king of PERSIAES brother, that he got into his hands a great ſum of mony: by meanes whereof he gaue vnto his mariners foure oboles a day for their wages, where before they were wont to haue but three, and yet Alcibiades had much ado to furniſh his with three onely a day. For this cauſe, to get mony, Alcibiades ſailed into CARIA. But in the meane time Antiochus whom Alcibiades had left his lieutenant behind him, and had giuen him charge of all the ſhips in his abſence, being a very skilfull ſea-man, but otherwiſe a haſty harebrayned foole, and of ſmall capacitie: he being expreſly commanded by Alcibiades not to fight in any caſe, though the enemies offered him battell, was ſo fooliſh raſh, and made ſo litle reckening of his ſtraight commandement, that he armed his owne gally, wherof himſelfe was captain, and other beſides, and went to the city of EPHESVS, paſſing all along his enemies galleys, reuiling and offering villany to thoſe that ſtood vpon the hatches of their gallies. Lyſander being maruellouſly prouoked by theſe words, went and encountred him at the firſt with a few ſhips. The other captaines of the gallies of the ATHENIANS, ſeeing Antiochus in daunger, went to aide him, one after another. Then Lyſander of his part alſo ſet out all his whole fleet againſt him, and in the end ouercame them: Antiochus ſelfe was killed in the conflict, and many gallies and men were taken priſoners: wherfore Lyſander ſet vp ſhewes of triumph in token of victory. Alcibiades hearing theſe ill fauored newes, returned preſently with all poſſible ſpeed to SAMOS: and when he came thither, he went with all the reſt of his fleet to offer Lyſander battell. But Lyſander quietly contenting himſelfe with his firſt victory, went not out againſt him. Now this victory was no ſooner won, but one Thraſybulus the ſon of Thraſon, Alcibiades enemy, went incontinently from the campe, and got him to ATHENS, to accuſe Alcibiades to the people: whom he informed how all went to wracke, and that he had loſt many ſhips, for that he regarded not his charge, careleſly putting men in truſt, whom he gaue too great credit to, becauſe they were good fellowes, and would drinke drunke with him, and were full of marriners mockes and knauiſh ieaſts, ſuch as they vſe commonly amongſt themſelues. And that he in the meane time tooke his pleaſure abroad, here and there, ſcraping money together where he could come by it, keeping good cheare, and feaſting of the ABYDENIAN and IONIAN curtiſans, when the enemies army was ſo neare theirs as it was. Moreouer, they laid to his charge, that he did fortifie a caſtle in the country of THRACIA, neare neare vnto the city BISANTHE, for a place to retire himselfe vnto, either because he could not, or rather that he would not liue any longer in his owne countrey. Vpon those accusations, the ATHENIANS giuing credite to the report: did immediatly chuse new captaines, and thereby declared their misliking. Alcibiades hearing of this, and fearing lest they would do him some worse harme, did leaue straight the ATHENIANS campe, and gathering a certaine number of straungers together, went of himselfe to make war vpon certaine free people of the THRACIANS, who were subiect to no prince nor state: where he got a maruellous masse of money together, by meanes whereof he did assure the GRECIANS inhabiting those marches, from all inuasion of forraine enemies. Now Tydeus, Menander, and Adimanthus the ATHENIANS captaines, being afterwards in a place commonly called the goates riuer, with all the galleys the citie of ATHENS had at that time vpon that coast: vsed euery morning commonly to go to the sea, to offer battell to Lysander, who rode at anker before the citie of Lampsacus, with all the LACEDÆMONIANS armie by sea, and commonly returned againe to the place from whence they came, in very ill order, without either watch or ward, as men that were careless of their enemies. Alcibiades being on the land not far off, and finding their great fault and negligence: took his horse, and went to them, and told them that they lay on an ill shore, where there was no good rode, nor towne, and where they were driuen to seeke their victuals, as farre as to the citie of SESTOS, and that they suffered their mariners to leaue their shippes, and go a land when they lay at anker, straggling vp and downe the countrey as they would themselues, without regard that there lay a great armie of their enemies before them, readie to be set out at the Generals commandement: and therefore he aduised them to remoue thence, and to go to cast anker before the citie of SESTOS. Howbeit the captaines would not be aduised by him: and that which was worst of all, Tydeus, one of the captaines, stoutly commaunded him to get him away, as one that had nothing to do with the matter, and that other had charge of the armie. Whereupon Alcibiades fearing they would purpose some treason against him, did depart presently from them. And as he went his way, he said to some of his friends which accompanied him out of the campe at his returne: that if the captaines of the ATHENIANS had not bene so round with him, he would haue forced the LACEDÆMONIANS to haue come to battell in despite of their beardes, or else he would haue driuen them to forsake their shippes. Some tooke this for a glorious bragge: other thought he was like enough to haue done it, because he could haue brought from land a great number of THRACIANS, both archers and horsemen, with whom he might haue giuen a charge vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, and done great mischiefe vnto their campe. But now, how wisely Alcibiades did foresee the faults he told the ATHENIANS captaines of: their great misfortune and losse that followed incontinently, did too plainely witnesse it to the world. For Lysander came so fiercely vpon them on a sodaine, that of all the shippes that they had in their whole fleete, onely eight galleys were saued, with whom Conon fled: and the other being not much lesse then two hundred in number, were euery one of them taken and caried away, with three thousand prisoners whom Lysander put to death. Shortly after, he tooke the citie selfe of ATHENS, and rased their long wals euen to the ground. After this great and notable victorie, Alcibiades fearing sore the LACEDÆMONIANS, who then without let or interruption of any, were only Lords and Princes by sea and by land: he went into the countrey of BYTHINIA, and caused great good to be brought after him, and tooke a maruellous sum of mony with him, besides great riches he left also in the castles of THRACIA, where he did remaine before. Howbeit he lost much of his goods in BYTHINIA, which certain THRACIANS dwelling in that country, had robbed him of, and taken from him. So he determined to repaire forthwith vnto king Artaxerxes, hoping that when the king had once proued him, he shold find him a man of no lesse seruice, then he had found Themistocles before him: besides that the occasion of his going thither, should be much iuster then his was: for he did not go thither, to make war against the city of ATHENS and his country, as Themistocles did: but of a contrary intent, to make intercession to the king, that it would please him to aid them. Now Alcibiades thinking he could vse no better mean then Pharnabazus help only, to see him safely conducted to the kings court: he tooke his iourney to him into the country of PHRYGIA, where he abode a certaine time to attend vpon him, & was very honorably entertained and receiued of Pharnabazus. All this while the ATHENIANS found themselues desolate, and in miserable state to see their empire lost: but then much more, when Lysander had taken away their liberties, and set thirty gouernors ouer their city. Now too late, after all was loſt (where they might haue recouered againe, if they had bene wiſe) they beganne together to bewaile and lament their miſeries and wretched ſtate, looking backe vpon all their wilfull faults and follies committed: among which, they did recken their ſecond time of falling out with Alcibiades, was their greateſt fault: for they baniſhed him only of malice and diſpleaſure, not for any offence himſelfe in perſon had committed againſt them, ſauing that his lieutenant in his abſence had ſhamefully loſt a few of their ſhippes: and they themſelues more ſhamefully had driuen out of their citie, the nobleſt ſouldier, and moſt skilfull captaine that they had. And yet they had ſome litle poore hope left, that they were not altogether caſt away, ſo long as Alcibiades liued, and had his health. For before, when he was a forſaken man, and led a baniſhed life, yet he could not liue idlely, and do nothing: wherefore now much more, ſaid they to themſelues, if there be any helpe at all, he will not ſuffer out of doubt the inſolencie and pride of the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yet abide the cruelties and outrages of theſe thirty tyraunts. And ſurely the common people had ſome reaſon to haue theſe thoughts in their heades, conſidering that the thirty gouernors themſelues did what they could poſſibly to ſpye out Alcibiades doings, and what he went about. Inſomuch as Critias at the laſt, declared to Lyſander, that ſo long the LACEDÆMONIANS might recken themſelues Lords ouer all GREECE, as they kept from the common people the rule and authoritie of the city of ATHENS. And further he added, that notwithſtanding the people of ATHENS could well away to liue like ſubiects vnder the gouernement of a few: yet Alcibiades whileſt he liued, would neuer ſuffer them ſo to be raigned ouer, but would attempt by all deuice he could to bring a chaunge and innouation among them. Yet Lyſander would not credite theſe perſwaſions, before ſpeciall commaundement was ſent to him from the Senate of LACEDÆMON, vpon his allegiance, that he ſhould deuiſe to kill Alcibiades by all meanes he could procure: either becauſe in troth they feared the ſubtiltie of his wit, and the greatneſſe of his courage, to enterpriſe matters of great waight and danger, or elſe that they ſought to gratifie King Agis by it. Lyſander being thus ſtraightly commanded, did ſend and practiſe incontinently with Pharnabazus to execute the fact: who gaue his brother Magæus, and his vncle Suſamithres commiſſion to attempt the matter. Now was Alcibiades in a certaine village of PHRYGIA, with a concubine of his called Timandra. So he thought he dreamed one night that he had put on his concubines apparell, and how ſhe dandling him in her armes, had dreſſed his head, friſeled his haire, and painted his face, as he had bene a woman. Other ſay, that he thought Magæus ſtrake off his head, and made his bodie to be burnt: and the voice goeth, this viſion was but a litle before his death. Thoſe that were ſent to kill him, durſt not enter the houſe where he was, but ſet it on fire round about. Alcibiades ſpying the fire, got ſuch apparel and hangings as he had, and threw it on the fire, thinking to haue put it out: and ſo caſting his cloke about his left arme, tooke his naked ſword in his other hand, and ranne out of the houſe, himſelfe not once touched with fire, ſauing his clothes were a litle ſinged. Theſe murtherers ſo ſoone as they ſpied him drew backe, and ſtood a ſunder, and durſt not one of them come neare him, to ſtand and fight with him: but a farre off, they beſtowed ſo many arrowes and darts on him, that they killed him there. Now when they had left him, Timandra went and tooke his body, which ſhe wrapped vp in the beſt linnen ſhe had, and buried him as honourably as ſhe could poſſible, with ſuch things as ſhe had, and could get together. Some hold opinion that Lais, the only famous curtiſan, which they ſay was of CORINTH (though indeed ſhe was borne in a litle towne of SICILIA, called HICCARA, where ſhe was taken) was his daughter. Notwithſtanding, touching the death of Alcibiades, there are ſome that agree to all the reſt I haue written, ſauing that they ſay, it was neither Pharnabazus, nor Lyſander, nor the LACEDÆMONIANS, which cauſed him to be ſlain: but that he keeping with a young gentlewoman of a noble houſe, whome he had ſtolne away, and intiſed to folly: her brethren to reuenge this iniurie, went to ſet fire vpon the houſe where he was, and that they killed him as we haue told you, thinking to leape out of the fire.

THE LIFE OF CAIVS Martius Coriolanus.

THE houſe of the Martians at ROME was of the number of the Patricians, out of the which haue ſprong many noble perſonages, whereof Ancus Martius was one, king Numaes daughters ſonne, who was King of ROME after Tullus Hoſtilius. Of the ſame houſe were Publius and Quintus, who brought to ROME their beſt water they had by conduits. Cenſorinus alſo came of that family, that was ſo ſurnamed, becauſe the people had choſen him Cenſor twiſe. Through whoſe perſwaſion they made a lawe, that no man from thencefoorth might require, or enioy the Cenſorſhippe twiſe. Caius Martius, whoſe life we intend now to write, being left an orphane by his father, was brought vp vnder his mother a widow, who taught vs by experience, that orphanage bringeth many diſcommodities to a child, but doth not hinder him to become an honeſt man, and to excell in vertue aboue the common ſort: as they that are meanely borne, wrongfully do complaine, that it is the occaſion of their caſting away, for that no man in their youth taketh any care of them to ſee them well brought vp, and taught that were meete. This man alſo is a good proofe to confirme ſome mens opinions: That a rare and excellent wit vntaught, doth bring foorth many good and euill things together: as a fat ſoile that lyeth vnmanured bringeth foorth both hearbes and weedes. For this Martius naturall wit and great heart did maruellouſly ſtirre vp his courage to do and attempt notable acts. But on the other ſide for lacke of education, he was ſo cholericke and impatient, that he would yeeld to no liuing creature: which made him churliſh, vnciuill, and altogether vnfit for any mans conuerſation. Yet men maruelling much at his conſtancie, that he was neuer ouercome with pleaſure, nor mony, & how he wold endure eaſily all maner of paines & trauels: therupon they well liked and commended his ſtoutneſſe and temperancy. But for all that, they could not be acquainted with him, as one citizen vſeth to be with another in the city: his behauiour was ſo vnpleaſant to them by reaſon of a certaine inſolent and ſterne manner he had, which becauſe it was too Lordly, was diſliked. And to ſay truly, the greateſt benefite that learning bringeth vnto men, is this: that it teacheth men that be rude and rough of nature, by compaſſe and rule of reaſon, to be ciuill and courteous, and to like better the meane ſtate, then the higher. Now in thoſe daies, valiantnes was honoured in ROME aboue all other vertues: which they call virtus, by the name of vertue it ſelf, as including in that generall name, all other ſpeciall vertues beſides. So that virtus in the Latin, was as much as valiantneſſe. But Martius being more inclined to the warres, then any other gentleman of his time, beganne from his childhood to giue himſelfe to handle weapons, and daily did exerciſe himſelfe therein: and he eſteemed outward armour to no purpoſe, vnleſſe one were naturally armed within. Moreouer he did ſo exerciſe his bodie to hardneſſe and all kind of actiuitie, that he was very ſwift in running, ſtrong in wreſtling, and mightie in griping, ſo that no man could euer caſt him. Inſomuch as thoſe that would try maſteries with him for ſtrength and nimbleneſſe, would ſay when they were ouercome: that all was by reaſon of his naturall ſtrength, and hardneſſe of ward, that neuer yeelded to any paine or toyle he tooke vpon him. The firſt time he went to the wars, being but a ſtripling, was when Tarquine ſurnamed the proud (that had bene king of ROME, and was driuen out for his pride, after many attempts made by ſundry battels to come in againe, wherein he was euer ouercome) did come to ROME with all the aide of the LATINES, and many other people of ITALY: euen as it were to ſet vp his whole reſt vpon a battel by them, who with a great and mighty army had vndertaken to put him into his kingdome againe, not ſo much to pleaſure him, as to ouerthrow the power of the ROMAINES, whoſe greatneſſe they both feared and enuied. In this battell, wherein were many hote and ſharpe encounters of either party, Martius valiantly fought in the ſight of the Dictator: and a ROMAINE ſouldier being throwne to the ground euen hard by him, Martius ſtraight beſtrid him, and ſlue the enemie with his owne hands that had before ouerthrowne the ROMAINE. Hereupon, after the battell was won, the Dictator did not forget ſo noble an act, and therefore firſt of all he crowned Martius with a garland of oken boughes. For whoſoeuer ſaueth the life of a ROMAINE, it is a maner among them, to honour him with ſuch a garland. This was, either becauſe the law did this honour to the oke, in fauour of the ARCADIANS, who by the oracle of Apollo were in old time called eaters of akornes: or elſe becauſe the ſouldiers might eaſily in euery place come by oken boughs: or laſtly, becauſe they thought it very neceſſarie, to giue him that had ſaued a citizens life, a crowne of this tree to honour him, being properly dedicated vnto Iupiter, the patron and protectour of Cities, and thought amongeſt other wild trees to bring forth a profitable frute, and of plants to be the ſtrongeſt. Moreouer, men at the firſt beginning did vſe akornes for their bread, and hony for their drink: and further, the oke did feed their beaſts, and giue them birds, by taking glue from the okes, with the which they made bird-lime to catch ſilly birds. They ſay that Caſtor and Pollux, appeared in this battell, and how incontinently after the battell, men ſaw them in the market place at ROME, all their horſes being on a white foame: and they were the firſt that brought newes of the victory, euen in the ſame place, where remaineth at this preſent a temple built in the honor of them, neare vnto the fountaine. And this is the cauſe, why the day of this victory (which was the fifteenth of Iuly) is conſecrated yet to this day vnto Caſtor and Pollux. Moreouer it is daily ſeene, that honour and reputation lighting on yong men before their time, and before they haue any great courage by nature, the deſire to win more dyeth ſtraight in them, which eaſily happeneth, the ſame hauing no deepe root in them before. Where contrariwiſe, the firſt honour that valiaunt minds do come vnto, doth quicken vp their appetite, haſting them forwarward as with force of wind, to enterpriſe things of high deſeruing praiſe. For they eſteeme not, to receiue reward for ſeruice done, but rather take it for a remembrance and encouragement, to make them do better in time to come: and be aſhamed alſo to caſt their honour at their heeles, not ſeeking to increaſe it ſtill by like deſert of worthy valiaunt deedes. This deſire being bred in Martius, he ſtrained ſtill to paſſe himſelfe in manlineſſe: and being deſirous to ſhew a daily increaſe of his valiantneſſe, his noble ſeruice did ſtill aduaunce his fame, bringing in ſpoyles vpon ſpoyles from the enemy. Whereupon, the captaines that came afterwards (for enuie of them that went before) did contend who ſhould moſt honor him, and who ſhould beare moſt honourable teſtimony of his valiantnes. Inſomuch as the ROMAINES hauing many warres and battels in thoſe dayes, Coriolanus was at them all: and there was not a battell fought, from whence he returned not with ſome reward of honor. And as for other, the only reſpect that made them valiant, was that they hoped to haue honor: but touching Martius, the onely thing that made him to loue honour, was the ioy he ſaw his mother did take of him. For he thought nothing made him ſo happy and honorable, as that his mother might heare euery body praiſe and commend him, that ſhe might alwaies ſee him returne with a crown vpon his his head, and that ſhe might ſtill imbrace him with teares running downe her cheekes for ioy. Which deſire they ſay Epaminondas did auow, and confeſſe to haue bene in him: as to think him ſelf a moſt happy & bleſſed man, that his father and mother in their life time had ſeen the victory he wan in the plaine of LEVCTRES. Now as for Epaminondas, he had this good hap, to haue his father and mother liuing, to be partakers of his ioy and proſperity: but Martius thinking al due to his mother, that had bene alſo due to his father if he had liued, did not only content himſelf to reioyce and honor her, but at her deſire took a wife alſo, by whom he had two children, and yet neuer left his mothers houſe therfore. Now he being growne to great credit and authority in ROME for his valiantneſſe, it fortuned there grew ſedition in the city, becauſe the Senate did fauour the rich againſt the people, who did complaine of the ſore oppreſſion of vſurers, of whom they borrowed mony. For thoſe that had litle, were yet ſpoiled of that litle they had by their creditors, for lack of ability to pay the vſury: who offered their goods to be ſold to thē that would giue moſt. And ſuch as had nothing left, their bodies were laid hold on, and they were made their bondmen, notwithſtanding all the wounds and cuts they ſhewed, which they had receiued in many battels, fighting for defence of their countrey and common wealth: of the which, the laſt warre they made was againſt the SABYNES, wherein they fought vpon the promiſe the rich men had made them, that from thenceforth they would intreat them more gently, and alſo vpon the word of Marcus Valerius chiefe of the Senate, who by authority of the Counſell, and in the behalfe of the rich, ſaid they ſhould performe that they had promiſed. But after that they had faithfully ſerued in this laſt battel of all, where they ouercame their enemies, ſeeing they were neuer a whit the better, nor more gently intreated, and that the Senate would giue no eare to them, but made as though they had forgotten their former promiſe, and ſuffered them to be made ſlaues and bond men to their creditours, and beſides, to be turned out of all that euer they had: they fell then euen to flat rebellion and mutiny, and to ſtirre vp dangerous tumults within the city. The ROMAINES enemies hearing of this rebellion, did ſtraight enter the territories of ROME with a maruellous great power, ſpoiling and burning all as they came. Whereupon the Senate immediatly made open proclamation by ſound of trumpet, that all thoſe that were of lawfull age to cary weapon, ſhould come and enter their names into the muſter-maſters book, to go to the wars: but no man obeyed their commandement. Wherupon their chiefe magiſtrates, and many of the Senate, began to be of diuers opinions among thēſelues. For ſome thought it was reaſon, they ſhould ſomewhat yeeld to the poore peoples requeſt, and that they ſhould a litle qualifie the ſeuerity of the law. Other held hard againſt that opinion, and that was Martius for one. For he alleaged, that the creditours looſing their money they had lent, was not the worſt thing that was herein: but that the lenity that was fauoured, was a beginning of diſobedience, and that the proud attempt of the communalty, was to aboliſh law, and to bring all to confuſion. Therefore he ſaid, if the Senate were wiſe, they ſhould betimes preuent and quench this ill fauoured & worſe meant beginning. The Senate met many dayes in conſultation about it: but in the end they concluded nothing. The poore common people ſeeing no redreſſe, gathered themſelues one day together, and one encouraging another, they all forſook the city, and encamped themſelues vpon a hil, called at that day the holy hill, alongſt the riuer of Tyber, offering no creature any hurt or violence, or making any ſhew of actuall rebellion: ſauing that they cried as they went vp and down, that the rich men had driuen them out of the city, and that throughout all ITALIE they might find aire, water, and ground to bury them in. Moreouer, they ſaid, to dwell at ROME was nothing els but to be ſlaine, or hurt with continuall warres, and fighting for defence of the rich mens goods. The Senate being afeard of their departure, did ſend vnto them certaine of the pleaſanteſt old men, and the moſt acceptable to the people among them. Of thoſe Menenius Agrippa was he, who was ſent for chiefe man of the meſſage from the Senate. He after many good perſwaſions and gentle requeſts made to the people, on the behalfe of the Senate, knit vp his oration in the end, with a notable tale, in this manner: That on a time all the members of mans body did rebell againſt the belly, complaining of it, that it only remained in the midſt of the body, without doing any thing, neither did beare any labour to the maintenance of the reſt: whereas all other parts and members did labour painfully, and were very carefull to ſatisfie the appetites and deſires of the body. And ſo the belly, all this notwithſtanding laughed at their folly, and ſaid: It is true, I firſt receiue all meates that nouriſh mans body: but afterwards I ſend it againe to the nouriſhment of other parts of the ſame. Euen ſo (quoth he) O you, my maſters, and citizens of ROME: the reaſon is alike betweene the Senate and you. For matters being wel digeſted, and their counſels throughly examined, touching the benefit of the common-wealth, the Senatours are cauſe of the common commodity that cometh vnto euery one of you. Theſe perſwaſions pacified the people, conditionally, that the Senate would grant there ſhould be yearely choſen fiue Magiſtrates, which they now call Tribuni plebis, whoſe office ſhould be to defend the poore people from violence & oppreſſion. So Iunius Brutus, and Sicinius Velutus, were the firſt tribunes of the people that were choſen, who had only bene the cauſers and procurers of this ſedition. Hereupon the city being growne againe to good quiet and vnity, the people immediatly went to the warres, ſhewing that they had a good will to do better then euer they did, and to be very willing to obey the Magiſtrates in that they would command, concerning the wars. Martius alſo, though it liked him nothing to ſee the greatneſſe of the people thus increaſed, conſidering it was to the preiudice and imbaſing of the Nobility, and alſo ſaw that other noble Patricians were troubled as well as himſelfe: he did perſwade the Patricians, to ſhew themſelues no leſſe forward and willing to fight for their country, then the common people were: and to let them know by their deeds and acts, that they did not ſo much paſſe the people in power and riches, as they did exceed them in true nobility and valiantneſſe. In the countrey of the VOLSCES againſt whom the ROMAINES made warre at that time, there was a principall city and of moſt fame, that was called CORIOLES, before the which the Conſul Cominius did lay ſiege. Wherfore all the other VOLSCES fearing leaſt that city ſhould be taken by aſſault, they came from all parts of the countrey to ſaue it, intending to giue the ROMAINES battell before the city, and to giue an onſet on them in two ſeuerall places. The Conſul Cominius vnderſtanding this, deuided his army alſo into two parts, and taking the one part with himſelf, he marched towards them that were drawing to the citie, out of the countrey: and the other part of his army he left in the campe with Titus Latius (one of the valianteſt men the ROMAINES had at that time) to reſiſt thoſe that would make any ſally out of the city vpon them. So the CORIOLANS making ſmal account of them that lay in camp before the city, made a ſally out vpon them, in the which at the firſt the CORIOLANS had the better, and draue the ROMAINES backe againe into the trenches of their campe. But Martius being there at that time, running out of the campe with a few men with him, he ſlue the firſt enemies he met withall, and made the reſt of them ſtay vpon the ſodain, crying out to the ROMAINES that had turned their backs, and calling thē again to fight with a loud voice. For he was euen ſuch another, as Cato would haue a ſouldier and a captaine to be, not onely terrible, and fierce to lay about him, but to make the enemy afeard with the ſound of his voice, & grimneſſe of his countenance. Thē there flocked about him immediatly, a great number of ROMAINES: whereat the enemies were ſo afeard, that they gaue back preſently. But Martius not ſtaying ſo, did chaſe & follow them to their owne gates, that fled for life. And there perceiuing that the ROMAINES retired back, for the great number of darts and arrowes which flew about their eares from the wals of the city, and that there was not one man amongſt them that durſt venter himſelf to follow the flying enemies into the citie, for that it was full of men of warre, very well armed and appointed: he did encourage his fellowes with words & deeds, crying out to thē, that fortune had opened the gates of the city, more for the followers then the fliers. But all this notwithſtanding, few had the hearts to follow him. Howbeit Martius being in the throng among the enemies, thruſt himſelfe into the gates of the city, and entred the ſame among them that fled, without that any one of them durſt at the firſt turne their face vpon him, or offer to ſtay him. But he looking about him, and ſeeing he was entred the city with very few men to helpe him, and perceiuing he was enuironed by his enemies that gathered round about to ſet vpon him: did things as it is written, wonderfull and incredible, aſwell for the force of his hand, as alſo for the agility of his body, and with a wonderfull courage and valiantneſſe he made a lane through the middeſt of them, and ouerthrew alſo thoſe he layed at: that ſome he made runne to the furtheſt part of the city, and other for feare he made yeeld themſelues, and to let fall their weapons before him. By this meanes, Martius that was gotten out, had ſome leiſure to bring the ROMAINES with more ſafety into the city. The city being taken in this ſort, the moſt part of the ſouldiers began incontinently to ſpoile, to cary away, and to looke vp the bootie they had wonne. But Martius was maruellous angry with them, and cryed out on them, that it was no time now to looke after ſpoile, and to runne ſtragling here and there to enrich themſelues, whileſt the other Conſull and their fellow citizens peraduenture were fighting with their enemies: and how that leauing the ſpoyle, they ſhould ſeeke to winde them themſelues out of daunger and perill. Howbeit, crie and ſay to them what he could, very few of them would hearken to him. Wherefore taking thoſe that willingly offered themſelues to follow him, he went out of the citie, and tooke his way towards that part, where he vnderſtood the reſt of the army was, exhorting and intreating them by the way that followed him not to be faint-hearted, and oft holding vp his hands to heauen, he beſought the gods to be gracious and fauourable vnto him, that he might come in time to the battell, and in a good houre to hazard his life in defence of his country-men. Now the ROMAINES when they were put in battell ray, and ready to take their targets on their armes, and to gird them vpon their arming coates, had a cuſtome to make their willes at that very inſtant, without any manner of writing, naming him onely whom they would make their heire in the preſence of three or foure witneſſes. Martius came iuſt to that reckoning, whileſt the ſouldiers were doing after that ſort, and that the enemies were approched ſo neare, as one ſtood in view of the other. When they ſaw him at his firſt comming all bloudy, and in a ſweat, and but with a few men following him: ſome thereupon beganne to be afeard. But ſoone after, when they ſaw him runne with a liuely cheere to the Conſull, and to take him by the hand, declaring how he had taken the citie of CORIOLES, and that they ſaw the Conſul Cominius alſo kiſſe and imbrace him: then there was not a man but took heart againe to him, and beganne to be of a good courage, ſome hearing him report from point to point, the happy ſucceſſe of this exploit, and other alſo coniecturing it by ſeeing their geſtures a farre off. Then they all began to call vpon the Conſull to march forward, and to delay no longer, but to giue charge vpon the enemie. Martius asked him how the order of their enemies battell was, and on which ſide they had placed their beſt fighting men. The Conſull made him anſwere, that he thought the bands which were in the vaward of their battell, were thoſe of the ANTIATES, whom they eſteemed to be the warlikeſt men, and which for valiant courage would giue no place, to any of the hoaſt of their enemies. Then prayed Martius, to be ſet directly againſt them. The Conſull graunted him, greatly praiſing his courage. Then Martius, when both armies came almoſt to ioyne, aduaunced himſelfe a good ſpace before his company, and went ſo fiercely to giue charge on the vaward that came right againſt him, that they could ſtand no longer in his hands: he made ſuch a lane through them, and opened a paſſage into the battell of the enemies. But the two wings of either ſide turned one to the other, to compaſſe him in betweene them: which the Conſull Cominius perceiuing, he ſent thither ſtraight of the beſt ſouldiers he had about him. So the battell was maruellous bloudie about Martius, and in a very ſhort ſpace many were ſlaine in the place. But in the end the ROMAINES were ſo ſtrong, that they diſtreſſed the enemies, and brake their arraye: and ſcattering them, made them flye. Then they prayed Martius that he would retire to the campe, becauſe they ſawe he was able to doe no more, he was alreadie ſo wearied with the great paine he had taken, and ſo faint with the great woundes he had vpon him. But Martius aunſwered them, that it was not for conquerours to yeeld, nor to be faint harted: and thereupon began afreſh to chaſe thoſe that fledde, vntill ſuch time as the armie of the enemies was vtterly ouerthrowne, and numbers of them ſlaine and taken priſoners. The next morning betimes, Martius went to the Conſull, and the other ROMAINES with him. There the Conſull Cominius going vp to his chayre of ſtate, in the preſence of the whole armie, gaue thankes to the goddes for ſo great, glorious, and proſperous a victorie: then he ſpake to Martius, whoſe valiantneſſe he commended beyond the Moone, both for that he himſelfe ſawe him do with his eyes, as alſo for that Martius had reported vnto him. So in the ende he willed Martius, that he ſhould chooſe out of all the horſes they had taken of their enemies, and of all their goodes they had wonne (whereof there was great ſtore) tenne of euerie ſorte which he liked beſt, before any diſtribution ſhould be made to other. Beſides this great honourable offer he had made him, he gaue him in teſtimonie that he had wonne that day the price of prowẽſſe aboue all other, a goodly horſe with a cappariſon, and all furniture to him: which the whole armie beholding, did maruellouſly praiſe and commend. But Martius ſtepping forth, told the Conſull, he moſt thankfully accepted the gift of his horſe, and was a glad man beſides, that his ſeruice had deſerued his Generals commendation: and as for his other offer, which was rather a mercenarie reward, then an honourable recompence, he would haue none of it, but was contented to haue his equall part with the other ſouldiers. Onely, this grace (ſayd he) I craue and beſeech you to graunt me: Among the VOLSCES there is an old friend and hoſt of mine, an honeſt wealthy man, and now a priſoner, who liuing before in great wealth in his owne countrey, liueth now a poore prisoner, in the hands of his enemies: & yet notwithstanding all this his misery & misfortune, it would do me great pleasure if I could saue him from this one daunger: to keepe him from being sold as a slaue. The souldiers hearing Martius words, made a maruellous great shout among them: and there were more that wondred at his great contentation and abstinence, when they saw so litle couetousnesse in him, then they were that highly praised and extolled his valiantnesse. For euen they themselues that did somewhat malice and enuy his glory, to see him thus honoured and passingly praised, did thinke him so much the more worthy of an honourable recompence for his valiant seruice, as the more carelesly he refused the great offer made vnto him for his profit: and they esteemed more the vertue that was in him, that made him refuse such rewards, then that which made them to be offered to him, as vnto a worthy person. For it is farre more commendable, to vse riches well, then to be valiant: and yet it is better not to desire them then to vse them well. After this shout and noise of the assembly was somewhat appeased, the Consull Cominius beganne to speake in this sort: We cannot compell Martius to take these gifts we offer him if he will not receiue them: but we will giue him such a reward for the noble seruice he hath done, as he cannot refuse. Therefore we do order and decree, that henceforth he be called Coriolanus, vnlesse his valiant acts haue wonne him that name before our nomination. And so euer since, he still bare the third name of Coriolanus. And thereby it appeareth, that the first name the ROMAINES haue, as Caius: was as our Christian name now. The second, as Martius: was the name of the house and family they came of. The third, was some addition giuen, either for some act or notable seruice, or for some marke on their face, or of some shape of their body, or else for some speciall vertue they had. Euen so did the GRECIANS in old time giue additions to Princes, by reason of some notable act worthy memory. As when they haue called some, Soter and Callinicos, as much to say as sauiour and conquerour. Or els of some notable apparant mark on ones face, or on his body, they haue called him Phiscon and Grypos: as ye would say, gorebelly, and hooke nosed: or else for some vertue, as Euergetes, and Phyladelphos: to wit, a benefactour, and louer of his brethren. Or otherwise for ones great felicitie, as Eudæmon: as much to say, as fortunate. For so was the second of the* Battes surnamed. And some Kings haue had surnames of ieast and mockery. As one of the Antigones that was called Doson, to say, the Giuer: who was euer promising, and neuer giuing. And one of the Ptolomees was called Lamyros: to say, conceitiue. The ROMAINES vse more then any other nation, to giue names of mockery in this sort. As there was one Metellus surnamed Didematus the banded: because he caried a band about his head of long time, by reason of a sore he had in his forehead. One other of his owne family was called Celer, the quicke flie: because a few dayes after the death of his father, he shewed the people the cruell fight of fencers at vnrebated swords, which they found wonderfull for the shortnesse of time. Other had their surnames deriued of some accident of their birth. As to this day they call him Proculeius, that is borne, his father being in some farre voyage: and him Posthumius, that is borne after the death of his father. And when of two brethren twins, the one doth die, and the other suruiueth: they call the suruiuer, Vopiscus. Sometimes also they giue surnames deriued of some marke or misfortune of the body: as Sylla, to say, crooked nosed: Niger, blacke: Rufus, red: Cæcus, blind: Claudus, lame. They did wisely in this thing to accustome men to thinke, that neither the losse of their sight, nor other such misfortunes as may chance to men, are any shame or disgrace vnto them, but the manner was to answer boldly to such names, as if they were called by their proper names. Howbeit these matters would be better amplified in other stories then this. Now when this war was ended, the flatterers of the people began to stirre vp sedition againe, without any new occasion, or iust matter offered of complaint. For they did ground this second insurrection against the Nobility and Patricians, vpon the peoples misery and misfortune, that could not but fall out, by reason of the former discord & sedition between them and the Nobility. Because the most part of the arable land within the territory of ROME, was become heathy & barre for lack of plowing, for that they had no time nor meane to cause corne to be brought thē out of other countries to sow, by reason of their wars which made the extreme dearth they had among them. Now those busie prattlers that sought the peoples good will by such flattering words, perceiuing great scarsity of corne to be within the city, & though there had bin plenty enough, yet the common people had no mony to buy it: they spread abroad false tales and rumors against the Nobility, that they in reuenge of the people, had practised and procured the extreme dearth among thē. Furthermore, in the midst of this stir, there came came Abaſſadours to ROME from the citie of VELITRES, that offered vp their citie to the ROMAINES, and prayed them they would ſend new inhabitants to repleniſh the ſame: becauſe the plague had bene ſo extreame among them, and had killed ſuch a number of them, as there was not left aliue the tenth perſon of the people that had bene there before. So the wiſe men of ROME began to thinke, that the neceſſitie of the VELITRIANS fell out in a moſt happy houre, and how by this occaſion it was very meete in ſo great a ſcarſitie of victuals, to disburden ROME of a great number of citizens: and by this meanes aſwell to take away this new ſedition, and vtterly to rid it out of the city, as alſo to cleare the ſame of many mutinous and ſeditious perſons, being the ſuperfluous ill humours that grieuouſly fed this diſeaſe. Hereupon the Conſuls prickt out all thoſe by a bill, whom they intended to ſend to VELITRES, to go dwell there as in forme of a colonie: and they leauied out all the reſt that remained in the citie of ROME, a great number to go againſt the VOLSCES, hoping by the meane of forraine warre, to pacifie their ſedition at home. Moreouer they imagined, when the poore with the rich, and the meane ſort with the Nobilitie, ſhould by this deuiſe be abroad in the warres, and in one campe, and in one ſeruice, and in one like danger: that then they would be more quiet and louing together. But Sicinius and Brutus, two ſeditious Tribunes, ſpake againſt either of theſe deuiſes, and cried out vpon the noble men, that vnder the gentle name of a Colonie, they would cloake and colour the moſt cruell and vnnaturall fact as might be: becauſe they ſent their poore citizens into a ſore infected citie and peſtilent ayre, full of dead bodies vnburied, and there alſo to dwell vnder the tuition of a ſtrange god, that had ſo cruelly perſecuted his people. This were (ſaid they) euen as much, as if the Senate ſhould headlong caſt downe the people into a moſt bottomleſſe pit. And are not yet contented to haue famiſhed ſome of the poore citizens heretofore to death, & to put other of them euen to the mercie of the plague: but a freſh they haue procured a voluntary warre, to the end they would leaue behind no kind of miſery and ill, wherewith the poore ſilly people ſhould not be plagued, and onely becauſe they are weary to ſerue the rich. The common people being ſet on a broile and brauery with theſe words, would not appeare when the Conſuls called their names by a bill, to preſt them for the warres, neither would they be ſent out to this new colonie: inſomuch as the Senate knew not well what to ſay or do in the matter. Martius then, who was now growne to great credit, and a ſtout man beſides, and of great reputation with the nobleſt men of ROME, roſe vp, and openly ſpake againſt theſe flattering Tribunes. And for the repleniſhing of the citie of VELITRES, he did compell thoſe that were choſen to go thither, and to depart the citie, vpon great penalties to him that ſhould diſobey: but to the warres, the people by no meanes would be brought or conſtrained. So Martius taking his friends and followers with him and ſuch as he could by faire words intreat to go with him, did runne certaine forreys into the dominion of the ANTIATES, where he met with great plenty of corne, and had a maruellous great ſpoile, aſwell of cattell as of men he had taken priſoners, whom he brought away with him, and reſerued nothing for himſelfe. Afterwards, hauing brought backe againe all his men that went out with him, ſafe and ſound to ROME, and euery man rich and loaden with ſpoile: then the home-tarriers and houſe-doues that kept ROME ſtil, began to repent them that it was not their hap to go with him, and ſo enuied them both that had ſped ſo well in this iourney, and alſo of malice to Martius, they ſpited to ſee his credit and eſtimation increaſe ſtill more and more, becauſe they accounted him to be a great hinderer of the people. Shortly after this, Martius ſtood for the Conſulſhip: and the common people fauoured his ſute, thinking it would be a ſhame to them to deny and refuſe the chiefeſt noble man of bloud, and moſt worthy perſon of ROME, and ſpecially him that had done ſo great ſeruice and good to the common-wealth. For the cuſtome of ROME was at that time, that ſuch as did ſue for any office, ſhould for certaine dayes before be in the market place, onely with a poore gowne on their backes, and without any coate vnderneath, to pray the citizens to remember them at the day of election: which was thus deuiſed, either to moue the people the more, by requeſting them in ſuch meane apparell, or elſe becauſe they might ſhew them their wounds they had gotten in the warres in the ſeruice of the common-wealth, as manifeſt markes and teſtimony of their valiantneſſe. Now it is not to be thought that the ſuters went thus looſe in a ſimple gowne in the market place, without any coate vnder it, for feare, and ſuſpition of the common people: for offices of dignity in the city were not then giuen by fauour or corruption. It was but of late time, and long after this, that buying and ſelling fell out in election of officers, and that the voices of the electours were bought for money. But after

Offices giuen then by deſert, without fauor or corruption.

corruption had once gotten way into the election of offices, it hath runne from man to man, euen to the very sentence of Iudges, and also among captaines in the warres: so as in the end, that onely turned common wealths into Kingdomes, by making armes subiect to money. Therefore me thinkes he had reason that said: he that first made banquets, and gaue money to the common people, was the first that tooke away authority, and destroyed common wealth. But this pestilence crept in by litle and litle, and did secretly win ground still, continuing a long time in ROME, before it was openly knowne and discouered. For no man can tell who was the first man that bought the peoples voices for mony, nor that corrupted the sentence of the Iudges. Howbeit at ATHENS some hold opinion, that Anytus, the sonne of Anthemion, was the first that fed the Iudges with money, about the end of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, being accused of treason for yeelding vp the fort of PYLE at that time, when the golden and vnfoiled age remained yet whole in iudgement at ROME. Now Martius following this custome, shewed many wounds and cuts vpon his body, which he had receiued in seuenteene yeares seruice at the warres, and in many sundry battels, being euer the foremost man that did set out feete to fight. So that there was not a man among the people, but was ashamed of himselfe, to refuse so valiant a man: and one of them said to another: we must needs chuse him Consul, there is no remedy. But when the day of election was come, & that Martius came to the market place with great pomp, accompanied with all the Senate, and the whole Nobilitie of the citie about him, who sought to make him Consull, with the greatest instance and intreatie they could, or euer attempted for any man or matter: then the loue and good will of the common people, turned straight to an hate and enuy toward him, fearing to put this office of soueraigne authoritie into his hands, being a man somewhat partiall toward the Nobilitie, and of great credit and authoritie amongst the Patricians, and as one they might doubt would take away altogether the liberty from the people. Wherupon for these considerations, they refused Martius in the end, and made two other that were suters, Consuls. The Senate being maruellously offended with the people, did account the shame of this refusall, rather to redound to themselues then to Martius: but Martius tooke it in farre worse part then the Senate, and was out of all patience. For he was a man too ful of passion and choller, and too much giuen ouer to selfe-wil & opinion, as one of a high mind and great courage, that lacked the grauitie and affabilitie that is gotten with iudgement of learning & reason, which only is to be looked for in a gouernour of State: and that remembred not how wilfulnesse is the thing of the world, which a gouernour of a common-wealth for pleasing should shun, being that which Plato called solitarinesse. As in the end, all men that are wilfully giuen to a selfe opinion and obstinate mind, and who will neuer yeeld to others reason, but to their owne: remaine without company, and forsaken of all men. For a man that will liue in the world, must needs haue patience, which lustie blouds make but a mocke at. So Martius being a stout man of nature, that neuer yeelded in any respect, as one thinking that to ouercome alwayes, and to haue the vpper hand in all matters, was a token of magnanimity, and of no base & faint courage, which spitteth out anger from the most weake and passioned part of the heart, much like the matter of an impostume: went home to his house, full fraighted with spite and malice against the people, being accompanied with all the lustiest yong gentlemen, whose minds were nobly bent, as those that came of noble race, and commonly vsed for to follow and honor him. But then specially they flockt about him, and kept him company to his much harme: for they did but kindle and inflame his choller more and more, being sory with him for the iniury the people offered him, because he was their captaine and leader to the warres, that taught them all marshal discipline, and stirred vp in them a noble emulation of honour and valiantnesse, and yet without enuy, praising them that deserued best. In the meane season, there came great plenty of corne to ROME, that had bene bought, part in ITALY, and part was sent out of SICILE, as giuen by Gelon the tyrant of SYRACVSA: so that many stood in great hope, that the dearth of victuals being holpen, the ciuill dissention would also cease. The Senate sate in counsell vpon it immediatly, the common people stood also about the pallace where the counsell was kept, gaping what resolution would fall out: perswading themselues that the corne they had bought should be sold good cheape, and that which was giuen should be deuided by the pole, without paying any pennie, and the rather, because certaine of the Senatours amongst them did so wish and perswade the same. But Martius standing vpon his feete, did somewhat sharpely take vp those, who went about to gratifie the people therein: and called them people-pleasers, and traitours to the Nobilitie. Moreouer he said, they nourished against themselues, the naughtie

naughtie ſeede and cockle of inſolencie and ſedition, which had bene ſowed and ſcattered abroad amongſt the people, which they ſhould haue cut off, if they had bene wiſe, in their grouth: and not (to their owne deſtruction) haue ſuffered the people, to ſtabliſh a magiſtrate for themſelues, of ſo great power and authority, as that man had, to whom they had granted it. Who was alſo to be feared, becauſe he obtained what he would, and did nothing but what he liſted, neither paſſed for any obedience to the Conſuls, but liued in all liberty, acknowledging no ſuperiour to commaund him, ſauing the onely heads and authours of their faction, whom he called his magiſtrates. Therefore ſaid he, they that gaue counſell, and perſwaded that the corne ſhould be giuen out to the common people gratis, as they vſed to do in the cities of GRECE, where the people had more abſolute power: did but only nouriſh their diſobedience, which would breake out in the end, to the vtter ruine and ouerthrow of the whole ſtate. For they will not thinke it is done in recompence of their ſeruice paſt, ſithence they know well enough they haue ſo oft refuſed to go to the warres, when they were commanded: neither for their mutinies when they went with vs, whereby they haue rebelled and forſaken their country: neither for their accuſations which their flatterers haue preferred vnto them, and they haue receiued, and made good againſt the Senate: but they will rather iudge, we giue and graunt them this, as abaſing our ſelues, and ſtanding in feare of them, and glad to flatter them euery way. By this meanes their diſobedience will ſtill grow worſe and worſe: and they will neuer leaue to practiſe new ſedition and vprores. Therefore it were a great folly for vs, me thinks to do it: yea, ſhall I ſay more? we ſhould if we were wiſe, take from them their Tribuneſhip, which moſt manifeſtly is the embaſing of the Conſulſhip, and the cauſe of the diuiſion of the citie. The ſtate whereof as it ſtandeth, is not now as it was wont to be, but becometh diſmembred in two factions, which maintaines alwaies ciuill diſſention and diſcord betweene vs, and will neuer ſuffer vs againe to be vnited into one body. Martius dilating the matter with many ſuch like reaſons, won all the young men, & almoſt all the rich men to his opinion: inſomuch as they rang it out, that he was the only man, and alone in the city, who ſtood out againſt the people, and neuer flattered them. There were only a few old men that ſpake againſt him, fearing leſt ſome miſchiefe might fall out vpon it, as indeed there followed no great good afterward. For the Tribunes of the people, being preſent at this conſultation of the Senate, when they ſaw that the opinion of Martius was confirmed with the more voyces, they left the Senate, and went downe to the people, crying out for help, and that they would aſſemble to ſaue their Tribunes. Hereupon the people ran on head in tumult together, before whom the words that Martius ſpake in the Senate were openly reported: which the people ſo ſtomached, that euen in that furie they were ready to fly vpon the whole Senate. But the Tribunes laid all the fault and burthen wholly vpon Martius, and ſent their ſergeants foorthwith to arreſt him, preſently to appeare in perſon before the people, to anſwer the words he had ſpoken in the Senate. Martius ſtoutly withſtood theſe officers that came to arreſt him. Then the Tribunes in their owne perſons, accompanied with the Ædiles, went to fetch him by force, and ſo laid violent hands vpon him. Howbeit the noble Patricians gathering together about him, made the Tribunes giue backe, and laid ſore vpon the Ædiles: ſo for that time, the night parted them, and the tumult appeaſed. The next morning betimes, the Conſuls ſeeing the people in an vprore, running to the market place out of all parts of the citie, they were afraid leſt all the city would together by the eares: wherefore aſſembling the Senate in all haſt, they declared how it ſtood them vpon, to appeaſe the furie of the people, with ſome gentle words, or gratefull decrees in their fauour: and moreouer, like wiſe men they ſhould conſider, it was now no time to ſtand at defence and in contention, nor yet to fight for honour againſt the communaltie, they being faine to ſo great an extremitie, and offering ſuch imminent daunger. Wherefore they were to conſider temperately of things, and to deliuer ſome preſent and gentle pacification. The moſt part of the Senatours that were preſent at this counſell, thought this opinion beſt, and gaue their conſents vnto it. Wherupon the Conſuls riſing out of counſel, went to ſpeak vnto the people as gently as they could, and they did pacifie their furie and anger, purging the Senate of all the vniuſt accuſations laid vpon them, and vſed great modeſty in perſwading them, and alſo in reprouing the faults they had committed. And as for the reſt, that touched the ſale of corne: they promiſed there ſhould be no diſliking offered them in the price. So the moſt part of the people being pacified, and appearing ſo plainely by the great ſilence that was among them, as yeelding to the Conſuls, and liking well of their words: the Tribunes then of the people

rose out of their seates, and said: Forasmuch as the Senate yeelded vnto reason, the people also for their part, as became them, did likewise giue place vnto them: but notwithstanding, they would that Martius should come in person to answer to the articles they had deuised. First, whether he had not solicited and procured the Senate to chaunge the present state of the commonweale, and to take the soueraigne authoritie out of the peoples hands. Next, when he was sent for by authority of their officers, why he did contemptuously resist and disobey. Lastly, seeing he had driuen and beaten the Ædiles into the market place before all the world: if in doing this, he had not done as much as in him lay, to raise ciuill wars, and to set one citizen against another. All this was spoken to one of these two ends, either that Martius against his nature should be cõstrained to humble himselfe, and to abase his haughtie and fierce mind: or else if he contiued still in his stoutnesse, he should incurre the peoples displeasure and ill will so far, that he should neuer possibly win them againe. Which they hoped would rather fall out so, then otherwise: as indeed they gessed vnhappily, considering Martius nature & disposition. So Martius came & presented himselfe, to answer their accusations against him, and the people held their peace, and gaue attentiue eare, to heare what he would say. But where they thought to haue heard very humble and lowly words come from him, he began not only to vse his wonted boldnesse of speaking (which of it selfe was very rough and vnpleasant, and did more aggrauate his accusation, then purge his innocencie) but also gaue himselfe in his words to thunder, and looke therewithall so grimly, as though he made no reckening of the matter. This stirred coales among the people, who were in wonderfull furie at it, and their hate and malice grew so toward him, that they could hold no longer, beare, nor indure his brauery and careless boldnesse. Whereupon Sicinius, the cruellest and stoutest of the Tribunes, after he had whispered a litle with his companions, did openly pronounce in the face of all the people, Martius as condemned by the Tribunes to dy. Then presently he commaunded the Ædiles to apprehend him, and cary him straight to the rocke Tarpeian, and to cast him headlong downe the same. When the Ædiles came to lay hands vpon Martius to do that they were commaunded, diuers of the people themselues thought it too cruell and violent a deed. The noble men also being much troubled to see such force and rigor vsed, began to crie aloud; helpe Martius: so those that laide hands on him being repulsed, they compassed him in round among themselues, and some of them holding vp their hands to the people, besought them not to handle him thus cruelly. But neither their words, nor crying out could ought preuaile, the tumult and hurly burly was so great, vntill such time as the Tribunes owne friends and kinsemen weying with themselues the impossibleness to conuey Martius to execution, without great slaughter and murder of the nobilitie: did perswade and aduise not to proceed in so violent and extraordinarie a sort, as to put such a man to death, without lawfull processe in law, but that they should referre the sentence of his death, to the free voice of the people. Then Sicinius bethinking himselfe a litle, did aske the Patricians, for what cause they tooke Martius out of the officers hands that went to do execution? The Patricians asked him againe, why they would of themselues so cruelly and wickedly put to death, so noble and valiaunt a Romaine as Martius was, and that without law or iustice? Well, then said Sicinius, if that be the matter, let there be no quarrell or dissention against the people: for they do graunt your demaund, that his cause shall be heard according to the law. Therefore said he to Martius, we do will and charge you to appeare before the people, the third day of our next sitting and assembly here, to make your purgation for such articles as shall be obiected against you, that by free voyce the people may giue sentence vpon you as shall please them. The noble men were glad then of the adiornment, and were much pleased they had gotten Martius out of this danger. In the meane space, before the third day of their next session came about, the same being kept euery ninth day continually at Rome, whereupon they call it now in Latine, Nundinæ: there fell out war against the Antiates, which gaue some hope to the nobilitie, that this adiornment would come to litle effect, thinking that this warre would hold them so long, as that the furie of the people against him would be well swaged, or vtterly forgotten, by reason of the trouble of the warres. But contrarie to expectation, the peace was concluded presently with the Antiates, and the people returned againe to Rome. Then the Patricians assembled oftentimes together, to consult how they might stand to Martius, and keepe the Tribunes from occasion to cause the people to mutine againe, and rise against the Nobilitie. And there Appius Clodius (one that was taken euer as an heauie enemy to the people) did auow and protest, that they would vtterly abase the authoritie of the Senate,

Coriolanus hath day giuen him to answer the people.

Senate, and deſtroy the commonweale, if they would ſuffer the common people to haue authoritie by voyces to giue iudgement againſt the Nobilitie. On the other ſide againe, the moſt auncient Senatours, and ſuch as were giuen to fauour the commmon people, ſaid: that when the people ſhould ſee they had authoritie of life and death in their hands, they would not be ſo cruell and fierce, but gentle and ciuill. More alſo, that it was not for contempt of Nobility or the Senate, that they ſought to haue the authoritie of iuſtice in their hands, as a prehemínence and prerogatiue of honour: but becauſe they feared, that themſelues ſhould be contemned and hated of the Nobilitie. So as they were perſwaded, that ſo ſoone as they gaue them authoritie to iudge by voyces: ſo ſoone would they leaue all enuie and malice to condemne any. Martius ſeeing the Senate in great doubt how to reſolue, partly for the loue and goodwill the Nobilitie did beare him, and partly for the feare they ſtood in of the people: asked aloud of the Tribunes, what matter they would burden him with? The Tribunes anſwered him, that they would ſhew how he did aſpire to be King, and would proue that all his actions tended to vſurpe tyrannicall power ouer ROME. Martius with that, riſing vpon his feete, ſaid: that thereupon he did willingly offer himſelfe to the people, to be tryed vpon that accuſation. And that if it were proued by him, he had ſo much as once thought of any ſuch matter, that he would then refuſe no kind of puniſhment they would offer him: conditionally (quoth he) that you charge me with nothing elſe beſides, and that ye do not alſo abuſe the Senate. They promiſed they would not. Vnder theſe conditions the iudgement was agreed vpon, and the people aſſembled. And firſt of all the Tribunes would in any caſe (whatſoeuer became of it) that the people ſhould proceed to giue their voyces by Tribes, and not by hundreds: for by this meanes the multitude of the poore needie people (and all ſuch rabble as had nothing to looſe, and had leſſe regard of honeſty before sheir eyes) came to be of greater force (becauſe their voyces were numbred by the pole) then the noble honeſt citizens, whoſe perſons and purſe did dutifully ſerue the common-wealth in their wars. And then when the Tribunes ſaw they could not proue he went about to make him ſelfe King, they beganne to broach afreſh the former words that Martius had ſpoken in the Senate, in hindering the diſtribution of the corne at meane price vnto the common people, and perſwading alſo to take the office of Tribuneſhip from them. And for the third, they charged him a new, that he had not made the common diſtribution of the ſpoyle he had gotten in the inuading the territories of the ANTIATES: but had of his owne authoritie deuided it among them, who were with him in that iourney. But this matter was moſt ſtraunge of all to Martius, looking leaſt to haue bene burdened with that, as with any matter of offence. Whereupon being burdened on the ſodaine, and hauing no readie excuſe to make euen at that inſtant: he began to fall a praiſing of the ſouldiers that had ſerued with him in that iourney. But thoſe that were not with him, being the greater number, cryed out ſo loude, and made ſuch a noiſe that he could not be heard. To conclude, when they came to tell the voyces of the Tribes, there were three voyces odde, which condemned him to be baniſhed for euer. After declaration of the ſentence, the people made ſuch ioy, as they neuer reioyced more for any battell they had wonne vpon their enemies, they were ſo braue and liuely, and went home ſo iocondly from the aſſembly, for triumph of this ſentence. The Senate againe in contrarie manner were as ſadde and heauie, repenting themſelues beyond meaſure, that they had not rather determined to haue done and ſuffered any thing whatſoeuer, before the common people ſhould ſo arrogantly and outragiouſly haue abuſed their authoritie. There needed no difference of garments I warrant you, nor outward ſhewes to know a Plebeian from a Patrician, for they were eaſily diſcerned by their lookes. For he that was on the peoples ſide, looked chearely on the matter: but he that was ſad, and hung downe his head, he was ſure of the Noble mens ſide. Sauing Martius alone, who neither in his countenance nor in his gate, did euer ſhew himſelfe abaſhed, or once let fall his great courage: but he onely of all other gentlemen that were angry at his fortune, did outwardly ſhew no manner of paſſion, nor care at all of himſelfe. Not that he did patiently beare and temper his euill hap, in reſpect of any reaſon he had, or by his quiet condition: but becauſe he was ſo caried away with the vehemencie of anger, and deſire of reuenge, that he had no ſenſe nor feeling of the hard ſtate he was in, which the common people iudge not to be ſorrow, although indeed it be the very ſame. For when ſorow (as you would ſay) is ſet on fire, then it is cõuerted into ſpite and malice, and driueth away for that time all faintneſſe of heart and naturall feare. And this is the cauſe why the cholerick man is ſo altered and mad in his actions, as a man

ſet on fire with a burning agew: for when a mans heart is troubled within, his pulſe will beate maruellous ſtrongly. Now that Martius was euen in that taking, it appeared true ſoone after by his doings. For when he was come home to his houſe again, & had taken his leaue of his mother and wife, finding them weeping and ſhreeking out for ſorrow, and had alſo comforted and perſwaded them to be content with his chaunce: he went immediatly to the gate of the citie, accompanied with a great number of Patricians that brought him thither, from whence he went on his way with three or foure of his friends onely, taking nothing with him, nor requeſting any thing of any man. So he remained a few daies in the country at his houſes, turmoyled with ſundry ſorts and kinds of thoughts, ſuch as the fire of his choler did ſtirre vp. In the end, ſeeing he could reſolue no way, to take a profitable or honourable courſe, but onely was pricked forward ſtill to be reuenged of the ROMAINES: he thought to raiſe vp ſome great warres againſt them, by their neareſt neighbours. Whereupon he thought it his beſt way, firſt to ſtirre vp the VOLSCES againſt them, knowing they were yet able enough in ſtrength and riches to encounter them, notwithſtanding their former loſſes they had receiued not long before, and that their power was not ſo much impaired, as their malice and deſire was increaſed to be reuenged of the ROMAINES. Now in the citie of ANTIVM, there was one called Tullus Auſidius, who for his riches, as alſo for his nobilitie and valiantneſſe was honoured among the VOLSCES as a King. Martius knew very well that Tullus did more malice and enuie him, then he did all the ROMAINES beſides: becauſe that many times in battels where they met, they were euer at the encounter one againſt another, like luſty couragious youths, ſtriuing in all emulation of honour, and had encountred many times together. Inſomuch as beſides the common quarrell betweene them, there was bred a maruellous priuate hate one againſt another. Yet notwithſtanding, conſidering that Tullus Auſidius was a man of a great mind, and that he aboue all other of the VOLSCES moſt deſired reuenge of the ROMAINES, for the iniuries they had done vnto them: he did an act that confirmed the words of an auncient Poet to be true, who ſaid:

Tullus Auſidius, a great perſon among the Volſces.

It is a thing full hard, mans anger to withſtand,
if it be ſtiffely bent to take an enterpriſe in hand.
For then moſt men will haue the thing that they deſire, although it coſt their liues therefore, ſuch force hath wicked ire.

And ſo did he. For he diſguiſed himſelfe in ſuch array and attire, as he thought no man could euer haue knowne him for the perſon he was, ſeeing him in that apparell he had vpon his backe: and as Homer ſaid of Vlyſſes:

So did he enter into the enemies towne.

Coriolanus diſguiſed, goeth to Antium, a city of the Volſces.

It was euen twi-light when he entred the citie of ANTIVM, and many people met him in the ſtreetes, but no man knew him. So he went directly to Tullus Auſidius houſe, and when he came thither, he got him vp ſtraight to the chimney harth, and ſate him downe, and ſpake not a word to any man, his face all muffled ouer. They of the houſe ſpying him, wondred what he ſhould be, and yet they durſt not bid him riſe. For il fauouredly muffled and diſguiſed as he was, yet there appeared a certaine maieſtie in his countenance, and in his ſilence: whereupon they went to Tullus who was at ſupper, to tell him of the ſtrange diſguiſing of this man. Tullus roſe preſently from the board, and comming towards him, asked him what he was, and wherefore he came. Then Martius vnmuffled himſelfe, and after he had pawſed awhile, making no anſwer, he ſaid vnto him: If thou knoweſt me not yet, Tullus, and ſeeing me, doeſt not perhappes beleeue me to be the man I am indeed, I muſt of neceſſitie bewray my ſelfe to be that I am. I am Caius Martius, who hath done to thy ſelfe particularly, and to all the VOLSCES generally, great hurt and miſchiefe, which I cannot deny for my ſurname of Coriolanus that I beare. For I neuer had other benefit nor recompence, of the true and painefull ſeruice I haue done, and the extreame daungers I haue bene in, but this only ſurname: a good memorie and witneſſe of the malice and diſpleaſure thou ſhouldeſt beare me. Indeed the name only remaineth with me: for the reſt, the enuie and crueltie of the people of ROME haue taken from me, by the ſufferance of the daſtardly nobilitie and magiſtrates, who haue forſaken me, and let me be baniſhed by the people. This extremitie hath now driuen me to come as a poore ſuter, to take thy chimney harth, not of any hope I haue to ſaue my life thereby. For if I had feared death, I would not haue come hither to haue put my life in hazard: but prickt forward with deſire to be reuenged of them that thus haue baniſhed me, which now I do beginne, in putting my perſon into the hands of their enemies.

enemies. Wherefore, if thou haſt any hart to be wrecked of the iniuries thy enemies haue done thee, ſpeed thee now, & let my miſerie ſerue thy turne, & ſo vſe it, as my ſeruice may be a benefit to the VOLSCES: promiſing thee, that I will fight with better good will for all you, then I did whē I was againſt you, knowing that they fight more valiātly, who know the force of the enemy, then ſuch as haue neuer proued it. And if it be ſo that thou dare not, and that thou art wearie to proue fortune any more: then am I alſo wearie to liue any longer. And it were no wiſedome in thee, to ſaue the life of him, who hath bene heretofore thy mortall enemie, and whoſe ſeruice now can nothing help nor pleaſure thee. Tullus hearing what he ſaid, was a maruellous glad man, and taking him by the hand, he ſaid vnto him. Stand vp, ô Martius, and be of good cheare, for in profering thy ſelfe vnto vs, thou doſt vs great honour: and by this meanes thou maiſt hope alſo of greater things at all the VOLSCES hands. So he feaſted him for that time, and entertained him in the honorableſt manner he could, talking with him of no other matters at that preſent: but within few daies after, they fell to conſultation together in what ſort they ſhould beginne their wars. Now on the other ſide, the citie of ROME was in maruellous vprore and diſcord, the nobilitie againſt the communaltie, and chiefly for Martius condemnation and baniſhment. Moreouer the Prieſts, the Soothſayers, and priuate men alſo, came and declared to the Senate certaine ſights and wonders in the aire, which they had ſeene, and were to be conſidered of: amongſt the which ſuch a viſion happened: There was a citizen of ROME called Titus Latinus, a man of meane quality and condition, but otherwiſe an honeſt ſober man, giuen to a quiet life, without ſuperſtition, and much leſſe to vanitie or lying. This man had a viſion in his dreame, in the which he thought that Iupiter appeared vnto him, and commanded him to ſignifie to the Senate, that they had cauſed a very vile lewd dauncer to go before the proceſſion: and ſaid, the firſt time this viſion had appeared vnto him, he made no reckening of it: and comming againe another time into his mind, he made not much more account of the matter then before. In the end, he ſaw one of his ſons dye, who had the beſt nature and condition of all his brethren: and ſuddenly he himſelfe was ſo taken in all his lims, that he became lame and impotent. Hereupon he told the whole circumſtance of this viſion before the Senate, ſitting vpon his litle couch or bed, whereon he was caried on mens armes: and he had no ſooner reported this viſion to the Senate, but he preſently felt his body and lims reſtored againe to their former ſtrength and vſe. So raiſing vp himſelf vpon his couch, he got vp on his feet at that inſtant, & walked home to his houſe, without helpe of any man. The Senate being amazed at this matter, made diligent enquirie to vnderſtand the truth: and in the end they found there was ſuch a thing: There was one that had deliuered a bondman of his that had offended him, into the hands of other ſlaues and bondmen, and had commaunded them to whip him vp and downe the market place, and afterwards to kill him: and as they had him in execution, whipping him cruelly, they did ſo martyr the poore wretch, that for the cruell ſmart and paine he felt, he turned and writhed his body in ſtrange and pitifull ſort. The proceſſion by chaunce came by euen at the ſame time, and many that followed it, were hartily moued & offended with the ſight, ſaying: that this was no good ſight to behold, nor meet to be met in proceſſion time. But for all this, there was nothing done: ſauing they blamed and rebuked him that puniſhed this ſlaue ſo cruelly. For the ROMAINES at that time, did vſe their bond men very gently, becauſe they themſelues did labor with their owne hands, and liued with them and among them: and therfore they did vſe them the more gently and familiarly. For the greateſt puniſhment they gaue a ſlaue that had offended, was this: They made him carie a limmer on his ſhoulders that is faſtened to the axeltree of a coach, and compelled him to go vp and downe in that ſort amongſt all their neighbors. He that had once abidden this puniſhment, and was ſeene in that maner, was proclaimed and cried in euery market towne: ſo that no man would euer truſt him after, and they called him Furcifer, becauſe the LATINES call the wood that runneth into the axeltree of the coach, Furca, as much to ſay, as a forke. Now when Latinus had made report to the Senate of the viſion that had happened to him, they were deuiſing whom this vnpleaſant dauncer ſhould be, that went before the proceſſion. Therupon certain that ſtood by, remembred the poore ſlaue that was ſo cruelly whipped through the market place, whom they afterwards put to death: and the thing that made them remember it, was the ſtraunge and rare manner of his puniſhment. The prieſts hereupon were repaired vnto for their aduice: they were wholly of opinion, that it was the whipping of the ſlaue. So they cauſed the ſlaues maiſter to be puniſhed, and began againe a new proceſſion, and all other ſhewes and ſights in honour of

A ceremony instituted by king Numa, touching religion.

Iupiter. But hereby appeareth plainely, how king Numa did wisely ordaine all other ceremonies concerning deuotion to the gods, and specially this custome which he established, to bring the people to religion. For when the magistrates, bishops, priests, or other religious ministers go about any diuine seruice, or matter of religion, an herauld euer goeth before them, crying out aloud, Hoc age: as to say, do this, or mind this. Hereby they are specially commaunded, wholly to dispose themselues to serue God, leauing all other businesse and matters aside: knowing well enough, that whatsoeuer most men do, they do it as in a manner constrained vnto it. But the ROMAINES did euer vse to begin againe their sacrifices, processions, playes, and such like shewes, done in honour of the gods, not onely vpon such an occasion, but vpon lighter causes then that.

The superstitiō of the Romans.

As when they went on procession through the citie, and did carie the images of their gods, and such other like holy reliques vpon open hallowed coaches or chariots, called in Latine Thensæ: one of the coach horses that drew them stood still, and would draw no more: and because also the coach-man tooke the raines of the bridle with the left hand, they ordained that the procession should be begunne againe a new. Of later time also, they did renew and beginne a sacrifice thirty times one after another, because they thought still there fell out one fault or other in the same: so holy and deuout were they to the gods. Now Tullus and Martius had secret conference with the greatest personages of the citie of ANTIVM, declaring vnto them, that now they had good time offered them to make warre with the ROMAINES, while they were in dissention one with another. They answered them, they were ashamed to breake the league, considering that they were sworne to keepe peace for two yeares. Howbeit, shortly after, the ROMAINES gaue them great occasion to make warre with them. For on a holy day common playes being kept in ROME, vpon some suspition, or false report, they made proclamation by sound of trumpet, that all the VOLSCES should auoid out of ROME before sunne set. Some thinke this was a craft and deceipt of Martius, who sent one to ROME to the Consuls, to accuse the VOLSCES falsely, aduertising them how they had made a conspiracie to set vpon them, whilst they were busie in seeing these games, and also to set their citie on fire. This open proclamation made all the VOLSCES more offended with the ROMAINES, then euer they were before: and Tullus aggrauating the matter, did so inflame the VOLSCES against them, that in the end they sent their ambassadours to ROME, to summon them to deliuer their lands and townes againe, which they had taken from them in times past, or to looke for present warres. The ROMAINES hearing this, were maruellously netled: and made no other aunswer but thus: If the VOLSCES be the first that begin warre, the ROMAINES will be the last that will end it. Incontinently vpon returne of the VOLSCES ambassadors, and deliuerie of the ROMAINES answer: Tullus caused an assembly generall to be made of the VOLSCES, and concluded to make warre vpon the ROMAINES. This done, Tullus did counsell them to take Martius into their seruice, and not to mistrust him for the remembrance of any thing past, but boldly to trust him in any matter to come: for he would do them more seruice in fighting for them, then euer he did them displeasure in fighting against them. So Martius was called foorth, who spake so excellently in the presence of them all, that he was thought no lesse eloquent in toung, then warlike in shew: and declared himselfe both expert in warres, and wise with valiantnesse. Thus he was ioyned in commission with Tullus as generall of the VOLSCES, hauing absolute authoritie betweene them to follow and pursue the wars. But Martius fearing lest tract of time to bring this army together with all the munition and furniture of the VOLSCES, would rob him of the meane he had to execute his purpose and intent: left order with the rulers and chiefe of the citie, to assemble the rest of their power, and to prepare all necessarie prouision for the campe. Then he with the lightest souldiers he had, and that were willing to follow him, stale away vpon the sodaine, and marched with all speed, and entred the territories of ROME, before the ROMAINES heard any newes of his comming. Insomuch as the VOLSCES found such spoile in the fields, as they had more then they could spend in their campe, and were wearie to driue and cary away that they had. Howbeit the gaine of the spoile and the hurt they did to the ROMAINES in this inuasion, was the least part of his intent: for his chiefest purpose was, to increase still the malice and dissention betweene the Nobilitie and the communaltie: and to draw that on, he was very carefull to keepe the Noble mens lands and goods safe from harme and burning, but spoiled all the whole country besides, and would suffer no man to take or hurt any thing of the noble mens. This made greater stir & broile betweene the nobility and the people, then was before. For the noble men fell out with the people, because they

they had so vniustly banished a man of so great valure and power. The people on the other side, accused the Nobility, how they had procured Martius to make these wars to be reuenged of them: because it pleased them to see their goods burnt and spoyled before their eyes, whilst themselues were well at ease, and did behold the peoples losses and misfortunes, knowing their owne goods safe and out of danger: & how the war was not made against the noble men, that had the enemy abroad, to keep that they had in safety. Now Martius hauing done this first exploit (which made the VOLSCES bolder, and lesse fearefull of the ROMAINES) brought home all the army againe, without losse of any man. After their whole army (which was maruellous great, and very forward to seruice) was assembled in one campe, they agreed to leaue part of it for garrison in the country about, & the other part should go on, and make the warre vpon the ROMAINES. So Martius bade Tullus choose, and take which of the two charges he liked best. Tullus made him answer, he knew by experience that Martius was no lesse valiant then himselfe, and how he euer had better fortune and good hap in all battels, then himselfe had. Therefore he thought it best for him to haue the leading of those that should make the warres abroad, and himselfe would keep home, to prouide for the safety of the cities of his countrey, and to furnish the campe also of all necessary prouision abroad. So Martius being stronger then before, went first of all vnto the city of CERCEES, inhabited by the ROMAINES, who willingly yeelded themselues, and therefore had no hurt. From thence he entred the countrey of the LATINES, imagining the ROMAINES would fight with him there, to defend the LATINES, who were their confederates, and had many times sent vnto the ROMAINES for their aide. But on the one side, the people of ROME were very ill willing to go: and on the other side, the Consuls being vpon going out of their office, would not hazard themselues for so small a time: so that the ambassadours of the LATINES returned home againe, and did no good. Then Martius did besiege their cities, and hauing taken by force the townes of the TOLERINIANS, VICANIANS, PEDANIANS, and the BOLANIANS, who made resistance, he sacked all their goods, and took them prisoners. Such as did yeeld themselues willingly vnto him, he was as carefull as possible might be, to defend them from hurt: and because they should receiue no damage by his will, he remoued his campe as farre from their confines as he could. Afterwards, he tooke the city of BOLES by assault, being about an hundred furlong from ROME, where he had a maruellous great spoile, and put euery man to the sword that was able to cary weapon. The other VOLSCES that were appointed to remaine in garrison for defence of their countrey, hearing this good newes, would tary no longer at home, but armed themselues, and ranne to Martius campe, saying they did acknowledge no other captaine but him. Hereupon his fame ranne through all ITALIE, and euery one praised him for a valiant captaine, for that by change of one man for another, such and so strange euents fell out in the state. In this while, all went still to wracke at ROME. For, to come into the field to fight with the enemy, they could not abide to heare of it, they were one so much against another, and full of seditious words, the Nobility against the people, and the people against the Nobility. Vntill they had intelligence at the length, that the enemies had laid siege to the city of LAVINIVM, in the which were all the temples and images of the gods their protectours, and from whence came first their auncient originall, for that AEneas at his first arriuall into ITALY did build that city. Then fell there out a maruellous sodaine change of mind among the people, and farre more strange and contrary in the Nobility. For the people thought good to repeale the condemnation and exile of Martius. The Senate assembled vpon it, would in no case yeeld to that. Who either did it of a selfe will to be contrary to the peoples desire: or because Martius should not returne thorough the grace and fauour of the people. Or else, because they were throughly angry and offended with him, that he would set vpon the whole, being offended but by a few, and in his doings would shew himselfe an open enemy besides vnto his country: notwithstanding the most part of them tooke the wrong they had done him, in maruellous ill part, and as if the iniury had bene done vnto themselues. Report being made of the Senates resolution, the people found themselues in a straight: for they could authorize and confirme nothing by their voices, vnlesse it had bene first propounded and ordained by the Senate. But Martius hearing this stirre about him, was in a greater rage with them then before: insomuch as he raised his siege incontinently before the city of LAVINIVM, and going towards ROME, lodged his campe within forty furlong of the city, at the ditches called Cluiliæ. His incamping so neare ROME, did put all the whole city in a wonderfull feare: howbeit for the present time it appeased the sedition and dissention betwixt the Nobilitie and the people. For there was no Consull, Senatour, nor Magistrate, that durst once contrary the opinion of the people, for the calling home againe of Martius. When they saw the women in a maruellous feare, running vp and downe the citie: the temples of the gods full of old people, weeping bitterly in their prayers to the gods: and finally, not a man either wise or hardy to prouide for their safetie: then they were all of opinion, that the people had reason to call home Martius againe, to reconcile themselues to him, and that the Senate on the contrary part, were in maruellous great fault to be angry and in choller with him, when it stood them vpon rather to haue gone out and intreated him. So they all agreed together to send ambassadors vnto him, to let him vnderstand how his countrey men did call him home againe, and restored him to all his goods, and besought him to deliuer them from this warre. The ambassadours that were sent, were Martius familiar friends and acquaintance, who looked at the least for a curteous welcome of him, as of their familiar friend and kinsman. Howbeit they found nothing lesse: for at their comming, they were brought through the camp, to the place where he was set in his chaire of state, with a maruellous and an vnspeakeable maiesty, hauing the chiefest men of the VOLSCES about him: so he commaunded them to declare openly the cause of their comming. Which they deliuered in the most humble and lowly words they possibly could deuise, and with all modest countenance and behauiour agreeable to the same. When they had done their message: for the iniury they had done him, he answered them very hotly, and in great choller: but as Generall of the VOLSCES, he willed them to restore vnto the VOLSCES, all their lands and cities they had taken from them in former warres: and moreouer, that they should giue them the like honour and freedome of ROME, as they had before giuen to the LATINES. For otherwise they had no other meane to end this warre, if they did not graunt these honest and iust conditions of peace. Thereupon he gaue them thirtie dayes respit to make him answere. So the ambassadours returned straight to ROME, and Martius forthwith departed with his armie out of the territories of the ROMAINES. This was the first matter wherewith the VOLSCES (that most enuied Martius glorie and authoritie) did charge Martius with. Among those, Tullus was chiefe: who though he had receiued no priuate iniury or displeasure of Martius, yet the common fault and imperfection of mans nature wrought in him, and it grieued him to see his owne reputation blemished through Martius great fame and honour, and so himselfe to be lesse esteemed of the VOLSCES then he was before. This fell out the more, because euery man honoured Martius, and thought he onely could do all, and that all other gouernours and captaines must be content with such credite and authoritie, as he would please to countenance them with. From hence they deriued all their first accusations and secret murmurings against Martius. For priuate captaines conspiring against him, were very angry with him: and gaue it out, that the remouing of the campe was a manifest treason, not of the townes, nor forts, nor of armes, but of time and occasion, which was a losse of great importance, because it was that which in reason might both loose and bind all, and preserue the whole. Now Martius hauing giuen the ROMAINES thirty dayes respit for their answere, and specially because the warres haue not accustomed to make any great changes, in lesse space of time then that, he thought it good yet, not to lie asleepe and idle all the while, but went and destroyed the lands of the enemies allies, & tooke seuen great cities of theirs well inhabited, and the ROMAINES durst not once put themselues into the field, to come to their aide and helpe: they were so faint hearted, so mistrustfull, and loth besides to make warres. Insomuch as they properly resembled the bodies paraliticke, and loosed of their limmes and members: as those which through the palsey haue lost all their sence and feeling. Wherefore, the time of peace expired, Martius being returned into the dominions of the ROMAINES againe with all his armie, they sent another ambassade vnto him, to pray peace, and the remoue of the VOLSCES out of their countrey: that afterwards they might with better leisure fall to such agreements together, as should be thought most meete and necessary. For the ROMAINES were no men that would euer yeeld for feare. But if he thought the VOLSCES had any ground to demaund reasonable articles and conditions, all that they would reasonably aske should be graunted vnto by the ROMAINES, who of themselues would willingly yeeld to reason, conditionally, that they did lay downe armes. Martius to that answered: that as Generall of the VOLSCES he would reply nothing vnto it: but yet as a ROMAINE citizen, he would counsell them to let fall their pride, and to be conformable to reason, if they were wise: and that they should returne againe within three dayes, deliuering vp the articles agreed vpon, which he

he had first deliuered them. Or otherwise, that he would no more giue them assurance or safe conduct to returne againe into his camp, with such vaine and friuolous messages. When the ambassadours were returned to Rome, and had reported Martius answer to the Senate: their citie being in extreame daunger, and as it were in a terrible storme or tempest, they threw out (as the common prouerb saith) their holy anker. For then they appointed all the Bishops, Priests, Ministers of the gods, and keepers of holy things, and all the augures or soothsayers, which foreshew things to come by obseruation of the flying of birds (which is an old auncient kind of prophecying and diuination amongst the Romaines) to go to Martius apparelled, as when they do their sacrifices: and first to intreate him to leaue off warre, and then that he would speake to his country men, and conclude peace with the Volsces. Martius suffered them to come into his camp, but yet he granted them nothing the more, neither did he entertaine them or speake more curteously to them, then he did the first time that they came vnto him, sauing onely that he willed them to take the one of the two: either to accept peace vnder the first conditions offered, or else to receiue warre. When all this goodly rabble of superstition and priestes were returned, it was determined in counsell that none should go out of the gates of the citie, and that they should watch and ward vpon the walles, to repulse their enemies if they came to assault them: referring themselues and all their hope to time, and fortunes vncertaine fauour, not knowing otherwise how to remedie the daunger. Now all the city was full of tumult, feare, and maruellous doubt what would happen: vntil at the length there fell out such a like matter, as Homer oft times said they would least haue thought of. For in great matters, that happen seldome, Homer saith, and crieth out in this sort:

did put into his mind such thoughts, and made him so deuise.

But sure some god hath taue out of the peoples mind, both wit and vnderstanding eke, and haue therewith assigned some other simple spirit, in stead thereof to bide, that so they might their doings all, for lacke of wit misguide.

And in another place:

The people of themselues did either it consider,
or else some god instructed them, and so they ioyn'd together.

Many reckon not of Homer, as referring matters vnpossible, and fables of no likelihood or troth, vnto mans reason, freewill, or iudgement: which in deed is not his meaning. But things true and likely, he maketh to depend of our owne free will and reason. For he oft speaketh these words.

I haue thought it in my noble heart:

And in another place:

Achilles angry was, and sory for to heare him so to say, his heauy breast was fraught with pensiue feare.

And againe in another place:

Bellerophon (she) could not moue with her faire tongue,
so honest and so vertuous, he was the rest among.

But in wondrous and extraordinary things, which are done by secret inspirations & motions, he doth not say that God taketh away from man his choise and freedome of will, but that he doth moue it: neither that he doth work desire in vs, but obiecteth to our minds certaine imaginations whereby we are led to desire, and thereby doth not make this our action forced, but openeth the way to our will, and addeth thereto courage, and hope of successe. For, either we must say, that the gods meddle not with the causes and beginnings of our actions: or else what other meanes haue they to helpe and further men? It is apparant that they handle not our bodies, nor moue not our feete and hands, when there is occasion to vse them: but that part of our mind from which these motions proceed, is induced thereto, or caried away by such obiects and reasons, as God offereth vnto it. Now the Romaine Ladies and gentlewomen did visit all the temples and gods of the same, to make their prayers vnto them: but the greatest Ladies (and more part of them) were continually about the altar of Iupiter Capitolin, among which troupe by name, was Valeria, Publicolaes owne sister. The self same Publicola, who did such notable seruice to the Romaines, both in peace and warres: and was dead also certaine yeares before, as we haue declared in his life.

The priests and soothsayers sent to Coriolanus.

Valeria, Publicolaes ſiſter.

His ſiſter Valeria was greatly honored and reuerenced among all the ROMAINES: and did ſo modeſtly and wiſely behaue her ſelfe, that ſhe did not ſhame nor diſhonour the houſe ſhe came off. So ſhe ſodainely fell into ſuch a fancy, as we haue rehearſed before, and had (by ſome god as I think) taken hold of a noble deuiſe. Whereupon ſhe roſe and the other Ladies with her, and they all together went ſtraight to the houſe of Volumnia, Martius mother: and comming in to her, found her, and Martius wife her daughter in law ſet together, and hauing her husband Martius yong children in her lap. Now all the traine of theſe Ladies ſitting in a ring round about her, Valeria firſt began to ſpeake in this ſort vnto her: We Ladies, are come to viſit you Ladies (my Lady Volumnia and Virgilia) by no direction from the Senate, nor commaundement of other Magiſtrate, but through the inſpiration (as I take it) of ſome god aboue: who hauing taken compaſſion and pitie of our prayers, hath moued vs to come vnto you, to intreate you in a matter, as well beneficial for vs, as alſo for the whole citizens in generall: but to your ſelues in ſpeciall (if it pleaſe you to credit me) and ſhall redound to our more fame and glory, then the daughters of the SABYNES obtained in former age, when they procured louing peace, in ſtead of hatefull warre, betweene their fathers and their husbands. Come on good Ladies, and let vs go all together vnto Martius, to intreat him to take pitie vpon vs, and alſo to report the troth vnto him, how much you are bound vnto the citizens: who notwithſtanding they haue ſuſtained great hurt and loſſes by him, yet they haue not hitherto ſought reuenge vpon your perſons by any diſcourteous vſage, neither euer conceiued any ſuch thought or intent againſt you, but do deliuer you ſafe into his hands, though thereby they looke for no better grace or clemencie from him. When Valeria had ſpoken this vnto them, all the other Ladies together with one voice confirmed that ſhe had ſaid. Then Volumnia in this ſort did anſwere her: My good Ladies, we are partakers with you of the common miſery and calamitie of our countrey, and yet our griefe exceedeth yours the more, by reaſon of our particular misfortune: to feele the loſſe of my ſon Martius former valiancy and glory, and to ſee his perſon enuironed now with our enemies in armes, rather to ſee him forth comming & ſafe kept, then of any loue to defend his perſon. But yet the greateſt griefe of our heaped miſhaps is, to ſee our poore country brought to ſuch extremity, that all the hope of the ſafety and preſeruation therof, is now vnfortunatly caſt vpon vs ſimple women: becauſe we know not what account he will make of vs, ſince he hath caſt from him all care of his naturall countrey and common-weale, which heretofore he hath holden more deare and precious, then either his mother, wife or children. Notwithſtāding, if ye think we can do good, we will willingly do what you wil haue vs: bring vs to him I pray you. For if we cānot preuaile, we may yet die at his feet, as humble ſuters for the ſafety of our country. Her anſwer ended, ſhe took her daughter in law, and Martius children with her, and being accompanied with all the other ROMAINE Ladies, they went in troupe together vnto the VOLSCES campe: whom when they ſaw, they of themſelues did both pitie and reuerence her, and there was not a man among them that once durſt ſay a word vnto her. Now was Martius ſet then in his chaire of State, with all the honours of a General, and when he had ſpied the women comming a far off, he maruelled what the matter meant: but afterwards knowing his wife which came formoſt, he determined at the firſt to perſiſt in his obſtinate and inflexible rancor. But ouercome in the end with natural affection, and being altogether altered to ſee them, his heart would not ſerue him to tarie their comming to his chaire, but coming downe in haſt, he went to meet them, and firſt he kiſſed his mother, and imbraced her a prety while, then his wife and litle children. And nature ſo wrought with him, that the teares fell from his eies, and he could not keep himſelf from making much of them, but yeelded to the affection of his bloud, as if he had bene violently caried with the fury of a moſt ſwift running ſtreame. After he had thus louingly receiued them, and perceiuing that his mother Volumnia would begin to ſpeake to him, he called the chiefeſt of the counſell of the VOLSCES to heare what ſhe would ſay. Then ſhe ſpake in this ſort: If we held our peace (my ſonne) and determined not to ſpeake, the ſtate of our poore bodies, and preſent ſight of our raiment, would eaſily bewray to thee what life we haue led at home, ſince thy exile and abode abroad, but think now with thy ſelfe, how much more vnfortunately then all the women liuing, we are come hither, conſidering that the ſight which ſhould be moſt pleaſant to all other to behold, ſpitefull fortune hath made moſt fearefull to vs: making my ſelfe to ſee my ſonne, and my daughter here, her husband, beſieging the walles of his natiue countrey: ſo as that which is the onely comfort to all other in their aduerſitie and miſerie, to pray vnto the gods, and to call to them for aide: is the onely thing which plungeth vs into moſt moſt deepe perplexitie. For we cannot (alas) together pray, both for victory, for our countrey, and for ſafety of thy life alſo: but a world of grieuous curſes, yea more then any mortall enemy can heape vpon vs, are forcibly wrapt vp in our prayers. For the bitter ſop of moſt hard choice is offered thy wife and children, to forgo one of the two: either to looſe the perſon of thy ſelf, or the nurſe of their natiue country. For my ſelfe (my ſonne) I am determined not to tary, till fortune in my life time do make an end of this warre. For if I cannot perſwade thee, rather to do good vnto both parties, then to ouerthrow and deſtroy the one, preferring loue and nature, before the malice and calamity of warres: thou ſhalt ſee, my ſonne, and truſt vnto it, thou ſhalt no ſooner march forward to aſſault thy country, but thy foote ſhall tread vpon thy mothers wombe, that brought thee firſt into this world. And I may not deferre to ſee the day, either that my ſonne be led priſoner in triumph by his naturall countreymen, or that he himſelfe do triumph of them, and of his naturall country. For if it were ſo, that my requeſt tended to ſaue thy countrey, in deſtroying the Volsces: I muſt confeſſe, thou wouldſt hardly and doubtfully reſolue on that. For as to deſtroy thy naturall country, it is altogether vnmeete and vnlawfull: ſo were it not iuſt, and leſſe honourable, to betray thoſe that put their truſt in thee. But my onely demaund conſiſteth, to make a gaile-deliuery of all euils, which deliuereth equall benefite and ſafety, both to the one and the other, but moſt honourable for the Volsces. For it ſhall appeare, that hauing victory in their hands, they haue of ſpeciall fauour granted vs ſingular graces, peace, and amity, albeit themſelues haue no leſſe part of both, then we. Of which good, if ſo it came to paſſe, thy ſelfe is the onely author, and ſo haſt thou the only honour. But if it faile, and fall out contrary: thy ſelf alone deſeruedly ſhalt carie the ſhamefull reproch and burthen of either party. So, though the end of war be vncertain, yet this notwithſtanding is moſt certain: that if it be thy chance to conquer, this benefit ſhalt thou reape of thy goodly conqueſt, to be chronicled the plague and deſtroyer of thy countrey. And if fortune alſo ouerthrow thee, then the world will ſay, that through deſire to reuenge thy priuate iniuries, thou haſt for euer vndone thy good friends, who did moſt louingly and courteouſly receiue thee. Martius gaue good eare vnto his mothers words, without interrupting her ſpeech at all: and after ſhe had ſaid what ſhe would, he held his peace a prety while, and anſwered not a word. Hereupon ſhe began againe to ſpeake vnto him, and ſaid: My ſonne, why doeſt thou not anſwer me? doeſt thou think it good altogether to giue place vnto thy choller and deſire of reuenge, and thinkeſt thou it not honeſty for thee to graunt thy mothers requeſt, in ſo weighty a cauſe? doſt thou take it honorable for a noble man, to remember the wrongs and iniuries done him: and doeſt not in like caſe think it an honeſt noble mans part, to be thankful for the goodnes that parents do ſhew to their children, acknowledging the duty & reuerence they ought to beare vnto them? No man liuing is more bound to ſhew himſelfe thankfull in all parts and reſpects then thy ſelf: who ſo vnnaturally ſheweſt al ingratitude. Moreouer (my ſon) thou haſt ſorely taken of thy country, exacting grieuous payments vpon thē, in reuenge of the iniuries offered thee: beſides, thou haſt not hitherto ſhewed thy poore mother any curteſie. And therfore, it is not onely honeſt, but due vnto me, that without compulſion I ſhould obtaine my ſo iuſt and reaſonable requeſt of thee. But ſince by reaſon I cannot perſwade thee to it, to what purpoſe do I defer my laſt hope? And with theſe words, her ſelf, his wife & children, fell downe vpon their knees before him. Martius ſeeing that, could refraine no longer, but went ſtraight and lift her vp, crying out: Oh mother, what haue you done to me? And holding her hard by the right hād, oh mother, ſaid he, you haue won a happy victory for your country, but mortall and vnhappy for your ſon: for I ſee my ſelf vanquiſhed by you alone. Theſe words being ſpoken openly, he ſpake a litle apart with his mother & wife, & then let them returne again to Rome, for ſo they did requeſt him: and ſo remaining in campe that night, the next morning he diſlodged, and marched homewards into the Volsces countrey againe, who were not all of one mind, nor all alike contented. For ſome miſliked him, and that he had done: other being well pleaſed that peace ſhould be made, ſaid: that neither the one, nor the other, deſerued blame nor reproch. Other though they miſliked that was done, did not thinke him an ill man for that he did, but ſaid: he was not to be blamed, though he yeelded to ſuch a forcible extremity. Howbeit no man contraried his departure, but al obeied his commandemēt, more for reſpect of his worthineſſe and valiancy, then for feare of his authoritie. Now the citizens of Rome plainly ſhewed, in what feare and danger their city ſtood of this war, when they were deliuered. For ſo ſoon as the watch vpon the wals of the city perceiued the Volsces camp to remoue, there was not a temple in the city but was preſently ſet open, & ful of mē, wearing garlands of flowres vpon their heads ſacrificing to the gods, as they were wont to do vpon the newes of ſome great obtained victory. And this common ioy was yet more manifeſtly ſhewed, by the honourable courteſies the whole Senate and people did beſtow on their Ladies. For they were all throughly perſwaded, and did certainly beleeue, that the Ladies only were cauſe of the ſauing of the city, and deliuering themſelues from the inſtant daunger of the warre. Wherupon the Senate ordained, that the Magiſtrates to gratifie and honour theſe Ladies, ſhould graunt them all that they would require. And they only requeſted that they would build a temple of Fortune of the women, for the building whereof they offered themſelues to defray the whole charge of the ſacrifices, and other ceremonies belonging to the ſeruice of the gods. Neuertheleſſe, the Senate commending their goodwill and forwardneſſe, ordained, that the temple and image ſhould be made at the common charge of the citie. Notwithſtanding that, the ladies gathered money among them, and made with the ſame a ſecond image of Fortune, which the ROMAINES ſay did ſpeake as they offred her vp in the temple, and did ſet her in her place: and they affirme, that ſhe ſpake theſe words: Ladies, ye haue deuoutly offered me vp. Moreouer, that ſhe ſpake that twiſe together, making vs to beleeue things that neuer were, and are not to be credited. For to ſee images that ſeeme to ſweate or weepe, or to put forth any humor red or bloudie, it is not a thing vnpoſſible. For wood and ſtone do commonly receiue certaine moiſture, whereof is ingendred an humour, which do yeeld of themſelues, or do take of the aire, many ſorts and kinds of ſpots and colours: by which ſignes and tokens it is not amiſſe me thinke, that the gods ſometimes do warne men of things to come. And it is poſſible alſo, that theſe images and ſtatues do ſometimes put forth ſounds, like vnto ſighes or mourning, when in the middeſt or bottome of the ſame, there is made ſome violent ſeparation, or breaking aſunder of things, blowne or deuiſed therein: but that a body which hath neither life nor ſoule, ſhould haue any direct or exquiſite word formed in it by expreſſe voice, that is altogether vnpoſſible. For the ſoule, nor god himſelfe can diſtinctly ſpeake without a bodie, hauing neceſſarie organes and inſtruments meete for the parts of the ſame, to forme and vtter diſtinct words. But where ſtories many times do force vs to beleeue a thing reported to be true, by many graue teſtimonies: there we muſt ſay, that it is ſome paſſion contrarie to our fiue naturall ſences, which being begotten in the imaginatiue part or vnderſtanding, draweth an opinion vnto it ſelfe, euen as we do in our ſleeping. For many times we thinke we heare, that we do not heare: and we imagine we ſee that we ſee not. Yet notwithſtanding, ſuch as are godly bent, and zealouſly giuen to thinke on heauenly things, ſo as they can no way be drawne from beleeuing that which is ſpoken of them, they haue this reaſon to ground the foundation of their beleefe vpon. That is, the omnipotencie of God, which is wonderfull, and hath no maner of reſemblance or likeneſſe of proportion vnto ours, but is altogether contrary, as touching our nature, our moouing, our art, and our force: and therefore if he do any thing vnpoſſible to vs, or do bring forth and deuiſe things, aboue mans common reach and vnderſtanding, we muſt not therfore thinke it vnpoſſible at all. For if in other things he is farre contrary to vs, much more in his workes and ſecret operations, he far paſſeth all the reſt: but the moſt part of Gods doings, as Heraclitus ſaith, for lack of faith, are hidden and vnknowne vnto vs. Now when Martius was returned againe into the city of ANTIVM from his voyage, Tullus that hated and could no longer abide him for the feare he had of his authoritie, ſought diuers meanes to make him away, thinking if he let ſlip that preſent time, he ſhould neuer recouer the like and fit occaſion againe. Wherefore Tullus hauing procured many other of his confederacy, required Martius might be depoſed from his eſtate, to render vp account to the VOLSCES of his charge and gouernement. Martius fearing to become a priuate man againe vnder Tullus being Generall (whoſe authority was greater otherwiſe, then any other among all the VOLSCES) anſwered: he was willing to giue vp his charge, and would reſigne it into the hands of the Lords of the VOLSCES, if they did all cõmaund him, as by all their commandement he receiued it. And moreouer, that he would not refuſe euen at that preſent to giue vp an account vnto the people, if they would tary the hearing of it. The people hereupon called a common counſell, in which aſſembly there were certaine oratours appointed, that ſtirred vp the common people againſt him: and when they had told their tales, Martius roſe vp to make them anſwer. Now, notwithſtanding the mutinous people made a maruellous great noiſe, yet when they ſaw him, for the reuerence they bare vnto his valiantneſſe, they quieted themſelues, and gaue him audience to alleage with leiſure what he could for his purgation. Moreouer, the honeſteſt men of the

the ANTIATES, and who most reioyced in peace, shewed by their countenance that they would heare him willingly, and iudge also according to their conscience. Whereupon Tullus fearing that if he did let him speake, he would proue his innocencie to the people, because amongst other things he had an eloquent tongue, besides that the first good seruice he had done to the people of the VOLSCES, did winne him more fauour, then these last accusations could purchase him displeasure: and furthermore, the offence they laid to his charge, was a testimony of the goodwill they ought him, for they would neuer haue thought he had done them wrong for that they tooke not the citie of ROME, if they had not bene very neare taking of it, by meanes of his approach and conduction. For these causes Tullus thought he might no longer delay his pretence and enterprise, neither to tarie for the mutining and rising of the common people against him: wherefore, those that were of the conspiracie, beganne to crie out that he was not to be heard, and that they would not suffer a traitour to vsurpe tyrannicall power ouer the tribe of the VOLSCES, who would not yeeld vp his state and authoritie. And in saying these words, they all fell vpon him, and killed him in the market place, none of the people once offering to rescue him. Howbeit it is a cleare case, that this murder was not generally consented vnto, of the most part of the VOLSCES: for men came out of al parts to honour his bodie, and did honourably burie him; setting out his tombe with great store of armour and spoiles, as the tombe of a worthie person and great captaine. The ROMAINES vnderstanding of his death, shewed no other honour or malice, sauing that they graunted the ladies the request they made: that they might mourne tenne moneths for him, and that was the full time they vsed to weare blackes for the death of their fathers, brethren, or husbands, according to Numa Pompilius order, who stablished the same, as we haue enlarged more amply in the description of his life. Now Martius being dead, the whole state of the VOLSCES heartily wished him aliue againe. For first of all they fell out with the ÆQVES (who were their friends and confederates) touching preheminence and place: and this quarrell grew on so farre betweene them, that fraies and murders fell out vpon it one with another. After that the ROMAINES ouercame them in battell, in which Tullus was slain in the field, and the flower of all their force was put to the sword: so that they were compelled to accept most shamefull conditions of peace, in yeelding themselues subiect vnto the conquerers, and promising to be obedient at their commaundement.

THE COMPARISON OF
Alcibiades with Martius Coriolanus.

The acts done by both.

NOW that we haue written all the deedes of worthy memory, done by either of them both: we may presently discerne, that in matters of warre the one hath not greatly exceeded the other. For both of them in their charge, were alike hardie and valiant for their persons, as also wise and politicke in the warres: vnlesse they will say, that Alcibiades was the better captaine, as he that had foughten more battels with his enemies, both by sea and land, then euer Coriolanus had done, and had alwaies the victorie of his enemies. For otherwise, in this they were much alike: that where they were both present and had charge and power to commaund, all things prospered notably, and with good successe on the part they were of, and also when they tooke the contrarie side, they made the first haue the worse euery way. Now for matters of gouernement, the Noble men and honest citizens did hate Alcibiades manner of rule in the common weale, as of a man most dissolute, and giuen to flatterie: because he euer studied by all deuice he could, to currie fauour with the common people. So did the ROMAINES malice also Coriolanus gouernement, for that it was too arrogant, proud, and tyrannicall: whereby neither the one nor the other was to be commended. Notwithstanding he is lesse to be blamed that seeketh to please and gratifie his common people: then he that despiseth and disdaineth them, and therefore offereth them wrong and iniurie, because he would not seeme to flatter them, to winne the more authoritie. For as it is an euill thing to flatter the common people to winne credite: euen so is it besides dishonesty, and iniustice also, to attaine to credit and authoritie, for one to make himselfe terrible to the people, by offering them wrong and violence. It is true that Martius was euer counted an honest natured man, plain, and simple, without art or cunning: but Alcibiades meerely contrary, for he was fine, subtill, and deceiptfull. And the greatest fault they euer burdened Alcibiades for, was his malice and deceipt, wherwith he abused the ambassadors of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and that he was a let that peace was not concluded, as Thucydides reporteth. Now, though by this act he suddenly brought the citie of ATHENS into wars, yet he brought it thereby to be of greater power, and more fearefull to the enemies, by making alliance with the MANTINEANS and the ARGIVES, who by Alcibiades practise entred into league with the ATHENIANS. And Martius, as Dyonisius the historiographer writeth: did by craft and deceipt bring the ROMAINES into warres against the VOLSCES, causing the VOLSCES maliciously and wrongfully to be suspected, that went to ROME to see the games plaid. But the cause why he did it, made the fact so much more foule and wicked: for it was not done for any ciuill dissention, nor for any iealousie and contention in matters of gouernment, as Alcibiades did: but onely following his cholericke mood, that would be pleased with nothing, as Dion said, he would needes trouble and turmoile the most part of ITALY, and so being angry with

with his country, he destroyed many other towns and cities that could not helpe it, nor do withall. This is true also, that Alcibiades spite and malice did worke great mischiefe and miserie to his country: but when he saw they repented them of the iniurie they had done him, he came to himselfe and did withdraw his army. Another time also, when they had banished Alcibiades, he would not yet suffer the captaines of the ATHENIANS to run into great errors, neither would he see them cast away, by following ill counsell which they tooke, neither would he forsake them in any daunger they put themselues into. But he did the very same that Aristides had done in old time vnto Themistocles, for which he was then, and is yet so greatly praised. For he went vnto the captaines that had charge then of the army of the ATHENIANS, although they were not his friends, and told them wherein they did amisse, and what they had further to do. Where Martius to the contrarie, did first great hurt vnto the whole citie of ROME, though all in ROME had not generally offended him: yea, and when the best and chiefest part of the citie were grieued for his sake, and were very sory and angry for the iniurie done him. Furthermore, the ROMAINES sought to appease one onely displeasure and despite they had done him by many ambassades, petitions and requests they made, whereunto he neuer yeelded, vntill his mother, wife, and children came, his heart was so hardened. And hereby it appeared he was entred into this cruell warre (when he would hearken to no peace) of an intent vtterly to destroy and spoile his countrie, and not as though he meant to recouer it, or to returne thither againe. Here was indeed the difference betweene them: that spials being laid by the LACEDÆMONIANS to kill Alcibiades, for the malice they did beare him, as also for that they were affraid of him, he was compelled to returne home againe to ATHENS. Where Martius contrariwise, hauing bene so honourably receiued and entertained by the VOLSCES, he could not with honesty forsake them, considering that they had done him that honour, as to chuse him their generall, and trusted him so farre, as they put all their whole army and power into his hands: and not as the other, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS rather abused then vsed him, suffering him to go vp and downe their city (and afterwards in the midst of their campe) without honour or place at all. So that in the end Alcibiades was compelled to put himselfe into the hands of Tisaphernes: vnlesse they will say that he went thither of purpose to him, with intent to saue the citie of ATHENS from vtter destruction, for the desire he had to returne home againe. Moreouer, we reade of Alcibiades, that he was a great taker, and would be corrupted with mony: and when he had it, he would most licentiously and dishonestly spend it. Where Martius in contrary maner would not so much as accept gifts lawfully offered him by his captaines, to honor him for his valiantnesse. And the cause why the people did beare him such ill will, for the controuersie they had with the Nobilitie about clearing of debts, grew: for that they knew well inough it was not for any gaine or benefite he had gotten thereby, so much as it was for spite and displeasure he thought to do them. Antipater in a letter of his, writing of the death of Aristotle the philosopher, doth not without cause cõmend the singular gifts that were in Alcibiades, and this especially: that he passed all other for winning mens good wils. Wheras all Martius noble acts and vertues, wanting that affabilitie, became hatefull, euen to those that receiued benefite by them, who could not abide his seueritie and selfe will: which causeth desolation (as Plato saith) and men to be ill followed, or altogether forsaken. Contrariwise, seeing Alcibiades had a trimme entertainment, and a very good grace with him, and could fashion himselfe in all companies, it was no maruell if his well doing were gloriously commended, and himselfe much honoured and beloued of the people, considering that some faults he did, were oftentimes taken for matters of sport, and toyes of pleasure. And this was the cause, that though many times he did great hurt to the commonwealth, yet they did oft make him their generall, and trusted him with the charge of the whole citie. Where Martius suing for an office of honor that was due to him, for the sundry good seruices he had done to the state, was notwithstanding repulsed, and put by. Thus do we see, that they to whom the one did hurt, had no power to hate him: and the other that honored his vertue, had no liking to loue his person. Martius also did neuer any great exploit, being generall of his country men, but when he was generall of their enemies against his naturall country: wheras Alcibiades, being both a priuat person, and a generall, did notable seruice vnto the ATHENIANS. By reason whereof, Alcibiades whersoeuer he was present, had the vpper hand euer of his accusers, euen as he would himselfe, and their accusations tooke no place against him: vnlesse it were in his absence. Where Martius being present, was condemned by the ROMAINES: and in his person murdered and slaine by the VOLSCES. But here I cannot say they haue done well, nor iustly, albeit himselfe gaue them some colour to do it, when he openly denyed the ROMAINE ambassadours peace, which after he priuately graunted, at the request of women. So by this deed of his, he tooke not away the enmitie that was betweene both people: but leauing warre still betweene them, he made the VOLSCES (of whom he was generall) to loose the oportunitie of noble victorie. Where indeed he should (if he had done as he ought) haue withdrawne his army with their counsell and consent, that had reposed so great affiance in him, in making him their generall: if he had made that account of them, as their goodwill towards him did in dutie bind him. Or else, if he did not care for the VOLSCES in the enterprise of this warre, but had only procured it of intent to be reuenged, and afterwards to leaue it off when his anger was blowne ouer: yet he had no reason for the loue of his mother to pardon his country, but rather he should in pardoning his country, haue spared his mother, because his mother and wife were members of the body of his countrey and city, which he did besiege. For in that he vncurteously reiected all publike petitions, requests of Ambassadors, intreaties of the bishops and priests, to gratifie onely the request of his mother with his departure: that was no act so much to honour his mother with, as to dishonour his countrie by, the which was preserued for the pitie and intercession of a woman, and not for the loue of it selfe, as if it had not bene worthie of it. And so was this departure a grace (to say truly) very odious and cruell, and deserued no thanks of either party, to him that did it. For he withdrew his army, not at the request of the ROMAINES, against whom he made war: nor with their consent, at whose charge the warre was made. And of all his misfortune and ill hap, the austeritie of his nature, and his haughtie obstinate mind, was the onely cause: the which of it selfe being hatefull to the world, when it is ioyned with ambition, it groweth then much more churlish, fierce and intollerable. For men that haue that fault in nature, are not affable to the people, seeming thereby as though they made no estimation or regard of the people: and yet on the other side, if the people should not giue them honour and reuerence, they would straight take it in scorne, and litle care for the matter. For so did Metellus, Aristides, and Epaminondas, all vsed this maner: not to seeke the goodwill of the cõmon people by flattery and dissimulation: which was indeed, because they despised that which the people could giue or take away. Yet would they not be offended with their citizens, when they were amerced, and set at any fines, or that they banished them, or gaue them any other repulse: but they loued them as well as they did before, so soone as they shewed any token of repentance, and that they were sory for the wrong they had done them, and were easily made friends againe with them, after they were restored from their banishment. For he that disdaineth to make much of the people, and to haue their fauour, should much more scorne to seeke to be reuenged when he is repulsed. For, to take a repulse and denyall of honour so inwardly to the heart, commeth of no other cause, but that he did too earnestly desire it. Therefore Alcibiades did not dissemble at all, that he was not very glad to see himselfe honored, and sorie to be reiected and denyed any honour: but also he sought all the meanes he could to make himselfe beloued of those amongst whom he liued. Whereas Martius stoutnesse and haughtie stomacke, did stay him from making much of those, that might aduance and honour him: and yet his ambition made him gnaw himselfe for spite and anger, when he saw he was despised. And this is all that reasonably may be reproued in him: for otherwise he lacked no good commendable vertues and qualities. For his temperance, and cleane hands from taking of bribes and money, he may be compared with the most perfect, vertuous, and honest men of all GREECE: but not with Alcibiades, who was in that vndoubtedly alwaies too licentious and loosely giuen, and had too small regard of the duty of honestie.

The end of Caius Martius Coriolanus life.

THE

THE LIFE OF Paulus Æmilius.

WHEN I firſt began to write theſe liues, my intent was to profit other: but ſince, continuing and going on, I haue much profited my ſelf by loking into theſe hiſtories, as if I looked into a glaſſe, to frame and faſhion my life, to the mould and pattern of theſe vertuous noblemen. For running ouer their maners in this ſort, & ſeeking alſo to deſcribe their liues: me thinks I am ſtill conuerſant and familiar with them, and do as it were lodge them with me, one after another. And when I come to peruſe their hiſtories, and to wey the vertues and qualities they haue had, and what ſingularitie each of them poſſeſſed: and to chuſe and cull out the chiefeſt things of note in them, and their beſt ſpeeches and doings moſt worthie of memorie: then I crie out:

O gods, can there be more paſsing pleaſure in the world?

Or is there any thing of more force, to teach man ciuill manners, and a ruled life, or to reforme the vice in man? Democritus the Philoſopher writeth, that we ſhould pray we might euer ſee happie images and ſights in the ayre, and that the good which is meete and proper to our nature, may rather come to vs, then that is euill and vnfortunate: preſuppoſing a falſe opinion and doctrine in Philoſophie, which allureth men to infinite ſuperſtitions: That there are good and badde images flying in the ayre, which giue a good or ill impreſſion vnto men, and incline men to vice, or to vertue. But as for me, by continuall reading of auncient hiſtories, and gathering theſe liues together which now I leaue before you, and by keeping alwaies in mind the acts of the moſt noble, vertuous, and beſt giuen men of former age, and worthy memory: I do teach and prepare my ſelfe to ſhake off and baniſh from me all lewd and diſhoneſt condition, if by chaunce the companie and conuerſation of them whoſe companie I keepe, and muſt of neceſſitie haunt, do acquaint me with ſome vnhappie or vngracious touch. This is eaſie vnto me, that do diſpoſe my mind, being quiet & not troubled with any paſſion, vnto the deep cõſideration of ſo many noble examples. As I do preſent vnto you now in this volume, the liues of Timoleon the CORINTHIAN, & of Paulus Æmylius the ROMAINE, who had not onely a good & an vpright mind with thẽ, but were alſo fortunate & happy, in all the matters they both did take in hand. So as you ſhall hardly iudge, when you haue read ouer their liues, whether wiſdom, or good fortune brought them to atchieue to ſuch honorable actes and exploits as they did. Many (and the moſt part of hiſtoriographers) do write, that the houſe and familie of the Æmilians in ROME, was alwaies of the moſt auncient of the nobilitie, which they call Patricians. Some writers affirme alſo that the firſt of that houſe that gaue name to all the poſteritie after, was Marcus, the ſonne of Pythagoras the wiſe, whom king Numa for the ſweetneſſe and pleaſant grace of his tongue, ſurnamed Marcus Æmilius: and thoſe ſpecially affirme it, that ſay king Numa was Pythagoras ſcholer. Howſoeuer it was, the moſt part of this family that obtained honour and eſtimation for their vertue, were euer fortunate alſo in all their doings, ſauing Lucius Paulus onely, who dyed in the battell of CANNES. But his misfortune doth beare manifeſt teſtimony of his wiſedome and valiancie together. For he was forced to fight againſt his will, when he ſaw he could not bridle the raſhneſſe of his fellow Conſull that would needes ioyne battell, and to do as he did, ſauing that he fled not as the other, who being the firſt procurer of the battell, was the firſt that ranne away: where he to the contrarie, to his power did what he could to let him, and did ſticke by it, and fought it valiantly vnto the laſt gaſpe. This AEmylius left a daughter behind him called AEmilia, which was maried vnto Scipio the great: and a ſonne, Paulus AEmylius, being the ſame man whoſe life we preſently treate of. His youth fortunately fell out in a flouriſhing time of glorie and honour, through the ſundry vertues of many great and noble perſons liuing in thoſe daies, among whom he made his name famous alſo: and it was not by that ordinarie art and courſe, which the beſt eſteemed young men of that age did take and follow. For he did not vſe to plead priuate mens cauſes in law, neither would creepe into mens fauour by fawning vpon any of them: though he ſaw it a common practiſe, and pollicie of men, to ſeeke the peoples fauour and goodwils by ſuch meanes. Moreouer, he refuſed not that common courſe which other tooke, for that it was contrarie to his nature, or that he could not frame with either of both, if he had bene ſo diſpoſed: but he rather ſought to winne reputation by his honeſty, his valiantneſſe, and vpright dealing, as chooſing that the better way then either of the other two, inſomuch as in maruellous ſhort time he paſſed all thoſe that were of his age. The firſt office of honor he ſued for, was the office of AEdilis, in which ſute he was preferred before twelue other that ſued for the ſelfe ſame office: who were men of no ſmall quality, for they all came afterwards to be Conſuls. After this, he was choſen to be one of the number of the prieſts, whom the ROMAINES call Augures: who haue the charge of all the diuinations and ſoothſayings, in telling of things to come by flying of birds, and ſignes in the aire. He was ſo carefull, and tooke ſuch pains to vnderſtand how the ROMAINES did vſe the ſame, and with ſuch diligence ſought the obſeruation of the ancient religion of ROMAINS in all holy matters: that where that prieſthood was before eſteemed but a title of honor, and deſired for the name only, he brought it to paſſe, that it was the moſt honorable ſcience, and beſt reputed of in ROME: wherin he confirmed the philoſophers opinion, that religion is the knowledge how to ſerue God. For when he did any thing belonging to his office of prieſthood, he did it with great experience, iudgment, and diligence, leauing all other thoughts, & without omitting any ancient ceremony, or adding to any new, contending oftentimes with his companions, in things which ſeemed light, and of ſmall moment: declaring vnto them, that though we do preſume the gods are eaſie to be pacified, & that they readily pardon all faults and ſcapes committed by negligence, yet if it were no more but for reſpect of commonwealths ſake, they ſhold not ſlightly, nor careleſly diſſemble or paſſe ouer faults cõmitted in thoſe matters: for no man (ſaith he) at the firſt that committeth any fault, doth alone trouble the ſtate of the cõmon wealth: but withal, we muſt think he leaueth the grounds of ciuil gouernmẽt, that is not as carefull to keepe the inſtitutions of ſmall matters, as alſo of the great. So was he alſo a ſeuere captaine, & ſtrict obſeruer ôf all marſhall diſcipline, not ſeeking to win the ſouldiers loue by flattery, when he was generall in the field, as many did in that time: neither corrupting them for a ſecond charge, by ſhewing himſelf gentle and courteous in the firſt, vnto thoſe that ſerued vnder him: but himſelfe did orderly ſhew them the very rules and precepts of the diſcipline of wars, euen as a prieſt that ſhold expreſſe the names and ceremonies of ſome holy ſacrifice, wherin were daunger to omit any p: rt or parcell. Howbeit, being terrible to execute the law of armes vpon rebellious and diſobedient ſouldiers, he kept vp thereby the ſtate of the commonweale the better: iudging to ouercome the enemy by force, was but an acceſſarie as a man may terme it, in reſpect of well training and ordering his citizens by good diſcipline. captaines of ROME being employed that wayes, there fell out another in the necke of that, in the West parts towards SPAINE, where they were all vp in armes. Thither they sent AEmylius Prætor, not with fixe axes as the other Prætors had borne before them, but with twelue: so that vnder the name of Prætor, he had the authority and dignity of a Consull. He twise ouercame the barbarous people in maine battell, and slue a thirty thousand of them, and got this victory through his great skill and wisedome, in chusing the aduantage of place and time, to fight with his enemies euen as they passed ouer a riuer: which easily gaue his souldiers the victory. Moreouer he took there two hundred and fifty cities, all which did open, and gladly receiue him in. So, leauing all that country quiet and in good peace, and hauing receiued their fealty by oath made between his hands, he returned againe to ROME, not inriched the value of a Drachma more then before. For then he tooke litle regard to his expences, he spent so franckly, neither was his purse his maister, though his reuenue was not great to beare it out, as it appeared to the world after his death, for all that he had was litle inough to satisfie his wiues ioynter. His first wife was Papyria, the daughter of a noble Consull Papyrius Masso, and after they had liued a long time together, he was diuorced from her, notwithstanding he had goodly children by her. For by her he had that famous Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus. The iust cause of the diuorce betweene them, appeareth not to vs in writing: but me thinkes the tale that is told concerning the separation of a certaine mariage is true. That a certaine ROMAINE hauing forsaken his wife, her friends fell out with him, and asked him: what fault doest thou find in her? is she not honest of her body? is she not faire? doth she not bring thee goodly children? But he putting forth his foote, shewed them his shooe, and answered them: Is not this a goodly shooe? is it not finely made? and is it not new? yet I dare say there is neuer a one of you can tell where it wringeth me. For to say truly, great and open faults are commonly occasions to make husbands put away their wiues: but yet oftentimes housholde words runne so betweene them (proceeding of crooked conditions, or of diuersity of natures, which strangers are not priuy vnto) that in processe of time they do beget such a strange alteration of loue and minds in them, as one house can no longer hold them. So AEmylius, hauing put away Papyria his first wife, he maried another that brought him two sonnes, which he brought vp with himselfe in his house, and gaue his two first sonnes (to wit, Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus) in adoption to two of the noblest and richest families of the city of ROME. The elder of the twaine, vnto Fabius Maximus, he that was fiue times Consull, and the yonger vnto the house of the Cornelians, whom the sonne of the great Scipio the AFRICAN did adopt, being his cosin germaine, and named him Scipio. Concerning his daughters, the sonne of Cato maried the one, and AElius Tubero the other, who was a maruellous honest man, and did more nobly maintaine himselfe in his pouerty, then any other ROMAINE: for they were sixteene persons all of one name, and of the house of the AElians, very neare a kinne one to the other, who had all but one litle house in the city, and a small farme in the countrey, wherewith they entertained themselues, and liued all together in one house, with their wiues, and many litle children. Amongst their wiues, one of them was the daughter of Paulus AEmylius, after he had bene twise Consull, and had triumphed twise, not being ashamed of her husbands pouerty, but wondring at his vertue that made him poore. Whereas brethren and kinsemen, as the world goeth now, if they dwel not farre asunder, and in other countries, not one neare another, and that riuers part them not, or walles deuide their lands, leauing great large wastes betweene them: they are neuer quiet, but stil in quarrell one with another. Goodly examples doth this story lay before the wise, and well aduised readers, to learne thereby how to frame their life, and wisely to behaue themselues. Now AEmylius being chosen Consull, went to make warre with the LIGVRIANS, who dwelled in the ALPES, and which otherwise are called LIGVSTINES. These are very valiant and warlike men, and were very good souldiers at that time, by reason of their continuall warres against the ROMAINES, whose neare neighbours they were. For they dwelt in the furthest part of ITALY, that bordereth vpon the great ALPES, and the row of ALPES, whereof the foot ioyneth to the THVSCAN sea, and pointeth towards AFRICK, & are mingled with the GAVLES and SPANIARDS, neighbours vnto the sea coast: who scowring all the Mediterranian sea at that time, vnto the straight of Hercules pillers, did with their litle light pinnases of pirats, let all the trafficke and entercourse of merchādize. Æmylius being gone to seek them in their country, they taried his comming with an army of forty thousand men: neuertheless, though he had but eight thousand men in all, and that they were fiue to one of his, yet he gaue the onset vpon them, and ouerthrew them,& draue them into their cities. Then he ſent to offer them peace, for the ROMAINES would not altogether deſtroy the LIGVRIANS, becauſe their countrey was as a rampier or bulwarke againſt the inuaſion of the GAVLES, who lay lurking for oportunity and occaſion to inuade ITALY: wherupon theſe LIGVRIANS yeelded themſelues vnto him,& put al their forts and ſhips into his hands. Æmylius deliuered vnto them their holds againe, without other hurt done vnto them, ſauing that he razed the walles of their fortifications: howbeit he tooke all their ſhips from them, leauing them litle botes of three owers onely, and no greater, and ſet all the priſoners at liberty they had taken, both by ſea and by land, aſwell ROMAINES as other, which were a maruellous number. Theſe were all the notable acts he did worthy memory, in the firſt yeare of his Conſulſhip. Afterwards, he oftentimes ſhewed himſelfe very deſirous to be Conſull againe, and did put forth himſelfe to ſue for it: but when he was denied it, he neuer after made ſute for it againe, but gaue himſelfe only to ſtudy diuine things, and to ſee his children vertuouſly brought vp, not only in the ROMAINE tongue which himſelfe was taught, but alſo a litle more curiouſly in the GREEKE tongue. For he did not onely retaine Grammarians, Rhetoritians, and Logicians, but alſo painters, grauers of images, riders of horſes, and hunts of GREECE about his children: and he himſelf alſo (if no matters of common wealth troubled him) was euer with them in the ſchoole when they were at their books, and alſo when they otherwiſe did exerciſe themſelues. For he loued his children as much or more then any other ROMAINE. Now concerning the ſtate of the common wealth, the ROMAINES were at wars with king Perſeus, and they much blamed the captains they had ſent thither before, for that for lacke of skill and courage, they had ſo cowardly behaued themſelues, as their enemies laughed them to ſcorne: and they receiued more hurt of them, then they did vnto the king. For not long before, they had driuen king Antiochus beyond mount Taurus, and made him forſake the reſt of ASIA, and had ſhut him vp within the borders of SYRIA, who was glad that he had bought that country with fifteene thouſand talents, which he paid for a fine. A litle before alſo, they had ouercome Philip, King of MACEDON in THESSALY, and had deliuered the GRECIANS from the bondage of the MACEDONIANS. And moreouer, hauing ouercome Hannibal (vnto whom no Prince nor King that euer was in the world was comparable, either for his power or valiantneſſe) they thought this too great a diſhonour to them, that this warre they had againſt king Perſeus, ſhould hold ſo long of euen hand with them, as if he had bene an enemy equall with the people of ROME: conſidering alſo that they fought not againſt them, but with the refuſe and ſcattered people of the ouerthrowne army his father had loſt before, and knew not that Philip had left his army ſtronger, and more expert by reaſon of his ouerthrow, then it was before: as I will briefly rehearſe the ſtory from the beginning. Antigonus, who was of the greateſt power of all the captaines and ſucceſſours of Alexander the great, hauing obtained for himſelfe and his poſteritie the title of a King, had a ſonne called Demetrius, of whom came Antigonus the ſecond, that was ſurnamed Gonatas, whoſe ſonne was alſo called Demetrius, that raigned no long time, but died, and left a yong ſonne called Philip. By reaſon whereof, the Princes and Nobility of MACEDON, fearing that the Realme ſhould be left without heire, they preferred one Antigonus, coſin to the laſt deceaſed King, and made him mary the mother of Philip the leſſe, giuing him the name at the firſt of the Kings protectour onely, and lieutenant generall of his maieſty. But after, when they had found he was a good and wiſe Prince, and a good husband for the Realme, they then gaue him the abſolute name of a king, and ſurnamed him Doſon, to ſay, the giuer: for he promiſed much and gaue litle. After him raigned Philip, who in his greene youth gaue more hope of himſelfe, then any other of the Kings before: inſomuch as they thought that one day he would reſtore MACEDON her auncient fame and glory, and that he alone would pluck downe the pride and power of the ROMAINES, who roſe againſt al the world. But after that he had loſt a great battell, and was ouerthrowne by Titus Quintus Flaminius neare vnto the city of SCOTVSA: then he began to quake for feare, and to leaue all to the mercy of the ROMAINES, thinking he eſcaped good cheape, for any light ranſome or tribute the ROMAINES ſhould impoſe vpon him. Yet afterwards comming to vnderſtand himſelf, he grew to diſdaine it much, thinking that to raigne through the fauour of the ROMAINES, was but to make himſelfe a ſlaue, to ſeek to liue in pleaſure at his eaſe, and not for a valiant and noble prince borne. Whereupon he ſet all his mind, to ſtudy the diſcipline of wars, and made his preparations as wiſely & cloſely as poſſibly he could. For he left all his townes alongſt the ſea coaſt, and ſtanding vpon any high waies, without any fortification at al, & in maner deſolate without people, to the end there might appeare appeare no occasion of doubt or mistrust in him: and in the meane time, in the high countries of his Realme farre from great beaten wayes, he leauied a great number of men of warre, and repienished his townes and strong holds that lay scatteringly abroad, with armour and weapon, mony, and men, prouiding for warre, which he kept as secretly as he could. For he had prouision of armour in his armory, to arme thirty thousand men, and eight million bushels of corne safely lockt vp in his forts and stronger places, and ready money, as much as would serue to entertaine ten thousand strangers in pay, to defend his countrey for the space of ten yeares. But before he could bring that to passe he had purposed, he died for griefe and sorrow, after he knew he had vniustly put Demetrius the best of his sonnes to death, vpon the false accusation of the worst, that was Perseus: who as he did inherit the kingdome of his father by succession, so did he also inherite his fathers malice against the ROMAINES. But he had no shoulders to beare so heauy a burden, and especially being as he was, a man of so vile and wicked nature: for among many leud and naughty conditions he had, he was extreme couetous and miserable. They say also, that he was not legitimate, because Philips wife had taken him from Gnathainia (a tailors wife borne at ARGOS) immediatly after he was borne, and did adopt the child to be hers. And some thinke that this was the chiefest cause why he practised to put Demetrius to death, fearing least this lawful son would seek occasion to proue him a bastard. Notwithstanding, simple though he was, and of vile and base nature, he found the strength of his kingdome so great, that he was contented to take vpon him to make war against the ROMAINES, which he maintained a long time, & fought against their Consuls, that were their Generals, and repulsed great armies of theirs both by sea and land, and ouercame some. As Publius Licinius among other, the first that inuaded MACEDON, was ouerthrown by him in a battel of horsine, where he slue at that time two thousand fiue hundred good men of his, and took six hundred prisoners. And their army by sea, riding at anker before the city of OREVM, he did sodainly set vpon, and took twenty great ships of burden, and all that was in them, and sunke the rest, which were all loden with corne: and took of all sorts besides, about 54. foysts, and galliots of fifty owers a peece. The second Consul and Generall he fought withall, was Hostilius, whom he repulsed, attempting by force to inuade MACEDON by way of the city of ELVMIA. Another time againe, when he entred in by stealth vpon the coast of THESSALY, he offered him battell, but the other durst not abide it. And as though this war troubled him nothing at all, and that he had cared litle for the ROMAINES, he went and fought a battell in the meane time with the DARDANIANS, where he slue ten thousand of those barbarous people, & brought away a maruellous great spoile. Moreouer he procured the nation of the GAVLES dwelling vpon the riuer of Danuby, which they call Bastarnæ (men very warlike, and excellent good horsmen) and did practise with the ILLYRIANS also by meane of their king Gentius, to make them ioyne with him in this warre: so that there ranne a rumour, that for money he had gotten these GAVLES to come downe into ITALY, from the high countrey of GAVLE, all alongst the Adriatike sea. The ROMAINES being aduertised of these newes, thought the time serued not now to dispose their offices in wars any more by grace & fauor vnto those that sued for thē: but contrariwise, that they should call some noble man that were very skilful & a wise captain, and could discreetly gouerne & performe things of great charge: as Paulus Æmylius, a man wel stepped on in yeres, being threescore yeare old, and yet of good power, by reason of the lusty yong men his sons, & sons in law, besides a great number of his friends and kinsfolk. So al that bare great authority, did altogether with one consent counsell him to obey the people, which called him to the Consulship. At the beginning indeed he delayed the people much that came to importune him, and vtterly denied them: saying, he was no meete man neither to desire, nor yet to take vpon him any charge. Howbeit in the end, seeing the people did vrge it vpon him, by knocking continually at his gates, & calling him aloud in the streetes, willing him to come into the market place, and perceiuing they were angry with him, because he refused it, he was content to be perswaded. And when he stood among thē that sued for the Consulship, the people thought straight that he stood not there so much for desire of the office, as for that he put them in hope of assured victory, and happy successe of this begun warre: so great was their loue towards him, and the good hope they had of him, that they chose him Consul againe the second time. Wherfore so soone as he was chosen, they would not proceed to drawing of lots according to their custome, which of the two Consuls should happē to go into MACEDON: but presently with a ful and whole consent of them all, they gaue him the whole charge of the warres of MACEDON. So being Consull now, and appointed to make war vpon king Perſeus, all the people did honourably company him home vnto his houſe: where a litle girle (a daughter of his) called Tertia, being yet an infant, came weeping vnto her father. He making much of her: asked her why ſhe wept. The poore girle anſwered, colling him about the necke, and kiſſing him: Alas father, wote you what? our Perſeus is dead. She meant it by a litle whelp ſo called, which was her play-fellow. In good houre, my girle, ſaid he, I like the ſigne well. Thus doth Cicero the orator report of it in his booke of diuinations. The ROMAINES had a cuſtome at that time, that ſuch as were elected Conſuls (after that they were openly proclaimed) ſhould make an oration of thankes vnto the people, for the honour and fauour they had ſhewed him. The people then (according to the cuſtome) being gathered together to heare Æmylius ſpeake, he made this oration vnto them. That the firſt time he ſued to be Conſul, was in reſpect of himſelfe, ſtanding at that time in need of ſuch honour: now he offered himſelfe the ſecond time vnto it, for the good loue he bare vnto them, who ſtood in need of a Generall, wherefore he thought himſelfe nothing bound nor beholding vnto them now. And if they did thinke alſo this warre might be better followed by any other then by himſelfe, he would preſently with all his hart reſigne the place. Furthermore, if they had any truſt or confidence in him, that they thought him a man ſufficient to diſcharge it: then that they would not ſpeake nor meddle in any matter that concerned his dutie, and the office of a Generall, ſauing onely, that they would be diligent (without any words) to do whatſoeuer he commaunded, and ſhould be neceſſary for the warre and ſeruice they took in hand. For if euery man would be a commander, as they had bene heretofore, of thoſe by whom they ſhould be commanded: then the world would more laugh them to ſcorne in this ſeruice, then euer before had bene accuſtomed. Theſe words made the ROMAINES very obedient to him, and conceiued good hope to come, being all of them very glad that they had refuſed thoſe ambitious flatterers that ſued for the charge, and had giuen it vnto a man, that durſt boldly and frankly tell them the troth. Mark how the ROMAINES by yeelding vnto reaſon and vertue, came to command all other, & to make themſelues the mightieſt people of the world. Now that Paulus Æmylius ſetting forward to this warre, had wind at will, and faire paſſage to bring him to his iourneys end, I impute it to good fortune, that ſo quickly and ſafely conueyed him to his campe. But for the reſt of his exploits, he did in all this warre, part of them being performed by his owne hardineſſe, other by his wiſedome and good counſell, other by the diligence of his friends in ſeruing him with good will, other by his owne reſolute conſtancie and corage in extremeſt danger, and laſt, by his maruellous skil in determining at an inſtant what was to be done, I cannot attribute any notable act or worthy ſeruice vnto this his good fortune they talke of ſo much, as they may do in other captaines doings: vnleſſe they wil ſay peraduenture, that Perſeus couetouſneſſe and miſery was Æmylius good fortune: for his miſerable feare of ſpending mony, was the only cauſe & deſtruction of the whole realme of MACEDON, which was in good ſtate & hope of continuing in proſperity. For there came downe into the country of MACEDON at king Perſeus requeſt, ten thouſand Baſtarnæ a horſe-backe, and as many footmen to them, who alwayes ioyned with them in battell: all mercenary ſouldiers, depending vpon pay and entertainment of warres, as men that could not plow, nor ſow, nor trafficke merchandize by ſea, nor skill of grazing to gaine their liuing with: and to be ſhort, that had no other occupation or merchandize, but to ſerue in the warres, and to ouercome thoſe with whom they fought. Furthermore, when they came to incamp and lodge in the MEDICA, neare to the MACEDONIANS, who ſaw them ſo goodly great men, and ſo well trained and exerciſed in handling all kind of weapons, ſo braue and luſty in words and threats againſt their enemies: they began to plucke vp their hearts, and to looke big, imagining that the ROMAINES would neuer abide them, but would be afeard to look them in the face, and only to ſee their march, it was ſo terrible & fearfull. But Perſeus after he had incoraged his men in this ſort, and had put them in ſuch a hope and iollity, when this barbarous ſupply came to ask him a thouſand crownes in hand for euery captain, he was ſo damped & troubled withall in his mind, caſting vp the ſum it came to, that his only couetouſnes and miſery made him returne them back, and refuſe their ſeruice: not as one that ment to fight with the ROMAINES, but rather to ſpare his treaſure, & to be a husband for thē, as if he ſhould haue giuen vp a ſtraight account vnto thē of his charges in this war, againſt whom he made it. And notwithſtanding alſo his enemies did teach him what he had to do, cōſidering that beſides all other their warlike furniture & munitiō, they had no leſſe then a hundred thouſand fighting men lying in camp together, ready to execute the Conſuls cōmandement: yet he taking vpō him to reſiſt ſo puiſſant an an army,& to maintaine the warres,which forced his enemies to be at extreme charge in entertaining ſuch multitudes of men, more then needed: hardly would depart with his gold and ſiluer, but kept it ſafe locked vp in his treaſury,as if he had bene afraid to touch it,and had bene none of his. And he did not ſhew that he came of the noble race of the kings of LYDIA,and PHOENICIA, who gloried to be rich: but ſhewed how by inheritance of bloud he chalenged ſome part of the vertue of Philip,and of Alexander, who both becauſe they eſteemed to buy victory with money, not money with victory, did many notable things, and thereby conquered the world. Hereof came the common ſaying in old time, that it was not Philip, but his gold and ſiluer that won the cities of GRECE. And Alexander when he went to conquer the INDES, ſeeing the MACEDONIANS cary with them all the wealth of PERSIA, which made his campe very heauy, and ſlow to march: he himſelf firſt of all ſet fire of his own cariage that conueyed all his neceſſaries,& perſwaded other to do the like, that they might march more lightly,and eaſily on the iourney. But Perſeus contrarily would not ſpend any part of his goods, to ſaue himſelfe, his children and realme, but rather yeelded to be led priſoner in triumph with a great ranſome, to ſhew the ROMAINES how good a husband he had bene for them. For he did not onely ſend away the GAVLES without giuing them pay as he had promiſed,but moreouer hauing perſwaded Gentius king of ILLYRIA to take his part in theſe wars,for the ſumme of three hundred talents which he had promiſed to furniſh him with: he cauſed the money to be told, and put vp in bags by thoſe whom Gentius ſent to receiue it. Whereupon Gentius thinking himſelfe ſure of the mony promiſed,committed a fond and foule part: for he ſtayed the ambaſſadours the ROMAINES ſent vnto him, and committed them to priſon. This part being come to Perſeus eares,he thought now he needed not hire him with mony to be an enemy to the ROMAINES,conſidering he had waded ſo farre,as that he had already done, was as a manifeſt ſigne of his ill will towards them, and that it was too late to looke backe and repent him,now that his foule part had plunged him into certaine warres,for an vncertaine hope. So did he abuſe the vnfortunate King,and defrauded him of the three hundred talents he had promiſed him. And worſe then this, ſhortly after he ſuffered Lucius Anicius the ROMAINE Prætor,whom they ſent againſt him with an army, to plucke King Gentius, his wife, and children, out of his kingdome, and to cary them priſoners with him. Now when AEmylius was arriued in MACEDON,to make war againſt ſuch an enemy: he made no maner of reckoning of his perſon,but of the great preparation and power he had. For in one camp he had foure thouſand horſmen,and no leſſe then forty thouſand footmen,with the which army he had planted himſelfe alongſt the ſea ſide,by the foot of the mount Olympus, in a place vnpoſſible to be approached: and there he had ſo well fortified all the ſtraites and paſſages vnto him with fortifications of wood,that he thought himſelfe to lie ſafe out of all daunger,and imagined to dally with AEmylius,and by tract of time to cate him out with charge. AEmylius in the meane ſeaſon lay not idle, but occupied his wits throughly, and left no meanes vnattempted, to put ſomething in proofe. And perceiuing that his ſouldiers by ouer much licentious libertie (wherin by ſufferance they liued before) were angry with delaying and lying ſtill, and that they did buſily occupy themſelues in the Generals office, ſaying this, and ſuch a thing would be done that is not done: he tooke them vp roundly, and commaunded them they ſhould meddle no more too curiouſly in matters that pertained not to them, and that they ſhould take care for nothing elſe, but to ſee their armour and weapon ready to ſerue valiantly,and to vſe their ſwords after the ROMAINES faſhion, when their Generall ſhould appoint and commaund them. Wherefore, to make them more carefull to looke to themſelues,he commanded thoſe that watched,ſhould haue no ſpeares nor pikes, becauſe they ſhould be more wakefull, hauing no long weapon to reſiſt the enemy, if they were aſſaulted. The greateſt trouble his army had,was lack of freſh water,becauſe the water that ran to the ſea was very litle,and maruellous foule by the ſea ſide. But AEmylius conſidering they were at the foote of the mount Olympus (which is of a maruellous height, and full of wood withal) coniectured,ſeeing the trees ſo freſh & green,that there ſhould be ſome litle prety ſprings among them,which ran vnder the ground. So he made them dig many holes & wels alongſt the mountain,which were ſtraight filled with faire water,being pent within groũd before for lack of breaking open the heads,which then ran down in ſtreams,& met together in ſundry places. And yet ſome do deny,that there is any meeting of waters within the ground,from whẽce the ſprings do come: and they ſay, that running out of the earth as they do, it is not for that the water breaketh out by any violence,or openeth in any place,as meeting together in one place of long time:

The originall of ſprings.

but that it ingendreth and riſeth at the ſame time and place where it runneth out, turning the ſubſtance into water, which is a moiſt vapour, thickned and made cold by the coldneſſe of the earth, and ſo becommeth a ſtreame, and runneth downe. For (ſay they) as womens breaſts are not alwaies full of milke (as milk pans are, that continually keep milk) but do of themſelues conuert the nutriment women take into milke, and after commeth forth at their nipples: euen ſo the ſprings and watery places of the earth, from whence the fountaines come, haue no meetings of hidden waters, nor hollow places ſo capable, readily to deliuer water from them, as one would draw it out of a pumpe or ſeſterne, from ſo many brooks, and deep riuers: but by their naturall coldnes and moiſture, they waxe thick, and put forth the vapour and aire ſo ſtrong, that they turne it into water. And this is the reaſon why the places where they dig & open the earth, do put forth more abundance of water by opening the ground: like as womẽs breaſts do giue more milk when they are moſt drawne and ſuckt, becauſe in a ſort they do better feed the vapour within them, and conuert it thereby into a running humour. Where, to the contrary, thoſe parts of the earth that are not digged, nor haue no vent outward, are the more vnable, and leſſe meet to ingender water, hauing not that prouocation and courſe to runne, that cauſeth the bringing forth of moiſture. Yet ſuch as maintain this opinion, do giue them occaſion that loue argument, to contrary them thus. Then we may ſay by like reaſon alſo, that in the bodies of beaſts there is no bloud long before, and that it ingendreth vpon a ſodaine, when they are hurt, by transferring of ſome ſpirit or fleſh that readily changeth into ſome running liquor. And moreouer, they are confuted by the common experience of theſe mine-men, that dig in the mines for mettal, or that vndermine caſtles to win them: who when they dig any great depth, do many times meet in the bowels of the earth with running riuers, the water whereof is not ingendred by litle and litle, as of neceſſitie it ſhould be, if it were true, that vpon the preſent opening of the ground, the humour ſhould immediatly be created, but it falleth vehemently all at one time. And we ſee oftentimes that in cutting thorough a mountaine or rocke, ſodainely there runneth out a great quantity of water. And thus much for this matter. Now to returne to our hiſtory again. Æmylius lay there a conuenient time, and ſtirred not: and it is ſaid there were neuer ſeene two ſo great armies one ſo neare to the other, and to be ſo quiet. In the end, caſting many things with himſelf, and deuiſing ſundry practiſes, he was informed of another way to enter into MACEDON, through the country of PERRÆBIA, ouer againſt the temple called Pythion, and the rock vpon which it is built, where there lay no garriſon: which gaue him better hope to paſſe that way, for that it was not kept, then that he feared the narrowneſſe and hardnes of the way vnto it. So, he brake the matter to his counſel. Thereupõ Scipio called Naſica (the ſon adopted of that great Scipio the AFRICAN, who became afterwards a great man, and was preſident of the Senate or counſell) was the firſt man that offered himſelf to leade them, whom it would pleaſe him to ſend to take that paſſage, & to aſſault their enemies behind. The ſecond was Fabius Maximus, the eldeſt ſonne of AEmylius, who being but a very yong man, roſe notwithſtanding, and offered himſelfe very willingly. AEmylius was very glad of their offers, and gaue them not ſo many men as Polybius writeth, but ſo many as Naſica himſelf declareth in a letter of his he wrote to a king, where he reporteth al the ſtory of this iourny. There were 3000. ITALIANS leauied in ITALY, by the confederates of the ROMAINES, who were not of the ROMAINE legions, and in the left wing about 5000. Beſides thoſe, Naſica tooke alſo 120. men at armes, and about 200. CRETANS and THRACIANS mingled together, of thoſe Harpalus had ſent thither. With this number Naſica departed from the camp, and tooke his way toward the ſea ſide, and lodged by the temple of Hercules, as if he had determined to do this feate by ſea, to enuiron the campe of the enemies behind. But when the ſouldiers had ſupped, and that it was darke night, he made the captains of euery band priuy to his enterpriſe, and ſo marched all night a contrary way from the ſea, vntil at the length they came vnder the temple of Pythion, where he lodged to reſt the ſouldiers that were ſore trauelled all night. In this place, the mount Olympus is aboue ten furlong high, as appeareth in a place ingrauen by him that meaſured it.

And did engraue it here in writing for to ſee,

Yet the Geometricians ſay, that there is no mountaine higher, nor ſea deeper, then the length of ten furlongs: ſo that I thinke this Xenagoras (in my opinion) did not take his meaſure at aduenture, and by geſſe, but by true rules of the art, and inſtruments Geometricall. There Naſica reſted all night. King Perſeus perceiuing in the meane time that Æmylius ſtirred not from the place where he lay, miſtruſting nothing his practiſe, and the coming of Naſica who was at hand: vntill ſuch time as a traytor of CRETE (ſtealing from Naſica) did reueale vnto him the pretended practiſe, as alſo the ROMAINES compaſſing of him about. He wondred much at theſe newes, howbeit he remoued not his campe from the place he lay in, but diſpatched one of his captaines called Milon, with ten thouſand ſtraungers, and two thouſand MACEDONIANS: and ſtraightly commanded him with all the poſſible ſpeed he could, to get the top of the hill before them. Polybius ſaith, that the ROMAINES came and gaue them an alarum, when they were ſleeping: But Naſica writeth, that there was a maruellous ſharpe and terrible battell on the top of the mountaine: and ſayd plainely, that a THRACIAN ſouldier comming towards him, he threw his dart at him, and hitting him right in the breaſt, ſlue him ſtarke dead: and hauing repulſed their enemies, Milon their captaine ſhamefully running away in his coat without armor or weapon, he followed him without any danger, and ſo went downe to the valley, with the ſafety of all his company. Naſica vvon the ſtraights of Macedon.

This conflict fortuning thus, Perſeus raiſed his campe in great haſte from the place where he was, & being diſappointed of his hope, he retired in great feare, as one at his wits end, & not knowing how to determine. Yet was he conſtrained either to ſtay, and incampe before the city of PYDNE, there to take the hazard of battell: or elſe to deuide his army into his cities and ſtrong holds, and to receiue the wars within his owne country, the which being once crept in, could neuer be driuen out againe, without great murder and bloudſhed. Hereupon his friends did counſell him, to chuſe rather the fortune of battell: alledging vnto him, that he was the ſtronger in men a great way, & that the MACEDONIANS wold fight luſtily with all the courage they could, conſidering that they fought for the ſafety of their wiues and children, and alſo in the preſence of their king, who ſhould both ſee euery mans doing, and fight himſelfe in perſon alſo for them. The king moued by theſe perſuaſions, determined to venter the chance of battell. So he pitched his campe, and viewed the ſituation of the places all about, & deuided the companies amongſt his captaines, purpoſing to giue a hot charge vpon the enemies when they ſhould draw neere. The place and country was ſuch, as being all champion, there was a goodly valley to range a battel of footmen in, and litle prety hils alſo one depending vpon another, which were very commodious for archers, naked men, & ſuch as were lightly armed, to retire themſelues being diſtreſſed, & alſo to enuiron their enemies behind. There were two ſmall riuers alſo, Æſon and Leucus that ran through the ſame, the which though they were not very deepe, being about the later end of the ſommer, yet they would annoy the ROMAINES notwithſtanding. Now when Æmylius was ioyned with Naſica, he marched on ſtraight in battell ray towards his enemies. But perceiuing a far off their battell marched in very good order, and the great multitude of men placed in the ſame: he wondred to behold it, and ſuddenly ſtayed his army, conſidering with himſelfe what he had to do. Then the yong captains hauing charge vnder him, deſirous to fight it out preſently, went vnto him to pray him to giue the onſet: but Naſica ſpecially aboue the reſt, hauing good hope in the former good lucke he had at his firſt encounter. AEmylius ſmiling, aunſwered him: ſo would I do, if I were as young as thou. But the ſundry victories I haue wonne heretofore, hauing taught me by experience the faults the vanquiſhed do commit, do forbid me to go ſo hotly to worke (before my ſouldiers haue reſted, which did returne but now) to aſſault an army ſet in ſuch order of battell. When he had anſwered him thus, he commaunded the firſt bands that were now in view of the enemies, ſhould imbattell themſelues, ſhewing a countenance to the enemie as though they would fight: and that thoſe in the rereward ſhould lodge in the meane time, and fortifie the campe. So, bringing the foremoſt men to be hindmoſt, by chaunging from man to man before the enemies were aware of it: he had broken his battell by little and little, and lodged his men, fortified within the campe without any tumult or noyſe, and the enemies neuer perceiuing it. But when night came, and euerie man had ſupped, as they were going to ſleepe and take their rest: the Moone which was at the full, and of a great height, began to darken and to chaunge into many sorts of colours, loosing her light, vntill such time as she vanished away, and was eclipsed altogether. Then the ROMAINES began to make a noise with basons and pans, as their fashion is to do in such a chaunce, thinking by this sound to call her againe, and to make her come to her light, lifting vp many torches lighted, and firebrands into the aire. The MACEDONIANS on the other side did no such matter within their campe, but were all together stricken with an horrible feare: and there ranne a whispering rumour through the people, that this signe in the element signified the eclipse of the King. For Æmylius was not ignorant of the diuersities of the eclipses, and he had heard say the cause is, by reason that the Moone making her ordinarie course about the world (after certaine reuolutions of time) doth come to enter into the round shadow of the earth, within the which she remaineth hidden, vntill such time as hauing past the darke region of the shadow, she commeth afterwards to recouer her light which she taketh of the Sunne. Neuertheless, he being a godly deuout man, so soone as he perceiued the Moone had recouered her former brightnesse againe, he sacrificed eleuen calues. And the next morning also by the breake of day, making sacrifice to Hercules, he could neuer haue any signes or tokens that promised him good lucke, in sacrificing twenty oxen one after another: but at the one & twentieth he had signes that promised him victory, so he defended himselfe. Wherfore, after he had vowed a solemne sacrifice of an hundred oxen to Hercules, and also games of prices at the weapons, he commaunded his captaines to put their men in readinesse to fight: and so sought to win time, tarying till the Sunne came about in the afternoone towards the West, to the end that the ROMAINES which were turned towards the East, should not haue it in their faces when they were fighting. In the meane time, he reposed himselfe in his tent, which was all open behind towards the side that looked into the valley, where the campe of his enemies lay. When it grew towards night, to make the enemies set vpon his men, some say he vsed this pollicy. He made a horse be driuen towards them without a bridle, & certaine ROMAINES followed him, as they would haue taken him againe: and this was the cause of procuring the skirmish. Other say, that the THRACIANS seruing vnder the charge of captaine Alexander, did set vpon certaine forragers of the ROMAINES, that brought forage into the campe: out of the which, seuen hundred of the LIGVRIANS ranne suddenly to the rescue, and relefe comming still from both armies, at the last the maine battell followed after. Wherefore Æmylius like a wise generall foreseeing by the daunger of this skirmish, and the stirring of both campes, what the fury of the battell would come to: came out of his tent, and passing by the bands did encourage them, and prayed them to sticke to it like men. In the meane time, Nasica thrusting himselfe into the place where the skirmish was hotest, perceiued the army of the enemies marching in battell readie to ioyne. The first that marched in the voward were the THRACIANS, who seemed terrible to looke vpon, as he writeth himselfe: for they were mighty made men, and caried maruellous bright targets of steele before them, their legges were armed with greaues, and their thighes with tases, their coates were blacke, and marched shaking heauy halberds vpon their shoulders. Next vnto these THRACIANS, there followed them all the other straungers and souldiers whom the king had hired, diuersely armed and set forth: for they were people of sundry nations gathered together, among whom the PÆONIANS were mingled. The third squadron was of MACEDONIANS, and all of them chosen men, aswell for the flower of their youth, as for the valiantnes of their persons: and they were all in goodly gilt armors, & braue purple cassockes vpon them, spicke and span new. And at their backes came after them, the old bands to shew themselues out of the campe with targets of copper, that made all the plaine to shine with the brightnesse of their steele and copper. And all the hils and mountaines thereabouts did ring againe like an Eccho, with the cry and noise of so many fighting men, one incouraging another. In this order they marched so fiercely with so great heart-burning, and such swiftnesse: that the first which were slaine at the incounter, fell dead two furlongs from the campe of the ROMAINES. The charge being giuen and the battell begunne, Æmylius galloping to the voward of his battell, perceiued that the captaines of the MACEDONIANS which were in the first rankes, had already thrust their pikes into the ROMAINES targets, so as they could not come neare them with their swords: and that the other MACEDONIANS carying their targets behind them, had now plucked them before them, and did base their pikes all at one time, and made a violent thrust into the targets of the ROMAINES. Which when he had considered, and of what strength and force his wall and ranke of of targets was, one ioyning ſo neare another, and what a terrour it was to ſee a front of a battell with ſo many armed pikes and ſteele heads: he was more afeard and amazed withall, then with any ſight he euer ſaw before: neuertheles he could wiſely diſſemble it at that time. And ſo paſſing by the companies of his horſemen, without either curaces or helmet vpon his head, he ſhewed a noble cheerfull countenance vnto them that fought. But on the contrary ſide, Perſeus the king of MACEDON, as Polybius writeth, ſo ſoone as the battell was begun, withdrew himſelfe, and got into the city of PYDNE, vnder pretence to go to do ſacrifice vnto Hercules: who doth not accept the faint ſacrifice of cowards, neither doth receiue their prayers, becauſe they be vnreaſonable. For it is no reaſon, that he that ſhooteth not, ſhould hit the white: nor that he ſhould winne the victory, that bideth not the battell: neither that he ſhould haue any good, that doth nothing toward it: nor that a naughty man ſhould be fortunate and proſper. The gods did fauour Æmylius prayers, becauſe he prayed for victory with his ſword in his hand, and fighting did call to them for aide. Howbeit there is one Poſidonius a writer, who ſaith he was in that time, and moreouer, that he was at the battell: and he hath written an hiſtorie containing many bookes of the acts of king Perſeus, where he ſaith, that it was not for faint heart, nor vnder colour to ſacrifice vnto Hercules, that Perſeus went from the battell, but becauſe he had a ſtripe of a horſe on the thigh the day before: who though he could not very well helpe himſelfe, and that all his friends ſought to perſwade him not to go to the battell, yet he cauſed one of his horſe to be brought to him notwithſtanding (which he commonly vſed to ride vp and downe on) and taking his backe, rode into the battell vnarmed, where an infinite number of darts were throwne at him from both ſides. And among thoſe, he had a blow with a dart that hurt him ſomewhat, but it was ouerthwart, & not with the point, and did hit him on the left ſide glauncing wiſe, with ſuch a force, that it rent his coate, and raſed his skin vnderneath, ſo as it left a marke behind a long time after. And this is all that Poſidonius writeth to defend and excuſe Perſeus. The ROMAINES hauing their hands full, & being ſtaied by the battell of the MACEDONIANS that they could make no breach into them: there was a captaine of the PELIGNIANS called Salius, who tooke the enſigne of his band, and caſt it among the preaſe of his enemies. Then all the PELIGNIANS ſet vpon them, with a maruellous force and fury in that place: for all ITALIANS thinke it too great a ſhame and diſhonour for ſouldiers to looſe or forſake their enſigne. Thus was there maruellous force of both ſides vſed in that place: for the PELIGNIANS proued to cut the MACEDONIANS pikes with their ſwords, or elſe to make them giue backe with their great targets, or to make a breach into them, and to take the pikes with their hands. But the MACEDONIANS to the contrary, holding their pikes faſt with both hands, ran them through that came neere vnto them: ſo that neither target nor corſlet could hold out the force and violence of the puſh of their pikes, in ſo much as they turned vp the heeles of the PELIGNIANS and TERRACINIANS, who like deſperate beaſts without reaſon, ſhutting in themſelues among their enemies, ranne wilfully vpon their owne deaths, and their firſt ranke were ſlaine euery man of them. Thereupon thoſe that were behind, gaue backe a litle, but fled not turning their backes, and onely retired giuing backe towards the mountaine Olocrus. Æmylius ſeeing that (as Poſidonius writeth) rent his arming coate from his backe for anger, becauſe that ſome of his men gaue backe: other durſt not front the battell of the MACEDONIANS, which was ſo ſtrongly imbattelled on euerie ſide, and ſo mured in with a wall of pikes, preſenting their armed heads on euery ſide a man could come, that it was impoſſible to breake into them, no not ſo much as come neere them onely. Yet notwithſtanding, becauſe the field was not altogether plaine and euen, the battell that was large in the front, could not alwayes keepe that wall, continuing their targets cloſe one to another, but they were driuen of neceſſity to breake and open in many places, as it happeneth oft in great battels, according to the great force of the ſouldiers: that in one place they thruſt forward, and in another they giue backe, and leaue a hole. Wherefore Æmylius ſuddenly taking the vantage of this occaſion, deuided his men into ſmall companies, and commanded them they ſhould quickly thruſt in betweene their enemies, and occupie the places they ſaw voide in the front of their enemies, and that they ſhould ſet on them in that ſort, and not with one whole continuall charge, but occupying them here and there with diuerſe companies in ſundry places. AEmylius gaue this charge vnto the priuate captaines of euery band and their lieutenants, and the captaines alſo gaue the like charge vnto their ſouldiers that could skilfully execute their commaundement. For they went preſently into thoſe parts where they ſaw the places open, and being once entred in among them, ſome gaue charge vpon the flankes of the MACEDONIANS, where they were all naked and vnarmed: other ſet vpon them behind: ſo that the ſtrength of all the corpes of the battell (which conſiſteth in keeping cloſe together) being opened in this ſort, was ſtraight ouerthrowne. Furthermore, when they came to fight man for man, or a few againſt a few, the MACEDONIANS with their litle ſhort ſwords, came to ſtrike vpon the great ſhields of the ROMAINES, which were very ſtrong, and couered all their bodies downe to the foote. And they to the contrary, were driuen of neceſſity to receiue the blowes of the ſtrong heauy ſwords of the ROMAINES, vpon their litle weake targets: ſo that what with their heauineſſe, and the vehement force wherewith the blowes lighted vpon them, there was no target nor corſlet, but they paſſed it through, and ran them in. By reaſon whereof they could make no long reſiſtance, whereupon they turned their backes and ranne away. But when they came to the ſquadron of the old beaten ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, there was the cruelleſt fight and moſt deſperate ſeruice, where they ſay that Marcus Cato (ſon of great Cato, and ſonne in law of Æmylius) ſhewing all the valiantneſſe in his perſon that a noble mind could poſſibly performe, loſt his ſword which fell out of his hand. But he like a yong man of noble courage, that had bin valiantly brought vp in all diſcipline, and knew how to follow the ſteps of his father (the nobleſt perſon that euer man ſaw) was to ſhew then his value and worthineſſe: and thought it more honor for him there to die, then liuing to ſuffer his enemies to enioy any ſpoile of his. So, by and by he ran into the ROMAINE army, to find out ſome of his friends, whom he told what had befallen him, and prayed them to helpe him to recouer his ſword: whereto they agreed. And being a good company of luſty valiant ſouldiers together, they ruſhed ſtraight in among their enemies, at the place where he brought them, and ſo did ſet vpon them with ſuch force and fury, that they made a lane through the middeſt of them, and with great ſlaughter and ſpilling of bloud, euen by plaine force, they cleared the way ſtill before them. Now when the place was voided, they ſought for the ſword, and in the end found it with great ado, amongſt a heape of other ſwords and dead bodies, whereat they reioyced maruellouſly. Then ſinging a ſong of victorie, they went againe more fiercely then before to giue a charge vpon their enemies, who were not yet broken aſunder: vntill ſuch time as at the length, the three thouſand choſen MACEDONIANS fighting valiantly euen to the laſt man, and neuer forſaking their rankes, were all ſlaine in the place. After whoſe ouerthrow, there was a great ſlaughter of other alſo that fled: ſo that all the valley and foote of the mountaines thereabouts was couered with dead bodies. The next day after the battell, when the ROMAINES did paſſe ouer the riuer of Leucus, they found it running all a bloud. For it is ſayd there were ſlaine at this field of Perſeus men, aboue fiue and twenty thouſand: and of the ROMAINES ſide, as Poſidonius ſaith, not aboue ſixe ſcore, or as Naſica writeth, but foureſcore only. And for ſo great an ouerthrow, it is reported it was wonderfull quickly done & executed. For they began to fight about three of the clocke in the afternoone, and had wonne the victorie before foure, and all the reſt of the day they followed their enemies in chaſe, an hundred and twenty furlongs from the place where the battell was fought: ſo that it was very late, and farre forth night, before they returned againe into the campe. So ſuch as returned, were receiued with maruellous great ioy of their pages that went out with linkes and torches lighted, to bring their maiſters into their tents, where their men had made great bonfires, and decked them vp with crownes and garlands of laurell, ſauing the Generals tent onely: who was very heauy, for that of his two ſonnes he brought with him to the warres, the younger could not be found, which he loued beſt of the twaine, becauſe he ſaw he was of a better nature then the reſt of his brethren. For euen then, being new crept out of the ſhell as it were, he was maruellous valiant and hardie, and deſired honour wonderfully. Now Æmylius thought he had bene caſt away, fearing leaſt for lacke of experience in the warres, and through the raſhneſſe of his youth, he had put himſelfe too farre in fight amongſt the preaſe of the enemies. Hereupon the campe heard ſtraight what ſorow Æmylius was in, and how grieuouſly he tooke it. The ROMAINES being ſet at ſupper, roſe from their meat, and with torch-light ſome ran to Æmylius tent, other went out of the campe to ſeeke him among the dead bodies, if they might know him: ſo all the campe was full of ſorow & mourning, the vallies and hils all abouts did ring againe with the cries of thoſe that called Scipio aloud. For euen from his childhood he had a naturall gift in him, of all the rare and ſingular parts required in a captaine and wiſe gouernour of the common-weale aboue all the young men of his time. At the laſt, when they were out of all hope of his coming againe, he happily returned from the

the chase of the enemies, with two or three of his familiars onely, all bloudied with new bloud (like a swift running greyhound fleshed with the bloud of the hare) hauing pursued very farre for ioy of the victory. It is that Scipio which afterwards destroyed both the cities of CARTHAGE and NVMANTIVM, who was the greatest man of war, and valiantest captaine of the ROMAINES in his time, and of the greatest authority and reputation among them. Thus fortune deferring till another time the execution of her spite, which she did beare to so noble an exploit, suffered Æmylius for that time, to take his ful pleasure of that noble victory. And as for Perseus, he fled first from the city of PYDNE, vnto the city of PELLA, with his horsmen, which were in manner all saued. Whereupon the footmen that saued themselues by flying, meeting them by the way, called them traytors, cowards, and villaines: and worse then that, they turned them off their horse backes, and fought it out lustily with them. Perseus seeing that, and fearing least this mutiny might turne to light on his necke, he turned his horse out of the high-way, and pulled off his purple coate, and caried it before him, and tooke his diademe in his hand, fearing to be knowne thereby: & that he might the more easily speake with his friends by the way, he lighted on foot, and led his horse in his hand. But such as were about him, one made as though he would mend the latchet of his shoe, another seemed to water his horse, another as though he would drinke: so that one dragging after another in this sort, they all left him at the last, & ran their way, not fearing the enemies fury so much, as their kings cruelty: who being grieued with his misfortune, sought to lay the fault of the ouerthrow vpō all other but himselfe. Now he being come into the city of PELLA by night, Euctus and Eudæus, two of his treasurers came vnto him, & speaking boldly (but out of time) presumed to tell him the great fault he had committed, and to counsell him what he should do. The king was so moued with their presumption, that with his owne hands he stabbed his dagger in them both, & slue them outright. But after this fact, all his seruants and friends refused him, and there only taried with him but Euander CRETAN, Archedamus ÆTOLIAN, and Neo BOEOTIAN. And as for the meane souldiers, there were none that followed him but the CRETANS, and yet it was not for the good will they did beare him, but for the loue of his gold and siluer, as Bees that keepe their hiues for loue of the hony: for he caried with him a great treasure, & gaue them leaue to spoile certaine plate & vessell of gold and siluer, to the value of fifty talents. But first of all, when he was come into the city of AMPHIPOLIS, and afterwards into the city of ALEPSE, and that the feare was well blowne ouer, he returned againe to his old humour, which was borne and bred with him, and that was auarice and misery: for he complained vnto those that were about him, that he had vnwares giuen to the souldiers of CRETA, his plate and vessell of gold to be spoiled, being those which in old time belonged vnto Alexander the great: and prayed them with teares in his eyes that had the plate, they would be contented to change it for ready mony. Now such as knew his nature, found straight this was but a fraud and a CRETAN lye, to deceiue the CRETANS with: but those that trusted him, and did restore againe the plate they had, did loose it euery iot, for he neuer payed them peny for it. So he got of his friends, the value of thirty talents, which his enemies soone after did take from him. And with that sum he went into the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he tooke the sanctuary & priuiledge of the temple of Castor and Pollux. They say, that the MACEDONIANS of long continuance did naturally loue their kings: but then seeing all their hope and expectation broken, their harts failed them, and broke withall. For they all came & submitted themselues to Æmylius, and made him Lord of the whole Realme of MACEDON in two dayes: and this doth seeme to confirme their words, who impute all AEmylius doings vnto his good fortune. And surely, the maruellous fortune he happened on in the city AMPHIPOLIS, doth confirme it much, which a man cannot ascribe otherwise, but to the speciall grace of the gods. For one day beginning to do sacrifice, lightning fell from heauen, and set all the wood on fire vpon the altar, and sanctified the sacrifice. But yet the miracle of his fame is more to be wondred at. For foure dayes after Perseus had lost the battell, and that the city of PELLA was taken, as the people of ROME were at the lists or shew place, seeing horses run for games: suddenly there arose a rumor at the entring into the lists where the games were, how AEmylius had wonne a great battell of King Perseus, and had conquered all MACEDON. This newes was rife straight in euery mans mouth, and there followed vpon it a maruellous ioy and great cheere in euerie corner, with shouts and clapping of hands, that continued all the day through the city of ROME. Afterwards they made diligent enquirie, how this rumour first came vp, but no certaine author could be knowne, and euery man sayd they heard it spoken: so as in the end it came to nothing, and passed away in that sort for a time. But shortly after, there came letters, and certaine newes that made them wonder more then before, from whence the messenger came that reported the first newes of it: which could be deuised by no naturall meanes, and yet proued true afterwards. We do reade also of a battell that was fought in ITALIE, neare vnto the riuer of SAGRA, wherof newes was brought the very same day vnto PELOPONNESVS. And of another also in like maner that was fought in ASIA against the MEDES, before the city of MYCALA: the newes whereof came the same day vnto the campe of the GRECIANS, lying before the city of PLATOEES. And in that great iourny where the ROMAINES ouerthrew the Tarquines, & the army of the LATINES: immediatly after the battell was wonne, they saw two goodly young men come newly from the campe, who brought newes of the victory to ROME, and they iudged they were Castor & Pollux. The first man that spake to them in the market place before the fountaine, where they watered their horse being all of a white some, told them: that they wondred how they could so quickly bring these newes. And they laughing came to him, and tooke him softly by the beard with both their hands, and euen in the market place his haire being blacke before, was presently turned yellow. This miracle made them beleeue the report the man made, who euer after was called Ænobarbus, as you would say, bearded as yellow as gold. Another like matter that happened in our time, maketh all such newes credible: For when Antonius rebelled against the Emperour Domitian, the city of ROME was in a maruellous perplexity, because they looked for great warres towards GERMANIE. But in this feare, there grew a sudden rumor of victory, and it went currantly through ROME, that Antonius himselfe was slaine, and all his army ouerthrowne, and not a man left aliue. This rumor was so rife, that many of the chiefest men of ROME beleeued it, and did sacrifice thereupon vnto the gods, giuing them thankes of the victory. But when the matter came to sifting, who was the first author of the rumour, no man could tell: for one put it ouer still to another, and it died so in the end amongst the people, as in a bottomlesse matter, for they could neuer boult out any certaine ground of it: but euē as it came flying into ROME, so went it flying away againe, no man can tell how. Notwithstanding, Domitian holding on his iourny to make this warre, met with posts that brought him letters for the certaine victory: and remembring the rumor of the victory that ran before in ROME, he found it true, that it was on the very same day the victory was gotten: and the distance betweene ROME and the place where the field was won, was aboue 20000 furlongs off. Euery man in our time knoweth this to be true. But againe to our history. Cn. Octauius, lieutenant of the army of Æmylius by sea, came to anker vnder the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he wold not take Perseus by force out of the sanctuary where he was, for the reuerence he did beare vnto the gods Castor and Pollux: but he did besiege him in such sort, as he could not scape him, nor flie by sea out of the Iland. Yet he had secretly practised with one Oroandes a CRETAN, that had a brigantine, and was at a prise with him for a sum of mony to conuey him away by night: but the CRETAN serued him a right CRETANS tricke. For when he had taked abord by night into his vessell, all the kings treasure of gold and siluer, he sent him word that he should not faile the next night following to come vnto the peere by the temple of Ceres, with his wife, his children and seruants, where indeed was no possibility to take shipping: but the next night following he hoised saile, and got him away. It was a pitifull thing that Perseus was driuen to do and suffer at that time. For he came downe in the night by ropes, out of a litle straight window vpon the wals, and not only himselfe, but his wife and litle babes, who neuer knew before what flying and hardnesse meant. And yet he fetched a more grieuous bitter sigh, when one told him on the peere, that he saw Oroandes the CRETAN vnder saile in the maine seas. Then day beginning to breake, & seeing himselfe voide of all hope, he ran with his wife for life to the wall, to recouer the sanctuary againe, before the ROMAINES that saw him could ouertake him. And as for his children, he had giuen them himselfe into the hands of one Ion, whom before he had maruellously loued, and who did then traiterously betray him: for he deliuered his children vnto the ROMAINES. Which part was one of the chiefest causes that draue him (as a beast that will follow her litle ones being taken from her) to yeeld himselfe into their hands that had his children. Now he had a speciall confidence in Scipio Nasica, and therefore he asked for him when he came to yeeld himselfe: but it was answered him, that he was not there. Then he began to lament his hard and miserable fortune euery way. And in the end, considering how necessity enforced him, he yeelded himselfe into the hands of Cneus Octauius, wherein he shewed plainly, that he had another vice in him more vnmanly and vile, then auarice: that was, a faint hart, and feare to dye. But hereby hereby he depriued himselfe of others pity and compassion towards him, being that only thing which fortune cannot deny & take from the afflicted, and specially from them that haue a noble hart. For he made request they would bring him vnto the Generall Æmylius, who rose from his chaire when he saw him come, and went to meete him with his friends, the water standing in his eyes, to meete a great king, by fortune of warre and by the will of the gods, fallen into that most lamentable state. But he to the contrary, vnmanly, and shamefully behaued himselfe. For he fell downe at his feete, and embraced his knees, and vttered such vncomely speech and vile requests, as Æmylius selfe could not abide to heare them: but knitting his browes against him, being hartily offended, he spake thus vnto him: Alas poore man, why dost thou discharge fortune of this fault, where thou mightest iustly charge and accuse her to thy discharge, doing things, for the which euery one iudgeth thou hast deserued thy present misery, and art vnworthy also of thy former honor? Why dost thou defame my victory, and blemish the glory of my doings, shewing thy selfe so base a man, as my honour is not great to ouercome so vnworthy an enemy? The ROMAINES haue euer esteemed magnanimity, euen in their greatest enemies: but dastardlinesse, though it be fortunate, yet it is hated of euery body. Notwithstanding, he tooke him vp, and taking him by the hand, gaue him into the custody of Ælius Tubero. Then Æmylius went into his tent, and caried his sons, and sons in law with him, and other men of quality, and specially the yonger sort. And being set downe, he continued a great space very pensiue with himselfe, not speaking a word: insomuch that all the standers by wondered much at the matter. In the end he began to enter into discourse and talke of fortune, and the vnconstancy of these worldly things, & said vnto them: Is there any man liuing, my friends, who hauing fortune at will, should therefore boast and glory in the prosperity of his doings, for that he hath conquered a country, city, or Realme: and not rather to feare the vnconstancy of fortune? who laying before our eyes, and all those that professe armes at this present, so notable an example of the common frailty of men, doth plainly teach vs to thinke, that there is nothing constant or perdurable in this world. For when is it, that men may thinke themselues assured, considering that when they haue ouercome others, then are they driuen to mistrust fortune most, and to mingle feare and mistrust, with ioy of victory: if they will wisely consider the common course of fatall destiny that altereth daily, sometime fauoring one, otherwhile throwing downe another? You see, that in an houres space we haue troden vnder our feet the house of Alexander the great: who hath bin the mightiest and most redoubted prince of the world. You see a king, that not long since was folowed and accompanied, with many thousand souldiers of horsmen & footmen, brought at this present into such miserable extremity, that he is inforced to receiue his meate and drinke daily at the hands of his enemies. Should we haue any better hope then, that fortune will alwayes fauor our doings, more then she doth his now, at this present? no out of doubt. Therefore digesting this matter well, you yong men I say, be not too brag nor foolish proud, of this conquest and noble victory: but thinke what may happen hereafter, marking to what end fortune will turne the entiy of this our present prosperity. Such were Æmylius words to these yong men, as it is reported, bridling by these and such like perswasions, the lusty brauery of this youth, euen as with the bit and bridle of reason. Afterwards he put his army into garrisons to refresh them: and went himselfe in person in the meane time to visite GREECE, making it an honorable progresse, and also a commendable. For as he passed through the cities, he releeued the people, reformed the gouernment of their state, and euer gaue them some gift or present. Vnto some he gaue corne, which king Perseus had gathered for the wars: and vnto other he gaue oiles, meeting with so great store of prouision, that he rather lacked people to giue it vnto, to receiue it at his hands, then wanting to giue, there was so much. As he passed by the city of DELPHES, he saw there a great pillar, foure square, of white stone, which they had set vp, to put king Perseus image of gold vpon it. Whereupon he commanded them to set vp his in that place, saying: it was reason the conquered should giue place vnto the conquerors. And being in the city of OLYMPIA, visiting the temple of Iupiter Olympian, he spake this openly, which euer since hath bene remembred: that Phidias had rightly made Iupiter, as Homer had described him. Afterwards when the ten ambassadors were arriued that were sent from ROME to establish with him the realm of MACEDON, he redeliuered the MACEDONIANS their country and townes againe, to liue at liberty, according to their lawes, paying yearely to the ROMAINES for tribute, a hundred talents: where before they were wont to pay vnto their kings ten times as much. And he made playes and games of all sorts, and did celebrate sumptuous sacrifices vnto the gods. He kept open court to all commers, & made noble feasts, and defrayed the whole charge thereof, with the treasure Perseus had gathered together, sparing for no cost. But through his care and foresight, there was such a speciall good order taken, euery man so curteously receiued and welcommed, and so orderly marshalled at the table according to their estate and calling, that the GRECIANS wondred to see him so carefull in matters of sport and pleasure: and that he tooke as great paines in his own person, to see that smal matters should be ordered as they ought, as he tooke regard for discharge of more weighty causes. But this was a maruellous pleasure to him, to see that among such sumptuous sights prepared to shew pleasure to the persons inuited, no sight nor stately shew did so delight them, as to enioy the sight and company of his person. So he told them, that seemed to wonder at his diligence & care in these matters: that to order a feast well, required as great iudgement and discretion, as to set a battell: to make the one fearfull to the enemies, and the other acceptable to his friends. But men esteemed his bounty & magnanimity for his best vertue and quality. For he did not only refuse to see the kings wonderfull treasure of gold and siluer, but caused it to be told, and deliuered to the custody of the treasurers, to cary to the coffers of store in ROME: and only suffered his sons that were learned, to take the bookes of the kings library. When de did reward the souldiers for their valiant seruice in this battell, he gaue his son in law Æmylius Tubero a cup, weying fiue talents. It is the same Tubero we told you of before, who liued with sixteene other of his kin all in one house, and of the only reuenue they had of a litle farme in the country. Some say, that that cup was the first pecce of plate that euer came into the house of the Ælians, & yet it came for honor and reward of vertue: but before that time, neither themselues, nor their wiues, wold euer haue, or weare any gold or siluer. After he had very well ordered and disposed all things, at the last he tooke leaue of the GRECIANS, and counselled the MACEDONIANS to remember the liberty the ROMAINES had giuen them, & that they should be carefull to keepe it, by their good gouernement and concord together. Then he departed from them, and tooke his iourny towards the country of EPIRVS, hauing receiued commission from the Senate of ROME, to suffer his souldiers who had done seruice in the battell, and ouerthrow of king Perseus, to spoile all the cities of that country. Wherefore that he might surprise them on a sudden, and that they should mistrust nothing, he sent to all the cities that they should send him by a certaine day, ten of the chiefest men of euery city. Who when they were come, he commanded them to go and bring him by such a day, all the gold & siluer they had within their cities, aswell in their priuate houses, as in their temples and churches, and gaue vnto euery one of them a captaine and garrison with them, as if it had bene only to haue receiued and searched for the gold and siluer he demanded. But when the day appointed was come, the souldiers in diuerse places (and all at one time) set vpon their enemies, and did rifle and spoile them of that they had, and made them also pay ransome euery man: So as by this pollicy, there were taken & made slaues in one day, a hundred and fiftie thousand persons, and threescore and ten cities spoiled and sacked euery one. And yet when they came to deuide the spoile of this generall destruction of a whole Realme by the polle, it came not to euery souldiers part, aboue eleuen siluer Drachmes a peece. Which made euery one to wonder greatly, and to feare also the terror of the warres, to see the wealth and riches of so great a Realme, to amount to so litle for euery mans share. When Æmylius had done this fact against his owne nature, which was very gentle and curteous: he went vnto the sea side to the city of ORICA, and there imbarked with his army bound for ITALIE. Where when he was arriued, he went vp the riuer of Tyber against the streame, in king Perseus chiefe galley, which had sixteene owers on a side, richly set out with the armor of the prisoners, rich clothes of purple colour, and other such spoiles of the enemies: so that the ROMAINES running out of ROME in multitudes of people to see this galley, & going side by side by her as they rowed softly, Æmylius tooke as great pleasure in it, as in any open games or feasts, or triumph that had bene shewed indeed. But when the souldiers saw, that the gold and siluer of king Perseus treasure was not deuided amongst them according vnto promise, and that they had a great deale lesse then they looked for, they were maruellously offended, and inwardly grudged Æmylius in their harts. Neuertheless they durst not speake it openly, but did accuse him, that he had bene too straight vnto them in this warre: and therefore they did shew no great desire, nor forwardnesse, to procure him the honour of triumph. Which Seruius Galba vnderstanding, that had bene an old enemy of his, notwithstanding he had the charge of a thousand men vnder him in this warre: he like an enuious viper told the people, how Æmylius had not deserued the honor of triumph, and sowed seditious words against him among the souldiers, to aggrauate their ill will the more against him. Moreouer, he craued a day of the Tribunes of the people, to haue respit to bring forth such matter as they determined to obiect against him: saying the time then was far spent, the Sun being but foure houres high, and that it would require longer time and leisure. The Tribunes made him answer, that he should speake then what he had to say against him, or otherwise they would not grant him audience. Hereupon he began to make a long oration in his dispraise, full of railing words, and spent all the rest of the day in that railing oration. Afterwards when night came on, the Tribunes brake vp the assembly, and the next morning the souldiers being incouraged by Galbaes oration, and hauing confedered together, did flocke about Galba, in the mount of the Capitoll, where the Tribunes had giuen warning they would keepe their assembly. Now being broad day, Æmylius triumph was referred to the most number of voices of the people, & the first tribe flatly did deny his triumph. The Senate, and the residue of the people hearing that, were very sory to see they did Æmylius so open wrong and iniury. The common people sayd nothing to it, but seemed to be very sory, howbeit they sought no redresse. The Lords of the Senate cried out vpon them, and sayd it was too much shame, and exhorted one another to bridle the insolency and boldnesse of these souldiers, who would grow in the end to such tumult and disorder, that they would commit all mischiefe and wickednesse, if betimes they were not looked to and preuented, seeing they did so openly stand against their Generall, seeking to depriue him of the honor of his triumph and victory. So they assembled a good company of them together, and went vp to the Capitoll, and prayed the Tribunes they would stay to take the voices of the people, vntill they had acquainted them with such needfull matter, as they had to open vnto them. The Tribunes granted to it, & silence was made. Then Marcus Seruilius, who had bene Consull, and had fought three and twenty combats of life and death in his owne person, & had alwayes slaine as many of his enemies as chalenged him man for man: rose vp, and spake in fauor of Æmylius in this maner: I know now (sayd he) better then before, how noble and worthy a captaine Paulus Æmylius is, who hath atcheiued such glory and honorable victory, with so dishonorble and disobedient souldiers. And I can but wonder that the people not long since reioyced, & made great account of the victories and triumphs won vpon the ILLYRIANS & other nations of AFRICKE: and that now they should for spite enuy his glory (doing what lyeth in them to hinder) to bring a MACEDONIAN king aliue in a triumph, and to shew the glory and greatnesse of king Philip and Alexander the great, subdued by the ROMAINES force and power. What reason haue ye, that not long since, vpon a flying rumour that Æmylius had won the battell against Perseus, you straight made sacrifices to the gods with great ioy, praying them that you might be witnesses of the truth thereof: and now that the person himselfe whom ye made Generall is returned home, and doth deliuer you most assured victory, you do frustrate the gods most solemne thanks and honor dew to them, and do depriue your selues also of your wonted glory in such a case: as if you were afeard to see the greatnesse of your prosperity, or that you meant to pardon a king, your slaue and prisoner. And yet of the two, you haue more reason to hinder the triumph, as pitying the king, then enuying your Captaine. But the malice of the wicked, through your patience is growne to such an insolent audacity & boldnesse, that we see men present here before vs, which neuer went from the smoke of the chimney, nor caried away any blowes in the field, being crammed at at home like women and house-doues, and yet they are so impudent and shameless, as they dare presume vnreuerently to your faces, to prate of the office and duty of a Generall of an army, and of the desert of triumph, before you I say, who by experience of many a sore cut and wound vpon your bodies in the warres, haue learned to know a good & valiant captaine, from a vile and cowardly person. And speaking these words, he cast open his gowne, and shewed before them all, the infinite scars and cuts he had receiued vpon his brest: and then turning him behind, shewed all such places as were not fit to be seene openly, and so turned himselfe againe to Galba, and sayd vnto him: Thou mockest me for that I shew thee: but I reioyce before my countrimen and citizens: that for seruing my country night and day on horse backe, I haue these wounds vpon me which thou seest. Now get thee about thy businesse, & receiue their voices: and I will come after, noting them that are naughty and vnthankful citizens, who like to be soothed with flattery, and not stoutly cõmanded, as behoueth a Generall in the warre. These words so reined the hard headed souldiers with the curbe of reason, that all the other tribes agreed in one, and granted Æmylius triumph: the order and solemnity whereof was performed in this sort. First, the people hauing ſet vp ſundry ſcaffolds, aſwell in the liſts and field called Circos by the LATINES, where the games and common running of horſes and chariots are made, as alſo about the market place, & in other ſtreetes of the city, the which the ſhew of the triumph ſhould paſſe: they all preſented themſelues in their beſt gownes to ſee the magnificence and ſtate thereof. All the temples of the gods alſo were ſet wide open, hanged full of garlands of flowers, and all perfumed within: and there were ſet through all the quarters of the city, numbers of ſergeants and other officers holding tipſtaues in their hands to order the ſtragling people, & to keepe them vp in corners and lanes ends, that they ſhould not peſter the ſtreets, and hinder the triumph. Furthermore, the ſight of this triumph was to continue three daies, wherof the firſt was ſcant ſufficient to ſee the paſſing by of the images, tables, and pictures, and ſtatues of wonderfull bigneſſe, all won and gotten of their enemies, and drawne in the ſhew vpon 250 charets. The ſecond day, there were caried vpon a number of carts, all the faireſt and richeſt armour of the MACEDONIANS, aſwell of copper, as alſo of iron and ſteele, all gliſtering bright, being newly furbiſhed, and artificially layed in order (and yet in ſuch ſort, as if they had bene caſt in heapes one vpon another, without taking any care otherwiſe for the ordering and laying of them) faire burganets vpon targets: habergions, or brigantines and corſlets, vpon greaues: round targets of the CRETANS, and iauelins of the THRACIANS, and arrowes amongſt the armed pikes: all this armour and cariage, being bound one to another ſo trimly (neither being too looſe, nor too ſtraight) that one hitting againſt another, as they drew them vpon the carts through the city, they made ſuch a ſound and noiſe, as it was fearfull to heare it: ſo that the only ſight of theſe ſpoiles of the captiues being ouercome, made the ſight ſo much more terrible to behold. After theſe carts loden with armor, there followed 3000 men, which caried the ready mony in 750 veſſels, which weighed about three talents a peece, and euery one of them were caried by foure men: & there were other that caried great bowles of ſiluer, cups and goblets faſhioned like pitchers, and other pots to drinke in, goodly to behold, aſwell for their bigneſſe, as for their great & ſingular imboſſed works about them. The third day early in the morning, the trumpets began to ſound and ſet forwards, ſounding no march nor ſweet note, to beautifie the triumph withall: but they blew out the braue alarum they ſound at an aſſault, to giue the ſouldiers courage for to fight. After them followed ſixſcore goodly fat oxen, hauing all their hornes gilt, and garlands of flowers & noſegaies about their heads, and there went by them certaine yong men, with aprons of needle-worke, girt about their middle, who led them to the ſacrifice, and yong boyes with them alſo, that caried goodly baſons of gold and ſiluer, to caſt and ſprinkle the bloud of the ſacrifices about. And after theſe, followed thoſe that caried all coynes of gold deuided by baſons and veſſels, and euery one of them weying three talents as they did before, that caried the great holy cup, which Æmylius had cauſed to be made of maſſie gold, ſet full of precious ſtones, weying the weight of ten talents, to make an offring vnto the gods. And next vnto them went other that caried plate, made and wrought after antike faſhion, & notable cups of the ancient kings of MACEDON: as the cup called Antigonus, and another Seleucus: and to be ſhort, all the whole cubberd of plate of gold and ſiluer of king Perſeus. And next them came the charret of his armour, in the which was all king Perſeus harneſſe, and his royall band (they call a Diademe) vpon his armour. And a litle ſpace betweene them, followed next the kings children, whom they led priſoners, with the traine of their ſchoole-maiſters and other officers, & their ſeruants, weeping and lamenting: who held vp their hands vnto the people that looked vpon them, and taught the kings yong children to do the like, to aske mercy and grace at the peoples hands. There were three prety litle children, two ſonnes and a daughter amongſt them, whoſe tender yeares and lacke of vnderſtanding, made them (poore ſoules) they could not feele their preſent miſery, which made the people ſo much the more to pity them, when they ſaw the poore little infants, that knew not the chaunge of their fortune: ſo that for the compaſſion they had of them, they almoſt let the father paſſe without looking vpon him. Many peoples harts did melt for very pity, that the teares ran downe their cheekes, ſo as this ſight brought both pleaſure and ſorow, together to the lookers on, vntill they were paſt and gone a good way out of ſight. King Perſeus the father, followed after his children and their traine, and he was clothed in a blacke gown, wearing a paire of ſlippers on his feet after his country maner. He ſhewed by his countenance his troubled mind, oppreſt with ſorow of his moſt miſerable ſtate and fortune. He was followed with his kinſfolkes, his familiar friends, his officers and houſhold ſeruants, their faces diſfigured by blubbering, ſhewing to the world by their lamenting teares, and ſorowfull eyes caſt

vpon their vnfortunate maiſter, how much they ſorowed and bewailed his moſt hard and cruell fortune, litle accounting of their owne miſery. The voice goeth, that Perſeus ſent vnto Æmylius to intreat him, that he ſhould not be led through the city in the ſhew & ſight of the triumph. But Æmylius mocking (as he deſerued) his cowardly faint hart, anſwered: as for that, it was before, and is now in him, to do if he will. Meaning to let him vnderſtand thereby, that he might rather chuſe to dye, then liuing to receiue ſuch open ſhame. Howbeit his hart would not ſerue him, he was ſo cowardly, and made ſo effeminate, by a certaine vaine hope he knew not what, that he was contented to make one among his owne ſpoiles. After all this, there followed 400 princely crownes of gold, which the cities & townes of GRECE had purpoſely ſent by their ambaſſadors vnto AEmylius, to honor his victory: and next vnto them, he came himſelfe in his charet triumphing, which was paſſing ſumptuouſly ſet forth and adorned. It was a noble ſight to behold: and yet the perſon of himſelfe onely was worth the looking on, without all that great pompe & magnificence. For he was apparelled in a purple gowne branched with gold, and caried in his right hand a laurell bough, as all his army did beſides: the which being deuided by bands and companies, followed the triumphing charret of their captaine, ſome of the ſouldiers ſinging ſongs of victory, which the ROMAINES vſe to ſing in like triumphs, mingling them with merry pleaſant toyes, reioycing at their captaine. Other of them alſo did ſing ſongs of triumph, in the honor and praiſe of Æmylius noble conqueſt and victory. He was openly praiſed, bleſſed, and honoured of euery body, and neither hated nor enuied of honeſt men: ſauing the ordinary vſe of ſome god, whoſe propeity is alwayes to leſſen or cut off ſome part of mans exceeding proſperity and felicity, mingling with mans life the ſence and feeling of good and euill together: becauſe that no liuing perſon ſhould paſſe all his time of life, without ſome aduerſity or misfortune, but that ſuch (as Homer ſaith) ſhould only thinke themſelues happy, to whom fortune hath equally ſorted the good with the euill. And this I ſpeake, becauſe Æmylius had foure ſons, two of the which he gaue in adoption vnto the families of Scipio and of Fabius, as we haue ſayd before: & two other which he had by his ſecond wife, he brought vp with him in his owne houſe, and were both yet very yong: of the which the one died, being fourteene yeares of age fiue dayes before his fathers triumph: and the other died alſo three dayes after the pompe of triumph at twelue yeares of age. When this ſorowfull chance had befallen him, euery one in ROME did pity him in their hearts: but fortunes ſpite and cruelty did more grieue and feare them, to ſee her litle regard towards him, to put into a houſe of triumph (full of honor and glory, and of ſacrifices and ioy) ſuch a pitifull mourning, and mingling of ſorowes and lamentations of death, amongſt ſuch ſongs of triumph and victory. Notwithſtanding this, AEmylius taking things like a wiſe man, thought that he was not only to vſe conſtancy and magnanimity, againſt the ſword and pike of the enemy: but alike alſo againſt all aduerſity and enmity of ſpitefull fortune. So, he wiſely waied and conſidered his preſent misfortune, with his former proſperity: and finding his misfortune counterpoiſed with felicity, and his priuate grieues cut off with common ioy, he gaue no place to his ſorowes & miſchances, neither blemiſhed any way the dignity of his triumph and victory. For when he had buried the eldeſt of his two laſt ſons, he left not to make his triumphant entry, as you haue heard before. And his ſecond ſon alſo being deceaſed after his triumph, he cauſed the people to aſſemble, and in face of the whole city he made an oration, not like a diſcomforted man, but like one rather that did comfort his ſorowfull countrimen for his miſchance. He told them, that concerning mens matters, neuer any thing did feare him: but for things aboue, he euer feared fortune, miſtruſting her change and inconſtancy, and ſpecially in the laſt war, doubting for ſo great proſperity as could be wiſhed, to be payed home with an after intollerable aduerſitie & ſiniſter chance. For as I went (ſaid he) I paſſed ouer the gulfe of the Adriatike ſea, from BRINDES vnto CORFV in one day: and from thence in fiue dayes after, I arriued in the city of DELPHES, where I did ſacrifice vnto Apollo. And within fiue other dayes, I arriued in my campe, where I found mine army in MACEDON. And after I had done the ſacrifice, and dew ceremonies for purifying of the ſame, I preſently began to follow the purpoſe and cauſe of my comming: ſo as in fifteene dayes after I made an honorable end of all thoſe warres. But yet, miſtruſting fortune alwaies, ſeeing the proſperous courſe of my affaires, and conſidering that there were no other enemies, nor dangers I needed to feare: I feared ſorely ſhe would chaunge at my returne, when I ſhould be vpon the ſea, bringing home ſo goodly & victorious an army, with ſo many ſpoiles, and ſo many Princes and Kings taken priſoners. And yet when I was ſafely arriued in the hauen, and ſeeing all the city

him in his heart to see the straunge chance of king Perseus fortune, and that he heartily desired to helpe him, and to do him good: yet he could neuer obtaine other grace for him, but onely to re-excellent turner and ioyner, and was learned, and could speake the Romaine tongue very well, and did write it so trimly, that afterwards he was chancelour to the magistrates of Rome, and did wisely and discreetly behaue himselfe in his office. Furthermore, they do adde to this goodly con-queste of the realme of Macedon, that Æmylius conquered another speciall good thing, that

By AEmylius victorie, the people payed no more subsidie. made him maruellously well liked of the common people: that is, that he brought so much gold and siluer vnto the treasury store of Rome, as the common people needed neuer after to make contribution for any thing, vntill the very time and yeare that Hircius and Pansa were Consuls, which was about the beginning of the first wars of Augustus and Antonius. And yet Æmylius had one singular good gift in him: that though the people did greatly loue & honor him, yet he euer tooke part with the Senate and nobility, and did neuer by word nor deed any thing in fauour of the people, to flatter or please them, but in matters concerning gouernement, he did euer leane to the nobility and good men. And this did Appius afterwards cast in his sons teeth, Scipio Africanus.
For both of them being two of the chiefest men of their time, and contending together for the office of Censor: Appius had about him to fauour his sute, all the Senate and nobility, as of ancient time the family of the Appians had euer held on their part. And Scipio Africanus, though he was a great man of himselfe, yet he was in all times fauored and beloued of the common people.
Whereupon when Appius saw him come into the market place, followed with men of small quality and base condition, that had bene slaues before, but otherwise could skilfully handle such practises, bring the people together, and by oportunity of cries and loud voices (if need were) obtaine what they would in the assemblies of the city: he spake out aloud and sayd: O Paulus AEmylius, now hast thou good cause to sigh & mourne in thy graue where thou liest (if the dead do know what we do here on earth) to see Æmylius a common sergeant, and Licinius a pratling fellow, how they bring thy son vnto the dignity of a Censor. And as for Scipio, he was alwaies be-loued of the common people, because he did fauour them in all things. But AEmylius also, although he tooke euer the noble mens part, he was not therefore lesse beloued of the common people, then those that alwayes flattered them, doing all things as the people would, to please them: which the common people did witnesse, aswell by other honors and offices they offered at that time, and of greatest power and authority, specially for inquiry and reformation of euery mans life and maners. For he that was Censor, had authority to put any Senator off the counsell, and so disgrade him, if he did not worthily behaue himselfe according to his place and calling: and might name and declare any one of the Senate, whom he thought to be most honest, and fittest for the place againe. Moreouer, they might by their authority, take from licentious young men, their horse which was kept at the charge of the common-weale. Furthermore, they be the sessours of the people, and the muster-maisters, keeping bookes of the number of persons at euery mustering. So there appeared numbred in the regist-booke Æmylius made then of them, three hundred seuen and thirty thousand, foure hundred and two and fiftie men, and Marcus AEmylius Lepidus named president of the Senate, who had that honor foure times before, and did put off the counsell three Senators, that were but meane men. And the like meane and moderation he and his companion Martius Philippus kept, vpon view and muster taken of the ROMAINE horsmen. And after he had ordered and disposed the greatest matters of his charge and office, he fell sicke of a disease that at the beginning seemed very dangerous, but in the end there was no other danger, sauing that it was a lingring disease, and hard to cure. So, following the counsell of phisitions, who willed him to go to a city in ITALY called VELIA, he tooke sea and went thither, and continued there a long time, dwelling in pleasant houses vpon the sea side, quietly and out of all noise. But during this time of his absence, the ROMAINES wished for him many a time and often. And when they were gathered together in the Theaters, to see the playes and sports, they cried out diuerse times for him: whereby they shewed that they had a great desire to see him againe. Time being come about when they vsed to make a solemne yearely sacrifice, and Æmylius finding himselfe also in good perfect health: he returned againe to ROME, where he made the sacrifice with the other priests, all the people of ROME gathering about him, reioycing much to see him. The next day after, he made another particular sacrifice, to giue thankes vnto the gods for recouery of his health. After the sacrifice was ended, he went home to his house, and sate him downe to dinner: he suddenly fell into a rauing (without any perseuerance of sickenesse spied in him before, or any change or alteration in him) and his wits went from him, in such sort, that he died within three dayes after, lacking no necessary thing that an earthly man could haue, to make him happy in this world. For he was euen honoured at his funerals, and his vertue was adorned with many goodly glorious ornaments, neither of gold, siluer, nor iuorie, nor with other such sumphtuousnesse or magnificence of apparell, but with the loue and goodwill of the people, all of them confessing his vertue and well doing: and this did not only his naturall countrimen performe in memory of him, but his very enemies also. For all those that met in ROME by chaunce at that time, that were either come out of SPAINE, from GENVA, or out of MACEDON, all those that were young and strong, did willingly put themselues vnder the coffin where his bodie lay, to helpe to cary him: and the olde men followed his body to accompany the same, calling Æmylius the benefactour, sauiour, and father of their country. For he did not onely intreat them gently, and graciously, whom he had subdued: but all his life time he was euer ready to pleasure them, and to set forwards their causes, euen as they had bene his confederates, very friends, and neere kinsmen. The inuentory of all his goods after his death, did scant amount vnto the summe of three hundred, three score, and ten thousand siluer Drachmes, which his two sonnes did inherit. But Scipio being the younger, left all his right vnto his elder brother Fabius, because he was adopted into a very rich house, which was the house of the great Scipio Africanus.

THE LIFE OF Timoleon.

The ſtate of the Syracuſans, before Timoleons comming.

BEFORE Timoleon was ſent into SICILE, thus ſtood the ſtate of the SYRACVSANS. After that Dion had driuen out the tyrant Dionyſius, he himſelfe after was ſlaine immediatly by treaſon, and thoſe that aided him to reſtore the SYRACVSANS to their liberty, fell out, and were at diſſention among themſelues. By reaſon whereof, the city of SYRACVSA changing continually new tyrants, was ſo troubled and turmoiled with all ſorts of euils, that it was left in manner deſolate, and without inhabitants. The reſt of SICILE in like caſe was vtterly deſtroyed, and no cities in manner left ſtanding, by reaſon of the long warres: and thoſe few that remained, were moſt inhabited of forreine ſouldiers and ſtrangers (a company of looſe men gathered togeather that tooke pay of no prince nor city) all the dominions of the ſame being eaſily vſurped, and as eaſie to change their Lord. Inſomuch, Dionyſius the tyrant, ten yeares after Dion had driuen him out of SICILE, hauing gathered a certaine number of ſouldiers togeather againe, and through their helpe driuen out Niſeus, that raigned at that time in SYRACVSA: he recouered the Realme againe, and made himſelfe king. So, if he was ſtrangely expulſed by a ſmall power out of the greateſt kingdome that euer was in the world: likewiſe he more ſtrangely recouered it againe, being baniſhed and very poore, making himſelfe king ouer them, who before had driuen him out. Thus were the inhabitants of the city compelled to ſerue this tyrant: who beſides that of his owne nature he was neuer curteous nor ciuill, he was now growne to be farre more dogged and cruell, by reaſon of the extreme miſery and misfortune he had endured. But the nobleſt citizens repaired vnto Icetes, who at that time as Lord ruled the city of the LEONTINES, and they choſe him for their Generall in theſe warres: not for that he was any thing better then the open tyrants, but becauſe they had no other to repaire vnto at that time: and they truſted him beſt, for that he was borne (as themſelues) within the city of SYRACVSA, and becauſe alſo he had men of war about him, to make head againſt this tyrant. But in the meane time, the CARTHAGINIANS came downe into SICILE with a great army, and inuaded the country. The SYRACVSANS being affraid of them, determined to ſend ambaſſadours into GRECE vnto the CORINTHIANS, to pray ayd of them againſt the barbarous people, hauing better hope of them, then of any other of the GRECIANS. And that not altogether becauſe they were lineally deſcended

ſcended from them, and that they had receiued in times paſt many pleaſures at their hands: but alſo for that they knew that CORINTH was a city, that in all ages and times, did euer loue liberty and hate tyrants, and that had alwayes made their greateſt warres, not for ambition of kingdomes, nor of couetous deſire to conquer and rule, but onely to defend and maintaine the liberty of the GRECIANS. But Icetes in another contrary ſort, tooke vpon him to be Generall, with a mind to make himſelfe king of SYRACVSA. For he had ſecretly practiſed with the CARTHAGINIANS, and openly notwithſtanding, in words he commended the counſell and determination of the SYRACVSANS, and ſent ambaſſadours from himſelfe alſo with theirs, vnto PELOPONNESVS: not that he was deſirous any ayd ſhould come from them to SYRACVSA, but becauſe he hoped if the CORINTHIANS refuſed to ſend them ayd (as it was very likely they wold, for the warres and troubles that were in GRECE) that he might more eaſily turne all ouer to the CARTHAGINIANS, and vſe them as his friends, to ayd him againſt the SYRACVSANS, or the tyrant Dionyſius. And that this was his full purpoſe and intent, it appeared plainely ſoone after. Now when their ambaſſadours arriued at CORINTH, and had deliuered their meſſage, the CORINTHIANS, who had euer bene carefull to defend ſuch cities as had ſought vnto them, and ſpecially SYRACVSA: very willingly determined in counſell to ſend them aide, and the rather for that they were in good peace at that time, hauing wars with none of the GRECIANS. So their only ſtay reſted vpon chuſing of a Generall to leade their army. Now as the magiſtrates and gouernors of the city were naming ſuch citizens, as willingly offered their ſeruice, deſirous to aduance themſelues, there ſtept vp a meane commoner who named Timoleon, Timodemus ſon, a man that vntill that time was neuer called on for ſeruice, neither looked for any ſuch preferment. And truly it is to be thought it was the ſecret working of the gods, that directed the thought of this meane commoner to name Timoleon: whoſe election fortune fauored very much, and ioyned to his valiantneſſe and vertue, maruellous good ſucceſſe in all his doings afterwards. This Timoleon was borne of noble parents, both by father and mother: his father was called Timodemus, and his mother Demareta. He was naturally inclined to loue his countrey and commonweale: and was alwayes gentle and curteous to all men, ſauing that he mortally hated tyrants & wicked men. Furthermore nature had framed his body apt for warres and for paines: he was wiſe in his greeneſt youth, in all things he tooke in hand, and in his age he ſhewed himſelfe very valiant. He had an elder brother called Timophanes, who was nothing like to him in condition: for he was a raſh hare-braind man, and had a greedy deſire to raigne, being put into his head by a company of meane men, that bare him in hand they were his friends, and by certaine ſouldiers gathered together which he had alwayes about him. And becauſe he was very hot and forward in wars, his citizens tooke him for a noble captaine, and a man of good ſeruice, and therfore oftentimes they gaue him charge of mē. And therein Timoleon did helpe him much to hide the faults he comitted, or at the leaſt, made them ſeeme leſſe, & lighter then they were, ſtill increaſing that ſmall good gift that nature brought forth in him. As in a battell the CORINTHIANS had againſt the ARGIVES and the CLEONEIANS, Timoleon ſerued as a priuate ſouldier amongſt the footmen: & Timophanes his brother, hauing charge of horſmen, was in great danger to be caſt away, if preſent helpe had not bin. For his horſe being hurt, threw him on the ground in the midſt of his enemies: wherupon part of thoſe that were about him, were affraid and diſperſed themſelues here & there; and thoſe that remained with him, being few in number, & hauing many enemies to fight withall, did hardly withſtand their force & charge. But his brother Timoleon ſeeing him in ſuch inſtant danger a far off, ran with all ſpeed poſſible to helpe him, & clapping his target before his brother Timophanes, that lay on the ground, receiuing many wounds on his body with ſword and arrowes, with great difficulty he repulſed the enemies, & ſaued his own & his brothers life. Now the GORINTHIANS fearing the like matter to come that before had happened vnto thē, which was to looſe their city through default of their friends helpe, they reſolued in counſell, to entertaine in pay continually 400 ſoldiers that were ſtrangers, whom they aſſigned ouer to Timophanes charge: who, abandoning all honeſty & regard of the truſt repoſed in him, did preſently practiſe all the waies he could to make himſelfe Lord of the city: and hauing put diuerſe of the chiefeſt citizens to death without order of law, in the end he openly proclaimed himſelf king. Timoleon being very ſory for this, and taking his brothers wickedneſſe would be the very high-way to his fall & deſtruction, ſought firſt to win him with all the good words and perſwaſions he could, to leaue his ambitious deſire to raigne, and to ſeeke to ſalue (as neere as might be) his hard dealing with the citizens.

Timoleon ſaued his brothers life.

Timophanes cruelties and vſurpation of the kingdome.

Timophanes ſet light by his brothers perſwaſions, aud would giue no eare vnto them. Thereupon Timoleon then went vnto one Æſchilus his friend, and brother vnto Timophanes wife, and to one Satyrus a ſoothſayer (as Theopompus the hiſtoriographer calleth him, and Ephorus calleth him, Orthagoras) with whom he came againe another time vnto his brother: and they three comming to him, inſtantly beſought him to beleeue good counſell, and to leaue the kingdome. Timophanes at the firſt did but laugh them to ſcorne, and ſported at their perſwaſions: but afterwards he waxed hote, and grew into great choller with them. Timoleon ſeeing that, went a litle aſide, & couering his face fel a weeping: & in the meane ſeaſon, the other two drawing out their ſwords, ſlue Timophanes in the place. This murther was ſtraight blowne abroad through the city, & the better ſort did greatly commend the noble mind and hate Timoleon bare againſt the tyrant: conſidering that he being of a gentle nature, and louing to his kin, did notwithſtanding regard the benefit of his country, before the naturall affection of his brother, & preferred duty and iuſtice, before nature and kinred. For, before he had ſaued his brothers life, fighting for the defence of his country: and now in ſeeking to make himſelfe king and to rule the ſame, he made him to be ſlaine. Such then as miſliked popular gouernment and liberty, and alwayes followed the nobility: they ſet a good face on the matter, as though they had bin glad of the tyrants death: yet ſtill reprouing Timoleon for the horrible murder he had committed againſt his brother, declaring how deteſtable it was both to the gods and men: they ſo handled him, that it grieued him to the hart he had done it. But when it was told him that his mother tooke it maruellous ill, and that ſhe pronounced horrible curſes againſt him, and gaue out terrible words of him, he went vnto her in hope to comfort her: howbeit ſhe could neuer abide to ſee him, but alwaies ſhut her doore againſt him. Then he being wounded to the hart with ſorow, tooke a conceit ſodainly, to kil himſelf by abſtaining frō meate: but his friends would neuer forſake him in this deſpaire, and vrged him ſo far by intreaty and perſwaſion that they cōpelled him to eate. Therupon he reſolued thenceforth to giue himſelfe ouer to a ſolitary life in the country, ſecluding himſelfe from all company and dealings: ſo as at the beginnning, he did not only refuſe to repaire vntō the city, & all acceſſe of company, but wandring vp and downe in moſt ſolitary places, conſumed himſelfe and his time with melancholy. And thus we ſee, that counſels and iudgments are lightly caried away (by praiſe or diſpraiſe) if they be not ſhored vp with rule of reaſon, & philoſophy, & reſt confounded in themſelues. And therfore it is very requiſite and neceſſary, that not only the act be good and honeſt of it ſelfe, but that the reſolution thereof be alſo conſtant, and not ſubiect vnto change: to the end we may do all things cōſideratly. Leaſt we be like vnto lickerous mouthed mē, who as they deſire meats with a greedy appetite, & after are ſoone weary, diſliking the ſame: euen ſo we do ſodainly repent our actions grounded vpon a weake imagination, of the honeſty that moued vs therunto. For repentance maketh the act naught which before was good. But determination, grounded vpon certaine knowledge and truth of reaſon, doth neuer change, although the matter enterpriſed, haue not alwayes happy ſucceſſe. And therefore Phocion the ATHENIAN hauing reſiſted (as much as in him lay) certaine things which the Generall Leoſthenes did, and which contrary to his mind tooke good effect: and perceiuing the ATHENIANS did open ſacrifice vnto the gods, to giue them thankes for the ſame, and much reioyce at the victory they had obtained: I would haue reioyced to (ſayd he) if I had done this: but ſo would I not for any thing, but I had giuen the counſell. And after that ſort, but more ſharply did Ariſtides LOCRIAN (a very friend and companion of Platoes) anſwer Dionyſius the elder, tyrant of SYRRCVSA: who asked his goodwill to marry one of his daughters. I had rather ſee my daughter dead (ſayd he) then maried vnto a tyrant. And within a certaine time after, the tyrant put all his ſonnes to death: and then he asked him in deriſion to greeue him the more, if he were ſtill of his former opinion for the marying of his daughter. I am very ſory (ſayd he) with all my hart for that which thou haſt done: but yet I do not repent me of that I haue ſayd. That peraduenture proceeded of a more perfect vertue. But to returne againe vnto Timoleon. Whether that inward ſorow ſtrooke him to the heart for the death of his brother Timophanes, or that ſhame did ſo abaſh him, as he durſt not abide his mother, twentie yeares after, he neuer did any notable or famous acte. And therefore, when he was named to be Generall of the ayd that ſhould be ſent into SICILE, the people hauing willingly choſen and accepted of him: Teleclides, who was chiefe gouernour at that time in the city of CORINTH, ſtanding vpon his feete before the people, ſpake vnto Timoleon, and did exhort him to behaue himſelfe like an honeſt man, and valiant captaine in this charge. For, ſayd he, if that you handle your ſelfe well, we will thinke you haue killed a tyrant: but if you order your ſelfe otherwiſe then well, we will iudge you haue killed your brother. Now Timoleon being buſie in leauying of men, and preparing himſelfe, letters came to the CORINTHIANS from Icetes, whereby plainly appeared, that Icetes had caried two faces in one hood, and that he was become a traytor. For he had no ſooner diſpatched his ambaſſadors vnto them, but he ſtraight tooke the CARTHAGINIANS part, and dealt openly for them, intending to driue out Dionyſius, and to make himſelfe king of SYRACVSA. But fearing leaſt the CORINTHIANS would ſend aide before he had wrought his feate, he wrote againe vnto the CORINTHIANS, ſending them word, that they ſhould not need now to put themſelues to any charge or daunger for comming into SICILE, and ſpecially, becauſe the CARTHAGINIANS were very angry, and did alſo lye in wait in the way as they ſhould come, with a great fleete of ſhips to meete with their army: and that for himſelfe, becauſe he ſaw they taried long, he had made league and amity with them, againſt the tyrant Dionyſius. When they had read his letters, if any of the CORINTHIANS were before but coldly affected to this iourny, choler did then ſo warme thē againſt Icetes, that they frankly granted Timoleon what he wold aske, and did helpe to furniſh him to ſet him out. When the ſhips were ready rigged, and that the ſouldiers were furniſhed of all things neceſſary for their departure, the Nuns of the goddeſſe Proſerpina, ſayd they ſaw a viſion in their dreame, and that the goddeſſes Ceres and Proſerpina did appeare vnto them, apparelled like trauellers to take a iourney: and told them, that they would go with Timoleon into SICILE. Vpon this ſpeech only, the CORINTHIANS rigged a galley, they called, the galley of Ceres and Proſerpina: and Timoleon himſelfe before he would take the ſeas, went into the city of DELPHES, where he made ſacrifice vnto Apollo. And as he entred within the Sanctuary where the anſwers of the Oracle are made, there happened a wonderfull ſigne vnto him. For amongſt the vowes and offerings that are hanged vp vpon the wals of the Sanctuarie, there fell a band directly vpon Timoleons head, imbrodered all about with crownes of victorie: ſo that it ſeemed Apollo ſent him already crowned, before he had ſet out one foote towards the iourney. He tooke ſhip, and ſailed with ſeuen galleys of CORINTH, two of CORPHVE, and ten the LEVCADIANS did ſet out. When he was launched out in the maine ſea, hauing a franke gale of wind and large, he thought in the night that the element did open, and that out of the ſame there came a maruellous great bright light ouer his ſhip, and it was much like to a torch burning, when they ſhew the ceremonies of the holy myſteries. This torch did accompany and guide them all their voyage, and in the end it vaniſhed away, and ſeemed to fall downe vpon the coaſt of ITALY, where the ſhip-maiſters had determined to arriue. The wiſe mens opinions being asked what this might ſignifie: they anſwered: That this wonderfull ſight did betoken the dreame, the Nunnes of the goddeſſe Ceres dreamed, and that the goddeſſes fauouring this iourney, had ſhewed them the way, by ſending of this light from heauen: becauſe that the Ile of SICILE is conſecrated vnto the goddeſſe Proſerpina, and ſpecially for that they report her rauiſhment was in that Ile, and that the whole realme was aſſigned vnto her for her ioynter, at the day of her mariage. Thus did this celeſtiall ſigne of the gods both encourage thoſe that went this iourney, and deliuer them alſo aſſured hope, who ſailed with all poſſible ſpeed they could, vntill ſuch time as hauing croſſed the ſeas, they arriued vpon the coaſt of ITALIE. But when they came thither, the newes they vnderſtood from SICILE put Timoleon in great perplexity, and did maruellouſly diſcourage the ſouldiers he brought with him: for Icetes hauing ouerthrowne the battell of the tyrant Dionyſius, and poſſeſſed the greateſt part of the city of SYRACVSA, he did beſiege him within the caſtell, and within that part of the city which is called the Ile, where he had pent him vp, and incloſed him in with wals round about. And in the meane time he had prayed the CARTHAGINIANS, that they would be carefull to keepe Timoleon from landing in SICILE, to the end that by preuenting that ayde, they might eaſily deuide SICILE betweene them, and no man to let them. The CARTHAGINIANS following his requeſt, ſent twentie of their galleys vnto RHEGIO, amongſt which Icetes Ambaſſadours were ſent vnto Timoleon, with teſtimony of his doings: for they were faire flattering words to cloke his wicked intent he purpoſed. For they willed Timoleon that he ſhould go himſelfe alone (if he thought good) vnto Icetes, to counſell him, and to accompany him in all his doings, which were now ſo farre onwards in good towardneſſe, as he had almoſt ended them all. Furthermore, they did alſo perſwade him, that he ſhould ſend backe his ſhips and ſouldiers to CORINTH, againe, conſidering that the warre was now brought to good paſſe, and that the CARTHAGINIANS would

in no case that his men should passe into SICILE, and that they were determined to fight with them, if they made any force to enter. So the CORINTHIANS at their arriuall into the city of RHEGIO, finding there these ambassadours, and seeing the fleete of the CARTHAGINIANS ships, which did ride at anker not farre off from them: it spited them on the one side, to see they were thus mocked and abused by Icetes. For euery one of them were maruellous angry with him, and were greatly afeard also for the poore SICILIANS, whom too plainely they saw left a pray vnto Icetes for reward of his treason, and to the CARTHAGINIANS for recompence of the tyrannie which they suffered him to establish. So, on the other side they thought it impossible to conquer the ships of the CARTHAGINIANS, which did lye in waite for them, and so neare vnto them, considering they were twise as many in number as they: and as hard for them to subdue the army also that was in the hands of Icetes in SICILE, considering that they were not come to him, but onely for the maintenance of the warres. Notwithstanding Timoleon spake very courteously vnto those Ambassadours, and captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS ships, letting them vnderstand that he would do as much as they would haue him: and to say truly, if he would haue done otherwise, he could haue wonne nothing by it. Neuertheless he desired for his discharge, they would say that openly, in the presence of the people of RHEGIO (being a city of GRECE, friend and common to both parties) which they had spoken to him in secret: and that done he would depart incontinently, alledging that it stood him very much vpon for the safety of his discharge, and that they themselues also should more faithfully keepe that they had promised vnto him touching the SYRACVSANS, when they had agreed vpon it and promised it before all the people of RHEGIO, who should be witnesse of it. Now all this was but a fetch and pollicy deliuered by him, to shadow his departure, which the captaines and gouernours of RHEGIO did fauor, and seeme to helpe him in; because they wished SICILE should fall into the hands of the CORINTHIANS, and feared much to haue the barbarous people for their neighbours. For this cause they commaunded a generall assembly of all the people, during which time, they caused the gates of the city to be shut: giuing it out, that it was because the citizens should not go about any other matters in the meane time. Then when all the people were assembled, they began to make long orations without concluding any matter: the one leauing alwayes to the other alike matter to talke of, to the end they might win time, vntill the galleys of the CORINTHIANS were departed. And staying the CARTHAGINIANS also in this assembly, they mistrusted nothing, because they saw Timoleon present: who made a countenance, as though he would rise to say something. But in the meane time, some one did secretly aduertise Timoleon, that the other galleys were vnder saile and gone away, and that there was but one galley left, which taried for him in the hauen. Thereupon he suddenly stole away through the preasse, with the helpe of the RHEGIANS, being about the chaire where the orations were made: and trudging quickly to the hauen, he imbarked incontinently, and hoised saile also. And when he had ouertaken his fleete, they went all safe together to land at the city of TAVROMENION, which is in SICILE: there they were very well receiued by Andromachus, who long time before had sent for them, for he gouerned this city as if he had bin Lord thereof. He was the father of Timæus the Historiographer, the honestest man of all those that did beare rule at that time in SICILE. For he did rule his citizens in all iustice and equitie, and did alwayes shew himselfe an open enemie to tyrants. And following his affection therein, he lent his city at that time vnto Timoleon, to gather people together, and perswaded his citizens to enter into league with the CORINTHIANS, and to aide them, to deliuer SICILE from bondage, and to restore it againe to liberty. But the captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS that were in RHEGIO, when they knew that Timoleon was vnder saile and gone, after that the assemblie of the counsell was broken vp: they were ready to eate their fingers for spite to see themselues thus finely mocked and deceiued. The RHEGIANS on the other side, were mery at the matter, to see how the PHOENICIANS stormed at it, that they had such a fine part played them. Howbeit in the end, they determined to send an Ambassadour vnto TAVROMENION, in one of their galleys. This Ambassadour spake very boldly and barbarously vnto Andromachus, and in a choler: and last of all, he shewed him first the palme of his hand, then the backe of his hand, and did threaten him that his citie should be so turned ouer hand, if he did not quickly send away the CORINTHIANS. Andromachus fell a laughing at him, and did turne his hand vp and downe as the Ambassadour had done, and commaunded him that he should get him going, and that with all speed ſpeed out of his city, if he would not ſee the keele of his galley turned vpward. Icetes now vnderſtanding of Timoleons comming, and being affraide, ſent for a great number of galleys vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. Then the SYRACVSANS began to deſpaire vtterly when they ſaw their hauen full of the CARTHAGINIANS galleys, the beſt part of their city kept by Icetes, and the caſtell by the tyrant Dionyſius. And on the other ſide, that Timoleon was not yet come but to a little corner of SICILE, hauing no more but the litle citie of TAVROMENION, with a ſmall power, and leſſe hope: becauſe there was not aboue a thouſand footemen in all, to furniſh theſe warres, neither prouiſion of victuals, nor ſo much money as would ſerue to entertaine and pay them. Beſides alſo, that the other cities of SICILE did nothing truſt him. But by reaſon of the violent extortions they had of lately ſuffered, they hated all captaines and leaders of men of warre to the death, and ſpecially for the treachery of Calippus and Pharax, whereof the one was an ATHENIAN, and the other a LACEDÆMONIAN. Both of them ſayd they came to ſet SICILE at liberty, and to driue out the tyrants: and yet neuertheleſſe, they had done ſo much hurt vnto the poore SICILIANS, that the miſerie and calamity which they had ſuffered vnder the tyrants, ſeemed all to be gold vnto them, in reſpect of that which theſe captaines had made them to abide. And they did thinke them more happie, that had willingly ſubmitted themſelues vnto the yoake of ſeruitude: then thoſe which they ſaw reſtored and ſet at liberty. Therefore perſwading themſelues, that this CORINTHIAN would be no better vnto them, then the other had bene before, but ſuppoſing they were the ſelfe ſame former crafts, and alluring baites of good hope and faire words, which they had taſted of before, to draw them to accept new tyrants: they did ſore ſuſpect it, and reiected all the CORINTHIANS perſwaſions. Sauing the ADRANITANS only, whoſe litle city being conſecrated to the god Adranus (and greatly honoured and reuerenced through all SICILE) was then in diſſention one againſt another: in ſo much as one part of them tooke part with Icetes, and the CARTHAGINIANS, and the other ſent vnto Timoleon. So it fortuned that both the one and the other, making all the poſſible ſpeed they could, who ſhould come firſt: arriued both in maner at one ſelfe time. Icetes had about fiue thouſand ſouldiers. Timoleon had not in all aboue twelue hundred men, with which he departed to go towards the city of ADRANVS diſtant from TAVROMENION, about three hundred and forty furlongs. For the firſt dayes iourny he went no great way, but lodged betimes: but the next morning he marched very haſtily, and had maruellous ill way. When night was come, and daylight ſhut in, he had newes that Icetes did but newly arriue before ADRANVS, where he encamped. When the priuate captaines vnderſtood this, they cauſed the voward to ſtay, to eate and repoſe a litle, that they might be the luſtier, and the ſtronger to fight. But Timoleon did ſet ſtill forwards, and prayed them not to ſtay, but to go on with all the ſpeed they could poſſible, that they might take their enemies out of order (as it was likely they ſhould) being but newly arriued, and troubled with making their cabbons, and preparing for ſupper. Therewith as he ſpake theſe words, he tooke his target on his arme, and marched himſelfe the formoſt man, as brauely and couragiouſly as if he had gone to a moſt aſſured victory. The ſouldiers ſeeing him march with that life, they followed at his heeles with like courage. So they had not paſſing thirty furlongs to go, which when they had ouercome, they ſtraight ſet vpon their enemies, whom they found all out of order, and beganne to flie, ſo ſoone as they ſaw they were vpon their backes before they were aware. By this meanes there were not aboue three hundred men ſlaine, and twiſe as many more taken priſoners, and ſo their whole campe was poſſeſſed. Then the ADRANITANS opening their gates, yeelded vnto Timoleon, declaring vnto him with great feare, and no leſſe wonder, how at the very time when he gaue charge vpon the enemies, the doores of the temple of their god opened of themſelues, and that the Iauelin which the image of their god did hold in his hand, did ſhake at the very end where the iron head was, and how all his face was ſeene to ſweat. This (in my opinion) did not onely ſignifie the victory he had gotten at that time, but all the notable exploits he did afterwards, vnto the which, this firſt encounter gaue a happie beginning. For immediatly after, many cities ſent vnto Timoleon, to ioyne in league with him. And Mamercus, the tyrant of CATANA, a ſouldier, and very full of money, did alſo ſeeke his friendſhip. Furthermore, Dionyſius the tyrant of SYRACVSA, being wearie to follow hope any longer, & finding himſelfe in manner forced vnto it by long continuance of ſiege, made no more reckoning of Icetes, when he knew that he was ſo ſhamefully ouerthrowne. And contrariwiſe, much eſteeming Timoleons valiantneſſe, he ſent to aduertiſe him, that he was contented to yeeld himſelfe and the castell into the hands of the CORINTHIANS. Timoleon being glad of this good hap vnlooked for, sent Euclides and Telemachus, two captaines of the CORINTHIANS, to take possession of the castell, with foure hundred men, not all at a time, nor openly (for it was vnpossible, the enemies lying in waite in the hauen) but by small companies, and by stealth, he conueyed them all into the castell. So the souldiers possessed the castell, and the tyrants pallace, with all the moueables and munition of warres within the same. There were a great number of horse of seruice, great store of staues and weapons offensiue of all sorts, and engines of battery to shoot farre off, and sundry other weapons of defence, that had bene gathered together of long time, to arme threescore and ten thousand men. Moreouer, besides all this, there were two thousand souldiers, whom with all the other things rehearsed, Dionysius deliuered vp into the hands of Timoleon: and he himselfe, with his mony and a few of his friends, went his way by sea, Icetes not knowing it, and so came to Timoleons campe. This was the first time that euer they saw Dionysius a priuate man, in base and meane estate. And yet within few dayes after, Timoleon sent him from thence vnto

The miseries & calamities of Dionysius the tyrant.

For he saw the death of his sonnes when they were men growne, and able to serue and carry armour. He saw his daughters rauished by force, and defloured of their virginity. He saw his owne sister (who was also his wife) first of all shamed, and cruelly handled in her person, with the greatest villanies and most vile parts done vnto her, that his enemies could deuise: and afterwards horribly murthered with his children, and their bodies in the end throwne into the sea, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Dion. Now when Dionysius was arriued in the city of CORINTH, euery GRECIAN was wonderfull desirous to go see him, and to talke with him. And some went thither very glad of his ouerthrow, as if they had troden him downe with their feete, whom fortune had ouerthrowne, so bitterly did they hate him. Other pitying him in their harts to see so great a change, did behold him as it were with a certaine compassion, considering what great power, secret and diuine causes haue ouer mens weakenesse and frailtie, and those things that daily passeth ouer our heads. worke of nature, or of mans hand so wonderfull, as was this of fortune: who made the world see a man, that before was in manner Lord and King of all SICILE, sit then commonly in the city of CORINTH, talking with a victualler, or sitting a whole day in a perfumers shop, or commonly drinking in some celler or tauerne, or to brawle and scold in the middest of the streetes, with common whores in face of the world, or else to teach common minstrels in euery lane and alley, and to dispute with them with the best reason he had, about the harmony and musicke of the songs they sang in Theaters. Now some say he did this, because he knew not else how he should driue the time away, for that indeed he was of a base mind, and an effeminate person, giuen ouer to all dishoneſt lusts and desires. Other are of opinion, he did it to be the lesse regarded, for feare least the CORINTHIANS should haue him in iealousie and suspition, imagining that he did take the change and state of his life in grieuous part, and that he should yet looke backe, hoping for a time to recouer his state againe: and that for this cause he did it, and of purpose fained many things against his nature, seeming to be a starke ideot, to see him do those things he did. Some notwithstanding haue gathered together certaine of his aunswers, which do testifie that he did not all these things of a base brutish mind, but to fit himselfe onely to his present misery and misfortune. For when he came to LEVCADES, an ancient city built by the Co-

RINTHIANS, as was also the city of SYRACVSA, he told the inhabitants of the same, that he was like to yong boyes that had done a fault: for as they flie from their fathers being ashamed to come to their sight, and are gladder to be with their brethren: euen so is it with me, sayd he: for it would please me better to dwell here with you, then to go to CORINTH our head city. Another time, being at CORINTH, a stranger was verie busie with him (knowing how familiar Dionysius was with learned men and philosophers, while he raigned in SYRACVSA) and asked him in the end in derision: what benefit he got by Platoes wisdom and knowledge? he answered him againe: how thinkest thou, hath it done me no good, when thou seest me beare so patiently this change of fortune? Aristoxenus a musitian and other, asking him what offence Plato had done

vnto him: he answered. That tyrants state is euer vnfortunate, and subiect to many euils: but yet no euill in their state was comparable to this: That none of all those they take to be their most familiars, dare once tell them truly any thing: and that through their fault, he left Platoes company. Another time there commeth a pleasant fellow to him, and thinking to mocke him finely, as he entred into his chamber, he shooke his gowne, as the manner is when they come to tyrants, to shew that they haue no weapons vnder their gownes. But Dionysius encountred him as pleasantly, saying to him: do that when thou goest hence, to see if thou hast stolne nothing. And againe, Philip king of MACEDON, at his table one day descending into talke of songs, verse, and tragedies, which Dionysius his father had made, making as though he wondred at them, how possibly he could haue leisure to do them: he answered him very trimly, and to good purpose. He did them euen at such times (quoth he) as you & I, and other great Lords whom they reckon happy, are disposed to be drunke, & play the fooles. Now for Plato he neuer saw Dionysius at CORINTH. But Diogenes Sinopian, the first time that euer he met with Dionysius, sayd vnto him: O, how vnworthy art thou of this state. Dionysius stayed sodainly, & replied: Truly I thanke thee (Diogenes) that thou hast cõpassion of my misery. Why said Diogenes againe: doest thou thinke I pity thee? nay it spiteth me rather, to see such a slaue as thou (worthy to dye in the wicked state of a tyrant like thy father) to liue in such security, and idle life, as thou leadest amongst vs? When I came to compare these words of Diogenes, with Philistus words the historiographer, bewailing the hard fortune of the daughters of the LEPTINES, saying that they were brought fro the top of all worldly felicity, honor, and goods (whereof tyrannical state aboundeth) vnto a base, priuate, & humble life: me thinkes they are the proper lamentations of a woman, that soroweth for the losse of her boxes of painting colours, or for her purple gownes, or for other such prety fine trims of gold, as women vse to weare. So, me thinkes these things I haue intermingled concerning Dionysius, are not impertinent to the description of our liues, neither are they troublesome nor vnprofitable to the hearers, vnlesse they haue other hasty businesse to let or trouble them. But now if the tyrant Dionysius wretched state seeme strange, Timoleons prosperity then was no lesse wonderfull. For within fifty dayes after he had set foot in SICILE, he had the castle of SYRACVSA in his possession, and sent Dionysius as an exile to CORINTH. This did set the CORINTHIANS in such a iolity, that they sent him a supply of 2000 footemen, and 200 horsemen, which were appointed to land in ITALY, in the country of the THVRIANS. And perceiuing that they could not possibly go from thence into SICILE, because the CARTHAGINIANS kept the seas with a great nauy of ships, and that thereby they were compelled to stay for better oportunity: in the meane time they bestowed their leisure in doing a notable good act. For the THVRIANS, being in wars at that time with the BRVTIANS, they did put their city into their hands, which they kept very faithfully and friendly, as it had bene their owne natiue country. Icetes all this while did besiege the castle of SYRACVSA, preuenting all he could possible, that there should come no corne by sea vnto the CORINTHIANS that kept within the castell: and he had hired two straunge souldiers, which he sent vnto the city of ADRANVS, to kill Timoleon by treason, who kept no gard about his person, and continued amongst the ADRANITANS, mistrusting nothing in the world, for the trust and confidence he had in the safegard of the god of the ADRANITANS. These souldiers being sent to do this murder, were by chance enformed that Timoleon should one day do sacrifice vnto this god. So vpon this, they came into the temple, hauing daggers vnder their gownes, and by litle and litle thrust in through the prease, that they got at the length hard to the altar. But at the present time as one encouraged another to dispatch the matter, a third person they thought not of, gaue one of the two a great cut in the head with his sword, that he fell to the ground. The man that had hurt him thus, fled straight vpon it, with his sword drawne in his hand, and recouered the top of a high rocke. The other souldier that came with him, and that was not hurt, got hold of a corner of the altar, and besought pardon of Timoleon, and told him he would discouer the treason practised against him. Timoleon thereupon pardoned him. Then he told him how his companion that was slaine, and himselfe, were both hired, and sent to kill him. In the meane time, they brought him also that had taken the rocke, who cried out aloud, he had done no more then he should do: for he had killed him that had slaine his owne father before, in the city of the LEONTINES. And to iustifie this to be true, certaine that stood by did affirme, it was so indeed. Whereat they wondred greatly to consider the maruellous working of fortune, how she doth bring one thing to passe by meanes of another, and gathereth all things together, how farre asunder soeuer they be, and linketh them together, though they seeme to be cleane contrary one to another, with no maner of likenesse or coniunction betweene them, making the end of the one, to be the beginning of another. The CORINTHIANS examining this matter throughly, gaue him that slue the souldier with his sword, a crowne of the value of ten minas, because that by meanes of his iust anger, he had done good seruice to the god that had preserued Timoleon. And furthermore, this good hap did not only serue the present turne, but was to good purpose euer after. For those that saw it, were put in better hope, & had thenceforth more care and regard vnto Timoleons person, because he was a holy man, one that loued the gods, and that was purposely sent to deliuer SICILE from captiuity. But Icetes hauing missed his first purpose, and seeing numbers daily drawne to Timoleons deuotion, he was mad with himselfe, that hauing so great an army of the CARTHAGINIANS at hand at his commandement, he tooke but a few of them to serue his turne, as if he had bene ashamed of his fact, and had vsed their friendship by stealth. So he sent hereupon for Mago their Generall, with all his fleete. Mago at his request brought an huge army to see too, of a hundred and fifty saile, which occupied and couered all the hauen: and afterwards landed threescore thousand men, whom he lodged euery man within the city of SYRACVSA. Then euery man imagined the time was now come, which old men had threatned SICILE with many yeares before, and that continually: that one day it should be conquered, and inhabited by the barbarous people. For in all the wars the CARTHAGINIANS euer had before in the country of SICILE, they could neuer come to take the city of SYRACVSA: and then through Icetes treason, who had receiued them, they were seene encamped there. On the other side, the CORINTHIANS that were within the castell, found themselues in great distresse, because their victuals waxed scant, & the hauen was so straightly kept. Moreouer, they were driuen to be armed continually to defend the wals, which the enemies battered, and assaulted in sundry places, with all kinds of engines of battery, and sundry sorts of deuised instruments and inuentions to take cities: by reason whereof, they were compelled also to deuide themselues into many companies. Neuertheless, Timoleon without, gaue them all the ayd he could possible: sending them corne from CATANA, in litle fisher-boates and small crayers, which got into the castle many times, but specially in stormy and foule weather, passing by the galleys of the barbarous people, that lay scatteringly one from another, dispersed abroad by tempest, and great billowes of the sea. But Mago and Icetes finding this, determined to go take the city of CATANA, from whence those of the castell of SYRACVSA were victualled: and taking with them the best souldiers of all their army, they departed from SYRACVSA, and sailed towards CATANA. Now in the meane space, Leon CORINTHIAN, captaine of all those that were within the castell, perceiuing the enemies within the city kept but slender ward, made a sudden sallie out vpon them, and taking them vnwares, slue a great number at the first charge, and draue away the other. So by this occasion he wan a quarter of the city, which they call ACRADINA, and was the best part of the city, that had receiued least hurt. For the city of SYRACVSA seemeth to be built of many townes ioyned together. So hauing found there great plenty of corne, gold, & siluer, he wold not forsake that quarter no more, nor returne againe into the castell: but fortifying with all diligence the cõpasse and precinct of the same, & ioyning it vnto the castell with certaine fortifications he built vp in haste, he determined to keepe both the one and the other. Now were Mago and Icetes very neere vnto CATANA, when a post ouertooke them, purposely sent from SYRACVSA vnto them, who brought them newes, that the ACRADINA was taken. Whereat they both wondred, & returned backe againe with all speed possible (hauing failed of their purpose they pretẽded) to keepe that they had yet left in their hands. Now for that matter, it is yet a question, whether we should impute it vnto wisedom & valiancie, or vnto good fortune: but the thing I will tell you now, in my opinion, is altogether to be ascribed vnto fortune. And this it is: The two thousand footmen and two hundred horsemen of the CORINTHIANS, that remained in the city of the THVRIANS, partly for feare of the galleys of the CARTHAGINIANS that lay in waite for them as they should passe, Hanno being their Admirall: and partly also for that the sea was very rough and high many dayes together, and was alwayes in storme and tempest: in the end, they ventured to go through the countrey of the BRVTIANS: and partly with their goodwill (but rather by force) they got through, and recouered the city of RHEGIO, the sea being yet maruellous high and rough. Hanno the Admirall of the CARTHAGINIANS, looking no more then for their passage, thought with himselfe that he had deuised a maruellous fine pollicy, to deceiue the enemies.

enemies. Thereupon he willed all his men to put garlands of flowers of triumph vpon their heads, and therewithall also made them dresse vp, and set forth his galleys, with targets, corslets, and brigantines after the GRECIANS fashion. So in this bravery he returned backe againe, sailing towards SYRACVSA, and came in with force of owers, rowing vnder the castels side of SYRACVSA, with great laughing and clapping of hands, crying out aloud to them that were in the castle, that he had ouerthrowne their aide which came from CORINTH, as they thought to passe by the coast of ITALY into SICILE, flattering himselfe, that this did much discourage those that were besieged. But whilest he sported thus with this fond deuise, the two thousand CORINTHIANS being arriued through the countrey of the BRVTIANS in the city of RHEGIO, perceiuing the coast cleare, and that the passage by sea was not kept, and that the raging seas were by miracle (as it were) made of purpose calme for them: they tooke sea foorthwith in such fisher-boates and passengers as they found ready, in the which they went into SICILE, in such good safety, as they drue their horse (holding them by the raines) alongst their boates with them. When they were all passed ouer, Timoleon hauing receiued them, went immediatly to take MESSINA, & marching thence in battel ray, tooke his way towards SYRACVSA, trusting better to his good fortune, then to his force he had: for his whole number in all were not aboue foure thousand fighting men. Notwithstanding Mago hearing of his comming, quaked for feare, and doubted the more vpon this occasion: About SYRACVSA are certaine marishes, that receiue great quantity of sweete fresh water, as well of fountaines and springs, as also of litle running brookes, lakes and riuers, which runne that wayes towards the sea: and therefore there are great store of eeles in that place, and the fishing is great there at all times, but specially for such as delight to take eeles. Whereupon the GRECIANS that tooke pay on both sides, when they had leisure, and that all was quiet betweene them, they intended fishing. Now, they being all countrimen, and of one language, had no priuate quarrell one with another: but when time was to fight, they did their duties, and in time of peace also frequented familiarly together, and one spake with another, and specially when they were busie fishing for eeles: saying, that they maruelled at the situation of the goodly places thereabouts, and that they stood so pleasantly and commodious vpon the sea side. So one of the souldiers that serued vnder the CORINTHIANS chaunced to say vnto them: Is it possible that you that be GRECIANS borne, and haue so goodly a city of your owne, and full of so many goodly commodities: that ye will giue it vp vnto these barbarous people, the CARTHAGINIANS, and most cruell murderers of the world? where you should rather wish that there were many SICILES betwixt them and GRECE. Haue ye so litle consideration or iudgement to thinke, that they haue assembled an army out of all AFRICKE, vnto Hercules pillars, and to the sea ATLANTICKE, to come hither to fight to stablish Icetes tyranny? who, if he had bene a wise and skilfull captaine, would not haue cast out his auncestors and founders, to bring into his country the ancient enemies of the same: but might haue receiued such honor and authority of the CORINTHIANS and Timoleon, as he could reasonably haue desired, and that with all their fauor and goodwill. The souldiers that heard this tale, reported it againe in their campe: insomuch they made Mago suspect there was treason in hand, & so sought some colour to be gone. But hereupō, notwithstanding that Icetes prayed him all he could to tary, declaring vnto him how much they were stronger then their enemies, and that Timoleon did rather preuaile by his hardinesse and good fortune, then exceed him in number of men: yet he hoised saile, & returned with shame inough into AFRICKE, letting slip the conquest of all SICILE out of his hands, without any sight of reason or cause at all. The next day after he was gone, Timoleon presented battell before the city, when the GRECIANS and he vnderstood that the CARTHAGINIANS were fled, and that they saw the hauen rid of all the ships: and then began to ieast at Magoes cowardlinesse, and in derision proclaimed in the city, that they would giue him a good reward that could bring them newes, whether the army of the CARTHAGINIANS were fled. But for all this, Icetes was bent to fight, and would not leaue the spoile he had gotten, but defend the quarters of the city he had possessed, at the swords point, trusting to the strength and situation of the places, which werely hardly to be approched. Timoleon perceiuing that, deuided his army, and he with one part thereof did set vpon that side which was the hardest to approch, and did stand vpon the riuer of ANAPVS: then he appointed another part of his armie to assault all at one time, the side of ACRADINA, whereof Isias CORINTHIAN had the leading. The third part of his army that came last from CORINTH, which Dinarchus and Demaratus led: he appointed to assault the quarter called EPIPOLES. Thus, assault being giuen on all sides at one time, Icetes bands of men were broken, and ran their way. Now that the city was thus won by assault, and come so suddenly to the hands of Timoleon, and the enemies being fled, it is good reason we ascribe it to the valiantnesse of the souldiers, and the captaines great wisedome. But where there was not one CORINTHIAN slaine nor hurt in this assault, sure me thinkes herein, it was only the worke and deed of fortune, that did fauour and protect Timoleon, to contend against his valiantnesse: to the end that those which should hereafter heare of his doings, should haue more occasion to wonder at his good hap, then to praise & commend his valiantnesse. For the fame of this great exploit, did in few dayes not only run through all ITALY, but also through all GRECE. In so much as the CORINTHIANS (who could scant beleeue their men were passed with safety into SICILE) vnderstood withall that they were safely arriued there, and had gotten the victory of their enemies: so prosperous was their iourney, and fortune so speedily did fauour his noble acts. Timoleon hauing now the castell of SYRACVSA in his hands, did not follow Dion. For he spared not the castle for the beauty and stately building thereof, but auoiding the suspition that caused Dion first to be accused, and lastly to be slaine, he caused it to be proclaimed by trumpet, that any SYRACVSAN whatsoeuer, should come with crowes of iron and mattockes, to helpe to digge downe and ouerthrow the fort of the tyrants. There was not a man in all the city of SYRACVSA, but went thither straight, and thought that proclamation and day to be a most happy beginning of the recouery of their liberty. So they did not only ouerthrow the castle, but the pallace also, and the tombes: & generally all that serued in any respect for the memory of any of the tyrants. And hauing cleared the place in few daies, and made all plaine, Timoleon at the suite of the citizens, made counsell hals, and places of iustice to be built there: and did by this meanes stablish a free state and popular gouernment, and did suppresse all tyrannicall power. Now, when he saw he had won a city that had no inhabitants, which wars before had consumed, and feare of tyranny had emptied, so as grasse grew so high and ranke in the great market place of SYRACVSA, as they grased their horses there, and the horse-keepers lay downe by them on the grasse as they fed: and that all the cities, a few excepted, were full of red deare and wild bores, so that men giuen to delight in hunting, hauing leisure, might find game many times within the suburbes and towne ditches, hard by the wals: and that such as dwelt in castles and strong holds in the countrey, would not leaue them, to come and dwell in cities, by reason they were all growne so stout, and did so hate and detest assemblies of counsell, orations, and order of gouernement, where so many tyrants had raigned. Timoleon thereupon seeing this desolation, and also so few SYRACVSANS borne that had escaped, thought good, and all his captaines, to write to the CORINTHIANS, to send people out of GRECE to inhabit the city of SYRACVSA againe. For otherwise the countrey would grow barren and vnprofitable, if the ground were not plowed. Besides, that they looked also for great warres out of AFRICKE: being aduertised that the CARTHAGINIANS had hung vp the body of Mago their Generall vpon a crosse (who had slaine himselfe for that he could not answer the dishonour layd to his charge) and that they did leauy another great mighty army, to returne againe the next yeare following, to make wars in SICILE. These letters of Timoleon being brought vnto CORINTH, and the ambassadours of SYRACVSA being arriued with them also, who besought the people to take care and protection ouer their poore city, & that they would once againe be founders of the same: the CORINTHIANS did not greedily desire to be Lords of so goodly and great a city, but first ploclaimed by the trumpet in all the assemblies, solemne feasts, and common playes of GRECE, that the CORINTHIANS hauing destroyed the tyranny that was in the city of SYRACVSA, and driuen out the tyrants, did call the SYRACVSANS that were fugitiues out of their countrey home againe, and all other SICILIANS that liked to come and dwell there, to enioy all freedome and liberty, with promise to make iust and equall diuision of the lands among them, the one to haue as much as the other. Moreouer, they sent out posts & messengers into ASIA, & into all the Ilands where they vnderstood the banished SYRACVSANS remained, to perswade and intreat them to come to CORINTH, and that the CORINTHIANS would giue them ships, captaines, & meanes to conduct them safely vnto SYRACVSA, at their owne proper costs and charges. In recompence whereof, the city of CORINTH receiued euery mans most noble praise & blessing, aswell for deliuering SICILE in that sort from the bondage of tyrants, as also for keeping it out of the hands of the barbarous people, and restoring the naturall SYRACVSANS and SICILIANS, to their home and countrey againe. Neuertheless, such ſuch SICILIANS as repaired to CORINTH vpon this proclamation (themſelues being but a ſmall number to inhabit the country) beſought the CORINTHIANS to ioyne to them ſome other inhabitants, aſwell of CORINTH it ſelfe, as out of the reſt of GREECE: the which was performed. For they gathered together about ten thouſand perſons, whom they ſhipped and ſent to SYRACVSA. Where there were already a great number of other come vnto Timoleon, aſwell out of SICILE it ſelfe, as out of all ITALY beſides: ſo that the whole number (as Athanis writeth) came to three ſcore thouſand perſons. Amongſt them he deuided the whole country, and ſold them houſes of the citie, vnto the value of a thouſand talents. And becauſe he would leaue the old SYRACVSANS able to recouer their owne, and make the poore people by this meanes to haue mony in common, to defray the common charge of the city, as alſo their expences in time of wars: the ſtatues or images were ſold, and the people by moſt voyces did condemne them: for they were ſolemnely indited, accuſed and arraigned, as if they had bene men aliue to be condemned. And it is reported that the SYRACVSANS did reſerue the ſtatue of Gelon, an auncient tyrant of their citie, honoring his memorie becauſe of a great victorie he had won of the CARTHAGINIANS, neare the citie of HIMERA: and condemned all the reſt to be taken away out of euery corner of the citie, and to be ſold. Thus began the citie of SYRACVSA to repleniſh againe, and by litle and litle to recouer it ſelfe, many people comming thither from all parts to dwell there. Thereupon Timoleon thought to ſet all other cities at libertie alſo, and vtterly to root out all the tyrants of SICILE: and to obtaine his purpoſe, he went to make wars with them at their owne doores. The firſt he went againſt was Icetes, whom he compelled to forſake the league of the CARTHAGINIANS, and to promiſe alſo that he would race all the fortreſſes he kept, and to liue like a priuate man within the city of the LEONTINES. Leptines in like maner, that was tyrant of the city of APPOLLONIA, and of many other litle villages thereabouts, when he ſaw himſelfe in danger to be taken by force, did yeeld himſelfe: whereupon Timoleon ſaued his life, and ſent him vnto CORINTH: thinking it honourable for his country, that the other GRECIANS ſhold ſee the tyrants of SICILE in their chiefe city of fame, liuing meanly and poorely like baniſhed people. When he had brought this to paſſe, he returned forthwith to SYRACVSA about the ſtabliſhment of the commonweale, aſſiſting Cephalus and Dionyſius, two notable men ſent from CORINTH to reforme the lawes, and to helpe them to ſtabliſh the goodlieſt ordinances for their commonweale. And now in the meane time, becauſe the ſouldiers had a mind to get ſomething of their enemies, and to auoid idleneſſe, he ſent them out abroad to a country ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, vnder the charge of Dimarchus, and Demaratus: where they made many litle townes rebell againſt the barbarous people, and did not only liue in all abundance of wealth, but they gathered mony together alſo to maintaine the wars. The CARTHAGINIANS on the other ſide while they were buſie about theſe matters, came downe into LYLIBEA, with an army of three ſcore and ten thouſand men, two hundred gallies, and a thouſand other ſhips and veſſels that caried engines of batterie, carts, victuals, munition, and other neceſſary prouiſion for a campe, intending to make ſporting wars no more, but at once to driue all the GRECIANS againe quite out of SICILE. For indeed it was an able army to ouercome all the SICILIANS, if they had bene whole of themſelues, and not deuided. Now they being aduertiſed that the SICILIANS had inuaded their country, they went towards them in great furie led by Aſdrubal and Amilcar, generals of the army. This newes was ſtraight brought to SYRACVSA, and the inhabitants were ſo ſtriken with feare of the report of their army: that being a maruellous great number of them within the city, ſcant three thouſand of them had the harts to arme themſelues, and to go to the field with Timoleon. Now the ſtrangers that tooke pay, were not abouc foure thouſand in all: and of them, a thouſand of their hearts failed, and left him in mid way, and returned home againe: ſaying, that Timoleon was out of his wits, and more raſh then his yeares required, to vndertake with fiue thouſand footmen, and a thouſand horſe, to go againſt threeſcore and tenne thouſand men: and beſides, to carie that ſmall force he had to defend himſelfe withall, eight great daies iourney from SYRACVSA: ſo that if it chaunced they were compelled to fly, they had no place whither they might retire themſelues vnto with ſafetie, nor man that would take care to burie them, when they were ſlaine. Neuertheleſſe, Timoleon was glad he had that proofe of them, before he came to battell. Moreouer, hauing encouraged thoſe that remained with him, he made them march with ſpeed towards the riuer of CRIMESVS, where he vnderſtood he ſhould meete with the CARTHAGINIANS. So getting vp vpon a litle hill, from whence he might ſee the campe of the enemies on the other ſide: by chaunce certaine moiles fell vpon his army, loden with ſmallage. The ſouldiers tooke a conceit at the firſt vpon ſight of it, and thought it was a token of ill lucke: becauſe it is a manner we vſe, to hang garlands of this herbe, about the tombes of the dead. Hereof came the common prouerbe they vſe to ſpeake, when one lyeth a paſſing in his bed: he lacketh but ſmallage. Aſmuch to ſay, he is but a dead man. But Timoleon to draw them from this fooliſh ſuperſtition, and diſcourage they tooke, ſtaid the army: and when he had vſed certaine perſwaſions vnto them, according to the time, his leiſure, and occaſion, he told them that the garland of it ſelf came to offer them victory before hand. For, ſaid he, the CORINTHIANS do crowne them that winne the ISTMIAN games (which are celebrated in their country) with garlands of ſmallage. And at that time alſo euen in the ſolemne ISTMIAN games, they vſed the garland of ſmallage for reward and token of victorie: and at this preſent it is alſo vſed in the games of NEMEA. And it is but lately taken vp, that they haue vſed branches of pine apple trees in the ISTMIAN games. When Timoleon had thus encouraged his men, as you haue heard before: he firſt of all tooke of this ſmallage, and made himſelfe a garland, and put it on his head: and after him the Captaines and all the ſouldiers alſo tooke of the ſame, and made themſelues the like. The ſoothſayers in like maner at the very ſame time, perceiued two Eagles flying towards them: the one of them holding a ſnake in her talents, which ſhe pierced through and through, and the other as ſhe flew, gaue a terrible cry. So they ſhewed them both vnto the ſouldiers, who did then all together with one voice call vpon the gods for helpe. Now this fortuned about the beginning of the ſommer, and towards the latter end of May, the ſun drawing towards the ſolſtice of the ſommer: when there roſe a great miſt out of the riuer, that couered all the fields ouer, ſo as they could not ſee the enemies campe, but onely heard a maruellous confuſed noiſe of mens voices, as it had come from a great army: and riſing vp to the top of the hill, they laid their targets downe on the ground to take a litle breath: and the ſun hauing drawne and ſucked vp all the moiſt vapours of the miſt vnto the top of the hils, the aire began to be ſo thicke that the tops of the mountaines were all couered ouer with clouds: and contrarily, the valley vnderneath was all cleare and faire, that they might eaſily ſee the riuer of CRIMESVS, and the enemies alſo, how they paſſed it ouer in this ſort. Firſt, they had put their carts of warre foremoſt, which were very hotly armed and well appointed. Next vnto them there followed ten thouſand footmen, armed with white targets vpon their armes: whom they ſeeing afar off ſo well appointed, they coniectured by their ſtately march and goodly order, that they were the CARTHAGINIANS themſelues. After them, diuers other nations followed confuſedly one with another, & ſo they thronged ouer with great diſorder. There Timoleon conſidering the riuer gaue him opportunitie to take thē before they were halfe paſt ouer, and to ſet vpon what number he would: after he had ſhewed his men with his finger, how the battell of their enemies was deuided in two parts by meanes of the riuer, ſome of thē being already paſſed ouer, & the other to paſſe: he commanded Demaratus with his horſmen to giue a charge on the voward, to keepe them from putting themſelues in order of battell. And himſelf cōming downe the hill alſo with all his footmen into the vally, he gaue to the SICILIANS the two wings of his battell, mingling with them ſome ſtrangers that ſerued vnder him: & placed with himſelf in the midſt, the SYRACVSANS, with all the choice and beſt liked ſtraungers. So he taried not long to ioyne, when he ſaw the ſmall good his horſmen did. For he perceiued they could not come to giue a luſty charge vpon the battell of the CARTHAGINIANS, becauſe they were paled in with theſe armed carts, that ran here & there before thē: wherupon they were compelled to wheele about continually, (vnleſſe they would haue put themſelues in danger to haue bin vtterly ouerthrowne) & in their returnes to giue venture of charge, by turns on their enemies. Wherfore Timoleon taking his target on his arme, cried out aloud to his footmen, to follow him couragiouſly, & to feare nothing. Thoſe that heard his voice, thought it more then the voice of a man, whether the fury of his deſire to fight did ſo ſtrain it beyond ordinary courſe, or that ſome god (as many thought it then) did ſtretch his voice to cry out ſo loud & ſenſibly. His ſouldiers anſwered him againe with the like voice: and praied him to lead thē without longer delay. Then he made his horſmen vnderſtand, that they ſhould draw on the one ſide from the carts, and that they ſhould charge the CARTHAGINIANS on the flankes: and after he did ſet the formoſt ranke of his battell, target to target againſt the enemies, commaunding the trumpets withall to ſound. Thus with great furie he went to giue a charge vpon them, who valiantly receiued the firſt charge, their bodies being armed with good iron corſelets, and

and their heads with faire murrions of copper, beſides the great targets they had alſo, which did eaſily receiue the force of their darts, and the thruſt of the pike. But when they came to handle their ſwords, where agilitie was more requiſite then force: a fearefull tempeſt of thunder, and flaſhing lightning withall, came from the mountaines. After that came darke thicke cloudes alſo (gathered together from the top of the hils) and fell vpon the vally, where the battell was fought with a maruellous extreame ſhower of raine, fierce violent winds, and haile withall. All this tempeſt was vpon the GRECIANS backs, and full before the barbarous people, beating on their faces, and did blindfold their eyes, and continually tormented them with the raine that came full vpon them with the wind, and the lightnings ſo oft flaſhing amongſt them, that one vnderſtood not another of them. Which did maruellouſly trouble them, and ſpecially thoſe that were but freſh water ſouldiers, by reaſon of the terrible thunderclaps, and the noiſe the boyſterous wind and haile made vpon their harneſſe: for that made them they could not heare the order of their Captaines. Moreouer, the dirt did as much annoy the CARTHAGINIANS, becauſe they were not nimble in their armour, but heauily armed as we haue told you: and beſides that alſo, when the plaites of their coates were through wet with water, they did lode and hinder them ſo much the more, that they could not fight with any eaſe. This ſtood the GRECIANS to great purpoſe to throw them downe the eaſier. Thus when they were tumbling in the dirt with their heauie armour, vp they could riſe no more. Furthermore, the riuer of CRIMESVS being riſen high through the great rage of waters, and alſo for the multitude of people that paſſed ouer it, did ouerflow the valley all about: which being full of ditches, many caues, and hollow places, it was ſtraight all drowned ouer, and filled with many running ſtreames, that ran ouerthwart the field, without any certaine channell. The CARTHAGINIANS being compaſſed all about with theſe waters, they could hardly get the way out of it. So as in the end they being ouercome with the ſtorme that ſtill did beat vpon them, and the GRECIANS hauing ſlaine of their men at the firſt onſet, to the number of foure hundred of their choiceſt men, who made the firſt front of their battell: all the reſt of their army turned their backs immediatly, & fled for life. Inſomuch as ſome of them being followed very nere, were put to the ſword in the midſt of the vally: other, holding one another hard by the armes together, in the midſt of the riuer as they paſſed ouer, were caried downe the ſtreame and drowned, with the ſwiftneſſe and violence of the riuer. But the greateſt number thinking by footmanſhip to recouer the hils thereabouts, were ouertaken by them that were light armed, and put to the ſword euery man. They ſay, that of ten thouſand which were ſlaine in this battell, three thouſand of them were naturall citizens of CARTHAGE, which was a very ſorrowfull and grieuous loſſe to the city: for they were of the nobleſt, the richeſt, the luſtieſt and valianteſt men of all CARTHAGE. For there is no chronicle that mentioneth any former wars at any time before, where there dyed ſo many of CARTHAGE at one field and battel, as were ſlaine at that preſent time. For before that time, they did alwaies entertaine the LYBIANS, the SPANIARDS, and the NOMADES, in all their wars: ſo as when they loſt any battell, the loſſe lighted not on them, but the ſtrangers paid for it. The men of accompt alſo that were ſlain, were eaſily knowne by their ſpoiles. For they that ſpoiled them, ſtood not triſling about getting of copper and iron together, becauſe they found gold and ſiluer enough. For the battell being won, the GRECIANS paſſed ouer the riuer, and tooke the campe of the barbarous people, with all their cariages and baggage. And as for the priſoners, the ſouldiers ſtole many of them away, and ſent them going: but of them that came to light in the common diuiſion of the ſpoile they were about fiue thouſand men, and two hundred carts of war that were taken beſides. Oh, it was a noble ſight to behold the tent of Timoleon their generall, how they enuironed it all about with heapes of ſpoiles of euery ſort: among which there were a thouſand braue corcelets gilt, and grauen with maruellous curious works, and they brought thither with thē alſo ten thouſand targets. So the conquerers being but a ſmal number, to take the ſpoile of a multitude that were ſlain, they filled their purſes euen to the top. Yet were they three daies about it, & in the end, the third day after the battell, they ſet vp a marke or token of their victory. Then Timoleon ſent vnto CORINTH, with the newes of this ouerthrow, the faireſt armor that were gotten in the ſpoile: becauſe he would make his country & natiue city ſpoken of & commended through the world, aboue all the other cities of GREECE. For that at CORINTH onely, their chiefe temples were ſet forth and adorned, not with ſpoils of the GRECIANS, nor offerings gotten by ſpilling the bloud of their owne nation and countrey: (which to ſay truly, are vnpleaſant memories) but with the

ſpoiles taken from the barbarous people their enemies, with inſcriptions witneſſing the valiancie and iuſtice of thoſe alſo, who by victory had obtained them. That is to wit, that the CORINTHIANS and their captaine Timoleon, (hauing deliuered the GRECIANS dwelling in SICILE, from the bondage of the CARTHAGINIANS) had giuen thoſe offerings vnto the gods, to giue thanks for their victory. That done, Timoleon leauing the ſtrangers he had in pay, in the country ſubiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, to ſpoile and deſtroy it, he returned with the reſt of his army vnto SYRACVSA: where at his firſt coming home, he baniſhed the thouſand ſouldiers that had forſaken him in his iourney, with expreſſe charge that they ſhould depart the city before Sun ſet. So theſe thouſand cowardly and mutinous ſouldiers paſſed ouer into ITALY, where, vnder promiſe of the country, they were all vnfortunatly ſlaine by the BRVTIANS: ſuch was the iuſtice of the gods to pay the iuſt reward of their treaſon. Afterwards, Mamercus the tyrant of CATANA, & Icetes (whether it was for the enuy they did beare to Timoleons famous deedes, or for that they were afraid of him) perceiuing tyrants could looke for no peace at his hands: they made league with the CARTHAGINIANS, and wrote vnto them that they ſhold ſend another army and captaine ſuddenly, if they would not vtterly be driuen out of SICILE. The CARTHAGINIANS ſent Giſco thither with threeſcore and ten ſaile, who at his firſt comming tooke a certaine number of GRECIAN ſouldiers into pay, which were the firſt the CARTHAGINIANS euer retained in their ſeruice: for they neuer gaue them pay vntill that preſent time, when they thought them to be men inuincible, and the beſt ſouldiers of the world. Moreouer, the inhabitants of the territory of MESSINA, hauing made a ſecret conſpiracy among themſelues, did ſlay foure hundred men that Timoleon had ſent vnto them: & in the territories ſubiect vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, neare vnto a place they call HIERES, there was another ambuſh laid for Euthimus LEVCADIAN, ſo as himſelfe and all his ſouldiers were cut in peeces. Howbeit the loſſe of them made Timoleons doings notwithſtanding more fortunate: for they were euen thoſe that had forcibly entred the temple of Apollo in the city of DELPHES, with Philodemus the PHOCIAN, and with Onomarchus who were partakers of their ſacriledge. Moreouer, they were looſe people and abiects, that were abhorred of euery body, who vagabondlike wandred vp and downe the country of PELOPONNESVS, when Timoleon for lacke of other was glad to take them vp. And when they came into SICILE, they alwaies ouercame in all battels they fought, whilſt they were in his company. But in the end, when the fury of wars was pacified, Timoleon ſending them about ſome ſpeciall ſeruice to the aide of ſome of his, they were caſt away euery man of them: and not all together, but at diuers times. So as it ſeemed that gods iuſtice, in fauour of Timoleon, did ſeparate them from the reſt, when he was determined to plague them for their wicked deſerts, fearing leſt good men ſhould ſuffer hurt by puniſhing of the euill. And ſo was the grace and goodwil of the gods wonderfull towards Timoleon, not onely in matters againſt him, but in thoſe things that proſpered well with him. Notwithſtanding, the common people of SYRACVSA tooke the ieſting words and writings of the tyrants againſt them, in maruellous euill part. For Mamercus amongſt other, thinking well of himſelfe, becauſe he could make verſes and tragedies, hauing in certaine battels gotten the better hand of the ſtrangers, which the SYRACVSANS gaue pay vnto, he gloried very much. And when he offered vp the targets he had gotten of them, in the temples of the gods, he ſet vp alſo theſe cutting verſes, in deriſion of them that were vanquiſhed:

With bucklers potlid like, which of no value were,
we haue theſe goodly targets won, ſo richly trimmed here,
All gorgeouſly with gold, and eke with Iuorie,
with purple colours finely wrought, and deckt with Ebonie.

These things done, Timoleon led his army before the citie of CALAVRIA, and Icetes therewhile entred the confines of the SYRACVSANS with a maine army, and caried away a maruellous great ſpoile: and after he had done great hurt, and ſpoiled the country, he returned backe againe, and came by CALAVRIA, to deſpite Timoleon, knowing well enough he had at that time but few men about him. Timoleon ſuffered him to paſſe by, but followed him afterwards with his horſemen and lighteſt armed footmen. Icetes vnderſtanding that, paſſed ouer the riuer called DAMIRIAS, and ſo ſtaid on the other ſide as though he would fight, truſting to the ſwift running of the riuer, and the height of the banks on either ſide of the ſame. Now the captaines of Timoleons bands fell out maruellouſly amongſt themſelues, ſtriuing for honor of this ſeruice, which was cauſe of delaying the battell. For none would willingly come behind, but euery man deſired desired to leade the voward, for honor to begin the charge: so as they could not agree for their going ouer, one thrusting another to get before his companion. Wherefore Timoleon fell to drawing of lots, which of them should passe ouer first, and tooke a ring of euery one of them, and cast them all within the lap of his cloke: so rolling them together, by chaunce he pluckt one at the first, whereon was grauen the markes and tokens of a triumph. The young captains seeing that, gaue a shout of ioy, and without tarying drawing of other lots, they began euery man to passe the riuer as quickely as they could, and to set vpon the enemies as suddenly. But they being not able to abide their force, ranne their waies, and were faine to cast their armour away to make more hast: howbeit there were a thousand of them lay dead in the field. And within few daies after, Timoleon leading his army to the citie of the LEONTINES, tooke Icetes aliue there, with his son Eupolemus, and the generall of his horsemen, who were deliuered into his hands by his owne souldiers. So Icetes and his son were put to death, like traitors and tyrants: and so was Euthydemus also, who though he was a valiant souldier, had no better mercie shewed him, then the father and the son, because they did burthen him with certaine iniurious words he spake against the CORINTHIANS. For they say, that when the CORINTHIANS came first out of their country into SICILE, to make warres against the tyrants: that he making an oration before the LEONTINES, said amongst other things, that they should not need to be afraid, if

Thus we see, that men do rather suffer hurt, then put vp iniurious words: and do pardon their enemies, though they reuenge by deeds, because they can do no lesse. But as for iniurious words they seeme to proceed of a deadly hate, and of a cankred malice. Furthermore, when Timoleon was returned againe to SYRACVSA, the SYRACVSANES arraigned the wiues of Icetes, and his son, and their daughters: who being arraigned, were also condemned to die by the iudgement of the people. Of all the actes Timoleon did, this of all other (in my opinion) was the fowlest deede: for if he had listed, he might haue saued the poore women from death. But he passed not for them, and so left them to the wrath of the citizens, who would be reuenged of them, for the iniuries that were done to Dion, after he had driuen out the tyrant Dyonisius. For it was Icetes that caused Arete, the wife of Dion, to be cast into the sea, his sister Aristomache, and his sonne that was yet a suckling child, as we haue written in another place in the life of Dion. That done, he went to CATANA against Mamercus, who taried him by the riuer of ABOLVS, where Mamercus was ouerthrowne in battell, and aboue two thousand men slaine, the greatest part whereof were the CARTHAGINIANS, whom Gisco had sent for his reliefe. Afterwards he graunted peace to the CARTHAGINIANS, vpon earnest sute made to him, with condition, that they should keepe on the other side of the riuer of LYCVS, and that it should be lawfull for any of the inhabitants there that would, to come and dwell in the territorie of the SYRACVSANS, and to bring away with them their goods, their wiues and their children: and furthermore, that from thencefoorth the CARTHAGINIANS should renounce all league, confederacie, and alliance with the tyrants. Wherupon Mamercus hauing no hope of good successe in his doings, he would go into ITALY, to stir vp the LVCANIANS against Timoleon and the SYRACVSANS. But they that were in his company, returned backe againe with their gallies in the mid way: and when they were returned into SICILE, they deliuered vp the city of CATANA into the hands of Timoleon, so as Mamercus was constrained to saue himselfe, and to flie into MESSINA, to Hippon the tyrant thereof. But Timoleon followed him, and besieged the city both by sea and by land. Wherat Hippon quaked for feare, and thought to flie by taking ship, but he was taken starting. And the MESSINIANS hauing him in their hands, made all the children come from the schoole to the Theater, to see one of the goodliest sights that they could deuise: to wit, to see the tyrant punished, who was openly whipped, and afterwards put to death. Now for Mamercus, he did yeeld himselfe vnto Timoleon, to be iudged by the SYRACVSANS, so that Timoleon might not be his accuser. So that he was brought vnto SYRACVSA, where he attempted to make an oration to the people, which he had premeditated long before. But seeing that the people cryed out, and made a great noise, because they would not heare him, and that there was no likelihood they would pardon him: he ranne ouerthwart the Theater, and knocked his head as hard as he could driue, vpon one of the degrees whereon they sate there to see their sports, thinking to haue dashed out his braines, and haue rid himselfe sodainely out of his paine. But he was not happy to die so, for he was taken straight being yet aliue, and put to death as theeues and murtherers are. Thus did Timoleon roote all tyrants out of SICILE, and made an end of all warres there. And whereas he found the whole Ile, wild, sauage, and hated of the naturall countrymen and inhabitants of the same, for the extreme calamities and miseries they suffered, he brought it to be so ciuill, and so much desired of straungers, that they came far and neare to dwell there, where the naturall inhabitants of the country selfe before, were glad to fly and forsake it. For AGRIGENTVM, & GELA, two great cities, did witnesse this, which after the wars of the ATHENIANS, had bene vtterly forsaken and destroyed by the CARTHAGINIANS, and were then inhabited againe: the one, by Megellus and Pheristus, two captaines that came from ELEA: and the other by Gorgos, who came from the Ile of CEO. And as neare as they could, they gathered againe together the first ancient citizens and inhabitants of the same: whom Timoleon did not only assure of peace and safety to liue there, to settle them quietly together: but willingly did helpe them besides, with all other things necessarie, to his vttermost meane and ability, for which they loued and honoured him as their father and founder. And this his good loue and fauour was common also to all other people of SICILE whatsoeuer. So that in all SICILE there was no truce taken in wars, nor lawes established, nor lands deuided, nor institution of any pollicie or gouernement thought good or auaileable, if Timoleons deuice had not bene in it, as chief directer of such matters: which gaue him a singular grace to be acceptable to the gods, and generally to be beloued of all men. For in those daies, there were other famous men in GREECE, that did maruellous great things: amongst whom were these, Timotheus, Agesilaus, Pelopidas, & Epaminondas: which Epaminondas, Timoleon sought to follow in all things, as neare as he could, aboue any of them all. But in all the actions of these other great captaines, their glory was alwaies mingled with violence, paine, and labour: so as some of them haue bene touched with reproch, and other with repentance. Whereas contrariwise, in all Timoleons doings (that only excepted which he was forced to do to his brother) there was nothing but they might with troth (as Timæus said) proclaime the saying of Sophocles:

Timo'eō quieteth all Sicile.

Timoleon compared with the famousest men in Greece.

Oh mighty gods of heauen, what Venus stately dame, or Cupid, (god) haue thus yput, their hands vnto this same?

And like as Antimachus verses, and Dionysius painting both COLOPHONIANS, are full of sinewes and strength, and yet at this present we see they are things greatly laboured, and made with much paine: and that contrariwise in Nicomachus tables, and Homers verses, besides the passing workmanship and singular grace in them, a man findeth at the first sight, that they were easily made, and without great paine. Euen so in like manner, whosoeuer will compare the painfull bloudie warres and battels of Epaminondas, and Agesilaus, with the wars of Timoleon, in the which, besides equitie and iustice, there is also great ease and quietnesse: he shall find, weighing things indifferently, that they haue not bene fortunes doings simply, but that they came of a most noble and fortunate courage. Yet he himselfe doth wisely impute it vnto his good hap, and fauorable fortune. For in his letters he wrote vnto his familiar friends at CORINTH, and in some other orations he made to the people of SYRACVSA, he spake it many times, that he thanked the almightie gods, that it had pleased them to saue and deliuer SICILE from bondage, by his means and seruice, and to giue him the honour and dignitie of the name. And hauing builded a temple in his house, he dedicated it vnto Fortune, and furthermore did consecrate his whole house vnto her. For he dwelt in a house the SYRACVSANS kept for him, and gaue him in recompence of the good seruice he had done them in the warres, with a maruellous faire pleasant house in the country also, where he kept most when he was at leysure. For he neuer after returned vnto CORINTH againe, but sent for his wife and children to come thither, and neuer dealt afterwards with those troubles that fell out amongst the GRECIANS, neither did make himselfe to be enuied of the citizens (a mischiefe that most gouernours and captaines do fall into, through their vnsatiable desire of honour and authoritie) but liued all the rest of his life after in SICILE, reioycing for the great good he had done, and specially to see so many cities and thousands of people happy by his meanes. But because it is an ordinary matter, and of necessitie, (as Simonides saith) that not onely all larkes haue a tuft vpon their heads, but also that in all cities there he accusers, where the people rule: there were two of those at SYRACVSA, that continually made orations to the people, who did accuse Timoleon, the one called Laphystius, and the other Demænetus. So this Laphystius appointing Timoleon a certaine day to come and answer to his accusation before the people, thinking to conuince him: the citizens began to mutine, and would not in any case ſuffer the day of adiornment to take place. But Timoleon did pacifie thē, declaring vnto them, that he had taken all the extreme paines and labor he had done, & had paſſed ſo many dangers, becauſe euery citizen & inhabitant of SYRACVSA, might frankly vſe the liberty of their laws. And another time Demænetus, in open aſſembly of the people, reprouing many things Timoleon did when he was General: Timoleon anſwered neuer a word, but only ſaid vnto the people, that he thanked the gods they had granted him the thing he had ſo requeſted of them in his prayers, which was, that he might once ſee the SYRACVSANS haue full power and libertie to ſay what they would. Now Timoleon in al mens opiniō, had done the nobleſt acts that euer GRECIAN captain did in his time, and had alone deſerued the fame and glory of all the noble exploits, which the rhetoricians with all their eloquent orations perſwaded the GRECIANS vnto, in the open aſſemblies, and common feaſts and playes of GREECE, out of the which fortune deliuered him ſafe and ſound before the trouble of the ciuill warres that followed ſoone after: and moreouer he made a great proofe of his valiancy and knowledge in wars, againſt the barbarous people and tyrants, and had ſhewed himſelf alſo a iuſt and mercifull man vnto all his friends, and generally to all thē GRECIANS. And furthermore, ſeeing he won the moſt part of all his victories and triumphs, without the ſhedding of any one teare of his men, or that any of them mourned by his meanes, and alſo rid all SICILE of all the miſeries and calamities raigning at that time, in leſſe then eight yeares ſpace: he being now growne old, his ſight firſt beginning a litle to faile him, ſhortly after he loſt it altogether. This happned, not through any cauſe or occaſion of ſickneſſe that came vnto him, nor that fortune had caſually done him that iniury: but it was in my opinion, a diſeaſe inheritable to him by his parents, which by time came to lay hold on him alſo. For the voice went, that many of his kin in like caſe had alſo loſt their ſight, which by litle and litle with age, was cleane taken from them. Howbeit Athanis the hiſtoriographer writeth, that during the warres he had againſt Mamercus and Hippon, as he was in his camp at MYLES, there came a white ſpot in his eies, that dimmed his ſight ſomewhat: ſo that euery man perceiued that he ſhould looſe his ſight altogether. Notwithſtanding that, he did not raiſe his ſiege, but continued his enterpriſe, vntill he tooke both the tyrants at laſt: and ſo ſoone as he returned to SYRACVSA againe, he did put himſelf out of his office of general, praying the citizens to accept that he had already done, the rather becauſe things were brought to ſo good paſſe, as they themſelues could deſire. Now, that he patiently tooke this misfortune to be blind altogether, peraduenture men may ſomewhat maruell at it: but this much more is to be wondred at, that the SYRACVSANS after he was blind, did ſo much honour him, and acknowledge the good he had done them, that they went themſelues to viſit him oft, and brought ſtrangers (that were trauellers) to his houſe in the city, and alſo in the country, to make them ſee their benefactor, reioycing & thinking themſelues happy, that he had choſen to end his life with them, and that for this cauſe he had deſpiſed the glorious returne that was prepared for him in GREECE, for the great and happy victories he had won in SICILE. But amongſt many other things the SYRACVSANS did, and ordained to honor him with, this of all other me thinketh was the chiefeſt: that they made a perpetuall law, ſo oft as they ſhould haue warres againſt forrein people, and not againſt their owne countrymen, that they ſhould chuſe a CORINTHIAN for their generall. It was a goodly thing alſo to ſee how they did honor him in the aſſemblies of their counſell. For if any trifling matter fell in queſtion among them, they diſpatched it of themſelues: but if it were a thing that required great counſell and aduiſe, they cauſed Timoleon to be ſent for. So he was brought through the market place in his litter, into the Theater, where all the aſſembly of the people was, and caried in euen ſo in his litter as he ſate: and then the people did all ſalute him with one voice, and he them in like caſe. And after he had pauſed a while, to heare the praiſes and bleſſings the whole aſſembly gaue him, they did propound the matter doubtfull to him, and he deliuered his opinion vpon the ſame: which being paſſed by the voices of the people, his ſeruants caried him backe againe in his litter through the Theater, and the citizens did waite on him a litle way with cries of ioy, and clapping of hands: and that done, they did repaire to diſpatch common cauſes by themſelues, as they did before. So his old age being thus entertained with ſuch honour, and with the loue and good will of euery man, as of a common father to them all: in the end a ſickneſſe tooke him by the backe, whereof he died. So the SYRACVSANS had a certaine time appointed them to prepare for his funerals, and their neighbours alſo thereabouts to come vnto it. By reaſon whereof his funerall was ſo much more honourably performed in all things, and ſpecially for that the people appointed the nobleſt young gentlemen of the citie to cary his coffin vpon their ſhoulders, richly furniſhed and ſet forth, whereon his body lay, and ſo did conuey him through the place, where the pallace and caſtle of the tyrant Dionyſius had bene, which then was razed to the ground. There accompanied his body alſo many thouſands of people, all crowned with garlands of flowers, and apparelled in their beſt apparell: ſo as it ſeemed it had bene the proceſſion of ſome ſolemne feaſt, and al their words were praiſings and bleſſings of the dead, with teares running downe their cheekes, which was a good teſtimony of the entire good will and loue they did beare him, and that they did not this as men that were glad to be diſcharged of the honour they did him, neither for that it was ſo ordained: but for the iuſt ſorrow and griefe they took for his death, and for very hearty good loue they did beare him. An honourable decree of the Syracuſans for the memorie of Timoleon. And laſtly, the coffin being put vpon the ſtack of wood where it ſhould be burnt, Demetrius one of the heraulds that had the lowdeſt voice, proclaimed the decree that was ordained by the people, the effect whereof was this: The people of SYRACVSA hath ordained, that this preſent body of Timoleon CORINTHIAN, the ſonne of Timodemus, ſhould be buried at the charges of the common-weale, vnto the ſumme of two hundred Minas, and hath honoured his memory with playes and games of muſick, with running of horſes, and with other exerciſes of the body, which ſhall be celebrated yearely on the day of his death for euermore: and this, becauſe he did driue the tyrants out of SICILE, for that he ouercame the barbarous people, and becauſe he repleniſhed many great cities with inhabitants againe, which the warres had left deſolate and vnhabited, and laſtly, for that he had reſtored the SICILIANS againe to their libertie, and to liue after their owne lawes. Timoleons tombe built in the market place. And afterwards, his tombe was built in the market place, about the which a certaine time after, they builded certaine cloiſters and galleries to exerciſe the youth in, with exciſe of their bodies, and the place ſo walled in, was called Timoleontium: and ſo long as they did obſerue the lawes, and ciuill pollicy he ſtabliſhed amongſt them, they liued long time in great and continuall proſperitie.

THE COMPARISON OF Paulus Æmylius with Timoleon.

The comparison of Timoleon and Paulus AEmylius for the warres. SIth theſe two men were ſuch as the Hiſtoriographers haue deſcribed them to be: it is certaine, that comparing the one with the other, we ſhall find no great oddes or difference betweene them. For firſt of all, the warres they made haue bene againſt great and famous enemies: the one againſt the MACEDONIANS, and the other againſt the CARTHAGINIANS, and both their victories very notable. For the one of them conquered the realme of MACEDON, which he tooke from the ſeuenth king that raigned by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne, ſince the time of the great Antigonus: and the other draue all the tyrants out of SICILE, and reſtored the whole Iles and cities therein, vnto their former libertie. Vnleſſe ſome will alleage perhaps that there was this difference betweene them, that AEmylius fought againſt King Perſeus, when he had all his power whole and entire, and

and had fought with the ROMAINES many times before, and had the better of them in all conflicts: where Timoleon set vpon Dionysius, when he was in greatest despaire, and in maner vtterly cast away. On the contrary side, it may be obiected for Timoleon, that he ouercame many tyrants, and a mightie great army of the CARTHAGINIANS, with a very small number of men, and yet men of all sorts: not as AEmylius with a great army of well trained and expert souldiers in warres, but with men gathered together at aduenture of all sorts, being mercenary hirelings, and men fighting for pay, lose people, and vnruly in warres, that would do but what they listed. For where the goodly deeds are like, and the meanes vnequall: there we must confesse that the praise is due vnto the Generall. Both the one and the other kept their hands cleane from corruption, in the charge which they tooke vpon them. But it seemeth that Æmylius came so fashioned and prepared, by the good ciuil law, and moral discipline of his country: and that Timoleon came rawly thither, and afterwards fashioned himself to be that he was. And this is to be proued: for that all the ROMAINES in that time were so ciuilly brought vp, and exceeded all other in straight keeping the lawes of their countrey. Where to the contrary, there was not one of the captaines of the GRECIANS that came then, or were sent into SICILE, but fell straight to corruption, when he had put his foot into SICILE, Dion onely excepted: and yet they had a certaine suspition of him, that he aspired to the kingdome, and imagined in his head to stablish a certaine Empire at SYRACVSA, like vnto that of LACEDÆMON. Timeus the historiographer writeth, that the SYRACVSANS sent Gilippus with shame backe againe into his country, for his vnsatiable greedie couetousnesse, and for his great thefts and bribes taken in his charge. Diuerse other haue also written the great treasons and fashoods Pharax SPARTAN, and Calippus ATHENIAN did commit, both of them seeking to make themselues Lords of SYRACVSA, and yet what men are they, and what meanes had they to haue such a foolish vaine hope and fancy in ther heads? considering that the one did follow and serue Dionysius, after he was driuen out of SYRACVSA: and the other also was but a priuate captaine of a band of footmen, of those that came with Dion. Timoleon in contrary maner was sent to be General of the SYRACVSANS, vpon their great instance and sute. And he hauing no need to seeke or hunt after it, but onely to keepe the power and authoritie they did willingly put into his hands: so soone as he had destroyed and ouerthrowne all such as would vniustly vsurp the gouernement, he did immediatly of his owne good will, frankly resigne vp his office and charge. And sure, so is this a notable thing to be commended, and esteemed in Paulus AEmylius: who hauing conquered so great and rich a realme, he neuer increased his goods the value of one farthing, neither did see nor handle any mony at all, although he was very liberall, and gaue largely vnto others. I meane not in speaking this to vpbraide or detect Timoleon, for that he accepted a faire house the SYRACVSANS gaue him in the citie, and a goodly manor also in the countrey: for in such cases there is no dishonestie in receiuing, but yet it is greater honestie to refuse, then to take: But that vertue is most rare and singular, where we see they will receiue nor take nothing, though they haue iustly deserued it. And if it be so, that the body is stronger and better compounded, which best abideth change of parching heat, & nipping cold: & that the mind is much more stronger and stable, that swelleth not vp with pride of prosperity, nor droopeth for sorrow in aduersitie. Then it appeareth, that AEmylius vertue was so much more perfect, in that he shewed himselfe of no lesse graue and constant a mind, in the patience he endured for his losse and sorow happened vnto him, (looosing at one time in maner, both his children) then he had done before, in all his triumph and greatest felicitie. Where Timoleon to the contrary, hauing done a worthy act against his brother, could with no reason suppresse the griefe and sorrow he felt: but ouercome with bitter griefe and repentance, continued the space of twenty yeares together, and neuer durst once only shew his face againe in the market place, nor deale any more in matters of the common-weale. Truly, for a man to beware to do euill, and to shun from euill, it is a very good and comely thing: so also to be sory, and afeard of euery reproach, and ill opinion of the world, it sheweth a simplenesse of nature, and a good and well disposed mind, but no manly courage.

The wonderful continencie of AEmylius from bribes. Not to take gifts, commended for a singular vertue.

THE LIFE OF Pelopidas.

To be too bold and venturous is not good.

CATO the elder, answered certaine on a time, that maruellously commended a bold, a venturous, and desperate man for the warres: that there was great oddes, to esteeme manhood so much, and life so litle. And surely it was wisely spoken of him. The report goeth, that king Antigonus gaue pay to a souldier among other, that was very hardie and venturous, but he had a naughtie sickly body. The King asked him one day, what he ayled to be so pale, and euill coloured? The souldier told him, he had a secret disease vpon him, that he might not tell him with reuerence. The King hearing him say so, commaunded his Phisitions and Surgeons to looke to him, and if he were curable, that they should heale him with all possible speede: and so they did. After the souldier had his health againe, he would venter no more so desperatly in the wars, as he did before. Insomuch as king Antigonus selfe perceiuing his slackneſſe in drawing backe, rebuked him, and said vnto him: that he wondred to see so great a chaunge and alteration in him. The souldier neuer shrinking at the matter, told him the troth plainely. Your selfe, and it please your Maiestie, is cause of my cowardlinesse now, by healing my disease, that made my life lothsome to me. Much like were a SYBARITANS words, touching the life and manner of the LACEDÆMONIANS: That it was no maruell they had such a desire to die in the warres, seeing they did it to rid themselues of their troubles, and most miserable and straight life. But we must not wonder though the SYBARITANS, being womanish men, and altogether giuen to pleasure, did so thinke: that those men hated their liues, who feared not death, for the desire they had to do good, and good will they had to do their dutie. Which was contrary in the LACEDÆMONIANS: for they were of opinion, that to liue and die willingly, was a vertue: as these funerall verses do witnesse:

Diuers opinions of life & death.

The dead which here do rest, did not in life esteeme, that life or death were (of themselues) or good or bad to deeme.
But euen as life did end, or death was brought to passe, so life or death, was good or bad, this their opinion was.

And in deede to flie death is no shame, so it proceede not of a cowardly heart: neither to desire death is commendable, if it be with contempt and hate of life. This is the reason why Homer saith, the valianteſt men are euer best armed, when they come to battell. The law-makers among the

the GRECIANS, do euer puniſh him that caſts away his target, but neuer him that caſteth away his ſword or launce. For euery man muſt firſt think to defend himſelfe, before he ſeeke to hurt his enemy, and ſpecially ſuch as haue the whole ſtate of a Realme in their hands, and be Generals of the field. For if the compariſon be true, that Iphicrates the ATHENIAN captaine made, that in an army of men, the light horſmen reſemble the hands, the men of armes the feet, the battell of footmen the ſtomacke and breaſt, the captaine, the head of a mans body: it ſeemeth then that the venturous captaine putting himſelfe in danger without cauſe, is not onely careleſſe of his owne life, but alſo of all theirs whoſe liues depend vpon his ſafety. As contrarily, he being carefull of his owne perſon, cannot but be carefull of his ſouldiers that ſerue vnder him. Therefore Callicratidas a LACEDÆMONIAN captaine, and a worthy man otherwiſe, did vnwiſely anſwer a ſoothſayer that bad him take heed to himſelf: for the ſignes & tokens of the ſacrifices did threaten his death. SPARTA, ſaid he, ſtandeth not vpon one man alone. It is true, that to fight by ſea or by land man for man, Callicratidas was but one man of himſelfe: but as captaine or lieutenant generall, he had the whole power and force of the army in his perſon. For he was not a man alone, when ſo many mens liues were loſt with his. Now old Antigonus was of a contrary mind: for he being ready to giue battell by ſea, about the Ile of ANDROS, made a better anſwer to one that ſaid vnto him: his enemies had moe ſhips then himſelfe. For how many ſhips then doeſt thou reckon my ſelfe, ſaid he? Therein he did wiſely to make great account of the worthineſſe of a General, ſpecially when it is ioyned with hardineſſe and experience. For the chiefeſt point of ſeruice, is to ſaue him that ſaueth all other. For when Chares on a time ſhewed the ATHENIANS openly, the ſundry wounds and cuts he had receiued vpon his body, and his target alſo thruſt through with many pikes: Timotheus ſtraight ſaid vnto him: Chares, I am not of thy mind. For when I did beſiege the city of SAMOS, I was aſhamed to ſee a dart throwne from the walles, light hard by me, for that I ſhewed my ſelfe a raſh young man, and more venturous then became a Generall of ſo great an army. For when it ſtandeth much vpon the whole army, and that it is neceſſary the Generall thereof do put himſelfe in daunger: then he ſhould put himſelfe forward, and occupy both hands and body without reſpect, not regarding their words that ſay, a good and wiſe captaine ſhould die for age, or at the leaſt old. But where there is ſmall honor to be won by very good ſucceſſe, and contrariwiſe much loſſe and deſtruction by great misfortune: no man of wiſedome or iudgement would wiſh a Generall to fight as a priuate ſouldier, to hazard the loſſe of a Generall. I thought good therefore to make this preface before the liues of Pelopidas and of Marcellus, both which were worthy men, and died otherwiſe then they ſhould. For they were both valiant ſouldiers in the field, and did both of them honour their country with famous victories, and ſpecially againſt great and dreadfull enemies. For the one was the firſt (as they ſay) that ouerthrew Hannibal, who was neuer ouercome by any before. And the other alſo ouercame the LACEDÆMONIANS in battell, that ruled all GREECE at that time both by ſea and by land. Yet they both careleſly loſt their liues, by venturing too boldly, when their country ſtood in greateſt need of ſuch men & captains as they were. This is the cauſe why we folowing the reſemblance that was betweene them, haue compared their liues together. Pelopidas, the ſon of Hippoclus, came of one of the nobleſt houſes of the city of THEBES, as Epaminondas did. He being brought vp in great wealth, his father left him heire of all his lands and goods, being but a yong man. So he ſtraight ſhewed himſelfe willing to do good with his mony, to thoſe that needed help, and were worthy: to let the world ſee, that his money was not his maiſter. For as Ariſtotle ſaith of theſe rich men, the moſt part of them do not vſe their goods for extreme couetouſnes: other again do abuſe them, as being giuen to ouermuch pleaſures. So rich men become ſlaues all their life time, ſome to pleaſure, other to profit. Now, all Pelopidas other friends would be beholding to him, and take very thankfully his curteſie and liberalitie towards him: but Epaminondas could neuer be brought to take any thing at his hands. Howbeit Pelopidas ſelfe followed Epaminondas maner: for he took a pride and pleaſure to go ſimply apparelled, to fare meanely, to labour willingly, and to make warres openly as he did. He was euen ſuch another, as Euripides the Poet deſcribed Capaneus to be, when he ſaid of him:

He rich and wealthy was, yet was he therewithall
no wight that purchac'd worldly hate, nor inſolent at all.

For he would haue bin aſhamed, that the pooreſt man of the city of THEBES, ſhould haue worne meaner apparell vpon his backe then himſelfe. As for Epaminondas, his pouerty was not dainty to him, becauſe his parents were euer poore, and yet for all that he paſſed it ouer more eaſily by ſtudy of Philoſophie, which he gaue himſelf vnto, and for that from his youth he liked to leade a ſpare life without exceſſe. Where Pelopidas matched in a noble houſe, and maried highly, and had two children by his wife: neuertheleſſe he had no mind to keepe or increaſe his goods the more for that, but gaue himſelfe altogether to ſerue the common-weale as long as he liued. By reaſon whereof his wealth decayed, and his beſt friends grew angry with him, telling him how he did not well to make no more reckoning of a thing that was ſo neceſſary, as to haue goods. And he anſwered them: In deed they are neceſſary I do confeſſe it, but yet for ſuch a one as this poore, lame, and blind man that ſtandeth by. They both were alike borne to all vertue, ſauing that Pelopidas tooke moſt pleaſure in exerciſe of his body and ſtrength, and Epaminondas in the exerciſe of his wit and learning. So as the paſtime each of them tooke when they were at leiſure was, that the one delighted to wraſtle and to hunt, and liked any kind of exerciſe of his body: and the other to heare, to ſtudy, and alwayes to learne ſome thing of Philoſophie. But among all the excellent gifts and good parts in either of them, and that moſt wanne them honour and eſtimation in the world, they were only commended, and ſingularly noted of wiſe men, for the perfect loue and friendſhip that was euer inuiolably kept betweene them vntill their deaths: hauing bene ioyned together in ſo many battels, warres, charges of armies, and otherwiſe in matters of ſtate and gouernement. For if a man will conſider, and looke into the doings of Ariſtides, Themiſtocles, and Cimon, of Pericles, Nicias, and Alcibiades, how full of diſſentions, enuies, and ſuſpitions they were one againſt another, in gouerning the common-weale: and againe will conſider the loue, honour, and kindneſſe, that continued alwayes betwixt Pelopidas, and Epaminondas: no doubt they will ſay theſe two are more worthy to be called brethren in warre, (as they ſay) and companions in gouernement, then any of them we haue named before, whoſe care and ſtudie was alwaies rather to ouercome one another, then to ouercome their enemies, and the only cauſe therof was their vertue. For their acts ſhewed they did not ſeeke glorie, nor riches for themſelues (the couetouſneſſe whereof doth alwayes breede quarrels and enuy) but both of them from the beginning fell one in loue with another, with a great kindneſſe and eſtimation of themſelues, to ſee their country flouriſh, and grow to great honour through their ſeruice, and in their time: and ſo they reckoned all the good exploites both of the one and the other, that tended to that end, as their owne. The moſt part of writers thinke, this great and earneſt loue the one did beare to another, did grow firſt betweene them in a iourney they made together vnto MANTINEA, to aid the LACEDÆMONIANS, that were at that time confederates of the THEBANS. For they being both ſet in battell ray, one hard by another among the footmen, againſt the Arcadians that ſtood before them: it fortuned that the point of the battell of the LACEDÆMONIANS in the which they were, gaue backe, and many of them ranne away. But they determining to die rather then to flie, ſtood cloſe together, and fought with the enemies that came vpon them, vntill ſuch time as Pelopidas being hurt in ſeuen places before, fell downe at the laſt vpon a heape of dead bodies, aſwell of their owne ſouldiers as of their enemies, euen one vpon another. Then Epaminondas thinking he had bene ſlaine, ſtept notwithſtanding before him to defend his body and armour, and he alone fought againſt many, being willing to die rather then to forſake Pelopidas lying amongſt the dead bodies: vntill himſelfe being thruſt into the breaſt with a pike, and ſore cut on his arme with a ſword, was euen ready to giue ouer, when Ageſipolis (King of the LACEDÆMONIANS) came with the other point of the battell in happy houre, who ſaued both their liues paſt all hope. Now after this battelll, the LACEDÆMONIANS both in words and deeds did courteouſly intreate the THEBANS as their friends and confederates. Notwithſtanding, in truth they began to feare the power and great courage of that city, and ſpecially the faction and aſſociates Iſmenias and Androclidas had ſet vp, whereof Pelopidas alſo was a companion: becauſe they thought it was popular, and inclined much to deſire liberty. Whereupon Archias, Leontidas, and Philip, all three great wealthy men of the city of THEBES, and miſliking to be equall with other citizens, did perſwade Phœbidas, a captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, that going and comming through the country of BOEOTIA with an army, he would one day aſſay to take the caſtle of THEBES called CADMEA, and driuing thoſe out of the city that would reſiſt him, he would put the gouernement of the ſtate into the hands of a few of the nobleſt perſons, who would be at the deuotion of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and obey them in all things. Phœbidas brought it to paſſe, and did work his feat before the THEBANS miſtruſted any thing vpon a holy day called THESMOPHORIA. After he had wonne the caſtle, he apprehended Iſmenias, and ſent him to LACEDÆMON, where ſhortly after

after they put him to death. Pelopidas, Pherenicus, and Androclidas, with many other, saued themselues by flying, & were banished THEBES by sound of trumpet. Epaminondas taried still in THEBES, and no man touched him, for they made small account of him, because he was altogether giuen to his booke: and though his goodwill had serued him to haue done some feate, his pouerty made him vnable to do any thing. The LACEDÆMONIANS vnderstanding of the taking of the castle, did straight put Phœbidas out of his charge, and set a fine of a hundred thousand drachmes vpon his head: but yet they kept still the castle of CADMEA in their hands with a great garrison. All the other cities and people of GREECE did wonder much at it, that they should allow the fact, and punish notwithstanding the doer. So the THEBANS hauing lost their auncient liberty, and being made subiect by both these, Archias and Leontidas, so as all hope was taken from them euer to wind out of this tyranny, or at any time to ouerthrow it, seeing it was maintained and defended by the LACEDÆMONIANS, and that they could not possibly take from them all the seignorie and dominion they had throughout GREECE, as well by sea as by land: Leontidas and his followers notwithstanding, when they vnderstood that they who were banished from THEBES, were very wel receiued and entertained of the people at ATHENS, and much made of also of the nobilitie, they sought secretly by treason to haue them killed. To do this feate, they sent certaine men vnknowne to ATHENS, who by treason slue Androclidas, howbeit they missed the killing of the other. Furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS wrote to the ATHENIANS, that they should not receiue such as were banished from THEBES, nor that they should fauour them, but driue them out of their citie, as those which by their allies were iustly proclaimed common enemies. The ATHENIANS notwithstanding, being men alwaies ciuilly giuen, and inclined in nature to humanitie, as being borne and bred vp withall, and very desirous besides to requite the THEBANS courtesie, who had bene the chiefest meanes and doers in restoring againe the popular state and gouernement at ATHENS: they would by no meanes offer the THEBANS any such iniurie, seeing they had stablished a lawe and decree, that if any ATHENIAN passing too and fro through the countrey of BOEOTIA, did beare armour against the thirtie tyrants, that were gouernours and oppressors of the libertie of ATHENS, there should no BOEOTIAN seeme to see, or know any thing thereof. In the meane time Pelopidas, though he were of the younger sort, did procure still euery one that was banished, to seeke the libertie of his countrey, and openly made an oration to them all, declaring that it were not onely a cowardly part, but also a wicked offence to the goddes, if they would suffer their countrey to remaine so in continuall bondage, and straungers to inhabite it with a garrison, to make them subiect to the yoke: and they in the meane time to be contented to saue themselues, to liue delicately and idlely at ATHENS, to studie to do what shall please the ATHENIANS to commaund them, and to be afraid of the Oratours, and those which through eloquence can perswade the common people to do what they lust. Therefore he perswaded them that they should hazard all, being a matter of so great weight, and take example of Thrasybulus noble courage and hardinesse: who departing from THEBES, did driue out the tyrants that oppressed ATHENS: and euen so, we departing from ATHENS, should seeke to deliuer THEBES also from bondage. When he had by these perswasions drawne them to his opinion, they secretly sent vnto their friends that remained still in THEBES, to let them vnderstand their mind and determination: who all liked very well of their purpose. Insomuch as Charon that was the chiefest man amõg them, promised to lend them his house to assemble in. Philidas also found meanes to be Secretarie to Philip and Archias, who were gouernours and Captaines of the citie at that time for the LACEDÆMONIANS. Epaminondas on the other side making no shew of any thing, had of long time practised to stirre vp the courage of the young men of THEBES. For when they were at any games or exercises of bodie, he would euer procure them to wrastle with the LACEDÆMONIANS. And after he saw them reioyce when they had cast them, and that they were the stronger: he would chide them, and tell them they might be ashamed, for lacke of courage to suffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to hold their noses to the grindstone, that were nothing like to them in strength. Now, the confederates appointed a day certaine, to breake the ice of their pretented enterprise, and agreed that Pherenicus, with other that were banished, should tarie at the village of THRIASIVM, and that they should send the valiantest and lustiest young men before, to giue the venture to enter the city: adding this therwithal, that if the enemies fortuned to surprise them, all the other of the conspiracy ioyntly together, shold be ready to giue order, that their fathers, mothers, & childrẽ, shold lacke nothing neceſſarie for them. Pelopidas was the firſt man that offered himſelfe to vndertake the enterpriſe: and after him Melon, Damoclidas, and Theopompus, all three, men of the greateſt houſes of THEBES, who loued maruellouſly together, and for no reſpect would euer offend one another, although from the beginning there was euer emulation among them for honour and glory, by ſtriuing who ſhould exceed other in vertue and valiantneſſe. Now they were twelue of them, who taking leaue of the reſt, ſent a foot poſt before to Charon, to aduertiſe him of their comming: and they themſelues went on their iourney caſting litle ſhort clokes vpon them, and taking hounds with them, and hunters ſtaues in their hands, becauſe their enterpriſe ſhould not be miſtruſted by thoſe that met them on the way, and that they ſhould thinke them hunters vp and downe the fields for their pleaſure. So, when the meſſenger they ſent, came to the citie, and had told Charon that they were comming: he neuer ſhrunke from his word, though the danger toward was great, but like a ſtout and honeſt man did abide by his promiſe he made, and told him they ſhould be moſt hartily welcome to his houſe. But another man called Hippoſthenidas, very honeſt otherwiſe, and one that loued his country and the preſeruation thereof, and a good friend of thoſe alſo that were baniſhed: fainting ſtraight vpon the ſudden report of theſe newes, his mind was troubled, and his heart failed him ſo, as his noſe fell a bleeding, to thinke vpon the greatneſſe of the inſtant danger he was like to fall into, hauing neuer caſt before with himſelfe, how by this enterpriſe they ſhould put all the empire of the LACEDÆMONIANS in hazard of vtter deſtruction, and lay a plot beſides to ouerthrow al their commonweale and ſtate: by laying all their hope vpon a few baniſhed men, hardly able to wade through with their enterpriſe. Whereupon ſo ſoone as he was come home, he ſecretly diſpatched a meſſenger one of his familiar friends, vnto Melon and Pelopidas, to will them they ſhould defer their enterpriſe for better oportunitie, and ſo to returne backe againe to ATHENS. Chlidon was the man he ſent of this meſſage, who preſently went home to his houſe: and taking his horſe out of the ſtable, bad his wife fetch him the bridle quickly. The bridle not being readily to be found, ſhe told him ſhe had lent it out to one of their neighbors. Then they fell a chiding together about it, and at length brake out to foule words, and laſtly his wife fell a curſing of him, and prayed the gods he might haue ill lucke in his iourney, and thoſe that ſent him. Chlidon hauing ſpent the moſt part of the day chiding and brawling with his wife about the bridle, and furthermore miſliking the tokens of his wiues curſing and banning of him: he determined not to go a foote out of the doores on that arrant, and ſo went about ſome other buſineſſe. Thus had this noble enterpriſe in manner bene altogether daſhed, before it was fully begun. Now thoſe that were in Pelopidas companie, changed apparell with the countrey men, becauſe they would not be knowne, and did deuide themſelues, for that they would not come into the city all together, but at diuers gates, being day light. At that time it was a maruellous wind and great ſnow, and the weather was ſo boiſterous, that euery man got him within dores: which fell out happily for the conſpirators, that they were not knowne when they came into the city. So their friends and confederats within the city receiued them as they came, and brought them to Charons houſe: where were aſſembled together, with thoſe that were baniſhed, eight and forty perſons onely. Now for the tyrants, thus ſtood the matter with them. Philidas their Secretary was of the conſpiracy, as we haue told you before, and he knew all the practiſe. Wherefore he had long before ſolemnly bidden Archias and his company, to ſupper to his houſe that very night, to be merry together, and had promiſed to entertaine them with women to welcome them withall: of purpoſe, that when they had in their full cups, and were in the midſt of all their pleaſure, the conſpirators might then vſe them as they would. So they being ſet at table, before they were ſped of their cups, one came to them, and told them truly of the treaſon (not the particularities, neither as a thing certaine, but of a rumour onely that ran abroad in the towne) how the baniſhed men were hidden in Charons houſe. Philidas would haue paſſed the matter ouer. Howbeit Archias would needs ſend one of his gard ſtraight for Charon, to commaund him to come to him preſently. It was within night, and Pelopidas and his companie prepared themſelues to worke their feat, being armed euery man, and their ſwords in their hands, when vpon a ſodaine they heard one knocke at the gate. And one of the houſe running ſtraight to the gate, came backe again afeard to tell them that it was one of Archias gard that came for Charon, to come immediatly to the gouernours. Then were they in doubt that their practiſe was diſcouered, and that they were all caſt away, before they could make any proof of their valiantnes: notwithſtanding, they were all of opinion, that Charon ſhould obey the meſſage, ſage, and that he ſhould preſent himſelfe before the gouernours, to take away all ſuſpition from them. Charon of himſelf was a ſtout man, very conſtant, and reſolute in danger for his own perſon: yet it grieued him much at that time, for feare the confederates ſhould ſuſpect him he had bewraied them, if ſo many honeſt citizens whom he had lent his houſe vnto, ſhould vnfortunatly miſcary. Therfore before he went out of his houſe, he went into his wiues chamber, to fetch his ſon, that was a goodly boy, but ſtrong as any boy of his age could be: ſo he brought him to Pelopidas, & praied him, if he vnderſtood he had betraied them any way, or otherwiſe had ſought their hurt, they ſhold then vſe his ſon as an enemy, without any compaſſion towards him. Whē the confederates ſaw the good zeale and true noble mind of Charon, they all fell a weeping, and were angry with him, that he ſhould thinke any of them ſo faint harted, or timerous, for any danger could come to them, that they ſhould ſuſpect or accuſe him for any thing: and therewithall they prayed him, not to leaue the boy with them, but rather to conuey him into ſome place out of the tyrants danger, where he might be brought vp, that one day he might be reuenged of the wrong and iniury they had done to them, and to their country. Charon anſwered them, he wold not take him away, and that he ſaw no life nor health more happy for him, then to die with his father without infamy, and with ſo many honeſt men his friends. So after he had beſought the gods to proſper them, and had encouraged and embraced euery one of the confederators one after another: he went to the gouernors, and ſtudied by the way ſo to frame his words & countenance, as though he ſhould ſeeme to thinke of any thing elſe, then of that he purpoſed to do. When he came to Philidas dore that made the feaſt, Archias & Philidas himſelfe came vnto him, & asked him: Charon, what are they (ſaid they) that are come into the city, and hidden in ſome houſe, with certain citizens, that do accompany them? Charon was ſomewhat abaſhed at the firſt, and asked them againe: what men be they? who are they that hides them in the city? But when he perceiued that Archias could tel nothing of certaintie, then he thought ſtraight that ſome man had informed them that was not priuy to the practiſe, but had heard ſomething of it. Therupon he willed them to take heed it was no falſe alarme, to make them afraid: neuertheleſſe (ſaid he) I will enquire further of it: for at all aduenture it is good to be circumſpect in ſuch a caſe to be ſure. Philidas anſwered him, he ſaid truly: and ſo he brought Archias backe againe into the hall, where he made him drinke deeper then before, ſtill entertaining the company with hope of the womens comming. Charon returning home again, found all the confederates ready to attempt their enterpriſe, not as men that reckened of their liues, nor that had any hope to preuaile: but as thoſe that were determined to dy valiantly, and to ſell their liues dearely. Now he truly told vnto Pelopidas only, what was ſaid vnto him: and the reſt, he told that Archias had ſent for him to ſpeake with him of other matters. The ſtorme of the former danger was ſcant blown ouer, but fortune ſent them another: for immediatly vpon talke had with Charon at the firſt, came a meſſenger from ATHENS, that brought a letter to the ſame Archias, written by the Biſhop of ATHENS at that time, called Archias alſo as himſelfe, and was his old hoſt and friend: wherin he wrote not of ſimple coniecture, nor ſurmiſed ſuſpition, but the plaine conſpiracy in euery degree, as afterwards it fell out. So the meſſenger was brought to Archias that was drunke, and deliuering him the letter he ſaid vnto him: Sir, he that ſendeth you this letter, ſtraightly charged me to tell you, that you ſhould preſently reade the contents thereof, becauſe it is a matter of great importance. Archias laughing ſaid vnto him: waighty matters to morrow. So he tooke the letter and put it vp, and then fell againe to his tale he had begun with Philidas. But euer after, the GRECIANS made this a common prouerbe among them, waighty matters to morrow. Now when the conſpirators ſpied their time to go about their buſines, they deuided themſelues in two companies. Pelopidas and Damoclidas went with one company, to ſet vpon Leontidas and Hypates, becauſe they dwelt neare together: Charon and Melon with the reſt, went againſt Archias and Philip, being diſguiſed in womens apparell they had put vpon their priuy coates, and wearing garlands of pine apple and firre trees on their heads, they couered all their faces. So when they came to ſhew themſelues at the hall doore where the banket was made, they that were in the hall at the firſt ſight, thinking they had bene the women they looked for, began to ſhout, and made great noiſe for ioy. But when the conſpirators caſt their eyes round about the hall to know thoſe which were at the table, they drew out their ſwords, and ſet vpon Archias and Philip ouerthwart the table: then they ſhewed thēſelues what they were. Then Philidas bad his gueſts he had bidden to the banket with them, that they ſhould not ſtir, for they ſhould haue no hurt: ſo ſome of thē ſate ſtil.

But the greateſt number of them wold needs from the boord, to defend their gouernors. Howbeit becauſe they were drunke that they knew not what they did, they were ſoone ſlaine with them. Now Pelopidas enterpriſe was not ſo eaſie. For they went againſt Leontidas, that was a ſober diſcreet man, and withall hardy of his hands: and they found he was gone to bed, his doores were ſhut vp, and they knocked long before any man came to the dore. At the length, one of his men that heard them rap ſo hard, with much ado came to open the dore: but he had no ſooner thruſt backe the bolt of the dore, and began to open it, but they puſhed it from them with ſuch a force vpon him all together, that they laid him on the ground, and went ſtraight to his maſters chamber. Leontidas hearing the noiſe of them that ran vp to him in ſuch haſt, preſently miſtruſted the matter: and leaping out of his bed, tooke his ſword in his hand, but did forget to put out the lampes that burned in his chamber all night; for if they had bene out, they might eaſily haue hurt one another in the darke. But the lampes giuing cleare light in the chamber, he went to the chamber doore, and gaue Cephiſodorus the firſt man that preſſed to enter vpon him, ſuch a blow with his ſword, that he dropped downe dead at his feet. Hauing ſlaine the firſt man, he dealt with the ſecond that came after him, and that was Pelopidas. The fight went hard betweene them two, both for that the chamber dore was very ſtraight, as alſo for that Cephiſodorus body lying on the ground, did choke the comming in at the chamber. Notwithſtanding, Pelopidas ouercame him in the end, and ſlue him: and went from thence with his company ſtraight to Hypates houſe, where they got in, as they did vnto Leontidas houſe before. But Hypates knew preſently what it was, and thought to ſaue himſelfe in his neighbours houſes. Howbeit the conſpirators followed him ſo hard, that they cut him off before he could recouer their houſes. Then they gathered together, and ioyned with Melons company, and ſent immediatly with all poſſible ſpeede to Athens, to the baniſhed Thebans there, and cryed through the city, liberty, liberty, arming thoſe citizens that came to them with the armor and ſpoiles of their enemies, that were hanged vp in common vaults, and armorers ſhops about Charons houſe, which they brake open, or cauſed to be opened by force. On the other ſide, Epaminondas and Gorgidas, came to ioyne with them, with a company of young men and honeſt old men well appointed, whom they had gathered together. Herupon the whole citie was ſtraight in an vprore and tumult, and euery houſe was full of lights, one running to another to know what the matter was. Neuertheleſſe the people did not yet aſſemble together, but euery one being amazed, muſing at this ſtir, not vnderſtãding the troth, ſtayed till day came on, that they might call a counſell. But truly herein, me thinks the Captaines of the garriſon of the Lacedæmonians were greatly in fault, that they did not ſtir betimes, and ſet vpon them incontinently: conſidering there were fifteene hundred ſoldiers, beſides a great number of citizens that would haue come, one after another to take their parts. But the great noiſe they heard made them afeard, and to ſee lights in euery mans houſe, and the people running vp and downe the ſtreetes in great multitudes too and fro: whereupon they ſtirred not, but only kept them within the caſtle of Cadmea. The next morning by breake of day, came the other baniſhed Thebans from Athens very well armed, and all the people of Thebes drew together in counſell. Thither did Epaminondas and Gorgidas bring Pelopidas and his conſorts, and preſented them before the people, compaſſed about with prieſts and the profeſſed of the city, offering them crownes to put vpon their heads, and they prayed the aſſembly of the citizens, that they would helpe their gods and their country. All the people that were preſent, when they ſaw them, roſe vp and ſtood on their feet, and with great ſhouts and clapping of hands receiued them, as their ſauiours, that had deliuered their country from bondage, and reſtored them againe to liberty: and therupon before them all, euen in the market place, by the whole voice and conſent of the people, they choſe Pelopidas, Melon, and Charon, gouernors and captains of Boeotia. Pelopidas then immediatly made thẽ beſiege the caſtell of Cadmea about, with trenches and force of wood, doing all he could poſſible to win it, and to expulſe the Lacedæmonians, before any ſupply or aide came to them from Sparta. So he did, and preuented it ſo ſuddenly, that the garriſon being departed out of the caſtle by compoſition, as they returned towards Lacedæmonia, they found Cleombrotus king of Sparta in the countrey of Megara, comming towards them with a great army to helpe them. Afterwards, of the three Captaines which had charge of their garriſon that lay at Thebes, the Spartans condemned two of them to death: Hermippidas and Arciſſus were preſently executed: and the third captaine, Dyſaoridas, they ſet ſo grieuous a fine on his head, that he went out of Peloponnesvs. This enterpriſe priſe being attempted, and executed with the like valiantneſſe, and the ſame danger and trouble, that Thraſybulus practiſe was, when he deliuered ATHENS from the ſlauerie of the thirty Gouernors and tyrants, and hauing the like fortune and happy end: the GRECIANS termed it coſin germain to Thraſybulus act. And indeed it were a hard matter to find two other ſuch, beſides them two, that with ſo few men ouercame their enemies, being many mo in number then them ſelues, or that with ſo ſmall helpe did ouercome thoſe that were of ſo great force, or that performed their enterpriſe with their onely valiance and wiſedome, and were cauſe beſides of ſo great bleſſing and benefite to their countrey, as Pelopidas and Thraſybulus attempt was. But the great change and alteration of the ſtate afterwards, did make their acts farre more noble and famous. For the warre that ouerthrew the maieſtie of SPARTA, and that tooke away all the ſeignorie and rule of the LACEDÆMONIANS both by ſea and by land, beganne the very ſame night, when Pelopidas himſelfe making the twelfth perſon, and entring into a priuate houſe, taking neither citie, nor caſtell, nor ſtrong hold (to tell truely by figuratiue ſpeech) did breake and cut in ſunder the linkes and chaines that linked ſtraight together, and ſtrengthened the LACEDÆMONIANS whole Empire and monarchie ouer all GREECE: who vntill that preſent time were thought ſo ſtrong, as no poſſibilitie could breake or ſunder them. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS fortuning afterwards to inuade the country of BOEOTIA with a mightie army, the ATHENIANS trembling for feare of their great power, did vtterly leaue to protect them, and renounced the league and alliance they had made before with them. And moreouer, they did ſtraightly proſecute lawe againſt thoſe, that were accuſed to take part with the BOEOTIANS: whereof ſome of them were put to death, other were baniſhed from ATHENS, and the reſt condemned in great ſummes of money. To be ſhort, euery man ſaid the THEBANS were but vndone, conſidering they had no helpe, and were beloued beſides of none. At that preſent time it fell out Pelopidas and Gorgidas were Generals ouer all BOEOTIA for that yeare, who deuiſing to throw a bone betwixt the ATHENIANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, to make them ſquare, they vſed this pollicie. There was a captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS called Sphodrias, a valiant man, but elſe of ſmall capacitie, and vainely giuen, hauing a certaine fond ambition and humour, perſwading himſelfe he had done ſome notable good ſeruice in his time. This Sphodrias was left in the citie of THESPIES, with a great band of ſouldiers, to receiue and fauour all the BOEOTIANS that had a mind to reuolt from the THEBANS. Pelopidas of himſelfe ſent a merchant, (a very friend of his) vnto Sphodrias with a great ſumme of money from him, and certaine perſwaſions withall, which preuailed more then the money, wiſhing him to attempt ſome greater matter, and to ſeeke to win the hauen of PIRÆA: a thing ſoone wonne, if he came to aſſault it on the ſodaine, and the rather, for that the ATHENIANS miſtruſt nothing, neither keepe watch nor ward there. Moreouer, that he might aſſure himſelfe, nothing could be better welcome to the lords of LACEDÆMONIA, then to make them lords of the city of ATHENS alſo. And again, that the THEBANS being at deadly fode with the ATHENIANS, for that they had betrayed and forſaken them in their need, would not aide nor ſuccour them in any reſpect. Sphodrias giuing too light eare to this vaine perſwaſion, tooke the ſouldiers he had with him, and marching away by night entred the realme of ATTICA, and went on to the city of ELEVSIN: but when he came thither, his ſouldiers were afeard, and would go no further. So his purpoſe being diſcouered, he was forced to returne backe to THESPIES, hauing raiſed ſuch a war to the LACEDÆMONIANS, as fell out to be of no ſmall importance to them, nor eaſie to be pacified. For after that time, the ATHENIANS ſought league and amity again with the THEBANS, and did aide them very louingly: and moreouer, putting themſelues to ſea, they ſailed vp and downe, procuring and drawing to their league all ſuch as were willing to rebell againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS: and the THEBANS beſides, had many pretie skirmiſhes with the LACEDÆMONIANS in the meane time, in their owne country of BOEOTIA. It is true they came to no great battels, but yet it was ſuch a great learning and continuall training of them in marſhal diſcipline, as the THEBANS ſtil increaſed in courage and valiantneſſe, and waxed ſtronger and better ſouldiers: for by thoſe skirmiſhes they grew not only expert ſoldiers, but waxed more skilfull in vſing their weapons, then before. As we reade, that Antalcidas a SPARTAN ſaid one day to king Ageſilaus, comming home ſore hurt from BOEOTIA: ſurely the THEBANS haue giuen you a worthy reward, for teaching them to be ſouldiers againſt their wils. But to ſay truly, Ageſilaus was not their maiſter to teach them to make wars, but they were the good and wiſe leaders of the THEBANS, who like good woodmē in chooſing their game, could skilfully chuſe both time and place to giue their enemies battell, & make them retire again with ſafetie, after they had bin fleſhed, giuing them a litle taſt of the fruits and commodity of victory: but among them, Pelopidas was he that deſerued moſt honour. For ſinee the firſt time they gaue him charge of men of war, they neuer failed, but choſe him continually euery yeare, either captaine of the holy band, or gouernour of BOEOTIA ſo long as he liued: ſo that Pelopidas only did the moſt things in this warre. The LACEDÆMONIANS were ouerthrowne in ſundry iournies, that they were diſtreſſed by the cities of PLATEES, and of THESPIES, where Phœbidas himſelfe (that had before taken the caſtell of CADMEA) was ſlaine among other. Another great power of theirs alſo was ouerthrown neare to the city of TANAGRA, where Panthoidas gouernor of the ſame, was alſo ſlain. Now al theſe victories, though they much encouraged the harts of the conquerors, and made them hardy: yet did they not thereby altogether conquer the minds of the vanquiſhed. For the LACEDÆMONIANS were not ouercome in any pitched field, nor ſet battell, where they had their whole army together: but they were light rodes, and skirmiſhes properly laid of purpoſe, where ſometime flying, ſomtime driuing them againe, they bickered very oft, and put them to the worſt. But the battell of TEGYRA, which was but a flouriſh and proofe to the iourny of LEVCTRES, wan Pelopidas great honour: for he had no companion to challenge any part of his glory and victory, neither did he leaue his enemies anie lawfull excuſe, to ſhadow or couer their ouerthrow. For he ſpied all occaſion he might poſſible, how to take the city of ORCHOMENE, that tooke part with the LACEDÆMONIANS, & had receiued two enſignes of footemen of theirs to keepe it. Pelopidas being aduertiſed one day, that the garriſon of ORCHOMENE was gone abroad to make a rode into the country of the LOCRIDES, hoping he ſhould find ORCHOMENE without garriſon, he marched thither with his holy band, and certaine number of horſemen. But when he drew neare the city, he had intelligence there was another garriſon comming from SPARTA to ſupply the place of the garriſon that was abrode: wherupon he returned backe againe by the city of TEGYRA, for he could haue paſſed no other way, but to haue turned downe by the foot of the mountaine. For all the valley that lay betweene both, was drowned with the ouerflowing of the riuer of MELAS, which euen from his very head carieth euer ſuch breadth with it, as it maketh the mariſhes nauigable, ſo as it is vnpaſſable for any ſhallow it hath. Not far fro theſe mariſhes, ſtandeth the temple of Apollo TEGYRIAN, where was an oracle in old time, but left off at this day, and had neuer long continuance, but only vntill the time of the wars of the MEDES, when Echecrates was maiſter and chiefe prieſt there. And ſome hold opinion, that Apollo was borne there: for they call the next mountaine to it DELOS, at the foot whereof the mariſhes of the riuer of MELAS do end, and behind the temple are two goodly ſprings, from whence commeth great abundance of good ſweet water: wherof the one of them is called to this day the Palme, and the other the Oliue. And ſome ſay alſo, that the goddeſſe Latona was not brought to bed betweene two trees, but betweene theſe two ſprings. For mount PTOVM is hard by it alſo, from whence the wild bore came of a ſodaine that flighted her. And the tale that is told of the ſerpent Pytho, and of the giant Tytius, do both confirme it, that Apollo was borne in the ſame place. I paſſe ouer many other coniectures confirming the ſame, for that we do not beleeue in our countrey that Apollo is among the number of thoſe, who from mortall men haue bene tranſlated to immortall goddes, as are Hercules and Bacchus, that through the excellencie of their vertue, did put off mortalitie, and tooke immortalitie vpon them: but we rather take him for one of thoſe that neuer had beginning nor generation, at the leaſt if thoſe things be to be credited, which ſo many graue and auncient writers haue left in writing to vs, touching ſo great and holy things. The THEBANS returning backe from ORCHOMENE, and the LACEDÆMONIANS on the other ſide returning alſo from LOCRIDE both at one time, they fortuned both armies to meete about the citie of TEGYRA. Now ſo ſoone as the THEBANS had diſcouered the LACEDÆMONIANS paſſing the ſtraight, one of them ranne ſodainely to Pelopidas, and told him: Sir, we are fallen into the hands of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Nay, are not they rather fallen into ours, aunſwered Pelopidas againe? With theſe words, he commaunded his horſemen that were in the rereward, to come before, and ſet vpon them: and himſelfe in the meane time put his footemen immediately into a pretie ſquadron cloſe together, being in all not aboue three hundred men, hoping when he ſhould come to giue charge with his battell, he ſhould make a lane through the enemies, though they were the greater number. For the LACEDÆMONIANS deuided themſelues in two companies, and euery company, as Ephorus writeth, had had fiue hundred men: and as Calliſtenes ſaid, ſeuen hundred. Polibius, and diuerſe other authours ſay, they were nine hundred men. So Theopompus and Gorgoleon, the Captaines of the LACEDÆMONIANS, luſtily marched againſt the THEBANS: and it fell out ſo, that the firſt charge was giuen, where the chiefetaines or Generals were of either ſide, with great fury on either part, ſo as both the Generals of the LACEDÆMONIANS which ſet vpon Pelopidas together, were ſlaine. They being ſlaine, and all that were about them being either hurt or killed in the field: the reſt of the army were ſo amazed, that they deuided in two, and made a lane on either ſide, for the THEBANS to paſſe through them if they would. But when they ſaw Pelopidas meant not to take the paſſage they offered him, and that he came on ſtill with his men to ſet vpon thoſe that were yet in battell ray, and ſlue all them that ſtood before him: then they turned taile, and tooke them to their legs. Howbeit the THEBANS did not chaſe them farre, fearing the ORCHOMENIANS who were not farre from them, and the new garriſon beſides, that were come from LACEDÆMON not long before. And this was the cauſe they were content that they had ouercommed them by force, and had paſſed through their army in deſpite of them, and broken and ouerthrowne them. So when he had ſet vp markes of triumph, and ſpoiled their ſlaine enemies, they returned home againe, glad men for their obtained victory. For in all the warres the LACEDÆMONIANS euer made, as well with the GRECIANS as with the barbarous people alſo, there was neuer chronicle mentioned at any time, that their enemies being ſo few, did ouercome them that were ſo many, nor that they were ouercome alſo by any number equall in battell. Whereupon they grew ſo couragious and terrible, that no man durſt once abide them: for their only fame did ſo terrifie their enemies that came to fight againſt them, that they thought with no equal force to be able to performe as much as they had done. But this battel of TEGYRA was the firſt that made both them and the other GRECIANS know, that it was not the riuer of EVROTAS alone, nor the valley that lyeth betweene the riuers of CNACION, and of BABYCE, that breedeth the valiant and hardy fighting men: but that it is in all places elſe, where they learne yong men to be aſhamed of diſhoneſt and vile things, and to venter their liues for honeſt cauſes, fearing more diſhonorable reproach, then honourable daunger. Theſe are the people moſt to be feared, and are moſt terrible alſo to their enemies. And for the holy band we mentioned before, it is ſaid Gorgidas was the firſt erector of the ſame. They were three hundred choſen men entertained by the ſtate, and they alwayes kept within the caſtle of CADMEA, and the band was called the townes band: for at that time, and ſpecially in that part of GRECE, they called the caſtles and great holds in cities, the townes. Other ſay it was a band of footemen that were in loue one with another. And therefore Pammenes pleaſant words are noted, ſaying, that Neſtor could no skill to ſet an army in battell ray, ſeeing he gaue the GRECIANS counſell, in the Iliades of Homer, that they ſhould ſet them in battell ray, euery countrey and tribe by themſelues:

that one might alwayes helpe at hand, that other to behoue.

For, ſaid he, one friend ſhould rather be ſet by another that loues together: becauſe in daunger, men commonly do litle regard their countrey men, or ſuch as are of their tribe. But men that do loue one another, can neuer be broken nor ouercome: for the paſſion of loue that entertaineth ech others affection, for affection ſake, doth keep them frō forſaking one another. And thoſe that are beloued, being aſhamed to do any vile & diſhoneſt thing before thoſe that loue them, for very loue will ſticke one by another to the death. And ſure the reaſon is good, if it be true that louers do in deed more regard them they loue, though they be abſent, then other that be preſent. As appeareth by the example of him, that being ſtriken downe to the ground, his enemy lifting vp his ſword to kill him, he prayed him he would giue him his deaths wound before, leaſt his friend that loued him, ſeeing a wound on his backe, ſhould be aſhamed of him. It is reported alſo, that Iolaus being beloued of Hercules, did helpe and accompany him in all his labours and quarrels. Whereupon Ariſtotle writeth, that vnto his time, ſuch as loued heartily together, became ſworne brethren one to another, vpon Iolaus tombe. And therefore me thinkes it is likely, that this band was firſt called the holy band, by the ſelfe ſame reaſon that Plato calleth a louer, a diuine friend by Gods appointment. It is written alſo, that this band was neuer broken, nor ouerthrowne before the battell of CHÆRONEA. After that battell, Philip taking view of the ſlaine bodies, he ſtayed in that place where the foure hundred men of that band lay all dead on the ground, one hard by another, and all of them ſlaine and thruſt through with pikes on their breaſts, whereat he wondred much: and being told him that it was the louers band, he fell a weeping for pitie, saying: Wo be to them that thinke these men did, or suffered any euill or dishonest thing. And to be short, the misfortune of Laius, that was slaine by his owne brother OEdipus, was not the first originall cause of this custome, that the THEBANS began to be in loue one with an other, as the Poets write: but they were their first law-makers, who perceiuing them to be a stout and fierce nation of nature, they sought euen from their youth to make them gentle and ciuill, and therefore in all their actions both of sport and earnest, they continually acquainted them with playing of the flute, being highly esteemed of them in those dayes. They brought in the vse also to make loue in the middest of all their youthful sports and exercises of their bodies, to frame the young mens manners, and to bring them to a ciuill life. And therefore they had reason that gaue the goddesse Harmonia to the THEBANS, for defender and patroneſſe of their citie, who was begotten (as they say) betweene Mars and Venus. For that giueth vs to vnderstand, that where force and warlike courage is ioyned with grace, to win and perswade: all things by this vnion and accord are brought to a goodly, profitable, and most perfect gouernement. Now, to returne againe to the matter of this holy band of the THEBANS. Gorgidas deuiding it in the former rankes, and placing it all alongst the front of the battell of the footemen, it did not appeare what they were able to do of themselues, for that he brought them not all into one body: so as thereby they might see what seruice the whole company could do being together, considering that it was deuided and mingled amongst many other, that were a great deale of lesse value then themselues. But Pelopidas that had made good proofe of their valiantnesse before, when they fought about him of themselues, without others by them, at TEGYRA: would neuer after deuide nor separate them one from the other, but keeping them together as one entire body that had all his members, he would alwayes begin with them to giue a charge in his most dangerous battels. For, as we see in running of coaches at games, that horses being tied all together in a front, do runne faster and stronger then they do when they are loose, and put to it alone: and not for that they being many together do breake through the aire better, but for that the contention and enuy betweene them to outrunne one another, doth indeed set their hearts and stomackes on fire. Euen so he thought, that valiant men giuing one another a desire and enuy to do well, should haue the more courage, and would be of greater force, when they fought one in anothers sight. But the LACEDÆMONIANS afterwardes being at peace and league with all the other GRECIANS, proclaimed open warres against the THEBANS onely: and king Cleombrotus went to inuade them with an army of ten thousand footemen, and a thousand horsemen. Whereupon the THEBANS were not only in the like danger they stood in before to loose their libertie, but the LACEDÆMONIANS did openly threaten they would vtterly destroy them for euer: so that all the countrey of BOEOTIA stood in greater feare then euer they did before. And one day as Pelopidas went out of his house to go to the warres, his wife bringing him of the doores to take her leaue of him, weeping, she prayed him heartily to looke well to himself. But he answered her againe: My good wife, it is for priuate souldiers to be carefull of themselues, but not for captaines: for they must haue an eye to saue others liues. And when he came to the campe, he found the Captaines and the Lieutenants of the army, in sundry opinions: and he was the first that agreed with Epaminondas opinion, who thought it best they should giue battell to the enemies. Pelopidas at that time was neither gouernour of BOEOTIA, nor Generall of the armie, but onely captaine of the holy band: notwithstanding they had great affiance in him, and gaue him great authoritie in counsell concerning their affaires: such as became a man that had made so good testimony of his naturall loue and affection to his countrey, as he had done. Now being determined in counsell that they should giue the enemie battell, they all mustred together in the valley of LEVCTRES, where he had a vision in his dreame, that troubled him very much. In that valley there are the tombes of the daughters of one Scedasus, which by reason of the place, they call the LEVCTRIDES, for that they were buried there, after they had bene defiled and rauished by certaine guests of the SPARTANS that lay in their house, trauelling that way. This act being so horrible and wicked, the poore father of these defiled virgines, could neither haue iustice nor reuenge of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and therefore after he had banned and cursed the LACEDÆMONIANS with most horrible and execrable railings and curses as might be possible, he killed himselfe vpon the graues of his daughters. The LACEDÆMONIANS had many sundry oracles, prophecies, and signes of the gods to warne them, to take heed of the wrath of the LEVCTRIDES: howbeit euery man vnderstood vnderstood not the signification of this prophecy, but were deceiued by the equiuocation of the name. For there was a litle towne in the country of LACONIA, standing vpon the sea side, called LEVCTRVM: and in ARCADIA also by the city of MEGALIPOLIS, there was another towne called by the same name. This misfortune chaunced long before the battell of LEVCTRES: but then Pelopidas dreaming in his tent, thought he saw in a vision the daughters of Scedasus weeping about their graues, and cursing the LACEDÆMONIANS: and that he saw their father also, commanding him to sacrifice a red maiden to his daughters, if they would obtaine the victory. This commaundement at the first, seemed very cruell and wicked: whereupon when he rose, he went to the Prognosticators and Generals of the army, and told them his dreame. So, some of them sayd, this was no matter to be lightly passed ouer, but to be considered of, alleaging many examples in the like cases. As of Menecius the sonne of Creon in old time, and of Macaria the daughter of Hercules. And yet of latter memory, the wise Pherecydes, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS slue, and whose skinne their Kings do keepe at this day, by commaundement of an oracle. And Leonidas, who following a prophecy of the gods, did as it were sacrifice himselfe, for the safety of GRECE. And furthermore, the young boyes which Themistocles did sacrifice to Bacchus Omestes (to say, eating raw flesh) before the battell of SALAMINA. And all these sacrifices were acceptable to the gods, as the victories following did plainely shew. In contrary maner also King Agesilaus, comming from those very places, from whence king Agamemnon came in the time of the warres of TROIA, and going also against the same enemies, dreamed one night in the city of AVLIDE, he saw the goddesse Diana, asking him his daughter for sacrifice. But he tenderly louing her, would by no meanes performe it: and thereupon was compelled to breake off his iourney before he had executed his enterprise, and departed with small honor. Other to the contrary stood to it stoutly, and said, it was not to be done. For, so cruell, abhominable, anst brutish a sacrifice, could not be acceptable to any of the gods, nor to any god, better or mightier then ours: considering that they be no impressions in the ayre, nor giants that rule the world, but the one onely mighty and eternall God, Father of gods and men. And to beleeue that either gods or demi-gods do delight in murther, or shedding of mans bloud, it is a meere mockery and folly. But admit it were so, they were no more to be regarded therein, then those that haue no power at all: for it is a manifest token of a wicked spirit, when they haue such damnable and horrible desires in them, and specially if they abide still with them. Now the Generals and heads of the army of the THEBANS being of sundry opinions, and Pelopidas being more afraid then before, by reason of their disagreement: a yong mare colt, or filly, breaking by chance from other mares, running and flinging through the campe, came to stay right against them. Then euery man began to looke vpon her, and to marke what a faire filly it was, and red coloured euery where, and what a pride she tooke with her selfe to heare her owne neighing. Theocritus then the soothsayer being amongst them, did behold her, and knew straight what the filly meant, and so cried out forthwith: O happy Pelopidas, loe here is the sacrifice thou lookest for, seeke no other virgine for thy sacrifice, but take this that God himselfe doth send thee. When Theocritus had said so, they tooke the filly, and laid her vpon the tombe of Scedasus daughters, and put garlands of flowers about her, as they handled other sacrifices: and then after their prayers made to the gods, they did sacrifice her with great ioy, and told Pelopidas vision in his dreame the night before through all the camp, and the sacrifice they had made also according to the signification thereof. Moreouer, when they came to ioyne battel, Epaminondas being General, drew all his army on the left hand, because he would bring the right wing of the enemies army (where they had placed the naturall SPARTANS) further from the other GRECIANS their friends and allies, that were set in the other wing of their battell: that he comming with his whole power together to giue a charge vpon Cleombrotus their King (being in a corner by himselfe) might be distressed or ouerthrowne. The enemies finding Pelopidas intent, began to chaunge their order, and hauing men enough, meant to thrust out their right wing at length to compasse in Epaminondas. But Pelopidas in the meane time sodainly preuented them, and running with great fury with his squadron of three hundred men, he set vpon Cleombrotus before he could disorder his men to put forth the right wing, and ioyne them together againe. And so he found the LACEDÆMONIANS not yet setled in their rankes, and brake them in this disorder, thrusting one in anothers place to put themselues againe in order: notwithstanding the LACEDÆMONIANS of all other men were the onely captaines and most expert souldiers in marshall discipline, as men so trained and practised, that no

ſodaine altering, of forme or order in their rankes, could either trouble or diſorder them. For they were men ſo trained, that they could turne head or ſide vpon any ſodaine occaſion offered, and could fight and order themſelues in battell euery way alike. So Epaminondas going to giue the onſet vpon them alone, with the whole force of his battell together, not tarying for others: and Pelopidas alſo with an incredible courage and readineſſe, preſenting himſelfe in battell before them, did put them into ſuch a terrible feare, that they cleane forgot their skill in fighting, and their wonted courage failed them. For they cowardly turned their backes, and there were moe LACEDÆMONIANS ſlaine at that day, then euer were before in any former battell. Pelopidas therefore, being neither gouernour of BOEOTIA, nor Generall of all the army, but onely captaine of the holy band: did notwithſtanding win as much honour and glory of this victory, as Epaminondas, that was gouernour of BOEOTIA, and Generall of all the army. Indeed afterwards they were both gouernours of BOEOTIA together, when they inuaded the countrey of PELOPONNESVS: where they made moſt part of the cities and people rebell againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, and take their part. As the ELIANS, the ARGIVES, and all ARCADIA, and the beſt part of LACONIA ſelfe, notwithſtanding it was in the heart of winter, and in the ſhorteſt dayes of the yeare, and towards the latter end alſo of the laſt moneth of their yeares authoritie and rule, hauing not many dayes to continue in office, being forced to leaue their authoritie, vpon paine of death if they did refuſe, vnto other officers new choſen, the beginning of the next moneth following. Whereupon their other companions, and gouernours alſo of the country of BOEOTIA, what for feare to incurre the daunger of the law, as alſo to auoide the trouble to lie in campe in the ſharpeſt of winter: they did vrge and perſwade them to bring the armie backe againe into their countrey. But Pelopidas was the firſt that yeelded to Epaminondas opinion, and wanne the other THEBANS alſo to conſent vnto it, to be contented to be led by them, to giue aſſault to the citie ſelfe of SPARTA. So, through their perſwaſion they paſſed ouer the riuer of EVROTAS, and took many litle townes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and waſted and deſtroyed all the countrey to the ſea ſide, leading vnder their enſignes an army of three ſcore and ten thouſand fighting men, and all GRECIANS, the THEBANS not making vp the twelfth part of them. Now, the honour and great reputation of theſe two perſons, Epaminondas and Pelopidas, brought their friends and confederates, that they followed them, without any reſolution of counſell or publicke order, and neuer opened their mouthes againſt them, but willingly marched vnder their conduction. And in my opinion, truly me thinkes it is the firſt and chiefeſt point in the law of nature, that he that is weake, not able to defend himſelfe, ſhould leane to one that is ſtrong, and able to defend both. Euen much like to freſh-water ſouldiers, and raw ſea-men, that lying at ſea in calme weather, and in ſafe harbour, are as luſtie and bragge with the maiſters and boate-ſwaines as may be: but let a litle ſtorme of weather come vpon them ſodainely, and that they be in any daunger, then they looke on the maiſters, hoping for no life but at their hands. And euen in like manner the ELIANS and ARGIVES, who though in all aſſemblies of counſell they would euer iarre and ſtriue with the THEBANS, for honour and ſuperioritie in the armie: yet when any battell came to be fought, wherein they ſaw there was daunger, then their peacockes brauerie was gone, and they were glad to obey their Generals commaundement. In this iourney they brought all the cities of the prouince of ARCADIA to be in league with them, and tooke all the countrey of MESSENIA from the LACEDÆMONIANS, which they peaceably enioyed: and called home againe all the auncient inhabitants of the ſame, and reſtored them to their countrey, and repleniſhed the citie of ITHOME. Then returning afterwardes into their countrey by the citie of CENCHREES, they ouerthrew the ATHENIANS that came to trouble them, in entring into the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, ſuppoſing to haue ſtopped their paſſage. Thus was the valiantneſſe of theſe two worthie men greatly commended and honoured of euery bodie, for ſo many notable exploites and victories as they had wonne, and their maruellous good ſucceſſe, greatly wondred at. But as their glorie and renowne increaſed abroade, ſo did their countrey mens malice and enuie increaſe againſt them at home: who had prepared ſuch a welcome home for them, as was too bad and vile for ſo honourable ſeruice as they had done. For Epaminondas and Pelopidas both at their returne, were accuſed of treaſon. For there was a ſpeciall law at THEBES, that commaunded all ſuch as ſhould happen to be gouernours of BOEOTIA, to reſigne their office immediatly to the new officers elect, at the beginning of the firſt moneth of the yeare, which in BOEOTIA they call BOVCATION: and they had kept it foure whole moneths moneths aboue their tearme appointed, in which time they had done all that we haue ſpoken of before, as well in the prouince of MESSENIA and of ARCADIA, as alſo in the countrey of LACONIA. Pelopidas was the firſt of the two that was called in by proceſſe, therefore he ſtood in the greater daunger: howbeit in the end, they were both diſcharged againe. As for Epaminondas, he tooke his accuſation and the attempt of his enemies (whereby they ſought to haue caſt them both away) quietly enough: iudging, that patience to thoſe that deale in ſtate and gouernement, is a great ſhew of force and magnanimitie. But Pelopidas being of a hotter nature, and more cholericke, and ſet on beſides by ſome of his friends, did take this occaſion to be reuenged. Meneclidas the orator was one of thoſe that came into Charons houſe with Pelopidas and Melon, but notwithſtanding the THEBANS did nothing honour him, as they did the reſt. He taking this ill at their hands, being maruellous eloquent of ſpeech, but viciouſly giuen otherwayes, and a man of a vile and miſchieuous nature: did fondly abuſe his eloquence, falſly accuſing thoſe that were his betters, in honeſty and credite. And not being contented with this firſt accuſation, he practiſed ſo commonly, that he put Epaminondas one yeare from being gouernour of BOEOTIA, which he ſued for: and moreouer, he was euer againſt him in all matters of ſtate he tooke in hand. But he could neuer bring Pelopidas out of fauour with the people: and therefore he ſought to make bate betwixt him and Charon. For it is the common tricke of all ſpitefull perſons, who when they cannot be thought ſo honeſt men as thoſe whom they enuy: to go about to prooue that they are not ſo honeſt and meete men, as thoſe whom they preferre and commend. So, in all his orations he made to the people, he continually extolled and commended Charons noble acts and victories, and ſpecially that victory aboue other, which the THEBANS wonne before the iourney of LEVCTRES, in a skirmiſh of horſemen, that was before the city of PLATEES, he hauing charge of the ſame: of the which he would leaue this memory. Androcides a CYZICENIAN and painter, was at a price with the THEBANS to paint them ſome other battell in a table, and he did draw this worke in the city ſelfe of THEBES: but as he was in hand withall, the rebellion of the THEBANS fell out againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, and warre followed on the necke of that, whereupon the painter forſooke THEBES, leauing his worke in a manner done and perfect. The THEBANS kept this table by them, and this Meneclidas moued the people they would hang it vp in ſome temple or publicke place with an inſcription vpon it, ſaying thus: This was Charons victory: of purpoſe to deface and obſcure the glorie of Pelopidas and of Epaminondas. Too vaine and fond was his ambition, to ſet before ſo many noble battels and victories, one ſimple ouerthrow of Charon; in the which Gerandas, one of the meaneſt gentlemen of all SPARTA was ſlaine, and forty other with him: and this was all he did. Pelopidas miſliked Meneclidas motion, maintaining that it was directly againſt the lawes of THEBES, which did expreſly forbid that no priuate perſon ſhould be honoured with the title of common victorie, but willed the glory thereof ſhould be attributed to all the people generally. Indeed Pelopidas in his orations did greatly praiſe and commend Charon, notwithſtanding he made open proofe, how Meneclidas was an ennious and ſpitefull detractour, and a naughtie wicked man, oftentimes asking the THEBANS, if they themſelues were worthy of no honour? ſo as in the end he cauſed Meneclidas to be condemned in a great ſumme of money. But he finding himſelfe vnable to pay it, being ſo great a ſumme, practiſed afterwards to alter the whole ſtate and gouernement. I thought good to dilate this at large, becauſe me thinkes it doth ſomewhat declare Pelopidas nature and maners, what they were. Now about that time Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, was at open warres with many people of THESSALY, and did vſe all policie he could, to bring them all to his obedience. Whereupon the free cities ſent their Ambaſſadours vnto THEBES, to pray them to ſend them a captaine with an army to aide them. Then Pelopidas ſeeing Epaminondas occupied about the warres of PELOPONNESVS, did offer himſelfe to the THESSALIAN Ambaſſadours, being loth to drowne his experience and ſufficiencie in warres, with vnprofitable and tedious idleneſſe, knowing that in thoſe parts where Epaminondas lay, there needed no other captaine. Now when he came with his army into THESSALY, the citie of LARISSA yeelded preſently vnto him: where the tyrant Alexander came to meete with him, and to pray him to treate a peace betwixt him and the THESSALIANS. Pelopidas attempted to bring it to paſſe, ſecking in ſtead of a tyrant to make him a gentle, iuſt, and lawfull gouernour of THESSALY. But when he ſaw no perſwaſions could take place with the tyrant, and that he grew more ſtubborne and vntractable, and would not heare reaſon: and more-ouer, that he heard many grieuous complaints of his great cruelties, and how they accused him to be a maruellous dissolute and vnruly person in all his doings, and extreamely couetous besides: then he began to speake roundly to him, and to handle him roughly. But the tyrant thereupon stole away secretly from him, and fled with his guard and souldiers about him. So Pelopidas leauing the THESSALIANS out of all feare and daunger of the tyrant, and furthermore in good peace and amitie one with the other, he went into MACEDON: where Ptolomie made warre at that time with Alexander, being king of MACEDON, they both hauing sent for him to heare and determine the quarrell betwixt them, and also to help him that had the right, against him that did the wrong. So when he came thither, he pacified them both, and restored the banished men of either side, to their lands and goods againe. For assurance of peace, he tooke the kings brother in hostage, whose name was Philip, and thirty other children of the noblest mens sonnes of MACEDON, whom he brought away with him to THEBES, to let the GRECIANS see, that the reputation of the THEBANS power stretched farre, and the renowne also of their maner of gouernement and iustice. It is the same Philip, that made warre afterwards with the GRECIANS, to take their libertie from them: howbeit being but a boy at that time, he was brought vp at THEBES in Pammenes house. And this is the cause, why some thought Philip did follow Epaminondas maner: and it might be peraduenture, he did learne of him to be quicke and ready in the warres, which indeed was but a peece of Epaminondas vertue. But as to the continencie, iustice, magnamitie, and clemencie, which were the speciall points that made Epaminondas of great fame: Philip could neither by nature, education, or study euer attaine vnto. The THESSALIANS hauing sent afterwards to THEBES, to complaine of Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, that did againe molest and trouble the free cities of THESSALY: Pelopidas was sent thither Ambassador with Ismenias, carying no power with him from THEBES, litle thinking he should haue needed to haue made warre: whereupon he was compelled to take men of the country self, vpon the instant necessitie offered. At the very same time also, all MACEDON was vp in armes: for Ptolomy had slain the King, and vsurped the kingdome, and the seruants and friends of the dead king called vpon Pelopidas for aid, who desiring to come euen vpon the fact, and hauing brought no men of warre out of his owne countrey with him, did presently leauy certaine men where he was, and so marched forward with them against Ptolomy. Now Ptolomy when both their powers met, did corrupt the souldiers Pelopidas had brought with money, to take his part. But notwithstanding this pollicie he had practised, yet he was afraid of the name onely, and greatnesse of Pelopidas reputation: wherefore he went vnto Pelopidas, as to a better man then himselfe, and making maruellous much of him, and intreating of him, he made promise, and bound it by oath, that he would keepe the Realme for the brethren of the dead King, and that he would take all those for his friends or enemies, whom the THEBANS did either loue or hate. And for assurance of his promise, he gaue him his son Philoxenus in hostage, and fiftie other of his friends, all the which Pelopidas sent vnto THEBES. But in the meane time, being maruellously offended with the treason of the souldiers against him, vnderstanding the most part of their goods, their wiues and children, were in the city of PHARSALE, he thought if he could win that, it were a maruellous good way for him to be reuenged of the treachery of the souldiers against him: whereupon he leauied certaine THESSALIANS, and went to that citie. Pelopidas was no sooner come thither, but Alexander the tyrant arriued also with his army. Pelopidas supposing he had come to iustifie himselfe, clearing the complaints of the THESSALIANS made against him: went to him, though he knew him to be a very wicked man, and one that delighted in murther and shedding of bloud. Neuertheless, he hoped he durst not haue attempted any thing against him, for the authority and seigniories sake of THEBES, by whom he was sent thither, as also for his owne reputation. But the tyrant seeing him slenderly accompanied, and without traine of souldiers: tooke him prisoner, and wan the city of PHARSALE at that present time. But this act of his put his subiects in a great feare, who seeing him commit so shamefull a deed against all equity, did thinke straight he meant to spare no man, but would vse men, and all things else that came in his hands, like a desperate man, and one that reckoned himselfe cast away. But when the THEBANS vnderstood this newes, they were maruellous sory, and straight sent an army thither, appointing other captaines then Epaminondas, because then they had some misliking of him. Alexander the tyrant hauing brought Pelopidas in the meane time to PHERES, did suffer any man that would at the first to come and see him, and speake with him: supposing his imprisonment had killed his heart, & had made him very humble.

But

But when he was told the contrary, how Pelopidas did comfort the citizens of PHERES, and willed them to be of good cheare, telling them the hower was now come that the tyrant ſhould ſmart for all the miſchiefes he had done: and that he ſent him word to his face, he had no reaſon to hang and put his poore citizens daily to death as he did, with ſundry kinds of cruell torments, who had in nothing offended him, and did let him alone, knowing that if euer he got out of his hands, he would be reuenged of him. The tyrant wondring at this great ſtomacke of his, and at his maruellous conſtancie fearing nothing: asked what he meant to long for haſtie death? Pelopidas being told what he ſaid, anſwered him againe: Marry, ſaid he, becauſe thou ſhouldeſt dye the ſooner, being more odious to the gods and men, then yet thou art. After this anſwer, the tyrant would neuer ſuffer any man to come and ſpeake with him againe. But Thebe, that was the daughter of the tyrant Iaſon deceaſed, and wife at that time of Alexander the tyraunt, hearing report of Pelopidas noble mind and courage by his keepers: ſhe had a maruellous deſire to ſee him, and to ſpeake with him. But when ſhe came to ſee him, like a woman ſhe could not at the firſt diſcerne the greatneſſe of his noble heart, and excellent hidden vertue, finding him in ſuch miſerie: yet coniecturing by exteriour ſhew, noting his ſimple apparell, his haires and beard growne very long, and how poorely he was ſerued, and worſe entertained: ſhe thought with her ſelfe his caſe was to be pitied, and that he was in no ſtate meete for the glory of his name, wherewith ſhe fell a weeping for compaſſion. Pelopidas that knew not what ſhe was, beganne to muſe at the firſt: but when it was told him ſhe was Iaſons daughter, then he courteouſly ſaluted her for her father Iaſons ſake, who while he liued was his very good friend. So Thebe ſaid vnto him: my Lord Pelopidas, I pitie thy poore ladie and wife. Truly ſo do I pitie thee, quoth Pelopidas againe to her: that thou being no priſoner, canſt abide ſuch a wicked Alexander. This anſwer tickled Thebe at the heart, who with great impatience did beare the crueltie, violence, and villanie of the tyrant her husband: that beſides all other infamous actes of his deteſtable life, committed Sodomie with her youngeſt brother. So ſhe oft viſiting Pelopidas, and boldly making her mone to him, telling him cloſely all the iniuries her husband offred her: through Pelopidas talke with her, by litle and litle ſhe grew to abhorre him, and to conceiue a hate in heart againſt him, deſiring reuenge on him. But now the captains of the THEBANS that were ſent to deliuer Pelopidas, being entred into THESSALY with their army: (whether it was through default of ignorance, or their miſhappe) they returned home with ſhame, and did nothing. Whereupon the THEBANS at their returne home condemned them euery man in the ſumme of ten thouſand Drachmes, and ſent Epaminondas thither againe with another armie: at whoſe comming, all THESSALY roſe incontinently, for the reputation of ſo great a captaine. And his fortune was ſo good, that he had in a manner vtterly ouerthrowne all the whole ſtate of the tyrant: his friends and captaines were ſo much afraid, and his ſubiects on the other ſide ſo well diſpoſed to rebell, and maruellous glad for the hope they had, quickely to ſee the tyrant haue his deſerued hire, for all his former wicked deedes he had committed. Notwithſtanding, Epaminondas preferring the deliuerie and ſafetie of Pelopidas, before the conſideration of his owne honour and glory, and fearing leſt Alexander ſeeing himſelfe in daunger to be turned out of all he had, falling into diſpaire like a bedlem beaſt, would bend all his deſperation and furie againſt Pelopidas: he drew theſe warres out in length, compaſſing him round about, but not fiercely ſetting vpon him with colour to prepare his way the better by delaying ſtill, thereby to ſoften the cruell mind of this tyrant, going on in this gentle ſort, and partly to cut his combe and extreame pride, but ſpecially to preſerue Pelopidas from the daunger and crueltie of his beaſtly rage. For he knew right well he was a cruell man, and one that neither regarded reaſon, nor iuſtice in any ſort, conſidering how he made ſome men to be buried aliue, and others to be put in the skinnes of beares and wild bores, and then to ſet hounds vpon them to teare them in peeces, or elſe himſelfe for his paſtime would kill them, with ſhooting or throwing of dartes at them. And in the cities of MELIBEA and of SCOTVSA, both of them being in league and friendſhip with him, he ſpying a time one day when the citizens were aſſembled in counſell together, ſodainely compaſſed them in with his guard and ſouldiers, and put them euery one to the ſword, euen to the litle children. And he conſecrated the dart alſo wherewith he had ſlaine his owne vnkle Polyphron, and hauing put garlands vpon it, he did ſacrifice to it, as to a god, and called it Tychon, as one would ſay, happie killer. And another time being in a Theater, where the Tragedie of Troades of Eurypides was played, he went out of the Theater, and ſent word to the players notwithſtanding, that they ſhould go on with their play, as if he had bene ſtill among them: ſaying that he came not away for any miſliking he had of them or of the play, but becauſe he was aſhamed his people ſhould ſee him weepe, to ſee the miſeries of Hecuba and Andromacha played, and that they neuer ſaw him pitie the death of any one man, of ſo many of his citizens as he had cauſed to be ſlaine. The guilty conſcience therefore of this cruell and heathen tyrant, did make him tremble at the onely name and reputation of Epaminondas: and as the common prouerbe ſaith:

which doth refuſe the pit prepar'de, and liſt not bide the ſhocke.

So he ſent ſtraight vnto Epaminondas to excuſe himſelfe. But Epaminondas would in no wiſe ſuffer the THEBANS, through his meanes, to make league with ſuch an helhound: onely he yeelded to abſtinence of armes for thirtie daies, vpon deliuery of Pelopidas and Iſmenias into his hands, with whom he ſtraight returned vnto THEBES. Now the THEBANS being aduertiſed that the LACEDÆMONIANS and the ATHENIANS, did ſend Ambaſſadours to Artaxerxes the mighty king of PERSIA, to make league with him: they ſent to him Pelopidas for them alſo, being wiſely conſidered of them to ſend a man of ſuch fame and reputation. For Pelopidas paſſing firſt through countries ſubiect to the king of PERSIA, his fame was ſuch where he came, that the peoples talke was onely of him. For the report of the famous battels he had won of the LACEDÆMONIANS, was not onely caried into the next regions and countries of ASIA: but ſince the firſt newes of the iourney of LEVCTRES was brought thither, Pelopidas hauing after that, wonne victorie vpon victorie, his eſtimation grew ſo great, as it was blowne abroad through the world, euen to the higheſt and furtheſt parts of the Eaſt countries. And when he came to the king of PERSIAES court, the Princes, great Lords, and Captaines of PERSIA that ſaw him, had him in great admiration, ſaying: Lo this is he that conquered the LACEDÆMONIANS, and tooke all their ſeignorie and authoritie from them, both by ſea and by land, and draue the SPARTANS beyond the riuer of EVROTAS, and from mount TAVGETVM, who not long before made warres with the great king of PERSIA, being ledde vnder their king Ageſilaus, euen in the middeſt of ASIA, for the realmes of SVSE, and of ECBATANE. So king Artaxerxes ſelfe was very glad of his comming, and praiſed him aboue them all, and made his eſtimation greater then it was before, by his great and honourable entertaining of him, meaning thereby to returne the honour to himſelfe againe: becauſe men ſhould thinke that the moſt famous men of the world came to honour him, and to ſee his Court, as eſteeming both him and his greatneſſe, the onely happineſſe of the world. But when he had ſeene his face, and heard him ſpeake, and perceiued that his words were much grauer then the ATHENIANS, and plainer then the LACEDÆMONIANS: he then was further in loue with him then before, and without diſguiſing, he did honour and fauor him aboue all the other Ambaſſadours, who found that he made more eſtimation of him, then of them all. Notwithſtanding, he ſeemed to beare greater goodwill vnto Antalcidas LACEDÆMONIAN, then to any other of the GRECIANS: for that one day being at the table, he tooke a garland of flowers from his owne head, and waſhed it in perfuming water, and ſent it vnto him. Indeed he did not vſe Pelopidas with that open familiaritie, yet did he ſend him the goodlieſt and richeſt preſents he could deuiſe, and graunted him beſides all his requeſts he made vnto him: which were, that all the people of GRECE ſhould be free: that the city and countrey of MESSINA ſhould be inhabited againe: and that the citizens of THEBES by their ſucceſſours ſhould be taken, as auncient friends and allies of the kings of PERSIA. So when he had receiued theſe anſwers, he returned home againe, and would by no meanes accept any of the great preſents the king had offered him: which cauſed the other ambaſſadours of the GRECIANS to be ſo ill welcome home to their cities. For among other, Timagoras was accuſed to the ATHENIANS, and condemned to dye, and was executed: which if they did in reſpect of the great preſents he had taken of the king, truly they had reaſon, and it was worthily done of them. For he tooke not only gold and ſiluer enough, as much as they would giue him: but receiued a very rich bed alſo, and PERSIAN chamberlaines to make and dreſſe it vp, as if no GRECIAN ſeruants of his could haue ſerued that turne. Moreouer, he receiued foureſcore milch kine to the paile, and neateheardes to keepe them, hauing neede of cowes milke belike, to heale a diſeaſe that fell vpon him: and wold needs be caried in a litter vpon mens armes from the Kings Court, vnto the Mediterranian ſea, the king rewarding them for their paines that caried him, with foure talents. Yet it ſeemeth the gifts he tooke did not offend the ATHENIANS ſo much, conſidering that Epicrates (a drudge or

The people laughed to heare him, but yet were they very angry the THEBANS had obtained all that they had demaunded: not considering that Pelopidas estimation and worthinesse did more preuaile, and take better effect, then all the orations the other could make, and specially to a Prince that sought alwaies to entertaine those GRECIANS, which were of greatest force and power in the warres. This Ambassage did greatly increase euery mans loue and goodwill vnto Pelopidas, because of the replenishing againe of MESSINA with inhabitants, and infranchising and setting at liberty of all the other GRECIANS. But the tyrant Alexander of PHERES, returning againe to his old accustomed crueltie, and hauing destoyed many cities of THESSALY, and placed his garrisons through all the country of the PHTHIOTES, ACHAIANS, and MAGNESIANS: the cities being aduertised of Pelopidas returne againe to THEBES, they sent ambassadours immediatly to THEBES, to pray them to send them an army, and namely Pelopidas for captaine, to deliuer them from the miserable bondage of the tyrant. The THEBANS willingly graunted them, and put all things in readinesse very sodainely. But Pelopidas being ready to set forward in his iourney, there fell a sodaine eclypse of the Sunne, so as at noone day it was very darke in THEBES. Pelopidas seeing euery man afraid of this eclypse aboue, he would not compell the people to depart with this feare, nor with so ill hope to hazard the losse of seuen thousand THEBANS, being all billed to go this iourney: but notwithstanding, he put himselfe alone into the THESSALIANS hands, with three hundred horsemen of straungers that were glad to serue with him, with whom he took his iourny against the soothsayers minds, & against the goodwill of all his citizens, who thought this eclypse did threaten the death of some great person like himselfe. But Pelopidas though he needed no spurre to be reuenged vpon the tyrant Alexander, being by nature hote, and desirous of himselfe to reuenge the spite and villanie he had offered him: yet he had a further hope to find the tyrants house deuided against himselfe, by the former talke he had with his wife Thebe, in time of his imprisonment there. Neuertheless, the fame and reputation of the iourney vndertaken, did wonderfully increase his noble courage, and the rather because he was desirous (all he could) the GRECIANS should see, that at the very same time when the LACEDÆMONIANS did send gouernors and captaines to Dionysius the tyrant of SICILE, to serue and aide him, and that the ATHENIANS as hirelings tooke pay of the tyrant Alexander of PHERES, in whose honour they had set vp a statue of brasse in their city, as vnto their sauiour: the THEBANS onely at the selfe same time tooke armes against them, to deliuer those whom the tyrants oppressed, and sought to root out all tyrannicall gouernment ouer the GRECIANS. So when he came to the city of PHARSALE, and had gathered his armie together, he went presently into the field to meet with the tyrant. Alexander perceiuing Pelopidas had very few THEBANS about him, and that he had twise as many mo THESSALIANS with him, then the other had: he went vnto the temple of THETIS, to meet with Pelopidas. There one telling Pelopidas, that Alexander was comming against him with a great power, Pelopidas aunswered him straight, all the better, we shall kill the more. Now in the midst of the valley, there are certaine round hils of a good pretie height, which they commonly call the dogs heads: they both striued which of their footmen should first get those hils. Pelopidas hauing a great number of horsemen, and good men at armes in the field, sent them before to giue charge vpon the enemies, that pressed to winne the vantage of the place: and hauing ouerthrowne them, they followed the chase all the valley ouer. But in the meane time, Alexander hauing his footmen by, marched forwards and got the hils, because the THESSALIANS that were further off came too late: notwithstanding when they came to the hils, they sought forcibly to clime them vp, being very high and steepe: but Alexander comming downe the hill, gaue charge vpon them to their disaduantage, and slue the first that gaue the attempt to get vp against the hill: and the residue being sore hurt, retired againe without their purpose. Pelopidas seeing that, sounded the retraite for the horsemen that followed the chase, to repaire to the standard, and commanded them they should set vpon the footmen of the enemies that were in battell ray: and he himselfe ran to helpe those that fought to win the hilles. So he tooke his target on his arme, and passing through the rereward, he got to the foremost ranckes: to whom, the sight of his person did so redouble their force and courage,

The eclypse of the Sun made the Thebans afraid.

Battell giuen by the temple of Thetis, vnto the tyrant Alexander.

that the enemies themselues thought it had bene a fresh supply of new mens harts and other bodies then theirs with whom they had fought before, that came thus lustily to set againe vpon them. And yet they did abide two or three onsets. Howbeit in the end, perceiuing those men did still more fiercely force to get vp the hill, and moreouer how their horsemen were come in from the chase: they gaue way, and left them the place, retyring backe by litle and litle. Then Pelopidas hauing won the hils, stayed on the top of them, viewing the armie of his enemies, which were not yet returned from their flying, but waued vp and downe in great disorder. And there he looked all about, to see if he could spie out Alexander: and at the length he found him out amongest others, in the right wing of his battell, setting his men againe in order and incouraging of them. After he had set eye on him, it was no holding of him backe, his heart so rose against him vpon sight of him, that giuing place to wrath, he neither regarded his person, nor the intent of his iourney, but running farre before his men, he cryed with a loud voice to the tyrant, and chalenged the combate of him. The tyrant would not abide him, nor come out to fight with him, but fled, and hid himselfe amongst his souldiers. But for his souldiers, the first that thought to set vpon Pelopidas, were slaine by him, and many left dead in the field. The residue standing stourly to it, and close together, did passe his curaces through with their long pikes, and thrust him into the brest. The THESSALIANS seeing him thus sore handled and distressed, for pitie sake came running from the toppe of those hilles, to the place where Pelopidas was, to helpe him. But euen as they came, he fell downe dead before them. Then did they together with their horsmen so fiercely set vpon them, that they made the whole battell of the enemies to flie: and following them in chase a great way from that place, they couered the valley with dead bodies, for they slue aboue three thousand men. It is no maruell, if the THEBANS that were at Pelopidas death, tooke it very heauily, and lamented bitterly: calling him their father, their sauiour, and maister, as one that had taught them the worthiest things that might be learned of any. But the THESSALIANS, and other friends and confederates also of the citie of THEBES, besides their exceeding in setting out their common proclamations and edicts in praise of his memory, and doing him all the honour that could be due to the most rare and excellent person that euer was: they did yet more shew their loue and affection towards him, by their passing great sorow and mourning they made for him. For it is said, that they that were at the battell, did not put off their armour, nor vnbridle their horses, nor would dresse their wounds, hearing tell of his death, before they went first and saw his body not yet cold with fighting, laying great heapes of the enemies spoils about it, as if he could haue told what they had done, nor before they had clipped off their own haires, and the haire of their horses, in token of sorow. And many of them also, when they were come into their tents and pauilions, would neither haue fire, eate, nor drinke: and all in the camp were full of sorow and mourning, as if they had not won a notable victorie, but had bene ouerthrown and made subiect by the tyrant. Afterwards when the newes of his death was spread through all the country, the Magistrates of euery citie through which Pelopidas bodie was conueyed, went to receiue it very honorably, accompanied with all the young men, the Priestes and children carying tokens and crownes of triumph, and other ornaments of gold, and when his funerall day was come, and that his bodie should be caried to be buried, the oldest and the noblest persons of the THESSALIANS went vnto the THEBANS, and prayed them that they might haue the burying of him: and one among them being the mouth of the rest, spake in this manner to the THEBANS. My Lords of THEBES, our good beloued friends and confederates, we only craue this good turne at your hands, wherein you shall much honour vs, and in our great calamitie somwhat also comfort vs. For we shall neuer more accompany Pelopidas aliue, nor requite his honorable deserts to vs, that he shall euer know them. But if it please you to let vs handle his body with our hands, and that we may bury him, and set foorth his obsequies, we will imagine then at the least that you do think that, which we our selues do certainly beleeue: that we THESSALIANS, not you THEBANS, haue receiued the greater losse of both. For you haue lost indeed a worthy Captaine, and we haue not onely receiued the like losse with you, but the hope also of recouering of our libertie. For how dare we againe send to you for another Captaine, when we cannot redeliuer you Pelopidas? The THEBANS hearing their petition, graunted their desire: and in mine opinion, no funerals could be done with greater pompe and honour, then the THESSALIANS performed his, being men that recken not dignitie, magnificence and pomp, to consist in ornaments of Iuorie, nor of purple: as Philistus doth set it out, who praiseth

to the moone the burying of Dionyſius the tyrant of SYRACVSA, which was the end of his tyrannie, as a ſumptuous concluſion of a ſtately tragedie. And Alexander the Great, at the death of Epheſtion, did not onely clippe his horſe haires and mules, but plucked downe alſo the battelments of the walles of the citie: becauſe it ſhould appeare, that the very walles themſelues did mourne for his death, ſhewing that deformitie in ſtead of their former beauty. But al ſuch things are done onely by force and compulſion, vpon the Lords commandements, which do but raiſe vp enuy againſt their memory for whom they are done, and hatred of them that are againſt their wils conſtrained to do the thing they miſliked: and are no iuſt proofes of honour nor goodwill, but rather vaine ſhewes of barbarous pompe, and pride in him, that diſpoſeth his authoritie and plentie of goods, in trifling toyes not to be deſired. Where contrariwiſe it plainely appeareth, that a priuate man dying in a forraine countrey, by reaſon ſhould be accounted moſt happy of all other creatures, that hauing neither his wife, kinne, nor his children by him, he ſhould be conueyed to his funerals, accompanied with ſuch multitudes of crowned people and number of cities, enuying one another, who ſhould moſt honour the funerals, as being vnrequeſted, and leaſt of all compelled. For ſaith Eſope, the death of a happy man is not grieuous, but moſt bleſſed, ſeeing it bringeth all good mens doings to happineſſe, and leaueth fortune to her fickle change, and ſporting pleaſure. But in my iudgement a LACEDÆMONIAN ſpake better, when he ſaid to Diagoras an old man, that had himſelfe in old time gotten victory in the games Olympicall, and had ſeene beſides his own children, and his childrens children (both ſonnes and daughters) crowned with victories alſo in the ſelfe ſame games: O Diagoras, dye preſently, elſe thou ſhalt neuer come to heauen. But theſe victories of the Olympicall and Pythian games, whoſoeuer ſhould put them all together, are not to be compared with one of the battels only, that Pelopidas hath fought and wonne: hauing ſpent the moſt part of his time in great calling and dignitie, and laſtly ended the ſame, being gouernour of BOEOTIA the third time (which was the higheſt office of ſtate in all his countrey) when he had deſtroyed the tyrants that kept the THEBANS in bondage, and was alſo ſlaine himſelfe, valiantly fighting for the recouerie of the THESSALIANS libertie. But as Pelopidas death was grieuous to the THEBANS friends and confederates: ſo fell it out very profitable for them. For the THEBANS hearing of Pelopidas death, did not delay reuenge, but ſent an army foorthwith of ſeuen thouſand footemen, and ſeuen hundred horſemen, vnder the conduct of Malcitas and of Diogiton. They finding Alexanders army ouerthrowne, and that he had loſt the moſt part of his ſtrength, did compell him to giue vp the THESSALIANS townes he kept by force againſt them, and to ſet the MAGNESIANS, the PHTHIOTES, and the ACHAIANS at libertie, withdrawing his garriſons he had placed in their ſtrong holds: and therewithall to ſweare, that from thencefoorth he would march vnder the THEBANS, againſt any enemie they ſhould leade him, or commaund him to go againſt. So the THEBANS were pacified vpon theſe conditions. Now will I tell you how the gods plagued him ſoone after for Pelopidas death, who (as we haue told you before) had pretily inſtructed Thebe his wife, that ſhe ſhould not feare the outward appearance nor power of his tyrannie, although ſhe were enuironed with ſouldiers of baniſhed men, whom the tyrant entertained to guard his perſon. Her ſelfe on the other ſide, fearing his falſhoode, as alſo hating his crueltie, conſpired her husbands death with her three brethren, Tiſiphonus, Pytholaus, and Lycophron, and executed her conſpiracie after this ſort. The tyrants pallace where he lay, was ſtraightly guarded euery where with ſouldiers, who nightly watched his perſon: but their bed chamber which they commonly vſed to lye in, was in the toppe of all his pallace, where they kept a dog tyed at the chamber doore to giue warning, which was a terrible dogge, and knew none but the tyrant and his wife, and his keeper that gaue him meate. Now when Thebe purpoſed to worke her feate, ſhe locked vp her three brethren a whole day neare vnto their bed chamber. So when night was come, and being bed time, ſhe went her ſelfe alone according to her manner, into Alexanders chamber: and finding him aſleepe, ſhe ſtale out ſtraight againe, and bade the keeper of the dogge to carie the dogge away, for her husband was diſpoſed to take reſt, and would haue no noiſe. There was no way to get vp to this chamber but by a ladder, which ſhe let downe: and fearing leſt her brethren ſhould make a noiſe, ſhe had couered the ladder ſtaues with wolle before ſhe let it fall downe: When ſhe had gotten them vp with their ſwords, and had ſet them before the doore, ſhe went firſt her ſelfe into the chamber, and tooke away the tyrants ſword that hung at his beds head, and ſhewed it them, as a token giuen them that he was aſleepe. When it came to the pinch to do the deede, theſe young men were afraid, and their hearts began to faile them. But ſhe tooke on with them, and called them cowardly boyes, that would not ſtand to it when it came to the point, and withall, ſware in her rage that ſhe would go wake the tyrant, and open all the treaſon to him. So partly for ſhame, and partly for feare, ſhe compelled them to come in, and to ſtep to the bed, her ſelfe holding a lampe to light them. Then one of them tooke him by the feet, and bound them hard: another caught him by the haire of his head, and pulled him backwards: and the third thruſt him through with his ſword. So by chaunce he dyed ſooner then he ſhould haue done, and otherwiſe then his wicked life deſerued, for the manner of his death. So Alexander was the firſt tyrant that was euer ſlaine by the treaſon of his wife, whoſe body was moſt villanouſly and deſpitefully vſed after his death. For when the townes men of PHERES had drawne him through the citie in mire and dirt, they caſt him out at length to the dogges to deuour.

THE LIFE OF Marcellus.

Marcellus kindred.

Marcellus conditions.

MArcus Claudius that was fiue times Conſull at ROME, was the ſonne (as they ſay) of another Marcus: and as Poſidonius writeth, he was the firſt of his houſe ſurnamed Marcellus, as who would ſay, a marſhall and warlike man by nature. For he was cunning at weapons, skilfull in wars, ſtrong and luſty of body, hardy, and naturally giuen to fight. Yet was he no quareller, nor ſhewed his great courage, but in warres againſt the enemie: otherwiſe he was very gentle, and faire conditioned. He loued learning, and delighted in the Greeke tong, and much eſteemed them that could ſpeake it. For he himſelfe was ſo troubled in matters of ſtate, that he could not ſtudie and follow it, as he deſired to haue done. For if God (as Homer ſaith) did euer make men

To vſe their youth in warres, and battels fierce and fell, till crooked age came creeping on, ſuch feates for to expell:

They were the nobleſt and chiefeſt men of ROME at that time. For in their youth, they fought with the CARTHAGINIANS in SICILE: in their middle age, againſt the GAVLES, to keepe them from the winning of all ITALIE: and againe in their old age, againſt Hannibal and the CARTHAGINIANS. For their age was no priuiledge for them to be diſpenced with, in the ſeruice of their warres, as it was elſe for common citizens: but they were both for their nobilitie, as alſo for

for their valiantnes and experience in warres, driuen to take charge of the armies deliuered them by the Senate and people. Now for Marcellus, there was no battell could make him giue ground being practised in all fights: but yet he was more valiant in priuate combate man for man, then in any other fight. Therefore he neuer refused enemie that did chalenge him, but slue all those in the field that called him to the combat. In SICILE he saued his brother Octacilius life, being ouerthrowne in a skirmish: for with his shield he couered his brothers bodie, and slue them that came to kill him. These valiant parts of him, being but a young man, were rewarded by the generals vnder whom he serued, with many crownes, and warlike honours, vsually bestowed vpō valiant souldiers. Marcellus increasing still his valiantnesse and good seruice, was by the people chosen Ædilis, as of the number of those that were the worthiest men, and most honorable: and the Priests did create him Augure, which is a kind of Priesthood at ROME, hauing authority by law, to consider and obserue the flying of birds, to diuine and prognosticate things thereupon. But in the yeare of his office of Ædile, he was forced against his will to accuse Capitolinus, his brother in office with him. For he being a rash and dissolute man of life, fell in dishonest loue with his collegues sonne Marcellus, that bare his owne name: who being a goodly young gentleman and newly come to mans state, was as well thought of, and taken of euery man for his manhood and good qualities, as any way for his beautie and personage. The first time Capitolinus moued this dishonestie to him, he did of himselfe repulse his shamelesse offer, without any others priuitie: but when he saw he came againe to tempt him the second time, he straight reuealed it to his father. Marcellus his father being maruellously offended withall, (as he had good cause) went & accused Capitolinus before the Senate. Capitolinus at the first, laid in many exeptions and fained excuses, to keepe him from appearing, and in the end he appealed to the Tribunes of the people: but they declared plainely they would not receiue his appeale, nor take any knowledge of the matter. At the length he was forced to answer the matter before the Senate, and denied flatly that he attēpted euer any such thing, because there were no witnesses to proue it against him. Whereupon the Senate thought good to send for young Marcellus, who comming before them, both blushed, and wept together. The Senate seeing shamefastnesse in him, mingled with teares, and a malice that could not be pacified: without seeking other proofe, they took it a cleare case, and so condemned Capitolinus presently in a great summe of mony, which Marcellus conuerted into siluer vessell, to serue at sacrifices, and so did consecrate them to the seruice of the gods. Now when the ROMAINES had ended their first warre against the CARTHAGINIANS, which held them fully the space of two and twenty yeares: immediatly after that, they began a new war against the GAVLES. For the INSVBRIANS, being a people deriued from the GAVLES, and dwelling at the foot of the mountains of the ALPES on ITALY side, being able to make a good power of them selues, did notwithstanding pray aide of the other GAVLES inhabiting on the other side of the mountains: and they caused the GESSATES, a mercenary people & hirelings to them that would giue pay, to bring great numbers with them. Truly me thinkes it was a maruellous matter, and wonderfull good hap for the ROMAINES, that this warre of the GAVLES came not vpon them, while they were at wars with the CARTHAGINIANS: and that the GAVLES also had lien quiet al that while (as if they had purposely sworne to set vpon the conquerors) expecting still an end between thē, & then to set vpon the conquerors, when they had nothing to say to any other. Yet the situatiō of their country did trouble the ROMAINES much, because they were so neare neighbors vnto them, & had wars as it were at their own doores. And so did the ancient reputation of the GAVLES somwhat appaule the ROMAINES, who as it should seeme they did feare more then any other nation whatsoeuer: because ROME had bene takē before by the GAVLES. Since which time a law was made, that Priests and ecclesiasticall persons should be dispensed with from going to the wars, vnlesse the GAVLES did rise against them. The preparation they made for this war at that time, did plainely shew the feare they had then of the GAVLES. For it is thought, that neuer before nor since, there were so many natural ROMAINES assembled together in field, as were then at that present. Moreouer, the new come cruelty they vsed in their sacrifices, doth record this to be true. For before they neuer vsed any strange maner in their sacrifice, or barbarous fashion, but were fauourable in their opinions about the ceremonies of religion, and agreeable to the GRECIANS touching the seruice of the gods. But then, they were compelled to obey certain oracles, and ancient prophecies they found written in Sibyles bookes: and they buried two GRECIANS aliue in the oxe market, a man and a woman, and likewise two GAVLES, a man a woman.

Vnto them they do yet continue certaine ſecret anniuerſaries in Nouember, that are not to be ſeene of enery body. The ROMAINES in their firſt battels of this warre, were often ouercome, and did ouercome: but theſe battels were to litle purpoſe for ending of the warres. In the yeare that C. Quintius Flaminius, and P. Furius Philo were Conſuls, and ſent with great armies to make warres vpon the INSVBRIANS, people ſubiect to the ſtate of MILLANE, newes were brought to ROME, there was a riuer ſeene in the country of ROMANIA, red as bloud, and three moones alſo at the very ſame time in the citie of RIMINI. Furthermore, the Prieſts and ſoothſayers that had obſerued and conſidered the tokens and ſignifications of birds on that day, when theſe two were choſen Conſuls: they told plainly there was errour in their election, and that they were directly choſen againſt all ſignes and tokens of the birds. Thereupon the Senate wrote immediatly to the camp to them, and willed them to come home to depoſe themſelues of their Conſulſhip, before they did attempt any thing as Conſuls againſt the enemies. The Conſull Flaminius receiued the letters in time: but becauſe he was ready to giue battell, he would not open them, before he had firſt ouerthrown his enemies, and ſpoiled their country as indeed he did. But when he was come backe to ROME againe, and had brought maruellous great ſpoiles with him, the people for all that would not go out to meete him, becauſe he did not preſently obey the letters they wrote vnto him, nor returned vpon it as they commaunded him, but contemptuouſly, without any regard of their diſpleaſure, followed his owne fantaſie: whereupon they had almoſt flatly denied him the honour of triumph. For his triumph was no ſooner ended, but they compelled him to giue ouer his Conſulſhip, and made him a priuate man with his companion. The ROMAINES therein were ſo religiouſly bent, as they would all things ſhould be referred vnto the gods good grace and pleaſure, and would ſuffer none to contemne the obſeruations and prognoſticating of the ſoothſayers, nor their auncient vſes and cuſtomes, for any proſperitie and felicitie that could happen. For they thought it more neceſſary and profitable for benefit of the common-weale, that the Senate and magiſtrates ſhould reuerence the ceremonies and ſeruice of the gods, then that they ſhould ouercome their enemies in battel. As for example, Tiberius Sempronius, a man as much honoured and eſteemed of the ROMAINES for his iuſtice and valiantneſſe, as any other of his time, being one yeare Conſull, did nominate and elect two other for Conſuls the yeare following, Scipio Naſica, and Caius Martius. Theſe two being entred into their Conſulſhip, and ſent from ROME alſo to their ſeuerall prouinces appointed them by lot: Sempronius by chance took certain litle bookes in his hand, where were briefly written the rules appertaining to the ceremonies of publike ſacrifice: and reading in them, he found a certaine ordinance he neuer heard before. And this it was: That if a magiſtrate were ſet in any tent or hired houſe without the city, to behold and obſerue the prognoſtications of birds, & that vpon any ſodain occaſion he were driuen to come againe into the city, before the birds had giuen any certaine ſignes: the ſecond time when he returned againe to end his obſeruations, there was no remedy, but he muſt leaue his tent or firſt hired houſe, and take another, and begin new obſeruations againe. Tiberius vtterly ignorant of this ordinance before, had kept his obſeruations twiſe in one ſelf houſe, and had choſen there, Naſica and Martius, Conſuls to ſucceed him. But when he knew he had offended, he told the Senate of it: who would not let ſlip ſo litle a fault, but wrote to the new Conſuls, and they ſtraight left their prouinces, & returned againe to ROME, willingly reſigning vp their offices. That was a prety while after. Againe alſo, about the very preſent time we write of now, there were two Prieſts of noble houſes (and noble perſons alſo) the one called Cornelius, & the other Cethegus, both which were diſgraded of their Prieſthood, becauſe they had not giuen the intrails of the ſacrificed beaſt in order as they ſhould haue done. Quintus Sulpitius in like maner, was diſgraded of his Biſhoprick, becauſe his miter which the FLAMINES do weare, fel off his head in his ſacrificing. Minutius being Dictator alſo, and hauing choſen Caius Flaminius Generall of the horſemen: becauſe they heard the noiſe of a rat at the election of Flaminius, they were both put out of their authority, and other choſen in their place. Now, though they were thus preciſe euen in trifles, it was not by reaſon of any ſuperſtition mingled with their religion: but becauſe they would not break any iot of the ancient inſtitutions & ceremonies of their country. But to our ſtory againe. Flaminius being depriued of his Conſulſhip, Marcellus was created Conſul in his place, by the regents at that time called Interreges. Marcellus being inueſted in his office, choſe Cneus Cornelius for his companion: and they ſay, that the GAVLES being inclined to peace, & the Senate of ROME alſo willing to harken to peace, Marcellus did ſtir vp the people, and made them deſire war. Notwithſtanding, they concluded concluded peace at that time: but the GAVLES GESSATES immediatly after renued the warres againe. For there came ouer the mountaines of the ALPES, a thirtie thousand of them, and they ioyned with the INSVBRIANS, which were many moe in number then themselues. Now, they being in a maruellous iollitie, went incontinently to lay siege to the citie of ACERRES, that standeth vpon the riuer of Po: and during the siege, King Britomarus taking ten thousand GESSATES with him, went and destroyed all the countrey about the Po. Marcellus hearing that, left with his companion Cneus Cornelius, all the armed footmen, and the third part of the horsemen, in his camp by ACERRES: and he himselfe with the residue of the horsemen, and sixe hundred footmen light armed, marched towards the enemie, trauelling night & day, vntil he met with ten thousand GESSATES, neare vnto a village of GAVLE on this side the mountaines, called CLASTIDIVM, which was subiect not long before to the ROMAINES. So he had no leisure to take rest, nor to refresh his men a litle: for the barbarous people knew straight he was come, and tooke him for no better then by and by ouercome, because he had so few footmen. And for his horsemen, the GAVLES made no reckoning of them: for besides thēselues are very good men at armes, and excel all other in that fight, yet were their number of horsmen far aboue Marcellus. Therefore they straight marched towards him in a maruellous furie, and with thundering shouts, as if they would haue deuoured them at their comming. Britomarus their king, aduanced himself before all his companie. Marcellus fearing to be compassed in behind, being so small a number: he put out the wings of his horsmen as much as he could, to haue the country at large, so that his two wings were very slēder, vntil he came neare his enemies. And being ready to gallop towards the enemy, it fortuned his horse being afraid with the noise of his enemies, turned about, & caried Marcellus back againe in spite of his teeth. But he fearing the ROMAINES superstition, in taking this for an euil token, & that they would take a conceit vpon the same: plucking the bridle with his left hand, turned his horse head again vpō the enemy, & then he worshipped the sun, as though he had not turned his horse by chaunce, but purposely for that cause. For it is the ROMAINES maner to turne about so, when they do honor their gods. So when they began to ioyne battel, he made a vow to Iupiter Feretriā, to offer him vp the goodliest spoiles of his enemies, if he did ouercome. The king of the GAVLES seeing him at that instant, imagined by the marks & tokens he saw, that he should be the General of his enemies: So he set spurs to his horse, and gallopped towards him from al his company, giuing him defiance, & chalenged him, shaking his staffe in his hand. He was the goodliest person and strongest man of all the GAVLES, and his armour was al gilt & siluered, and so set forth with sundry works and colours, that it shined as the Sun. Marcellus on the other side hauing viewed all the army of his enemies throughout, and perceiuing none so richly armed as the king: thought straight it was against him, that he had made his prayer and vow to Iupiter. Then he put his horse in full cariere against him, and came with such a force and furie to him, that he pierced his armour with his staffe, and ouerthrew him, but yet he killed him not dead: whereupon he sodainely redoubled two or three strokes besides vpon him, and so slue him right out. Then he lighted from his horse, and taking the dead Kings armour in his hand, he lift vp his eyes to heauen, and said: O Iupiter Feretrian, thou that doest from heauen behold and direct all marshall feates and Captaines deeds: thy selfe I call to witnesse, that I am the third ROMAINE Captaine, that being Generall of the armie, haue slaine with my owne hands, the King and Generall of the enemies: and I promise here to thee, to offer thee vp the richest spoiles of mine enemies, so thy godhead will vouchsafe to graunt vs the like good fortune in all this warre besides. His prayer ended, the men of armes of the ROMAINES ranne in among the horsemen and footemen of the GAVLES, one being vnparted from another: and fortune did so fauour them, that they wan a passing victory, in such a strange and wondefull maner, as was incredible. For it was neuer seene before nor since, that so few horsemen did ouerthrow so great a number of men of armes and footemen ranged together. Now when Marcellus had slaine the greater number of them, and had gotten their spoiles and all their baggage, he returned againe to his companion Cneus Cornelius, whom he found making warres vnfortunately with the GAVLES, before the greatest and most populous citie they had, called MILLAINE, which the GAVLES on this side the mountaines take for their chiefe citie, and from whence all other had their first originall. Whereupon they did all their possible endeuour to defend it, and did as straightly besiege the Consull Cornelius, as he did them. Now, when Marcellus was come to the camp againe, the GESSATES vnderstanding that their king Britomarus was slaine in battell, returned backe againe into their country, and the city of MILLAINE was taken. After that all the other cities thereabout yeelded of themselues, without force of siege, and the GAVLES wholy submitted themselues and al that they had, to the mercy of the ROMAINES, who graunted them peace vpon easie conditions. For these famous victories, the Senate of ROME gaue all the honour of triumph vnto Marcellus onely, and that was as wonderfull and worthy a sight, as any that euer past before him: what for the infinite spoiles, and the numbers of great men taken prisoners, as also for the exceeding sumptuousnesse and stately shew thereof. But the goodliest sight of all for the rarenesse, was to behold Marcellus selfe, carying on his shoulders the whole spoile of the barbarous King, to offer vp to Iupiter Feretrian. For he had cut downe a goodly yong oke of the mountaine, straight, and shut vp very long, which he had trimmed vp in forme of triumph, hanging all the armed peeces he had won of the King, very orderly round about it. Then, when all the shew of his triumph was past, he himselfe tooke the oke vpon his shoulders, and got vp vpon his triumphing charet, and so marched thorough the citie, carying these signes thereupon: which was the noblest sight, and honourablest shew of the whole triumph. His army followed after the charet, singing verses and songs of victory, in praise of the gods and their Captaine: and when he had passed through the whole city, and was come to the temple of Iupiter called Feretrian, there he set vp this yong oke, and token of triumph. This Marcellus is the third and last ROMAINE captaine, to whom happened this honour in our age. For the first man that euer offered vp to Iupiter the spoiles of the generall of their enemies, was king Romulus, who wan the like spoiles of Acran, king of the CÆNINIANS. The second was Cornelius Cossus, who slue Tolumnius, Generall of the THVSCANS. And the third was Marcellus, who slue with his owne hands Britomarus king of the GAVLES: and after him, no man euer since could obtaine the like good fortune. The god to whom these maner of spoiles are consecrated thus, is called Iupiter Feretriũ, so termed as some write, because they do cary this token of triumph to him, following the deriuation of this Greeke word, Ferin, which signifieth to cary: for in those former times, many Greeke words were mingled with the Latine. Other affirme it is one of the surnames of Iupiter, signifying as much as lightning: for Ferire in the Latin toung, signifieth to strike. And some say also, in wars it is properly to hurt or kil with his own hands: for the ROMAINES do vse at this day when they giue a charge vpon their enemies in battell, or that they haue them in chase flying, to cry, incouraging one another, Feri, Feri: which is as much, as kil, kil. And the spoiles taken from the enemies also, are generally called Spolia: but those which Lieutenants generall, or Generals, do take from the Generals of their enemies, when they haue slaine them, they are called particularly, Spolia opima. Yet some hold opinion that King Numa Pompilius, mentioning the rich spoiles, or Spolia opima in his commentaries, speaketh of the first, the second, and the third: and commaundeth that the first spoiles which are wonne, should be consecrated to Iupiter Feretrian: the second vnto Mars: and the third vnto Quirinus. And that they should giue to him that had wonne the first spoiles, three hundred * Asses, the second, two hundred: and the third, a hundred. But notwithstanding, the best opinion, and vsuall taking of Spolia opima, referreth them to be the first spoiles wonne in a foughten field, and those which the Lieutenant of an army, or a Generall, doth take from the Generall of the enemies, after he hath slaine him with his owne hands. And thus much for the declaration of this matter. Furthermore, the ROMAINES were so ioyfull of this victory, and of their good successe in this warre, that they caused a massie cup of gold to be made of the spoile they had gotten, weighing a hundred pound weight, which they sent to offer vp in the temple of Apollo Pythias, in the citie of DELPHES, in token of thankes: and they made liberall diuision besides of the spoiles vnto their friends and confederates, and sent a great part of it vnto Hieron king of SYRACVSA, who was their confederate. Not long after, Hannibal being entred ITALY, Marcellus was sent with an army by sea, into SICILE. And after the great ouerthrow was giuen at the battell of CANNES, wherein there died so many thousand ROMAINES, and that very few of them saued themselues by flying into the citie of CANNVSIVM: they looked that Hannibal hauing ouercome the flower of all the ROMAINES youth, and their greatest force, would not faile to come straight to ROME. Wherefore Marcellus first sent fifteene hundred of his men by sea, to help to defend ROME: and hauing afterwards receiued commandement from the Senate, he came to CANNVSIVM, where he took such as were fled thither for succour after the battell, and so brought them out of the field, to defend the countrey. Now the ROMAINES hauing lost the most part of all their best Captaines, in diuers sundry battels before: of all those that remained, Fabius Maximus was the onely able and reputed reputed man for commendation of his honesty and wisdome, yet they misliked of him notwithstanding, for a timerous man, and of no courage, as a man too ful of doubts & considerations, and loth to put any thing in hazard: saying, he was a good captain to defend, but not to offend the enemy. Wherupon they thought good to ioyne Marcellus liuely youth and courage, with Fabius feminine feare and wisdome: and therfore some yeares they chose them both Consuls together, or els they sent one of them as Consul, and the other as Proconsul, each in his turne, to the countrey where they had wars. And for proofe hereof, Posidonius writeth, that the ROMAINES at that time called Fabius Maximus their target, and Marcellus their sword. Therefore Hannibal himselfe said, he feared Fabius Maximus as his gouernor, and Marcellus as his enemy: because the one kept him from hurting of others, and the other did hurt to himself. Immediatly after this great victory at CANNES, Hannibals souldiers became so bold, so careless, & disordered, that they kept the field without feare of any thing, and dispersed themselues farre from their camp: wherefore Marcellus setting vpon those straglers, he slue them euery man, and so by litle and litle did still lessen the power and strength of his enemy. Afterwards he aided the cities of BIZANTIVM and of NOLA, and stablished the true deuotion and loue of the BIZANTINES towards the ROMAINES: from thence he went to NOLA, & found great sedition there betwixt the Senate & the people, because the Senate could not keep the people in obedicce, but they would needs take Hannibals part. The cause of the peoples stubburnesse grew, by occasion of a gentleman of the city called Bandius, a noble gentleman to the people, and a valiant man of his hands. This Bandius hauing fought valiantly at the battell of CANNES, after he had slaine many a CARTHAGINIAN, was himselfe in the end striken downe, and found lying among the dead bodies, sore wounded and mangled: wherupon Hanniball greatly commending his valiantnesse, did not onely let him go without ransome, but also gaue him rich gifts, and made him his host and friend. Hereupon Bandius at his comming home, to requite Hannibals honor and curtesie, became one of those that most fauoured Hanniball, and most perswaded the people of NOLA to take his part. Notwithstanding this, Marcellus thinking it too great a sinne against the gods, to put a man to death that had made so great proofe of his valiantnesse, and had serued with the ROMAINES in their greatest warres and extreamest daunger, and who besides the goodnesse of his nature, had a maruellous gift also, to winne mens good wils by his great courtesie: when this Bandius came one day to do his dutie to him, Marcellus of purpose asked him what he was, though he had knowne him long before, onely to take occasion to talke with him. The other answered him, his name was Lucius Bandius. Then Marcellus seeming to be maruellous glad, and to wonder at him, sayd: and art thou that Bandius they speake so much of at ROME, whom they say did so notable seruice in person at the battel of CANNES, and neuer forsooke Paulus AEmylius the Consull, but receiued so many wounds vpon his body in defence of him? Bandius answered, that he was the man, & therewith shewed him many wounds he had vpon his body. Marcellus then replied: Alas, thou that carriest such notable markes of thy vnfained loue towards vs, what diddest thou meane, that thou camest not straight againe vnto vs? art thou perswaded we are so miserable and vnthankfull, that we will not worthily reward the vertue and valiantnesse of our friends, whom our enemies selues do honor? After Marcellus had vsed this courteous speech vnto him, and had imbraced him, he gaue him a goodly horse for seruice in the warres, and fiue hundred Drachmes of siluer besides. So after that time, Bandius did euer take Marcellus part, and alwayes followed him, being very faithfull to him, and shewed himselfe very seuere and earnest to accuse them that tooke Hannibals part in the citie: which were many in number, and had conspired among themselues, that the first time the ROMAINES should go into the field to skirmish with the enemies, they would shut the gates after them, and take the spoile of all their cariages. Marcellus being informed of this treason, did set his men in battell ray within the city, hard by the gates, and behind them he placed all the sumpters and cariage in good order: besides that, he made proclamation by trumpet, that no citizen vpon paine of death should approach the walles. This occasion drew Hannibal to come hard to the citie, seeing no watch vpon the walles, and made him the bolder to come in disorder, imagining there had bene some mutiny or sedition within, betweene the noble men and the people. But in the meane time, Marcellus set open the gate being hard by, and sallying out vpon the sodaine with the best men of armes he had, he gaue a charge vpon Hannibal in the voward. Immediatly after came out his footemen at another gate, running straight vpon Hannibal, with a wonderfull cry and shout: so as Hannibal to withstand thē, was driuen to deuide his men in two companies.

But as he was deuiding of them, ſodainly a third gate opened vpon them, from whence all the reſidue of the ROMAINES iſſued out, who ſet vpon the CARTHAGINIANS on euery ſide, they being maruellouſly amazed to be ſo ſodainely ſet on, which they looked not for: ſo hauing their hands full with thoſe that came firſt vpon them, being ſcant able to defend themſelues againſt them, and ſeeing this new and laſt charge alſo, they were forced to retire. This was the firſt time, that euer Hannibals ſouldiers began to giue place to the ROMAINES, who draue them backe vnto their camp, and ſlue a great number of them, and did hurt diuers of them beſides. For ſome write there were ſlaine of the CARTHAGINIANS at that conflict, about fiue thouſand, and of the ROMAINES there died not paſt fiue hundred men. But Titus Liuius doth not ſet out the ouerthrow ſo great, and yet confeſſeth that Marcellus wan great honor by it, and that it made the ROMAINES maruellous valiant againe, after ſo many and ſundry battels as they had loſt one after another: for then they were perſwaded that they fought not with an enemy altogether inuincible, but that he might ſometime alſo, as wel as themſelues, receiue both loſſe and hurt. Therfore, one of the Conſuls dying about that time, the people cauſed Marcellus to be ſent for, & placed him in his roome: and in ſpite of the Senate they deferred all deputation vntill his returne from the camp. Marcellus came no ſooner to ROME, but he was choſen Conſull in the dead mans roome, by all the voices of the people. Notwithſtanding, when they went to chuſe him, it thundred maruellouſly: which the Prieſts and Augures tooke for an il token, but yet they durſt not openly ſpeake againſt his election, becauſe they feared the people. Howbeit Marcellus of himſelfe did willingly giue vp his Conſulſhip, and yet was it no exception to him for his ſeruice in the warres: for they created him Proconſull, and ſent him againe to the camp at NOLA, where he did ſeuerely puniſh ſuch as tooke Hannibals part: who being aduertiſed thereof, came thither with all poſſible ſpeed to helpe them: and euen at his firſt comming he offered Marcellus battell, which he refuſed at that time. Neuertheleſſe he tooke his time, when Hannibal had ſent the beſt part of his army to forage, as meaning to fight no more battels: and then he ſet vpon him, hauing giuen his footemen long pikes, ſuch as they vſe in fight vpon the ſea, and taught them alſo, how to hurt the enemie a farre off, keeping them ſtill in their hands. But the CARTHAGINIANS hauing no skill of their pikes, and fighting with ſhort iauelins in their hands, did ſtrike downe-right blowes: which was the cauſe, that they being ſet vpon by the ROMAINES, were driuen to turne their backes, and flie before them. So there were fiue thouſand of the CARTHAGINIANS left dead in the field, foure elephants ſlaine, and two taken aliue: and furthermore, three dayes after the battell, there came a three hundred horſemen, ſome of them SPANIARDS, and other NVMIDIANS, that ſubmitted themſelues to the ROMAINES. Neuer came there ſuch a misfortune before to Hannibal: who had of long time kept together in loue and amity, an army aſſembled of ſundry barbarous nations and people. Howbeit theſe three hundred continued euer after faithful to the end, both to Marcellus, and to all other Lieutenants and Generals of the ROMAINES. Shortly after, Marcellus being againe choſen Conſull the third time, went into SICILE. For Hannibals proſperous ſucceſſe and victories, had ſo incouraged the CARTHAGINIANS, as they ſought again to conquer this Iland: and ſpecially becauſe that after the death of Hieronimus the tyrant, there roſe ſome tumult at SYRACVSA. Vpon which occaſion the ROMAINES had ſent an army thither before, and a Prætor called Appius: at whoſe hands Marcellus hauing receiued the army, a great number of the ROMAINES became humble ſuters to him, to pray him to aid them in their calamity, which was this. Of thoſe that ſcaped from the battell of CANNES, ſome ſaued themſelues by flying, other were taken priſoners, of which there were ſuch a number, as it appeared that ROME had not people inough left onely to keepe the walles. Neuertheleſſe, thoſe few that remained, their hearts were ſo great, that they would neuer redeeme the priſoners, which Hanniball was contented to deliuer them vpon ſmal ranſome, but made a decree they ſhould not be redeemed: & ſo ſuffered ſome of thē to be killed, others to be ſold for ſlaues out of ITALY. And moreouer, thoſe that ſaued themſelues by flying, they ſent ſtraight into SICILE: commanding they ſhould not ſet a foot againe in ITALY, whileſt they had wars with Hanniball. Theſe were the men that came altogether, and fell downe at Marcellus feet, ſo ſoon as he arriued in SICILE, and humbly beſought him, to appoint them to ſerue vnder ſome enſigne, that they might fight to do their country honour and ſeruice: promiſing him with teares running downe their cheekes, that their faithfull ſeruice then ſhould witneſſe for them, that the ouerthrow they had at CANNES, fell vpon them rather by misfortune, then through lack of courage. Whereupon Marcellus hauing compaſſion on them, wrote to the

the Senate in their fauour, and prayed them that they would graunt him licence to ſupply the bands of his army, as they diminiſhed, with thoſe poore ROMAINES his countrymen. Many reaſons paſſed too and fro, againſt this ſute: neuertheleſſe it was concluded in the end by the Senat, that the Common-wealth made no reckening of the ſeruice of faint hearted men like women: wherefore if Marcellus thought good of their ſeruice, yet it ſhould not be lawfull for him to giue them any crownes or rewards of honour, for any notable ſeruice ſoeuer they did, as all Generals are wont to giue to honeſt men that ſerue valiauntly. This order of the Senate miſliked Marcellus very much, who at his returne home out of SICILE, made his complaint in open Senate, and told them they did him manifeſt wrong, to deny him that fauour, that hauing done his commonwealth ſuch faithfull ſeruice diuerſe times, as he had done, he might not reſtore ſo many poore ROMAINES to their honour againe. Now when Marcellus was in SICILE, he receiued great hurts and iniuries by Hippocrates Generall of the SYRACVSANS: who, to pleaſure the CARTHAGINIANS, and by their meanes to make himſelfe chiefe Lord of SYRACVSA, did put many ROMAINE citizens to death. Whereupon Marcellus went and laid ſiege to the city of the LEONTINES, and when he had taken it by aſſault, he hurt neuer a townes man, nor naturall citizen of the ſame: but ſuch traitours as he found there, who had fled from his campe, and yeelded to the enemies, them he cauſed to be whipped, and then hanged. But notwithſtanding, Hippocrates had before cauſed it to be bruted at SYRACVSA, that Marcellus had put all the LEONTINES to the ſword, not ſparing litle children: and afterwards Hippocrates comming thither on the ſodaine, in the feare and garboile of this falſe brute, he eaſily tooke the city. Marcellus hearing Hippocrates had taken SYRACVSA, left foorthwith the LEONTINES, and went with his whole army, and camped hard by SYRACVSA: and ſent his ambaſſadors to tell the SYRACVSANS truly, what he had done in the city of the LEONTINES, and quite contrary to that they were informed of. Howbeit that preuailed not, for they beleeued not Marcellus, becauſe Hippocrates being the ſtronger, had won the city. Wherupon he began then to approch the wals, and to aſſault in euery quarter, as well by ſea as by land. Appius tooke charge of them that gaue aſſault by land. Marcellus himſelfe, with threeſcore gallies of fiue owers at euery bancke, well armed, and full of all ſorts of artillerie & fire works, did aſſault by ſea, and rowed hard to the wall, hauing made a great engine and deuice of battery, vpon eight gallics chained together, to batter the wal: truſting in the great multitude of his engines of batterie, and to all ſuch other neceſſarie prouiſion as he had for wars, as alſo in his owne reputation. But Archimedes made light account of all his deuices, as indeed they were nothing comparable to the engines himſelfe had inuented: and yet were not his owne ſuch, as himſelfe did recken of, to ſhew ſingularitie of worke and deuice. For thoſe he had made, were but his recreations of Geometrie, and things done to paſſe the time with, at the requeſt of king Hieron: who had prayed him to call to mind a litle his Geometricall ſpeculation, and to apply it to things corporall and ſenſible, and to make the reaſon of it demonſtratiue, and plaine, to the vnderſtanding of the common people by experiments, and to the benefit and commoditie of vſe. For this inuentiue art to frame inſtruments and engines (which are called mechanicall, or organicall, ſo highly commended and eſteemed of all ſorts of people) were firſt ſet forth by Architas and by Eudoxus: partly to beautifie a litle the ſcience of Geometrie by this fineneſſe, and partly to proue and confirme by materiall examples and ſenſible inſtruments, certaine Geometricall concluſions, whereof a man cannot find out the conceiuable demonſtrations, by enforced reaſons and proofes. As that concluſion which inſtructeth one to ſearch out two lines meane proportionall, which cannot be proued by reaſon demonſtratiue: and yet notwithſtanding is a principle and an accepted ground, for many things which are contained in the art of portraiture. Both of them haue faſhioned it to the workmanſhip of certaine inſtruments, called Meſolabes or Meſographes, which ſerue to find theſe meane lines proportional, by drawing certaine curue lines, and ouerthwart and oblike ſections. But after that, Plato was offended with them, and maintained againſt them, that they did vtterly corrupt and diſgrace the worthineſſe and excellencie of Geometrie, making it to deſcend from things not comprehenſible, and without body, vnto things ſenſible and materiall, and to bring it to a palpable ſubſtance, where the vile and baſe handy worke of man is to be employed: ſince that time I ſay, handy craft, or the art of engines, came to be ſeparated from Geometry, and being long time deſpiſed by the Philoſophers, it came to be one of the warlike arts. But Archimedes hauing told king Hieron, his kinſman and very friend, that it was poſſible to remoue as great a waight as he would, with as litle ſtrength as he liſted to put to it: and boaſting himſelfe thus (as they report of him) and truſting to the force of his reaſons, wherwith he proued this concluſion, that if there were another globe of earth, he was able to remoue this of ours, and paſſe it ouer to the other: king Hieron wondring to heare him, required him to put this deuice in execution, and to make him ſee by experience, ſome great or heauy weight remoued, by litle force. So Archimedes caught hold with a hooke of one of the greateſt carects, or hulkes of the king (that to draw it to the ſhore out of the water, required a maruellous number of people to go about it, and was hardly to be done ſo) and put a great number of men more into her, then her ordinarie burthen: and he himſelfe ſitting alone at his eaſe far off, without any ſtraining at all, drawing the end of an engine with many wheeles & pullies, faire and ſoftly with his hand, made it come as gently and ſmoothly to him, as it had floted in the ſea. The king wondring to ſee the ſight, and knowing by proofe the greatneſſe of his art: he prayed him to make him ſome engines, both to aſſault and defend in all manner of ſieges and aſſaults. So Archimides made him many engines, but king Hieron neuer occupied any of them, becauſe he raigned the moſt part of his time in peace, without any wars. But this prouiſion and munition of engines, ſerued the SYRACVSANS turne maruellouſly at that time: and not only the prouiſion of the engines ready made, but alſo the enginer and work-maſter himſelf that had inuented them. Now the SYRACVSANS ſeeing themſelues aſſaulted by the ROMAINES both by ſea and by land, were maruellouſly perplexed, and could not tell what to ſay, they were ſo afraid: imagining it was impoſſible for them to withſtand ſo great an army. But when Archimedes fell to handle his engines, and to ſet them at liberty, there flue in the aire infinit kinds of ſhot, & maruellous great ſtones, with an incredible noiſe and force on the ſodaine, vpon the footemen that came to aſſault the city by land, bearing down, and tearing in peeces all thoſe which came againſt thē, or in what place ſoeuer they lighted, no earthly body being able to reſiſt the violence of ſo heauy a weight: ſo that all their ranks were maruellouſly diſordered. And as for the gallies that gaue aſſault by ſea, ſome were ſunke with long peeces of timber like vnto the yards of ſhips, wherto they faſten their ſayles, which were ſodainly blown ouer the wals with force of theſe engines into their gallies, and ſo ſunke them by their ouer great waight. Other being hoiſſed vp by the prooes with hands of Iron, and hookes made like cranes bils, plunged their poupes into the ſea. Other being taken vp with certaine engines faſtened within, one contrary to another, made them turne in the ayre like a whirlegig, and ſo caſt them vpon the rockes by the towne wals, and ſplitted them all to fitters, to the great ſpoile and murther of the perſons that were within them. And ſometimes the ſhips and gallies were lift cleane out of the water, that it was a fearefull thing to ſee them hang and turne in the ayre as they did: vntill that caſting their men within them ouer the hatches, ſome here, ſome there, by this terrible turning, they came in the end to be emptie, and to breake againſt the wals, or elſe to fall into the ſea againe, when the engines left their hold. Now for Marcellus engine, which he brought againſt the wals, vpon a bridge made of gallies ioyned together: that was called Sambuca, by reaſon of the faſhion it had like to an inſtrument of muſicke of the ſame name, which is a harpe. The ſame being yet a good pretie way off from the wals, there fell a great ſtone vpon it ſent from the wals, weighing ten talents: then a ſecond after that, and a third one after that, the which falling al into this engine with ſuch a thunder and terrible tempeſt, brake the foundation of the engine, and tare all the bridge of the gallies ioyned together in peeces, that ſuſtained it. So that Marcellus being amazed withall, not knowing well what it meant: was glad to retire quickly, and ſent to make his trumpet ſound the retrait to thoſe that gaue aſſault by land. Herupon they ſate in counſell to determine what was to be done, & they reſolued, that the next morning before day they ſhould approch the wals if it were poſſible: becauſe that Archimedes engines, which were very ſtrong and hard wound vp, ſhould by this meanes ſend all the force and fury of their ſtones and ſhot ouer their heads, and that neare hand alſo he could do no good with them, for that they had not the ſcope of their leuell and cariage they ſhould haue. But Archimedes had preuented this deuice by long preparation before, hauing made prouiſion of engines for far and neare, the leuell and cariage whereof was proportioned for all diſtances: their ſhot ſhort, the arrowes not very long, many holes and arches in the walles one hard by another, where there were ſtore of crosbowes to kill neare at hand, ſet in ſuch places, as the enemies could not ſee them without. Wherefore, when the ROMAINES thought to approch, thinking they had bene ſafe and cloſe, that no man ſaw them: it amazed thē all when they were receiued againe with infinite ſhot, and ſtriken to the ground with ſtones that fell fell vpon their heads like lead: (for there was no part of all the walles, from whence they had not the like ſhot.) Whereupon they were forced againe to retire from the wals. And yet when they were further off from them, the arrowes, ſtones, and other kind of ſhot that flue in euery place among them, killed a great number of them, ſcattered farre from thence: ſo that many of them were ſlaine and ſore wounded, and diuerſe of their ſhips ſplitted, and they not once able to be reuenged, nor to hurt their enemies, becauſe Archimedes had placed his engines very cloſely behind the wals, and not vpon the wals in ſight of the enemy. So that it appeared the gods fought againſt the ROMAINES, they were ſo ſlaine and wounded, and yet they could not tell how, nor by whom. Notwithſtanding, Marcellus eſcaped with life, ſafe from hurt, and mocking his workemaiſters and enginers he had in his campe, he ſaid vnto them: What, ſhall we not leaue to make wars with this Briarian enginer and Geometrician here? who ſitting ſtill vpon the wharfe in ſporting manner hath with ſhame ouerthrowne our nauie, and exceeded all the fabulous hundred hands of the Giants, diſcharging at one inſtant ſo many ſhot among vs? For indeed, all the reſidue of the SYRACVSANS, were as the body and members of Archimedes preparation: and he himſelfe was the only creature that moued and did all, all weapons elſe being quiet, and his engines onely occupied, to aſſault and defend. At the length Marcellus ſeeing his men thus afeard, as if they did but ſee the end of a rope, or any peece of timber vpon the wall, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes was letting looſe ſome of his engines vpon them: he would no more approch the wals, nor giue aſſault, determining to ſee if he could win it by long ſiege. Notwithſtanding, Archimedes had ſuch a great mind, and was ſo profoundly learned, hauing hidden in him the onely treaſure and ſecrets of Geometricall inuentions: as he would neuer ſet foorth any booke how to make all theſe warlike engines, which wan him at that time the fame and glory, not of mans knowledge, but rather of diuine wiſdome. But he eſteeming all kind of handicraft and inuention to make engines, and generally all maner of ſciences bringing common cõmoditie by the vſe of them, to be but vile, beggerly, and mercenarie droſſe: employed his wit & ſtudie only to write things, the beauty and ſubtilty whereof, were not mingled any thing at all with neceſſitie. For all that he hath written, are geometricall propoſitions, which are without compariſon of any other writings whatſoeuer: becauſe the ſubiect whereof they treate, doth appeare by demonſtration, the matter giuing them the grace and the greatneſſe, and the demonſtration prouing it ſo exquiſitly, with wonderfull reaſon and facilitie, as it is not repugnable. For in all Geometry are not to be found more profound and difficult matters written, in more plain and ſimple tearmes, and by more eaſie principles, then thoſe which he hath inuented. Now ſome do impute this, to the ſharpeneſſe of his wit and vnderſtanding, which was a naturall gift in him: other do referre it to the extreame paines he tooke, which made theſe things come ſo eaſily from him, that they ſeemed as if they had bene no trouble to him at all. For no man liuing of himſelfe can deuiſe the demonſtration of his propoſitions, what paine ſoeuer he take to ſeeke it: & yet ſtraight ſo ſoone as he commeth to declare and open it, euery man then imagineth with himſelfe he could haue found it out well enough, he can then ſo plainly make demonſtration of the thing he meaneth to ſhew. And therefore that me thinks is like enough to be true, which they write of him: that he was ſo rauiſhed and drunke with the ſweet intiſements of this Syren, which as it were lay continually with him, as he forgat his meat and drinke, and was careleſſe otherwiſe of himſelf, that oftentimes his ſeruants got him againſt his will to the baths, to waſh and annoint him: and yet being there, he would euer be drawing out of the Geometricall figures, euen in the very imbers of the chimney. And while they were annointing of him with oyles and ſweete ſauors, with his finger he did draw lines vpon his naked body: ſo far was he taken from himſelfe, & brought into an extaſie or traunce, with the delight he had in the ſtudy of Geometrie, and truly rauiſhed with the loue of the Muſes. But amongſt many notable things he deuiſed, it appeareth, that he moſt eſteemed the demonſtration of the proportion betweene the Cylinder (to wit, the round colomne) and the ſphære or globe contained in the ſame: for he prayed his kinſmen and friends, that after his death they would put a Cylinder vpon his tombe, containing a maſſie ſphære, with an inſcription of the proportion, whereof the continent exceedeth the thing contained. So Archimedes being as you haue heard, did aſmuch as lay in him, both to ſaue himſelfe and SYRACVSA from taking. But now againe to Marcellus. Marcellus during the ſiege at SYRACVSA, wan the citie of MEGARES in SICILE, one of the ancienteſt cities in all the Iland: and he tooke beſides, the campe of Hippocrates, lying by ACILES, where he ſlue aboue 8000 men, ſurpriſing them vpon the ſodaine, euen as they were preparing to lodge, and to fortifie their campe. Then he ouercame a great part of the champion countrie of SICILE, and made the cities to rebel that tooke the CARTHAGINIANS part: and in all the battels he fought, he euer ouercame them that durſt bid him battell. It chanced afterwards, that he tooke a LACEDÆMONIAN captaine priſoner, called Danippus: euen as he came out of SYRACVSA by ſea. The SYRACVSANS deſirous to redeeme him, ſent to him to pray he might be ranſomed. They made many parlees about his ranſome, and drew out this practiſe to diuerſe meetings: vntill Marcellus had taken good markes of a certaine tower, that had no great watch kept vpon it, and into the which he might ſecretly conuey a certaine number of men, the wall of the city in that place being no very hard thing to ſcale. Therfore when he had giuen a good geſſe by eſtimation at the height of that tower, by often approching to it, hauing parleed many a time hard by it: he prouided skaling ladders, & took the oportunitie of a feaſt which the SYRACVSANS ſolemnized in the honor of Diana, on which day they gaue themſelues to all feaſting, ſporting, and playes. So he tooke not onely the tower, but filled all the wals round about with armed men before day, and brake open the maine gate & entry of the city called Hexapile. And as the SYRACVSANS beganne to ſtirre, perceiuing the ROMAINES on the wals: Marcellus made his men ſound their trumpets on euery ſide. Whereupon the SYRACVSANS were ſo affraid and amazed, that they began to fly, thinking all the city beſides had bene taken, where indeed the greateſt and ſtrongeſt quarter of the city called ACRADINA, was not yet touched: becauſe it is walled in round about, and ſeparated from the reſt of the city, which is deuided into two other parts, the one called the new city, & the other fortune. The two parts whereof being won, Marcellus by the breake of the day forced in by the gate or entrie of the Hexapile. And when his captaines told him he was happy, to win ſo goodly a city ſo eaſily: they ſay, that he (looking about him, and conſidering the greatneſſe & ſtatelineſſe of the ſame) wept for very pitie, foreſeeing whereto it ſhould come, thinking with himſelfe what a ſodaine change it ſhould haue, when his army came to ſpoile and ſacke the ſame. For there was not a captain that durſt deny the ſouldiers when they demaunded the ſpoile, and yet were there many that would needs haue it burnt and raſed to the ground. But Marcellus would not agree to that in any caſe, and beſides, it was ſore againſt his mind to grant them the ſpoile of the goods & ſlaues: ſtraightly commanding them notwithſtanding, not to lay hands of any free man, and not to kill, hurt, nor to make any SYRACVSAN ſlaue. Wherin, though he ſhewed great fauor and mercy, yet it grieued him to ſee ſo famous a city, brought to that miſerable ſtate: and in the midſt of all the ioy he had for his victorie, he could not refraine from weeping for pitie to ſee ſo rich and wealthie a citie, in the turning of a hand, ſpoiled and brought to nought. For it is ſaid, that the riches and goods taken away at the ſacke of SYRACVSA, were nothing inferiour to the ſpoiles of CARTHAGE, which was alſo ſacked not long after that: for the other part of the city of SYRACVSA called ACRADINA, was ſoone after alſo taken by treaſon, and ſpoiled againſt the captaines wils, ſauing the kings treaſure, which was reſerued to be caried to the common treaſure of ROME. SYRACVSA being taken, nothing grieued Marcellus more, then the loſſe of Archimedes: who being in his ſtudie when the city was taken, buſily ſeeking out by himſelfe the demonſtration of ſome Geometricall propoſition which he had drawne in figure, and ſo earneſtly occupied therein, as he neither ſaw nor heard any noiſe of enemies that ran vp and downe the citie, and much leſſe knew it was taken: he wondered when he ſaw a ſouldier by him, that bad him go with him to Marcellus. Notwithſtanding, he ſpake to the ſouldier, and bad him tarie vntill he had done his concluſion, and brought it to demonſtration: but the ſoldier being angry with his anſwer, drew out his ſword and killed him. Other ſay, that the ROMAINE ſouldier when he came, offered the ſwords point to him to kill him: and that Archimedes when he ſaw him, prayed him to hold his hand a litle, that he might not leaue the matter he looked for vnperfect, without demonſtration. But the ſoldier making no reckening of his ſpeculation, killed him preſently. It is reported a third way alſo, ſaying, that certaine ſouldiers met him in the ſtreets going to Marcellus, carying certaine Mathematicall inſtruments in a litle pretie coffer, as dials for the Sun, ſphæres and angles, wherewith they meaſure the greatneſſe of the body of the Sun by view: and they ſuppoſing he had caried ſome gold or ſiluer, or other precious iewels in that litle coffer, ſlue him for it. But it is moſt true, that Marcellus was maruellous ſory for his death, and euer after hated the villaine that ſlue him, as a curſed and execrable perſon: and how he made alſo maruellous much afterwards of Archimedes kinſmen for his ſake. The ROMAINES were eſteemed of at that time by all nations, for maruellous maruellous expert ſouldiers, and taken for very valiant and dangerous men to be dealt with: but they neuer ſhewed any example of their clemencie and curteſie, and leaſt of all of any ciuill maner to any ſtraungers, vntill Marcellus taught the way, whoſe actes did ſhew the GRECIANS then, that the ROMAINES were more gracious and mercifull then they. For he did ſo courteouſly intreate thoſe that had to do with him, and ſhewed ſuch fauour to priuate perſons, and alſo to whole cities: that if there were any crueltie ſhewed in the cities of ENNA, or at MEGARES, or againſt the SYRACVSANS, it was rather through their own fault and folly that were hurt, then theirs that did them the hurt. And for proofe hereof, I will recite you one example only among many. There is a citie in SICILE called ENGYIVM, it is no great thing, but a very ancient citie of name, by reaſon of the trafficke thither, for that there are certaine goddeſſes to be ſeene, whom they worſhip, called the mothers. Some ſay the CRETANS were the firſt builders and founders of the temple there, where you ſhall ſee ſpeares and helmets of copper, and vpon them are grauen the name of Meriones: and vpon others, Vlyſſes name alſo, which are conſecrated to theſe goddeſſes. This citie ſtood altogether at the deuotion of the CARTHAGINIANS: and Nicias being the chiefeſt man of the ſame, was all he might againſt it, and perſwaded them openly in all their counſels to take part with the ROMAINES, prouing it by many reaſons, that his enemies counſelling the contrary, were vnprofitable members of the common wealth. Wherupon Nicias enemies fearing his greatneſſe and authoritie, they did conſpire among themſelues to apprehend him, and to deliuer him to the CARTHAGINIANS. But Nicias hearing of ſuch a matter, and finding that they lay in waite to take him, vſed this pollicie to preuent their treaſon. He gaue out openly very ill ſpeeches againſt the goddeſſes, and did many things in derogation of their honour: and ſaid the ſight of them (which was a matter of great credite) was but a deuice, and that there was no credit to be giuen to them. Theſe words tickled his enemies, imagining that the common people would lay the miſchiefe they pretended againſt him, to himſelfe, as the onely cauſer of his owne hurt. So they hauing appointed a day to apprehend him, by chaunce a common counſell was kept that day they had determined of: where Nicias ſpeaking to the people about matter of counſell, in the midſt of his oration he fell to the ground, to the great wonder of the whole aſſembly, as euery man may coniecture. Howbeit, neuer a man ſtirred, and a pretie while after he began to lift vp his head a litle, and to looke gaſtly about him, with a faint trembling voice, which he ſtill gathered higher and lowder by litle and litle, vntill he ſaw all the people wonderouſly affraid and amazed, that not one of them durſt ſpeake. Then throwing his gowne from him, and renting his coate, he got vpon his feete halfe naked, and ran towards the gate of the Theater, crying out that the goddeſſes mothers did torment him: & not a man durſt once come neare him, nor offer to ſtop him, they were ſo ſuperſtitious & fooliſhly affraid of the goddeſſes, imagining it was ſome diuine puniſhment. But by this means he eaſily got to the gates of the city, and fled from them all: and he was neuer ſeene after that time, to do, or ſpeake like a mad man in any thing. His wife that was made priuy to his deuice, and furthered his intent, went firſt and fell downe on her knees before the goddeſſes mothers in their temple, as ſhe had hartily prayed vnto them: and fayning afterwards ſhe would go ſeeke her husband, that ran vp & down the fields like a mad man, ſhe went out of the city with her litle children, and no body troubled her. Thus did they eſcape without danger, & went vnto Marcellus to SYRACVSA. The ENGIENIANS afterwards played ſuch inſolent parts, that Marcellus in the end went thither, and cauſed them all to be taken and bound, as though he would haue put thē to execution. But Nicias came to him with teares in his eyes, and embracing his knees, and kiſſing his hands, beſought him to take pitie of his poore citizens, beginning firſt with thoſe that were his greateſt enemies. This good nature of Nicias ſo pacified Marcellus wrath, that he pardoned them all, and did no hurt to the city, and gaue Nicias certain land, beſides many other rich gifts he beſtowed vpon him. Thus it is reported in the hiſtory of Poſidonius the philoſopher. Now Marcellus being ſent for home by the ROMAINES, becauſe they had wars in their owne country, and euen at ROME gates: he departed out of SICILE returning towards ROME, and caried the goodlieſt tables, pictures, and ſtatues, and other ſuch ornaments as were in SYRACVSA, meaning firſt to beautifie his triumph with them, and to leaue them afterwards for an ornament to ROME, which before that time neuer knew what ſuch curious works meant. For, this fineneſſe, and curious tables and imagery, neuer came into ROME before, but was throughly ſet out with armour and weapons of barbarous people, and with bloudy ſpoils, and was alſo crowned with monuments of victories & triumphs of diuerſe enemies, which were no pleaſant, but rather fearefull ſights to looke vpon, farre vnfit for feminine eyes. But euen as Epaminondas called the plain of BOEOTIA, Mars his ſcaffold, where he kept his games: and Xenophon alſo called the city of EPHESVS, the armorers ſhop: euen ſo me thinkes (as Pindarus ſaid) they might rightly haue tearmed ROME, the temple of Mars fighting. And this wan the peoples good wils much more to Marcellus, becauſe he did ſo paſſingly ſet foorth ROME with ſuch excellent fine toyes of GRECE. But Fabius Maximus on the other ſide, was better beloued of the old men: becauſe he brought no ſuch toyes with him from the city of TARENTVM, when he wan it. Indeed he brought away gold and ready coine, and much other goods that were profitable: but for images and tables, he left them ſtanding in their places, ſpeaking a thing of great note: Let vs leaue the TARENTINES their gods offended with them. And furthermore the noble men were angry with Marcellus, ſaying, that by this act he had purchaſed ROME great malice and hate. Firſt, becauſe he did not onely lead men priſoners in his triumph, but the gods alſo: and ſecondly, becauſe he had filled the people full of prittle prattle, and idle curioſitie, ſpending all the whole day in gazing, and wondring at the excellencie of the workemen, and of their works, where before they would fall to their labour, or elſe they went to the wars, not being acquainted with curioſitie, nor idle life, as Euripides ſaid, ſpeaking of Hercules:

In wicked practiſes he ſimple was to ſee,

Notwithſtanding, Marcellus did glory amongſt the GRECIANS themſelues, ſaying: that he had taught the ROMAINES to eſteeme the wonderfull workes of GRECE, which they knew not before. But at his returne out of SICILE, his enemies procured, that his honour of triumph was denyed him. So Marcellus knowing that he had yet left ſomewhat to do in SICILE, and that the war was not altogether ended, and fearing beſides leaſt a third triumph would make him too much enuied: he was contented with good will to haue the honor of the great triumph in the mountaine of ALBA only: and of the litle triumph, in the city of ROME. This maner of litle triumph is called in Greek Euan, and the ROMAINES call it Ouatio. And this difference there is betweene them: that in the Ouation triumph, the party to whom it is graunted, doth not enter into the city vpon a triumphing chariot drawne with foure horſes, nor doth cary any lawrell vpon his head in token of triumph, nor hath any trumpets or hornes blowne before him, but doth march on foot with a paire of ſlippers on his feete, hauing flutes and howboyes playing before him, and wearing a garland of firre tree vpon his head: ſo as this maner of entrie is nothing warlike, and is rather a pleaſant then fearefull ſight. Whereby it plainely appeareth, that theſe two kinds of entries they graunted to the Captaines, returning from the warres with victorie: were diſtinguiſhed in the old time, rather by the manner, then by the greatneſſe of their doings. For ſuch as had ouercome their enemies by great ſlaughter and bloudy battels, they did make their entrie with pompe of triumph, that was altogether marſhall and terrible, followed with their ſouldiers armed, and crowned with lawrell garlands, as their cuſtome was in muſtering their campe in the warres. But they on the contrary ſide, that without any exploit of armes returned home with victorie, either by peaceable meanes, or by force of their eloquence: the law graunted them the honour of Ouation triumph, which was quiet, and full of all ioy and mirth. For the flute is an inſtrument of pleaſure belonging to peace, and the firre tree is a tree conſecrated to Venus, which goddeſſe, aboue all gods and goddeſſes doth moſt deteſt warres. This ſecond kind of entrie was called Ouatio, not as many GRECIANS haue taken it, comming of this word Euan, which is a voice and ſong of ioy, although they did vſe alſo to accompany the Captaines making their entry in this ſort, crying and ſinging Euan: but there were certaine GRECIANS that would haue fetched the deriuation of this word, from an old common cuſtome they had: and were of opinion beſides, that part of this honour did appertaine to god Bacchus, whoſe ſurname we call Euius, and ſometimes Thriambus. Howbeit this is not the true deriuation of the name, but after this ſort. At the great triumph and entry made, the captaine or generall that triumpheth as a Conqueror, did offer and ſacrifice (by the old orders and auncient cuſtomes of ROME) one or diuerſe oxen: where at the ſecond triumph called the Ouation, he only ſacrificed a mutton, which the ROMAINES call in their toung Ouem, and thereof it was called Ouation. And here by the way is to be noted, the difference betwixt the law-maker of the ROMAINE lawes and cuſtomes, and the law-maker of the LACEDÆMONIANS: how each of them was contrarie to the other, in appointing the ſacrifices for victorie. For at SPARTA, the captaine or General that had done his feat by policy or friendſhip, the ſacrifice he did offer vp to the gods, was an oxe: and he that by force and bloudy battell had obtained victory, only offered vp a cock for ſacrifice. For though they were very good ſoldiers, yet they thought better of his ſeruice, that by his wiſedome and wiſe perſwaſions obtained victorie: then of his, that wan it by valiantneſſe, and force of armes. Thus you may ſee which of theſe two law-makers had beſt reaſon in his ordinances. But now to Marcellus againe. He being choſen Conſull the fourth time, his enemies and euill willers did ſtirre vp the SYRACVSANS againſt him, and perſwaded them to complaine to the Senate of him, that he had cruelly and vncourteouſly vſed them, contrary to the auncient league and alliances made long before with the ROMAINES. Marcellus being ſacrificing one day in the Capitoll, while the Senate were ſet in counſell, the SYRACVSANS deputies came before them, and kneeling downe beſought them to giue them audience, and that they would do them iuſtice. The other Conſul that was preſent rebuked thē, being angry that they had ſo maliciouſly ſpied the occaſion of Marcellus abſence. But when Marcellus heard of it, he ſtraight left off all, and came to the Senate, and firſt ſate him downe in his Conſuls chaire, where he gaue audience as Conſull, and diſpatched diuers cauſes: when he had ſo done, he roſe out of his chaire, and came downe among them, ſtanding as a priuate perſon to anſwer at the barre, as other offenders and men accuſed, ſuffering the SYRACVSANS to alleage and ſay againſt him what they would. Then were the SYRACVSANS blanke, when they ſaw the maieſtie of Marcellus, and his ſtaied countenance in all things: and as they had found him before a very valiant man in wars, and vnconquerable, they found him then a man no leſſe dreadful in his Conſuls robe: ſo that they hung downe their heads, & durſt not looke him in the face. Notwithſtanding, they being ſuborned by his enemies, began at the length boldly to accuſe him, and yet with ſorrow and lamentation, the effect whereof was this: That they being the ROMAINES friends and confederates, had abidden ſuch iniuries at Marcellus hands, as all other Generals neuer offered their very enemies. Whereto Marcellus ſtraight anſwered againe to the contrary. That for many iniuries the ROMAINES had receiued of them, they ſuffered nothing but that which was vnpoſſible they ſhould not ſuffer, that reſiſted vntil they were taken by force: and yet they might thank themſelues for any thing they ſuffered, becauſe they would not obey nor conſent to reaſonable capitulations and articles of peace, which he had oftentimes offered them. And againe, they could not alleage for their excuſe, that the tyrants had compelled them to make warres: when they to the contrary, becauſe they would enter into wars, were contented to be ſubiect to a tyrant. So, when both parties had ſpoken their minds, the SYRACVSANS (as the maner is) went out of the Senate houſe, and Marcellus alſo, leauing his fellow Conſul in his place in the Senate, and taried without the doore, attending the ſentence of the Senate, neuer altering his countenance nor wōted look, neither for feare of ſentence, nor for malice or anger againſt the SYRACVSANS, quietly looking for his iudgement. Afterwards whē the Senators voices were gathered together, & that Marcellus was cleared by the moſt voices: then the SYRACVSANS fel downe at his feet weeping, & beſought him not to wreake his anger vpon them that were preſent, and moreouer that he would haue compaſſion of the reſidue of the citizens, who did acknowledge his great grace and fauor extended to them, and confeſſed themſelues bound to him for euer. Marcellus moued with pitie by their intreaty, he pardoned them, & euer after did to the SYRACVSANS what pleaſure he could poſſible. For through his intreatie and requeſt, the Senate did confirme and ratifie his graunt vnto them, which was: that they might vſe the libertie & benefit of their owne laws, & quietly enioy their goods alſo which were left them. To requite this ſpecial grace procured them by Marcellus, the SYRACVSANS gaue him many honors, and among others they made a law, that euer after, as oft as any of Marcellus name or houſe came into SICILE, the SYRACVSANS ſhould keep a ſolemne feaſt, with garlands on their heads, and ſhould alſo ſacrifice vnto the gods. After this, Marcellus went againſt Hannibal: & where al the other Conſuls almoſt, and Generals, after the ouerthrow at CANNES, had vſed this onely policy with him, not to come to battel: he took a contrary courſe to them all, thinking that tract of time (wherby they thought to eate out Hannibals force) was rather a direct conſuming & deſtroying of all ITALY: & that Fabius Maximus ſtanding too much vpon ſafety, tooke not the way to cure the diſeaſe & weaknes of the commonweale of ROME, looking to end this war, conſuming by litle and litle the ſtrength and power of ROME, committing a fearefull phiſitions fault and error, being afraide to heale the patient ſodainely, imagining that to bring them low, doth leſſen the diſeaſe. So firſt of all he went to beſiege certain great cities of the SAMNITES, which were reuolted from obedience of the Romaines: and those he wan againe with a great prouision of corne and mony he found in thē, besides 3000. souldiers Hanniball left in garrison there, whom he took prisoners.

Cneus Fuluius Viceconsull slaine in Apulia by Hannibal.

Hanniball after that, hauing slaine the Viceconsull Cneus Fuluius in Apvlia, with eleuen Tribunis militum (to wit, Colonels, euery one hauing the charge of a 1000. footmen) and ouerthrowne the greatest part of his armie: Marcellus wrote letters to Rome, hoping to comfort the Senate and people, telling he would go thither, and did warrant them he would driue Hanniball out of Apvlia. Whē the Romaines had read his letters, they were nothing the more comforted, but rather (as Liuy writeth) more afraid & discoraged: because they doubted the danger to come would be greater, then the losse past, taking Marcellus to be a far greater and better Generall, then euer was Fuluius. Neuertheless, Marcellus performing the contents of his letters written to Rome, draue Hanniball out of Apvlia, and made him retire into Lvcania. And Marcellus finding him in that country, by a city called Nvmistron, lodged vpon hils, and in places of strength and aduantage: he camped hard by him in the valley, and the next morning he was the first that presented his enemy battel. Hanniball on the other side, came downe into the vally, and they ioyned battel: which was so cruelly fought, and so long time, as it could not be descerned who had the better. For the battell being begun at nine of the clocke in the morning, it was darke night ere they gaue ouer. The next morning by peepe of day, Marcellus set his men againe in battell ray, in the middest of all the dead bodies that lay slaine in the field, and chalenged Hanniball, to proue who should haue the field. But Hanniball refused, and marched his way thence: so as Marcellus thereby had good leisure left him to strip his slaine enemies, and also to bury his own souldiers. When he had finished that, he presently followed his enemy by the foote, who laid many ambushes for him, but he could neuer trap him in any: and in euery encounter or skirmish they had together, Marcellus had euer the better, which wan him great fame and credit. Now time being come about to chuse new Consuls, the Senate thought good to send rather for the other Consull that was in Sicile, then to remoue Marcellus thence, who had fought with Hanniball. So when the other Consull was come to Rome, the Senate commaunded him to name Quintus Fuluius Dictator, because the Dictator was neither chosen by the people, nor by the Senate: but one of the Consuls or Prætors, in open assembly of the people, nameth such a one Dictator, as he liketh of. Wherefore it seemeth, that this word Dictator, came vpon that word naming: for, Dicere in the Romaine tongue, signifieth to name. Howbeit other hold opinion, that he was called Dictator, because he commandeth of himselfe what he will, without the counsell of the Senate, & the voices of the people: and this seemeth to be true, because the commaundements of the Senate of Rome are called Edicta, which we Grecians call Diatagmata. Now the other Consull and cōpanion of Marcellus being come out of Sicile, he would needs name another Dictator then him whom the Senate offered him: and because he would not be compelled to do that he was vnwilling to do, he stole away one night, and returned againe into Sicile. Hereupon the people did name and appoint Quintus Fuluius Dictator, and the Senate wrote their letters to Marcellus, to confirme him: which Marcellus did, & authorized the peoples electiō. So he himself was chosen again Proconsul for the next yeare following: in the which he hauing conferred with Fabius Maximus about the wars, they were agreed, that Fabius should proue if he could win the citie of Tarentvm againe: and that Marcellus in the meane time should keepe Hanniball occupied, that he might not come to aid it. This resolution being taken betweene them, Marcellus went to meet Hanniball by the citie of Cannvsivm: who as he still changed and shifted lodging, because he would not come to the battell against his will, found Marcellus euer in his eye before him. Insomuch as Hanniball remouing thus his camp, Marcellus plied him so one day with continuall alarums & skirmishes, that he brought thim to a battel that held all day long til night, and compelled them both to leaue off till the next morning: where Marcellus shewed againe in field by breake of the day, in battel ray. Wherat Hānibal being in a maruellous rage, he called his souldiers together, & made an oratiō to them, earnestly mouing them once again to fight with Marcellus, if euer they had heretofore fought for his sake. You see, said he, that hauing fought so many battels, and gottē such victories as we haue done, we cānot yet take breath as we would, nor be in quiet, how much soeuer we win, if we driue not away yonder fellow Marcellus. Whē Hanniball had ended his oration to the Carthaginians, he led them on to the battel: where Marcellus, to no purpose, & out of time, would needs shew Hanniball a stratagem of warre, that turned himselfe to the worst. For Marcellus perceiuing the right wing of his army distressed, made one of his legions that was set in in ray in the rereward of his hoast, to march to the front of his battell, to helpe those that needed aide. But this remouing of the legion, troubled them that fought, and gaue the enemies the victory: who slue that day two thousand seuen hundred of the ROMAINES. So, when Marcellus was come againe into his campe, he straight called his souldiers before him, to whom he spake in this maner: that he saw a great deale of armour, and bodies of men, but he could see no ROMAINES. The ROMAINES hearing him say so, besought him to pardon the fault they had committed. Marcellus answered, he would neuer pardon them, so long as they were ouercome: but whē they ouercame again, he was content to remit al. So the next morning he agreed to bring them againe to fight with the enemie, that such as were at ROME should rather heare newes of their victorie, then of their running away. When he had said, he appointed they should giue those bands that first turned their backes to Hannibal, barly for wheate. So as though many of them were in great daunger of their liues, for the sore wounds they had rece iuedin the battell: yet there was not a man of them, but Marcellus words did more grieue them thē the grieuous wounds they had. The next morning betimes was set out of the Generals tent, the coate armour died in skarlet, which is the ordinary signe of battell: & the bands that had receiued dishonor the day before, were placed at their owne request in the front of the battell. The other Captaines besides, that were not ouerthrowne, did leade their bands also to the field, and did set them in battell ray. Hannibal hearing of that, cried out: O gods, what a man is this, that can not be quiet, neither with good nor ill fortune? for he is the onely odde man, that neuer giueth rest to his enemie, when he hath ouercome him, nor taketh any for himselfe when he is ouercome. We shall neuer haue done with him, for any thing that I see, sith shame, whether he win or loose, doth still prouoke him to be bolder and valianter. After orations made of both sides, both armies marched forwards to ioyne battell. The ROMAINES being as strong as the CARTHAGINIANS, Hannibal put his Elephants in the voward and front of his battell, and commanded his men to driue them vpon the ROMAINES: and so they did. Which in deed did somewhat trouble and disorder the first rankes of the ROMAINES: vntill such time as Flauius Tribune of the souldiers, tooke an ensigne in his hands, and marched before the beasts, and gaue the first of them such a thrust with the point of his ensigne, that he made her turne backe. The first beast being turned backe thus, ran vpon the second that followed her, and the second made the third go backe also, and so from one to another, vntill they all turned. Marcellus perceiuing that, commaunded his horsemen to set vpon the enemies with all the fury they could, in that place where he saw them somewhat troubled with these beasts, that turned backe againe vpon them: and that they should driue them further in amongst them. Which they did, and gaue so hot a charge vpon the CARTHAGINIANS, that they made them turne their backes and runne away, and they pursued them still, killing them downe right, euen to their camp side: where was the greatest slaughter of all, by reason their Elephants that were wounded, fell downe starke dead within the gate of their camp. And they say, of the CARTHAGINIANS there were slaine at this battel, aboue eight thousand, and of the ROMAINES only three thousand: howbeit all the rest of them for the most part were very sore hurt. Which fell out very well for Hannibal, that he might march away at his pleasure, as he did that night, & got him away far off from Marcellus, as knowing he was not in state to follow him ouer sodainly, because of the great number of hurt men in his camp: and so by small iourneis he went into CAMPANIA, where he lay in garrison all the sommer, in the city of SINVESSE, to heale the wounds of his sore mangled souldiers. Hannibal hauing now gotten himselfe at the length out of Marcellus hands, and hauing his army free to serue him as he thought good: he burned and destroyed all ITALY where he went, and stood no more in feare of any thing. This made Marcellus ill spoken of at ROME, and caused his enemies to take hold of such a matter against him: for they straight raised Publius Bibulus Tribune to accuse him, who was a hote harebrained man, but very eloquent, and could deliuer his mind very wel. So this Bibulus called the people oft to counsel, & told them there, that they must needs call home Marcellus, and appoint some other to take the charge of the army: for as for him, said he, because he hath fought a litle with Hannibal (and as a man might say, wrestled a litle with him) he is now gotten to the bathes to solace himselfe. But Marcellus hearing this, left his Lieutenants in the camp, & went himself to ROME, to answer to the vntrue accusations laid against him, and there he perceiued at his comming, how they intended to prosecute the matter against him vpon these informations. So a day of hearing was appointed for his matter, & the parties came before the people assēbled in coūsel, in the great lists, or shew place, called Circus Flaminius, to giue iudgement. There Publius Bibulus the Tribune, ſitting in his chaire, laid open his accuſation with great circumſtance: and Marcellus, when Bibulus had told his tale, anſwered him in few words, and very diſcreetly, onely touching his purgation. But the noble and chiefeſt men of the citie, roſe vp and ſpake on Marcellus behalfe, telling the people plainly that they did Marcellus wrong, to reckon worſe of his valiantneſſe, then their enemy did: and to iudge of him as a coward, conſidering Hannibal onely fled from him, of all other captaines, and would by no meanes fight with him, neuer refuſing to fight with any other whatſoeuer. Theſe perſwaſions tooke ſuch effect, as where Marcellus accuſer looked for his condemnation, Marcellus to the contrary, was not onely cleared of his accuſation, but furthermore, they choſe him Conſull againe the fift time. So being entred into his office, he wēt firſt into THVSCAN: where viſiting the good cities one after another, and quieting them, he pacified a great ſedition in the country, when they were all ready to riſe & rebel. Afterwards at his returne, he thought to conſecrate the temple of honor and vertue, which he had built with the ſpoiles he got in the wars of SICILE. But the Prieſts were againſt it, ſaying, two gods might not be in one church. Thereupon he built another temple, and ioyned it to the firſt, being very angry the Prieſts denied ſo his conſecration: and he did take it for an euill token, beſides diuers other ſignes in the element that afterwards appeared, and troubled him much. For there were may temples ſet on fire with lightning at one time: and the rats and miſe did gnaw the gold, that was in the chappell of Iupiter Capitoline. And it is reported alſo, that an oxe did ſpeake: and a child came out of the head of an Elephant, and that the child was aliue. Furthermore, the Prieſts and Soothſayers ſacrificing to the gods, to withdraw the euil from them, theſe ſiniſter tokens did threaten: they could neuer find any fauourable ſignes in their ſacrifices. Whereupon they ſought to keepe Marcellus ſtill at ROME, who had a maruellous earneſt deſire to be gone with ſpeed to the warres: for neuer man longed for any thing ſo much, as Marcellus did, to fight with Hannibal. In ſomuch he neuer dreamed other thing in the night, nor ſpake of any matter els in the day to his friends & cōpaniōs, nor praied to the gods for any other thing, but that he might fight with Hannibal in the field: and I thinke he would willingliеſt haue fought a priuate combat with him, in ſome walled city or incloſed liſts for the combat. And had it not bene that he had already won himſelfe a great fame, and ſhewed himſelf to the world, (by ſundry great proofes and experience of his doings) a graue, skilfull, and a valiant Captaine as any man of his time: I would haue ſaid it had bene a pang of youth, and a more ambitious deſire, then became a man of his age, who was three ſcore yeare old at that time, when they made him Conſull againe the fift time. Neuertheleſſe, after he had ended all his propitiatory ſacrifices & purifications, ſuch as the ſoothſayers had appointed, he departed from ROME with his fellow Conſull Quintus Criſpinus to the wars. He found Hannibal lying betweene the cities of BANCIA, and VENOVSA, and ſought all the means he could to procure him to fight, but he could neuer get him to it. Howbeit Hannibal being aduertiſed by ſpials, that the Conſuls ſet an army to beſiege the city of the LOCRIANS, ſurnamed EPIZEPHYRIANS: (as ye would ſay) the occidentals, becauſe the GRECIANS in reſpect of the ITALIANS, are called the orientals:) he laid an ambuſh for them that went, vnder the hil of PETELIVM, which was directly in their way, where he ſlue about two thouſand fiue hundred ROMAINES. That ouerthrow did ſet Marcellus on fire, and made him more deſirous of battell: whereupon he remoued his campe from the place he lay in, and marched nearer to his enemie. Betweene their two camps there was a prety litle hill, ſtrong of ſituation, a wild thing ouergrown with wood: and there were high hillockes, from whence they might diſcerne a great way, both the one and the others campe, and at the foot of the ſame ran prety ſprings: inſomuch as the ROMAINES wondred, that Hannibal comming thither firſt, did not take that place, but had left it to his enemies. Howbeit Hannibal was crafty enough, leauing it of purpoſe: for as it was commodious to lodge his campe, ſo it ſerued his turne better for an ambuſh. So he filled the wood, the hollow places, and the vallies thereabout, with ſtore of ſhot and ſpearemen, aſſuring himſelfe that the place would entiſe the ROMAINES thither: and in deed he geſſed rightly, for ſo it fell out. Straight there flue a rumour abroade in the ROMAINES campe, that there was a paſſing place to lodge in, and euery man tooke vpon him like a skilfull ſouldier, to tell what vantage they ſhould haue vpon their enemies by taking that place, and ſpecially if they did lodge there, or otherwiſe built a fort vpon it. Whereupon Marcellus determined to go ſee the place himſelfe, taking a few horſemen with him. Notwithſtanding, before he would take horſe, he called for his ſoothſayer to ſacrifice to the gods. The firſt beaſt that was ſacrificed, the Soothſayer ſhewed Marcellus the liuer liuer of it without a head. The ſecond beaſt ſacrificed, had a faire great head of a liuer, and all the other parts were alſo ſound, and very new: that by them it appeared all the feare of the firſt ſignes and tokens were taken away. Yet the Soothſayers on the other ſide ſaid, it did make them worſe afraid then before: for theſe ſo fauourable and luckie tokens of the ſacrifice, following immediatly after the firſt foule and naughtie ſignes, made them doubt them much, by reaſon of ſo ſtrange and ſodaine an alteration. But as the Poet Pindarus ſaith:

Nor force of burning fire, nor wall of ſteele nor ſtone, nor whatſoeuer other thing, is here this earth vpon:
Can keepe abacke the courſe of fatall deſtiny, nor yet reſiſt the due decrees, which come from heauen on high.

So Marcellus tooke his horſe, with Quintus Criſpinus his fellow Conſull, and his ſonne one of the Tribunes of the ſouldiers, hauing only two hundred & twenty horſemen with him, of the which there was not one ROMAINE among them, but all were THVSCANS, ſauing forty FREGELLANIANS, who from the beginning of theſe warres, had alwayes ſhewed themſelues very faithfull and louing to Marcellus. The hil we ſpake of before, being thicke couered with wood and buſhes, the enemies had ſet a skout to watch on the top of it, to giue warning if they ſaw any comming towards it. The ROMAINES could not ſee him, and he on the other ſide might ſee euen into their campe, and perceiue what was done: as he did aduertiſe thoſe at that time that lay in amhuſh for Marcellus comming: and they ſuffered him to paſſe on, vntill he came directly againſt them. Then they ſhewed vpon the ſodain, and compaſſing in Marcellus, they both ſhot & ſtrake at him, ſome following them that fled, and other fighting with the forty FREGELLANIANS which only ſtucke to it: who came roundly in together (notwithſtandanding the THVSCANS were fled) vpon the firſt crie they heard, to defend the two Conſuls, vntill ſuch time as the Conſull Criſpinus hauing two wounds on his body with a dart, did turne his horſe to flie. And with that, one of the enemies gaue Marcellus ſuch a ſore blow with a ſpeare hauing a broade iron head, that he ranne him quite through. The FREGELLANIANS that were left aliue, being but a few in number, ſeeing Marcellus ſlaine, left him lying on the ground, and tooke his ſonne away with them, that was very ſore hurt, and by the ſwiftneſſe of their horſes recouered their camp, and ſaued themſelues. At this ouerthrow, there were not ſlaine aboue fortie men, and fiue and twenty taken priſoners, of which fiue of them were the Conſuls ſergeants, and their officers that caried axes before them, and the other were all horſemen. Within few dayes after, the other Conſull Criſpinus died alſo of his hurts, which was ſuch a misfortune, as neuer came before to the ROMAINES, that both their Conſuls were ſlaine at one battel. Now Hannibal made no great reckoning of all that were ſlaine, or taken at this field: but when he heard that Marcellus ſelfe was ſlaine at this ouerthrow, he went himſelfe ſtraight to the place to ſee him. So when he had viewed his bodie a great while, ſtanding hard by it, and conſidering his ſtrength, his ſtature, and countenance, hauing taken full view of all the parts of him, he ſpake no proud word againſt him, nor ſhewed any glad countenance, as ſome other would haue done, that had ſlaine ſo valiant and daungerous an enemie: but wondering how he came to be ſlaine ſo ſtrangely there, he tooke off his ring from one of his fingers that ſealed his letters, and giuing his bodie buriall according to his eſtate, made it to be honourably burnt, and then put all his bones and aſhes into a ſiluer pot, on which he himſelfe put a crowne of gold, and ſent it vnto Marcellus ſonne. It fortuned ſo, that certaine light horſemen of the NVMIDIANS met with them that caried this ſiluer pot, and would haue taken it from them by force, but they ſtood to it, and would not part withall, and ſo fighting and ſtriuing together for it, the bones and aſhes were ſcattered all about. Hannibal hearing this, ſaid to them that were about him: ſee, how nothing can be, which the gods will not. So he puniſhed the NVMIDIANS, and cared no more to get Marcellus bones together, but perſwaded himſelfe it was the will of the gods he ſhould die ſo ſtrangely, and that his body ſhould haue no buriall. Cornelius Nepos, and Valerius Maximus write it thus: but Liuy and Auguſtus Cæſar ſay, that the pot was caried vnto his ſonne, and honorably buried: Marcellus did conſecrate many monuments in diuers places, beſides thoſe at ROME. As at CATANA in SICILE: a place for young men to exerciſe themſelues in. In the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, in the temples of the gods called Cabires: many images and tables he brought from SYRACVSA. And in the Ile of LINDOS, in the temple of Minerua, where among other, there is a ſtatue of his, and this Epigramme grauen vnder it, as Poſidonius the Philoſopher writeth:

Marcellus poſteritie. The Author of this Epigramme reckoneth, the two times of his being Viceconſull, for two whole Conſulſhips: but his poſteritie continued alwayes in great honour, vnto Marcellus the ſonne of Octauia, (Auguſtus Cæſars ſiſter) and of Caius Marcellus. He died a yong man, being Ædilis of Rome, and maried vnto Iulia, Auguſtus daughter, with whom he liued no long time. But to honour the memory of him, Octauia his mother built the Librarie, and Auguſtus Cæſar the Theater, which are called to this day, Marcellus Theater and Librarie.

THE COMPARISON OF Marcellus with Pelopidas.

Pelopidas and Marcellus acts in warres. THeſe are the greateſt things and beſt worthy of memorie (in my opinion) of all Pelopidas and Marcellus doings: and for their maners and naturall conditions otherwiſe, they were all one, becauſe they were both valiant, painfull, and noble minded: ſauing that this difference onely was betweene them: that Marcellus in many cities he tooke by aſſault, did cruelly murder them, and ſpilt much bloud: where Epaminondas and Pelopidas contrarily did neuer put any to the ſword they ouercame, neither did they take away the libertie from any citie they tooke: as it is thought the Thebans would not haue handled the Orchomenians ſo cruelly as they did, if one, or both of them had bene preſent. Now for their acts, it was a noble and wonderfull peece of ſeruice that Marcellus did, with ſo ſmall a company of horſemen as he tooke with him, to ouerthrow ſo great a company of horſemen and footmen both, of the Gavles: a thing that neuer Generall but himſelfe did, and ſpecially that ſlue with his owne hands in the field, the Generall of his enemies: which Pelopidas could neuer attaine vnto, for he ſeeking to kill Alexander the tyrant of Pheres, was ſlaine firſt himſelfe, and ſuffered that, which he deſired to haue done to another. And yet for that ſeruice may be obiected, the battels of Leuctres, and of Tegyra, which were both famous and notable. But to encounter with thoſe, there was no notable ambuſh or ſecret practiſe done by Marcellus, that was any thing like comparable to that Pelopidas did at his returne from exile, when he ſlue the tyrants that kept Thebes in bondage. For that was as notable a pollicie and ſodaine an enterpriſe ſtolen vpon, as none was euer greater, or more famous. It is true Marcellus was yoked with Hanniball, who was a dreadfull and a violent enemy: ſo were the Thebans alſo at that very time with the Laced æmonians, who notwithſtanding were ouercome of Pelopidas, at the battels of Tegyra, and of Leuctres. Whereas Marcellus did neuer ſo much as once ouercome Hanniball, as Polybius writeth, but but remained vnconquered alwaies, vntill that Scipio ouercame him in battell. Notwithstanding, we do giue best credit to the reports of Cæsar, Liuie, Cornelius Nepos, and of king Iuba among the GRECIANS: who write, that Marcellus otherwhile did ouerthrow certaine of Hannibals companies, howbeit they were neuer no great ouerthrowes to speake of, and it seemeth rather, it was through some mockery or deceit of that AFRICAN then otherwise. Yet sure it was a great matter and worthy much commendation, that the ROMAINES were brought to that courage, as they durst abide to fight with the CARTHAGINIANS, after so many great ouerthrowes, and hauing so many Generals of their armies slaine in battell, and the whole Empire of ROME being in so great danger of vtter destruction. For it was Marcellus only of all other Generals, that put the ROMAINES in hart againe, after so great and long a feare throughly rooted in them: and incouraged the souldiers also to long to fight with their enemy, and not onely to hope, but to assure themselues of victory. For, where by reason of their continuall losses and fearefull ouerthrowes they had, they thought themselues happy men to escape Hannibals hands by running away: he taught them to be ashamed to flie like cowards, to confesse they were in distresse, to retire, and leaue the field, before they had ouercome their enemies. And where Pelopidas was neuer ouercome in battell being Generall, and Marcellus did ouercome more then any Generall in his time: it might seeme therefore that the great number of the victories of the one, should compare with the good hap of the other that was neuer ouercome. It is true that Marcellus tooke the city of SYRACVSA, and Pelopidas failed of taking the city of SPARTA: but yet do I thinke, that it was more valiantly done of Pelopidas to come so neere SPARTA as he did, and that he was the first that passed the riuer of EVROTAS with an army, which neuer enemy did before him, then it was of Marcellus to win all SICILE. Vnlesse some peraduenture wil say againe, this was Epaminondas, not Pelopidas act, as also in the victory of LEVCTRES: whereas no man liuing can challenge any part of glory in the doings of Marcellus: for he tooke SYRACVSA, being only Generall alone, and did ouerthrow the GAVLES without his fellow Consull, & fought with Hannibal, without any mans helpe or incouragement (for all other were against it, and perswaded the contrary) and he was the first that altered the maner of wars the ROMAINES vsed then, and that trained his souldiers, that they durst fight with the enemy. For their death, I neither commend the one nor the other, and the strangenesse of either of their deaths doth grieue me maruellously: as I do greatly wonder also, how Hannibal in so many battels as he fought (which are innumerable) could alwayes scape vnhurt. I cannot but greatly commend also the valiantnesse of one Chryssantas, whom Xenephon speaketh of in his booke of the institution of Cyrus, saying: that he hauing lift vp his sword in his hand ready to kill one of his enemies, and hearing the trumpet sound the retraite, he softly retired, and would not strike him. Howbeit it seemeth Pelopidas is more to be excused: for beside that he was very hote and desirous of battell, his anger was honourable and iust, and moued him to seeke reuenge. For as the poet Euripides saith:

The best that may betide, is when a captaine liues,
and doth suruiue the victories, which he with force atchieues:
But if he needs must fall, then let him valiantly euen thrust amid the thickest throng, and there with honor die.

For so becommeth his death famous, and not dishonorable. But now, besides Pelopidas iust cause of anger, yet was there another respect that most pricked him forward, to do that he did: for he saw his victory ended, in the death of the tyrant: otherwise he should hardly haue found so noble an occasion to haue shewed his valiantnesse, as in that. And Marcellus contrarily, without any instant necessity, and hauing no cause of heate or choller (which putteth all men valiant in fight besides themselues, that they know not what they do) did rashly & vnaduisedly, thrust himselfe into the middest of the danger, where he died not as a Generall, but as a light horsman and skout (abandoning his three triumphes, his fiue Consulships, and his spoiles and tokens of triumph, which he had gotten of kings with his owne hands) among venturous SPANIARDS and NVMIDIANS, that sold their bloud & liues for pay vnto the CARTHAGINIANS: so that I imagine they were angry with themselues (as a man would say) for so great and happy a victory, to haue slaine amongst FREGELLANIAN skouts, and light horsemen, the noblest and worthiest person of the ROMAINES. I would no man should thinke I speake this in reproch of the memory of these two famous men, but as a griefe only of them and their valiantnesse: which they employed so, as they blemished all their other vertues, by the vndiscreete hazarding of their persons and liues without cause, as if they would and should haue died for themselues, and not rather for their countrey and friends. And also when they were dead, Pelopidas was buried by the allies and confederates of the city of THEBES, for whose cause he was slaine: and Marcellus in like maner, by the enemies selues that had slaine him. And sure the one is a happy thing, and to be wished for in such a case: but the other is farre aboue it, and more to be wondered at: That the enemy himselfe should honour his valiantnesse and worthinesse that hurt him, more then the office of friendship performed by a thankfull friend. For nothing moueth the enemy more to honour his dead enemy, then the admiration of his worthinesse: and the friend sheweth friendship many times, rather for respect of the benefits he hath receiued, then for the loue he beareth to his vertue.

THE LIFE OF Aristides.

ARISTIDES the son of Lysimachus, was certainly of the tribe of Antiochides, and of the towne of ALOPECIA. But for his goods and wealth, they diuersly write of him. For some say, he liued poorely all the dayes of his life, and that he left two daughters, which by reason of their pouerty, liued vnmaried many yeares after their fathers death. And many of the oldest writers do confirme that for troth. Yet Demetrius Phalerius, in his booke intituled Socrates, writeth the contrary: that he knew certaine lands Aristides had in the village of PHALERIA, which did yet beare the name of Aristides lands, in the which his body is buried. And furthermore, to shew that he was well to liue, and that his house was rich and wealthy, he bringeth forth these proofes. First, that he was one yeare Mayor or Prouost of ATHENS, whom they called Archon Eponymos, because the yeare tooke the name of him that had it yearely. And they say he came to it by drawing of the beane, according to the auncient vse of the ATHENIANS, and their wonted manner of making their election of the sayd office: in which election none were admitted to draw the beane, but such as were highest set in their subsidie bookes, according to the value and rate of their goods, whom they called at ATHENS, Pentacosiomedimnes, as you would say, those that might dispend fiue hundred bushels of wheat by the yeare, and vpwards. Secondly, he alledgeth he was banished by the Ostracismon, which banisheth the nobility and great rich men onely, whom the common people enuie, because of their greatnesse, and neuer dealeth with

with poore men. The third and laſt reaſon he makes is, that he left of his gift, three footed ſtooles in the temple of Bacchus, which thoſe do commonly offer vp, as haue won the victory in comedies, tragedies, or other ſuch like paſtimes, whereof they themſelues had borne the charge. And thoſe three footed ſtooles remaine there yet, which they ſay were giuen by Ariſtides, and haue this inſcription vpon them: The tribe of Antiochides wanne the victorie, Ariſtides defrayed the charges of the games, and Archeſtratus the Poet taught them to play his comedies. The laſt reaſon, though it ſeeme likelieſt of them all, yet is it the weakeſt of the reſt. For Epaminondas (whom euery man knoweth was poore euen from his birth, and alwayes liued in great pouertie) and Plato the Philoſopher, tooke vpon them to defray the charges of games that were of no ſmall expence: the one hauing borne the charges of flute players at THEBES, and the other the daunce of the children which daunced in a round at ATHENS: towards the furniſhing of which charges Dion the SYRACVSAN gaue Plato money, and Pelopidas alſo gaue Epaminondas money. Now, this is not ſpoken that vertuous men ſhould alwayes refuſe the gifts of their friends, and that they might not in ſome ſort accept their friends curteſie offered them: but becauſe they ſhould thinke it vncomely and diſhonourable for them, to take any thing to enrich themſelues, or to ſpare and hoord vp. Howbeit where there is any honorable act to be done, or any publike ſhew to be made, not tending to their priuate benefit: in ſuch a caſe they ſhould not refuſe their friends louing offer, and goodwill towards them. And where Demetrius ſaith, the three footed ſtoole was offered vp in the temple of Bacchus, Panætius declareth plainly, that Demetrius was deceiued by the ſemblance of the name. For ſince the time of the wars of the MEDES, vnto the beginning of the warre of PELOPONNESVS, in all the regiſters and records kept of the defrayers of the charges of common playes, there were found but two men bearing name of Ariſtides that obtained victory: and neither of them both was ſonne vnto Lyſimachus, whom we write of at this preſent. For the one is expreſſely named the ſon of Xenophilus, and the other was long after the ſame Ariſtides we now ſpeake of: as appeareth eaſily by the writing and orthographie, which is according to the grammer rules, we haue vſed in GREECE euer ſince Euclides time. Moreouer it is eaſie to be knowne, by the name of the poet Archeſtratus that is adioyned to it: for there is no man that maketh mention of a poet of this name, in all the warres of the MEDES: but in the time of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, many do put him in for an author and maker of rimes and ſongs that were ſung in common daunces. Yet for all Panætius obiections, the matter is to be better looked into, and conſidered of. But for the Oſtraciſmon baniſhment, it is true, that ſuch as were great men in eſtimation aboue the cõmon people, either in fame, nobility, or eloquence, they onely were ſubiect vnto this baniſhment. For Damon himſelfe, being Pericles ſchoolemaiſter, was baniſhed, only becauſe the common people thought him too wiſe. Moreouer, Idomeneus writeth, that Ariſtides was their prouoſt for a yeare, not by lot of beanes, but by voices of the ATHENIANS that choſe him. And if he were prouoſt ſince the iourney of PLATÆES, as Demetrius writeth, it is likely inough that they did him this honour, for his great vertue and notable ſeruice, which other were wont to obtaine for their riches. But this Demetrius doth not only defend Ariſtides, but alſo Socrates pouertie, as if it were a foule vice and reproch to be poore. For he writeth, that he had not onely a houſe of his owne, but alſo threeſcore and ten minas at vſurie, which Criton gaue him intereſt for. But now to our ſtory againe. Ariſtides was Cliſthenes very friend, he that reſtored the gouernement at ATHENS after the expulſion of the thirty tyrants, and did reuerence Lycurgus the Law-maker of the LACEDÆMONIANS for his lawes, aboue all the men in his time: and therefore he euer fauoured the ſtate of Ariſtocratia, that is, where the noble men rule, and haue the ſoueraignty. Howbeit he euer had Themiſtocles (Neocles ſonne) his continuall aduerſarie, as taking part with the contrary, and defending the popular ſtate of gouernement. Some ſay, that being ſchollers, and brought vp together, they were euer contrary one to another in all their actions and doings, were it in ſport, or in matters of earneſt: and euer after, men beganne to ſee the naturall inclination of them both, by their contrarie affections. For Themiſtocles was quicke, nimble, aduenturous, and ſubtill, and would venter on any thing vpon light occaſion. Ariſtides contrariwiſe was very quiet, temperate, conſtant, and maruellous well ſtaied, who would for no reſpect be drawne away from equity and iuſtice, neither would lie, flatter, nor abuſe any body, though it were but in ſport. Notwithſtanding, Ariſtus of CHIO writeth, that their malice beganne firſt of light loue, and that it grew to greatneſſe by proceſſe of time betweene them: for (ſaith he) both the one and the other of them fell in loue with Steſileus, borne in the Ile of CEOS. This fond light loue of theirs, fell not eaſily from them, nor the enuy they conceiued one againſt another, but continued againſt each other in matters of ſtate: ſuch was their malice towards one another. In which calling, Themiſtocles ſought the way to winne friends, by whoſe meanes he came to great preferment in ſhort time, and had made himſelfe very ſtrong by them. Therefore, when a friend of his told him one day, he was worthy to gouerne the city of ATHENS, and were very fit for it, if he were indifferent, and not partiall. The gods forbid (quoth he) I ſhould euer occupie the place of a gouernour, where my friends ſhould not find more fauour then ſtrangers, that do me no pleaſure. But Ariſtides taking another courſe by himſelfe, would not ſtand vpon his friends in gouernment. Firſt, becauſe he would do no man wrong with pleaſuring his friends: nor yet would anger them, by denying their requeſts. Secondly, becauſe he ſaw many rulers and men of authority bold to do iniuſtice, and manifeſt wrong, bearing themſelues vpon their friends: but he caried this opinion, that no honeſt man, or good citizen, ſhould truſt to any bolſtring of friends, but to his owne iuſt and vpright doings. Notwithſtanding, Ariſtides perceiuing that Themiſtocles did raſhly alter many things, and euer encountered all his wayes, and hindered his doings, he was enforced ſometime to croſſe Themiſtocles againe, and to ſpeake againſt that he preferred, partly to be euen with him, but moſt to hinder his credit and authority, which increaſed ſtill through the peoples fauour and goodwils towards him: thinking it better by contrarying him a litle to diſappoint ſometime a thing that might haue fallen out well for the common-wealth, rather then by giuing him the head, to ſuffer him to grow too great. To conclude, it fortuned on a time that Themiſtocles hauing preferred a matter very profitable for the common-wealth, Ariſtides was ſo much againſt it, as Themiſtocles purpoſe tooke no place. Moreouer Ariſtides was ſo earneſt againſt him, that when the counſell brake vp after Themiſtocles motion was reiected, he ſpake it openly before them all: that the common-wealth of ATHENS would neuer proſper vntill they both were layd in Barathrum, which was a priſon or hole, wherein they put all theeues and condemned men. Another time, Ariſtides moued a matter to the people, which diuerſe were againſt, but yet it went with him. And when the Iudge or Preſident of the counſell did put it to the people, to know their allowance of it: Ariſtides perceiuing by the arguments made againſt it, that the matter he preferred was hurtfull to the common-wealth, he gaue it ouer, and would not haue it paſſe. Many times alſo Ariſtides ſpake by other men, when he would haue a thing go forward, for feare leaſt Themiſtocles ſpite towards him, would hinder the benefit of the common-wealth. They found him very conſtant and reſolute in matters of ſtate, whatſoeuer happened: which wan him great commendation. For he was neuer the prouder for any honor they gaue him, nor thought himſelfe diſgraced for any ouerthrow he receiued: being alwayes of this mind, that it was the duty of an honeſt citizen, to be euer ready to offer his body and life to do his countrey ſeruice, without reſpect and hope of reward of money, or for honour and glory. Therefore when certaine verſes were repeated in the Theater, of one of the tragedies of Æſchilus made in commendation of the ancient ſoothſayer Amphiaraus, to this effect:

He will not onely ſeeme, a iuſt man by his face, but iuſt indeed he will be found, and vertue ſtill embrace
With all his thought and ſoule, from whence there may proceed graue counſels, for to beautifie his countries crowne indeed.

All the people ſtraight caſt their eyes vpon Ariſtides, as vpon him, that in truth aboue all other moſt deſerued the praiſe of ſo great a vertue. For he was ſo ſtout and reſolute, not onely to reſiſt fauour and friendſhip, but to reiect hate and anger alſo. For in caſe of iuſtice, neither could friendſhip make him go awry for his friends ſake: nor enuy could moue him to do iniuſtice, to his very enemy. For proofe hereof it is written, that he had an enemy of his in ſute of law, and did proſecute it to iudgement: inſomuch as after the plaint was read, the Iudges were ſo angry with the offender, that without any more hearing of him, they would haue giuen ſentence againſt him. But Ariſtides riſing from his place, went and kneeled at the Iudges feete with the offender his enemie, and beſought them to giue him leaue to ſpeake, to iuſtifie and defend his cauſe, according to the courſe of law. Another time he being Iudge betweene two priuate men that pleaded before him, one of them ſayd vnto him: Ariſtides, this fellow mine aduerſarie here, hath done you great iniurie. My friend (quoth Ariſtides againe) I pray thee tell me onely the iniury he hath done thee, for I am Iudge here to do thee right, and not my ſelfe. Moreouer, he being choſen choſen high treaſurer of all the reuenues of ATHENS, did declare that all the officers before him, and other his late predeceſſours, had greatly robbed and ſpoiled the common treaſure, but ſpecially Themiſtocles: who was a wiſe man, and of great iudgement, but yet ſomewhat light fingered. Therefore when Ariſtides was to giue vp his account, Themiſtocles and many other ſubborned by him, were againſt him, and accuſed him for abuſing his office, and followed him ſo hard, that through their practiſe they condemned him, as Idomeneus writeth. Yet the nobleſt citizens ſeeing what iniurie they offered Ariſtides, tooke his cauſe in hand, and found meanes to procure the people not onely to releaſe the fine impoſed vpon him, but to reſtore him againe to his office of high treaſurer for the yeare following: in the which he ſeemed to repent his former ſtraightneſſe in gouernment the yeare before, and dealt more fauourably with thoſe he had to do with, and would not examine euery thing ſo ſtraightly as he did before. Wherupon ſuch as were theeues and ſtealers of the treaſure of the common-wealth, did maruellouſly praiſe and like him, and became ſuters for him to continue in the office. But when the day of election came, that the ATHENIANS would chuſe him againe, Ariſtides ſelfe reproued them, and ſayd: When I faithfully diſcharged the duty of mine office committed to me by you, I then receiued ſhame and reproch at your hands: and now that I haue diſſembled, not ſeeming to ſee the theſts and robberies done vpon your treaſure, ye claw me, and ſay I am an honeſt man, and a good citizen. But I would you knew it, and I tell you plainely, I am more aſhamed of the honour you do me now, then I was of the fine you did ſet vpon me, when you condemned me the laſt yeare: and I am ſory to ſpeake it, that you ſhould thinke it more commendation to pleaſure the wicked, then to preſerue the common-wealth. After he had ſpoken theſe words, and had bewrayed the common theſts the officers of the city did commit, he ſtopped the theeues mouthes that ſo highly praiſed and commended him for ſo honeſt a man: but yet of the noble and honeſt citizens he was much commended. Furthermore, on a time when Dathis Lieutenant to Darius king of PERSIA, was come with all his nauy to go a land about MARATHON, in the country of ATTICA, vpon pretence (as he ſayd) to be reuenged onely of the ATHENIANS that had burnt the city of SARDIS, but indeed of mind to conquer all GREECE, and to deſtroy the whole countrey before him: the ATHENIANS choſe ten captaines to go to the warres, among whom Miltiades was the chiefeſt man of authority. But Ariſtides drew very neare him in reputation and credit, becauſe he did very good ſeruice in obtaining the victory, ſpecially when he agreed with Miltiades in counſell, to giue battell vpon the barbarous people: and alſo when he willingly gaue Miltiades the whole rule and order of the army. For euery one of the ten captaines did by turnes leade the whole army for one whole day: and when Ariſtides turne came about, he gaue his preferment thereof vnto Miltiades, teaching his other companions, that it was no ſhame, but honor for them to be ruled by the wiſeſt. Thus by his example, he appeaſed all ſtrife that might haue growne among them, and perſwaded them all to be contented to follow his direction and counſell, that had beſt experience in the warre. And ſo he did much aduance Miltiades honor. For after that Ariſtides had once yeelded his authority vnto him, euery one of the reſt did the like when it came to their turne: and ſo they all ſubmitted themſelues vnto his rule and leading. But on the day of the battell, the place where the ATHENIANS were moſt combred, was in the middeſt of the battell, where they had ſet the tribes of the Leontides, and of Antiochides: for thither the barbarous people did bend all their force, & made their greateſt fight in that place. By which occaſion, Themiſtocles & Ariſtides fighting one hard by another, for that the one was of the tribe Leontides, and the other of Antiochides, they valiantly fought it out with the enemies, enuying one another: ſo as the barbarous people at the laſt being ouerthrowne, they made them flie, and draue them to their ſhips. But when they were imbarked and gone, the captaines of the ATHENIANS perceiuing they made not towards the Iles, which was their direct courſe to returne into ASIA, but that they were driuen backe by ſtorme of wind and pyrries of the ſea, towards the coaſt of ATTICA, and the city of ATHENS, fearing leaſt they might find ATHENS vnfurniſhed for defence, and might ſet vpon it: they thereupon ſent away preſently nine tribes that marched thither with ſuch ſpeed, as they came to ATHENS the very ſame day, and left Ariſtides in the campe at MARATHON, with his tribe and countrey men, to looke to the priſoners and ſpoile they had won of the barbarous people. Who nothing deceiued the opinion they had of his wiſdome. For notwithſtanding there was great ſtore of gold and ſiluer, much apparell, moueables, and other infinite goods and riches in all their tents and pauillions, and in the ſhips alſo they had taken of theirs: he was not ſo couetous as once to touch them, nor to ſuffer any other to meddle with them, vnleſſe by ſtealth ſome prouided for themſelues. As amongſt other, there was one Callias, one of Ceres prieſts, called Dadouchos, as you would ſay the torch-bearer (for in the ſecret ſacrifices of Ceres, his office was to hold the torch) whom when one of the barbarous people ſaw, and how he ware a band about his head, and long haire, he tooke him for ſome king, and falling on his knees at his feete, kiſſed his hand, and ſhewed him great ſtore of gold he had hidden and buried in a ditch. But Callias, like a moſt cruell, and cowardly wretch of all other on the earth, tooke away the gold, and killed the poore ſoule that had ſhewed him the place, becauſe he ſhould not tell it to others. Hereof it commeth, that the comicall Poets do call thoſe that came of him in mockerie, Laccoplutes, as made rich by a ditch: becauſe of the gold that Callias found in it. Immediatly after this battell, Ariſtides was choſen prouoſt of ATHENS for the yeare: albeit Demetrius Phalerius writeth, that it was a litle before his death, after the iourney of PLATEES. For in their Chronicles, where they ſet in order their prouoſts of ATHENS for the yeare, ſince Xanthippides time, there appeareth no one name of Ariſtides in that yeare, that Mardonius the king of PERSIAES Lieutenant was ouerthrowne by PLATEES, which was many yeares after: but contrariwiſe, they find Ariſtides enrolled among the prouoſts immediatly after Phanippus, in the yeare the battell was fought at MARATHON. Now the people did moſt commend Ariſtides iuſtice, before all his other vertues and qualities: becauſe that vertue is moſt common and in vſe in our life, and deliuereth moſt benefit to men. Hereof it came, that he being a meane man, obtained the worthieſt name that one could haue, to be called by the whole city, a iuſt man. This ſurname was neuer deſired of kings, princes, nor of tyrants, but they alwayes delighted to be ſurnamed, ſome Poliorcetes, to ſay, conquerors of cities: other Cerauni, to ſay, lightning or terrible: other Nicanores, to ſay, ſubduers: and ſome other, Æti and Hieracles, to ſay, Eagles or Faulcons, or ſuch like birds that prey: deſiring rather (as it ſhould appeare by thoſe ſurnames) the praiſe and reputation growing by force and power, then the commendation that riſeth by vertue and goodneſſe. Yet notwithſtanding, God whom they deſire moſt to be likened to, doth excell all humaine nature in three ſeuerall things: in immortality, in power, and in vertue, of which three, vertue is the moſt honourable and precious thing. For as the naturall Philoſophers reaſon, all the foure elements and Vacuum, are immortall and vncorruptible, and ſo are force and power, earth-quakes, lightning, terrible ſtormes, running riuers, and inundations of waters: but as for iuſtice and equity, no man is partaker of them, ſaue onely God, by meanes of reaſon and vnderſtanding. Therefore, becauſe men commonly haue three ſundry affections of the gods: the firſt, that they thinke them bleſſed: the ſecond, that they feare them: the third, that they reuerence them: it appeareth then that they thinke them bleſſed, for the eternitie and immortality of their godhead: that they feare them, becauſe of their omnipotencie and power: and that they loue and worſhip them, for their iuſtice and equitie. And yet notwithſtanding, of thoſe three, men do couet immortalitie, which no fleſh can attaine vnto: and alſo power, which dependeth moſt vpon fortune: and in the meane time they leaue vertue alone, whereof the gods of their goodneſſe haue made vs capable. But here they ſhew themſelues fooles. For iuſtice maketh the life of a noble man, and of one in great authority, ſeeme diuine and celeſtiall: where without iuſtice, and dealing vniuſtly, his life is moſt beaſtly, and odious to the world. But now againe to Ariſtides. This ſurname of a iuſt man at the beginning, made him beloued of all the people: but afterwards it turned him to great ill will, and ſpecially by Themiſtocles practiſe: who gaue it out euery where, that Ariſtides had ouerthrowne all iuſtice, becauſe by conſent of the parties he was euer choſen Arbitrator to end all controuerſies: and how by this meanes he ſecretly had procured the abſolute power of a king, not needing any gard or ſouldiers about him. The people moreouer being growne very diſſolute and licentious, by reaſon of the victory of MARATHON, and ſeeking to haue all things paſſe by them and their authority, began now to miſlike, and to be greatly offended, that any priuate man ſhould go before the reſt in good fame and reputation. Whereupon, they came out of all ſhires of ATTICA into the city of ATHENS, and ſo baniſhed Ariſtides with the Oſtraciſmon: diſguiſing the enuy they bare to his glory with the name of feare of tyranny. For this maner of baniſhment called Oſtraciſmon, or Exoſtraciſmon, was no ordinary puniſhment for any fault or offence committed: but to giue it an honeſt cloake, they ſayd it was onely a pulling downe and tying ſhort, of too much greatneſſe and authority, exceeding farre the maner and countenance of a popular ſtate. But to tell you truly, it was none otherwiſe, wiſe, then a gentle meane to qualifie the peoples enuy againſt ſome priuate perſon: which enuy bred no malice to him whoſe greatneſſe did offend them, but onely tended to the baniſhing of him for ten yeares. But afterwards when by practiſe, this Oſtraciſmon baniſhment was layd vpon meane men, and malefactors, as vpon Hyperbolus that was the laſt man ſo baniſhed, they neuer after vſed it any more at ATHENS. And by the way, it ſhall not be amiſſe to tell you here, why and wherefore this Hyperbolus was baniſhed. Alcibiades and Nicias were the chiefeſt men of ATHENS at that time, and they both were euer at ſquare together, a common thing amongſt great men. They perceiuing now by the peoples aſſembling, that they went about to execute the Oſtraciſmon, were maruellouſly affraid it was meant to baniſh one of them: wherefore they ſpake together, and made both their followers friends with each other, and ioyned them in one tribe together, inſomuch, when the moſt voices of the people were gathered to condemne him that ſhould be baniſhed, they found it was Hyperbolus. The people therewith were much offended, to ſee the Oſtraciſmon ſo embaſed and ſcorned, that they neuer after would vſe it againe, and ſo left it off for euer. But briefly to let you vnderſtand what the Oſtraciſmon was, and after what ſort they vſed it: ye are to know, that at a certaine day appointed, euery citizen caried a great ſhell in his hand, whereupon he wrote the name of him he would haue baniſhed, and brought it into a certaine place railed about with wodden barres in the market place. Then, when euery man had brought in his ſhell, the magiſtrates and officers of the city, did count and tell the number of them: for if there were leſſe then 6000 citizens, that had thus brought theſe ſhels together, the Oſtraciſmon was not full and perfect. That done, they layd apart euery mans name written in theſe ſhels: and whoſe name they found written by moſt citizens, they proclaimed him by ſound of trumpet, a baniſhed man for ten yeares, during which time notwithſtanding, the partie did enioy all his goods. Now euery man writing thus his name in a ſhell, whom they would haue baniſhed: it is reported there was a plaine man of the countrey (very ſimple) that could neither write nor reade, who came to Ariſtides (being the firſt man he met with) and gaue him his ſhell, praying him to write Ariſtides name vpon it. He being abaſhed withall, did aske the countrey man, if Ariſtides had euer done him any diſpleaſure. No, ſaid the country man, he neuer did me hurt, nor I know him not: but it grieues me to heare euery man call him a iuſt man. Ariſtides hearing him ſay ſo, gaue him no anſwer, but wrote his owne name vpon the ſhell, and deliuered it againe to the country man. But as he went his way out of the city, he lift vp his hands to heauen, and made a prayer contrary to that of Achilles in Homer, beſeeching the gods that the ATHENIANS might neuer haue ſuch troubles in hand, as they ſhould be compelled to call for Ariſtides againe. Notwithſtanding, within three yeares after, when Xerxes king of PERSIA came with his army through the countries of THESSALY and BOEOTIA, and entred into the hart of the country of ATTICA: the ATHENIANS reuoking the law of their Oſtraciſmon, called home againe all thoſe they had baniſhed, and ſpecially, becauſe they were affraid Ariſtides would take part with the barbarous people, and that his example ſhould moue many other to do the like, wherein they were greatly deceiued in the nature of the man: for before that he was called home, he continually trauelled vp and downe, perſwading and incouraging the GRECIANS to maintaine and defend their liberty. After that law was repealed by proclamation, and that Themiſtocles was choſen the only Lieutenant generall of ATHENS, he did alwaies faithfully ayd and aſſiſt him in all things, as well with his trauell, as alſo with his counſell: and thereby wan his enemie great honour, becauſe it ſtood vpon the ſafety and preſeruation of his countrey. For when Eurybiades, Generall of the armie of the GRECIANS, had determined to forſake the Ile of SALAMINA, and that the galleys of the barbarous people were come into the middeſt of the ſeas, and had enuironed the Iles all about, and the mouth of the arme of the ſtraight of SALAMINA, before any man knew they were thus incloſed in, Ariſtides departing out of the Ile of Ægina with a maruellous boldneſſe, ventred through the middeſt of all the barbarous ſhips and fleete, and by good hap got in the night into Themiſtocles tent, and calling him out, ſpake with him there in this ſort: Themiſtocles, if we be both wiſe, it is high time we ſhould now leaue off this vaine enuie and ſpite we haue long time borne each other, and that we ſhould enter into another ſort of enuie more honourable and profitable for vs both: I meane, which of vs two ſhould do his beſt indeuour to ſaue GRECE: you, by ruling and commaunding all like Lieutenant generall: and I, by counſelling you for the beſt, and executing your commaundement: conſidering you are the man alone that will roundlieſt come vnto the point that is beſt: which is in my opinion, that we ſhould hazard battell by ſea within the ſtraight of SALAMINA, and that aſſoone as might be poſſible. But if our friends and confederates dò let this to be put in execution, I do aſſure you your enemies do helpe it forward. For it is ſaid, that the ſea both before and behind vs, and round about vs, is couered all ouer with their ſhips, ſo as they that would not before, ſhall now be compelled of force, and in ſpite of their hearts, to fight and beſtirre them like men: becauſe they are compaſſed in all about, and there is no paſſage left open for them to eſcape, nor to flie. Whereunto Themiſtocles aunſwered: I am ſory, Ariſtides, that herein your honeſtie appeareth greater then mine: but ſince it is ſo, that you haue deſerued the honor in beginning, and procuring ſuch an honourable and commendable ſtrife betweene vs, I will henceforth indeuour my ſelfe to exceed you in continuing this your deſire. After which anſwer, he told Ariſtides, how he purpoſed to mocke the barbarous king, and praied him to intreate Eurybiades to yeeld to his deuiſe, and to perſwade him that there was no other way to ſaue GRECE, but to fight by ſea: for Eurybiades gaue more credit to Ariſtides perſwaſions, then he did to Themiſtocles words: for when all the captaines were called to counſell, to determine whether they ſhould giue battell, or not: one Cleocritus CORINTHIAN ſayd to Themiſtocles, that his counſell did not like Ariſtides at all as it ſeemed, becauſe he ſpake neuer a word to it being preſent. Ariſtides anſwered him ſtraight, that he vtterly miſtooke him. For (quoth he) if I did not thinke his counſell good, I would not hold my peace as I do: but now I am mute, not for any goodwill I beare him, but becauſe I find his counſell wiſe and ſound. While the captaines of the GRECIANS were reaſoning in this ſort, Ariſtides ſeeing PSYTTALEA (a litle Iland before SALAMINA within the ſtraight) full of men of warre of their enemies: imbarked immediatly the valianteſt and luſtieſt ſouldiers he had of all his countrey men, into the leaſt foyſtes or pinnaces he had among all his galleys: and went with them, and landed in that Ile, and ouerthrew all the barbarous people he found there, and put them to the ſword euery man, taking the chiefeſt of them onely priſoners: among which, were three ſons of Sandauce, the kings ſiſter, whom he ſent vnto Themiſtocles. Theſe three Lords were all ſlaine by the commandement of Euphrantidas the ſoothſayer, and ſacrificed to Bacchus Omeſtes, as to ſay, the cruell Bacchus, and eater of raw fleſh, and all vpon an Oracle they had receiued. That done, Ariſtides diſperſed his ſouldiers about the Ile, to receiue all ſuch as were by fortune of war, or of the ſea, caſt into the Iland: to the end that no enemy of theirs ſhould ſcape their hands, nor any of his friends ſhould periſh. For the greateſt fleete of all their ſhips, and the ſharpeſt encounter of the whole battell, was about this litle Iland: and therefore the tokens of triumph were ſet there. After the battell was won, Themiſtocles to feele Ariſtides opinion, ſayd vnto him: we haue done a good peece of ſeruice, but yet there is another behind of greater importance, and that is this: We muſt bring all ASIA into EVROPE, which we may eaſily do, if we ſaile with all ſpeed to the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, and go breake the bridge the king hath made there. Then Ariſtides cried out, ſtay there, neuer ſpeake of that: but I pray you let vs rather ſeeke all the wayes we can, how to driue this barbarous king out of GRECE, leaſt if we keepe him in ſtill with ſo great an army (and he ſhall ſee no way before him to eſcape out) we driue him then to fight like a deſperate man, and perill our ſelues, we cannot tell to what. When Themiſtocles had heard his opinion, he ſecretly ſent the Eunuke Arnaces his priſoner, vnto king Xerxes, to aduertiſe him from him, that he had altered the GRECIANS purpoſe, which was fully bent to haue broken vp the bridge he had made at the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, to paſſe ouer his army: and that he was the willinger to let him vnderſtand it, that he might the better prouide for the ſafety of his perſon. King Xerxes being netled with this aduertiſement, tooke ſtraight his iourney, and with all ſpeed went to recouer the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, and left Mardonius his Lieutenant generall in GRECE, with three hundred thouſand of the beſt ſouldiers of his army. This Mardonius was maruellouſly dreaded of all the GRECIANS, for the wonderfull great army he had by land, and he did threaten them alſo by his letters he wrote vnto them: You haue (ſayd he) with your ſhips by ſea, ouercome men acquainted to fight by land, and that neuer handled ower: but now, the plaines of THESSALIE, or the fields of BOEOTIA, are very faire and large for horſemen and footemen to make proofe of their valiantneſſe, if you will come to the battell in the field. He wrote letters to the ATHENIANS, by the king his maiſters commandement, of other effect, and offered them from him, to build vp their city againe, to giue them a great penſion, and furthermore to make them Lords of all GRECE, ſo they would giue ouer, and leaue off theſe warres. The LACEDÆMONIANS being forthwith aduertiſed of his letters written to the ATHENIANS, and

and fearing leaſt they would haue bene perſwaded by them: ſent their Ambaſſadours with all ſpeed to ATHENS, to pray them to ſend their wiues and children vnto SPARTA, and alſo to offer them victuals, to releeue their poore old people, becauſe of the great ſcarcity that was at ATHENS, for that their city was burnt and razed, and all their country beſides deſtroyed by the barbarous people. The ATHENIANS hauing heard the offers of the Ambaſſadors of LACEDÆMON, made them a maruellous anſwer through Ariſtides counſell, and this it was: That they bare with the barbarous people, though they thought all things were to be ſold for gold and ſiluer, becauſe they eſteemed nothing more precious, nor better in this world, then to be rich and wealthy: but on the other ſide, they were greatly offended with the LACEDÆMONIANS, that they onely regarded the preſent pouerty and neceſſity of the ATHENIANS, and did forget their vertue and noble courage, thinking to make them fight more valiantly for the preſeruation of GRECE, by offering them victuals to liue withall. The people approuing this anſwer, Ariſtides then cauſed the Ambaſſadours of SPARTA to come to the aſſembly, and commanded them to tell the LACEDÆMONIANS by word of mouth, that all the gold aboue, or vnder the ground, could not corrupt the ATHENIANS, to make them take any ſumme of money or reward, to leaue the defence of the liberty of GRECE: and to the herauld that came from Mardonius, he ſhewed him the Sunne, and ſayd vnto him: ſo long as yonder Sunne keepeth his courſe about the world, ſo long will the ATHENIANS be mortall enemies vnto the PERSIANS, becauſe they haue ſpoiled and deſtroyed all their countrey, and haue defiled and burnt the temples of their gods. Beſides, he willed that the prieſts, by commandement of the people, ſhould excommunicate and curſe him that would procure them to ſend vnto the PERSIANS to make peace with them, and to breake their league and alliance with the other GRECIANS. Hereupon, when Mardonius came againe the ſecond time to ouerrun the countrey of ATTICA, the ATHENIANS got them againe into the Ile of SALAMINA, and then they ſent Ariſtides Ambaſſadour vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. He ſharply tooke them vp, and reproued their ſloth and negligence, becauſe they had againe forſaken ATHENS, and left it to the ſpoile of the barbarous people: and prayed them yet they would looke to ſaue the reſt of GRECE. The Ephori (which were certaine officers that ruled all things within the city of SPARTA) when they had heard Ariſtides perſwaſions: ſtraight tooke order for aide, though it appeared they did nothing all day but play, and make good cheere, keeping that day one of their ſolemne feaſts they called Hyacinthia. Howbeit the next night following, they ſent out fiue thouſand citizens borne in SPARTA, into the field, all proper men & valiant ſoldiers, euery one of them carying with him ſeuen Ilotes (which are the countrey men and ſlaues in the country of LACEDÆMONIA) not making the Ambaſſadors of ATHENS priuie to it at all. Wherfore Ariſtides came againe another time into their counſell, to complaine of their negligence. But they fell a laughing, and ſayd he dreamed, or elſe he mocked them: for their army which they had ſent againſt the ſtrangers (for ſo they called the PERSIANS) was already at the city of ORESTION in ARCADIA. Ariſtides hearing their aunſwere, replied, that they were to blame to mocke them in that ſort, to ſend away their men ſo ſecretly, that they might not know of it: and that it was no time for them now to go about to deceiue their friends, but their enemies rather. Idomeneus in his ſtory reporteth the matter thus in euery point: notwithſtanding, in the decree that was made to ſend Ambaſſadours to SPARTA, Ariſtides is not named for Ambaſſadour, but there are other appointed: as Cimon, Xanthippus, and Mironides. Afterwards Ariſtides was choſen by voices of the people, Lieutenant generall of the army of ATHENS, in this warre againſt the PERSIANS, and went vnto the campe of the GRECIANS by the city of PLATÆES, with eight thouſand footemen well armed and appointed. There he found king Pauſanias the onely Generall of all the whole power and army of the GRECIANS, who brought with him the force of SPARTA: and there came daily into his campe one after another, a maruellous great multitude of other GRECIANS. Now touching the army of the barbarous people, they incamped all alongſt the riuer of ASOPVS: but becauſe their campe ſtretched out a maruellous way in length, they were not intrenched at all, but had only fortified a peece of ground foure ſquare with a wall about, which was ten furlongs on euery ſide, to place all their cariage and chiefeſt things in. And for the GRECIANS againe, the ſoothſayer Tiſamenus, borne in the city of ELIDE, had told Pauſanias, and all the GRECIANS together, that they ſhould haue the victorie, ſo they did not aſſault at all, but only defend. And Ariſtides, that had ſent to the Oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, in the name of the ATHENIANS, had anſwer: they ſhould ouercome their enemies, ſo they did ſacrifice and make ſpeciall prayers vnto Iupiter and Iuno of mount CITHÆRON, vnto Pan, and vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, and alſo vnto the demy gods, Androcrates, Leucon, Piſander, Damocrates, Hypſion, Actæon, and Polyidus: and ſo that they did hazard battel alſo within their owne territories, and in the plaine of Ceres Eleuſinian, and of Proſerpina. This Oracle troubled Ariſtides maruellouſly, becauſe the demy gods whom they had commaundement to do ſacrifice vnto, were the founders and aunceſtors of the PLATÆIANS: and the caue of the Nymphes Sphragitides, is one of the tops of the mount CITHÆRON, looking towards the Weſt, where the Sunne ſetteth in ſommer. They ſay there was an Oracle there in old time, whoſe ſpirit poſſeſſed many inhabitants thereabouts, and beſtraught them of their wits: whereupon, they called thoſe ſo poſſeſſed, Nympholepty, as who would ſay, taken with the Nymphes. And againe to tell the ATHENIANS they ſhould haue the victory, ſo they did hazard battell in the plaine of Ceres Eleuſinian, and within their owne territorie: it was euen to ſend them backe againe into the country of ATTICA. Ariſtides being thus perplexed, Arimneſtus captaine of the PLATÆIANS, had ſuch a viſion in the night in his ſleepe. He thought, that Iupiter the ſauiour did appeare vnto him, and asked him what the GRECIANS intended to do? and that he anſwered: my Lord, we muſt to morrow remoue our campe into the territories of ELEVSIN, & there we will fight with the barbarous people, according to the cõmandement the Oracle of Apollo hath giuen vs. Then that Iupiter replied, that they were greatly deceiued: for all that Apollo had declared by his Oracle was meant within the territorie of the PLATÆIANS, and that they ſhould find it true, if they conſidered it well. Arimneſtus hauing plainely ſeene this viſion in his ſleepe, when he did awake in the morning, he ſtraight ſent for the oldeſt citizens, and conſidering with them where this place ſhould be, he found at the length, that at the foote of mount CITHÆRON, by the city of NYSIA, there was an old temple they called the temple of Ceres Eleuſinian, and of her daughter Proſerpina. When he heard them ſay ſo, he went ſtraight and told Ariſtides of it, and found that it was an excellent place to ſet an army in battell ray, that had but few horſemen: for that the foot of mount CITHÆRON did let the horſemen, they could not go to the place where the temple ſtood, and where the plaine and valley did end: beſides alſo, that the chappell of Androcrates was euen in that place, which was all hidden with thicke wood round about it. And becauſe they ſhould lacke nothing to hinder the expreſſe commaundement of the Oracle for hope of victorie, the PLATÆIANS (through Arimneſtus counſell and aduiſe) made a common decree, that the confines of the city of PLATÆES ſhould be taken away towards ATHENS ſide, & that the land therof ſhold be giuẽ clearely vnto the ATHENIANS, becauſe they ſhould fight with the barbarous people in their owne land, for the defence and preſeruation of GRECE, according to the commaundement of the Oracle. This noble gift and preſent of the PLATÆEIANS was ſo famous, as many yeares after, king Alexander the great hauing conquered the Empire of ASIA, built vp the wals againe of the city of PLATÆES, and when he had done, made a herauld openly proclaime it at the games Olympical, that Alexander had done the PLATÆEIANS that honor and dignity, for a memoriall and honour of their magnanimity. Becauſe in the warre againſt the PERSIANS, they had freely and liberally giuen away their land vnto the ATHENIANS, for the ſafety of the GRECIANS: and had ſhewed themſelues of a noble courage alſo, and very willing to defend the ſtate of GRECE. Now when the army of the GRECIANS came to be ſet in order of battell, there fell a ſtrife betweene the ATHENIANS and the TEGEATES, becauſe the ATENIANS would needs (according to their old cuſtome) haue the left wing of the battell, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had the right wing: and the TEGEATES on the contrary part, would haue the preheminence before the ATHENIANS, alledging the famous acts and notable ſeruice of their anceſtors in former wars, whereupon the ATHENIANS did mutine. But Ariſtides ſtept betweene them, and told them, that it was no time now to contend with the TEGEATES about their nobility and valiantneſſe: and as for you, my Lords of SPARTA (ſaid he) and you alſo my maiſters of GRECE: we tell you, that the place neither giueth nor taketh vertue away, and we do aſſure you that whereſoeuer you place vs, we will ſo defend and keepe it, as we will not impaire nor blemiſh the honour we haue won in former foughten battels and gotten victories. For we are not come hither to quarrell and fall out with our friends, but to fight with our common enemies: nor to brag of our aunceſtors doings, but to ſhew our ſelues valiant in defence of all GRECE. For this battell will make good proofe of all the GRECIANS, how much eſtimation euerie citie, euery captaine, and particular perſon will deſerue for his part. When Ariſtides had ſpoken, the captaines and all other of the the counſell concluded in fauour of the ATHENIANS, that they ſhould haue one of the wings of the battell. But by this meanes, all GRECE ſtood in maruellous garboile at that time, and the ſtate of the ATHENIANS ſpecially in great danger. For a number of the nobleſt citizens of ATHENS, and that brought great ſubſtance with them to the warres, being now at low ſtate, and in pouerty, their goods being ſpent and gone, and ſeeing themſelues diſcountenanced, not bearing that rule and authoritie in the commonwealth they were wont to do, becauſe other were called to authority, and preferred to the offices of the city: they gathered together, and met at a houſe in the city of PLATÆES, and there conſpired to ouerthrow the authority of the people at ATHENS: and if they could not obtaine their purpoſe, then that they would rather looſe all, and betray their countrie vnto the barbarous people. While theſe things were practiſed in the campe, many being of the conſpiracy, Ariſtides came to an inckling of it, and was maruellous affraid, becauſe of the time: wherefore he began to be carefull of the matter, being of ſuch importance as it was, and yet would not be curious to vnderſtand the whole conſpiracie, litle knowing what a number might be drawne into this treaſon, if it were narrowly looked into, but rather reſpected that which was iuſt, then what was profitable for the time. So he cauſed eight perſons onely of the great number to be apprehended, and of theſe eight, the two firſt whom they would haue indited as principals, and were moſt to be burdened for the conſpiracy, Æſchines of the towne of LAMPRA, and Egeſias of the towne of ACHARNA, they found meanes to flie out of the campe, and to ſaue themſelues. And for the other, Ariſtides ſet them at liberty, and gaue them occaſion that were not diſcouered, to be bold, and to repent them of their follies: ſaying, that the battell ſhould be their iudge, where they ſhould purge themſelues of all accuſations layd againſt them, & ſhew the world alſo, that they neuer had any other intention but honeſt & good, towards their country. Mardonius, to proue the courage of the GRECIANS, had ſent all his horſemen (wherein he was farre ſtronger then the GRECIANS) to skirmiſh with them. Who were lodged at the foote of mount CITHÆRON, in ſtrong places and full of ſtones, ſauing the three thouſand MEGARIANS, that camped in the plaine: by reaſon whereof, they were ſore troubled and hurt, by the horſmen of the barbarous people that ſet vpon them on euery ſide, for they might charge them where they would. In ſomuch, in the end, perceiuing they alone could no longer reſiſt the force of ſo great a multitude of the barbarous people, they ſent with all ſpeed poſſible to Pauſanias, to pray him to ſend them preſent aide. Pauſanias hearing this newes, aud ſeeing in his owne ſight the campe of the MEGARIANS almoſt all couered with ſhot and darts which the barbarous people threw at them, and that they were compelled to ſtand cloſe together in a litle corner: he wiſt not what to do. For, to go thither in perſon with the LACEDÆMONIANS that werre footemen heauy armed, he thought that was no way to helpe them. So he proued to put ſome ambitious deſire and enuy of honor, among the priuate captaines & generals of the army of the other GRECIANS, which were then about him: to ſee if he could moue any mans courage and deſire, to offer himſelfe willingly to go aide the MEGARIANS. Howbeit they had all deafe eares, but Ariſtides: who promiſed to go in the name of the ATHENIANS, and brought Olympiodorus into the field (one of the valienteſt captaines that ſerued vnder him) with his company of 300 choſen men, and certaine ſhot mingled amongſt them. Theſe ſouldiers were ready in a moment, & marched ſtraight in battel ray, a great pace towards the barbarous people. Maſiſtius, that was Generall of the horſemen of the PERSIANS, a goodly tall man, perceiuing their comming towards him: turned his horſe, & gallopped to them. The ATHENIANS taried him, and kept their ground, and the encounter mas very hote, becauſe both the one and the other ſide did the beſt they could at this firſt onſet to put the reſt of the battell in ieoperdy: and they fought ſo long, that Maſiſtius horſe was ſhot through the body with an arrow, that put him to ſuch paine, as he neuer lin flinging, till he caſt his maiſter on the ground, armed as he was at all peeces. So being on the ground, he could not riſe againe, aſwell for the weight of his armor, as for that the ATHENIANS came ſo ſodainly vpon him. And notwithſtanding there were many about him to hew him in peeces, yet they could find no way how to kil him, he was ſo throughly armed and loden with gold, copper, and iron, not only vpon his body and his head, but alſo on his legs and armes: vntill at the length there was one that thruſt the head of his dart through his beuer, & ſo killed him. The PERSIANS perceiuing that, fled immediatly, and forſooke the body of their Generall. Shortly after it appeared to the GRECIANS that they had ſped well at this skirmiſh, not becauſe they had ſlaine many enemies, but for the great lamentation the barbarous people made for the loſſe of Maſiſtius. For his death did ſo greeue them, that they powled themſelues, they clipped off their horſe and moyles haires, and filled beſides all the field thereabouts with pitifull cries and ſhreekes, as thoſe that had loſt the valianteſt and chiefeſt man of authority of all their campe, next vnto Mardonius the kings Lieutenant. After this firſt skirmiſh, both the one and the other ſide kept their campe, and would not come into the field many dayes after: for the ſoothſayers did promiſe both ſides the victory, as much the PERSIANS, as the GRECIANS, ſo they did but only defend: and contrariwiſe, they did threaten them to be ouerthrowne, that did aſſault. But Mardonius finding victuals waxed ſcant, and that they were ſtored but for few dayes, and moreouer how the GRECIANS daily grew ſtronger by continual repaire to their campe, the longer he delayed: in the end he reſolued to tary no longer, but to paſſe the riuer of ASOPVS the next morning by breake of the day, and ſuddenly to ſet vpon the GRECIANS. So he gaue the captaines warning the night before what they ſhould do, becauſe euery man ſhould be ready: but about midnight there came a horſeman without any noiſe at all, ſo neare to the GRECIANS' campe, that he ſpake to the watch, and told them he would ſpeake with Ariſtides Generall of the ATHENIANS. Ariſtides was called for ſtraight, and when he came to him, the horſeman ſayd vnto Ariſtides: I am Alexander king of MACEDON, who for the loue and great goodwill I beare you, haue put my ſelfe in the greateſt danger that may be, to come at this preſent time to aduertiſe you, that to morrow morning Mardonius will giue you battell: becauſe your enemies ſudden comming vpon you, ſhould not make you affraid, being ſuddenly charged, and ſhould not hinder alſo your valiant fighting. For it is no new hope that is come to Mardonius, that makes him to fight, but only ſcarcity of victuals that forceth him to do it, conſidering that the Prognoſticators are all againſt it that he ſhould giue you battell, both by reaſon of the ill tokens of their ſacrifices, as alſo by the anſwers of their Oracles, which hath put all the army in a maruellous feare, and ſtand in no good hope at all. Thus he is forced to put all at aduenture, or elſe if he will needs lie ſtill, to be ſtarued to death for very famine. After king Alexander had imparted this ſecret to Ariſtides, he prayed him to keepe it to himſelfe, and to remember it in time to come. Ariſtides anſwered him then, that it was no reaſon he ſhould keepe a matter of ſo great importance as that from Pauſanias, who was the Lieutenant generall of their whole army: notwithſtanding, he promiſed him he would tell it no man elſe before the battell, and that if the gods gaue the GRECIANS the victorie, he did aſſure him, they ſhould all acknowledge his great fauour and goodwill ſhewed vnto them. After they had talked thus together, king Alexander left him, and returned backe againe: and Ariſtides alſo went immediatly to Pauſanias tent, and told him the talke king Alexander and he had together. Thereupon the priuate captaines were ſent for ſtraight to counſell, and there order was giuen, that euery man ſhould haue his bands ready, for they ſhould fight in the morning. So Pauſanias at that time (as Herodotus writeth) ſayd vnto Ariſtides, that he would remoue the ATHENIANS from the left to the right wing, becauſe they ſhould haue the PERSIANS themſelues right before them, and that they ſhould fight ſo much the luſtier, both for that they were acquainted with their fight, as alſo becauſe they had ouercome them before in the firſt encounter: and that himſelfe would take the left wing of the battell, where he ſhould encounter with the GRECIANS that fought on the PERSIANS ſide. But when all the other priuate captaines of the ATHENIANS vnderſtood it, they were maruellous angry with Pauſanias, & ſaid he did them wrong, and had no reaſon to let all the other GRECIANS keepe their place where they were alwayes appointed, and only to remoue them, as if they were ſlaues, to be appointed at his pleaſure, now on the one ſide, then on the other, and to ſet them to fight with the valieneſt ſouldiers they had of all their enemies. Then ſayd Ariſtides to them, that they knew not what they ſayd, and how before they miſliked, and did ſtriue with the TEGEATES, onely for hauing the left wing of the battell, and when it was graunted, they thought themſelues greatly honoured that they were preferred before them, by order of the captaines: and now where the LACEDÆMONIANS were willing of themſelues to giue them the place of the right wing, and did in manner offer them the preheminence of the whole army: they do not thankfully take the honor offered them, nor yet do reckon of the vantage and benefit giuen them to fight againſt the PERSIANS ſelues, their ancient enemies, and not againſt their naturall countrey men anciently deſcended of them. When Ariſtides had vſed all theſe perſwaſions vnto them, they were very well contented to chaunge place with the LACEDÆMONIANS: and then all the talke among them was to encourage one another, and to tell them that the PERSIANS that came againſt them, had no better them, had no better hearts nor weapons, then those whom they before had ouercome, in the plaine of MARATHON. For sayd they, they haue the same bowes, the same rich imbrodered gownes, the same golden chaines and carcanets of womanish persons, hanging on their cowardly bodies and faint harts: where we haue also the same weapons and bodies we had, and our harts more liuely and couragious then before, through the sundry victories we haue since gotten of them. Further, we haue this aduantage more: that we do not fight as our other confederates the GRECIANS do, for our citie & countrie only, but also to continue the fame and renowne of our former noble seruice, which we wan at the iourneys of MARATHON and of SALAMINA: to the end, the world should not thinke that the glorie of these triumphes and victories was due vnto Miltiades onely, or vnto fortune, but vnto the courage and worthinesse of the ATHENIANS. Thus were the GRECIANS throughly occupied to chaunge the order of their battell in hast. The THEBANS on the other side that tooke part with Mardonius, receiuing intelligence of the altering of their battell, by traytors that ranne betweene both campes, they straight told Mardonius of it. He thereupon did suddenly also change the order of his battell, and placed the right wing of the PERSIANS against the left wing of his enemies: either because he was affraid of the ATHENIANS, or else for greater glorie that he had a desire to fight with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and commaunded the GRECIANS that tooke his part, that they should fight against the ATHENIANS. This alteration was so openly done, that euerie man might see it: whereupon Pausanias remoued the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, and set them in the right wing. Mardonius seeing that, remoued the PERSIANS againe from the right wing, and brought them to the left wing (where they were before) against the LACEDÆMONIANS: and thus they consumed all that day in changing their men too and fro. So the captaines of the GRECIANS sat in counsell at night, and there they agreed, that they must needs remoue their campe, and lodge in some other place where they might haue water at commandement: because their enemies did continually trouble and spoile that water they had about them, with their horses. Now when night came, the captaines would haue marched away with their men, to go to the lodging they had appointed: but the people went very ill willing, and they had much ado to keepe them together. For they were no sooner out of the trenches and fortification of their campe, but the most part of them ran to the city of PLATÆES, and were maruellously out of order, dispersing themselues here and there, and set vp their tents where they thought good, before the places were appointed for them: and there were none that taried behind, but the LACEDÆMONIANS onely, and that was against their wils: for one of their captaines called Amompharetus, a maruellous hardie man, that feared no danger, and longed sore for battell, he was in such a rage with these trifling delayes, that he cried it out in the campe, that this remouing was a goodly running away, and sware he would not from thence, but would there tary Mardonius comming with his company. Pausanias went to him, and told him he must do that the other GRECIANS had consented to in counsell, by most voices. But Amompharetus tooke a great stone in his hands, and threw it downe at Pausanias feete, and told him there is the signe I giue to conclude battell, and I passe not for all your cowardly conclusions. Amompharetus stubburnnesse did so amaze Pausanias, that he was at his wits end. So he sent vnto the ATHENIANS that were onwards on their way, to pray them to tarie for him, that they might go together, and therewithall made the rest of his men to march towards the city of PLATÆES, supposing thereby to haue drawne Amompharetus to haue followed him, or else to let him remaine alone behind. But in trifling thus, the day brake: and Mardonius vnderstanding that the GRECIANS did forsake their first lodging, he made his armie presently march in battell ray to set vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS. So the barbarous people made great shoutes and cries, not thinking to go fight, but to sacke and spoile the GRECIANS flying away, as indeed they did litle better. For, Pausanias seeing the countenance of his enemies, made his ensignes to stay, and commaunded euery man to prepare to fight: but he forgate to giue the GRECIANS the signall of the battell, either for the anger he tooke against Amompharetus, or for the sudden onset of the enemies, which made them that they came not in straight, nor altogether to the battell after it was begun, but straggling in small companies, some here, and some there. In the meane time, Pausanias was busie in sacrificing to the gods, and seeing that the first sacrifices were not acceptable vnto them, by the Soothsayers obseruations they made: he commaunded the SPARTANS to throw their targets at their feete, and not to stirre out of their places, but onely to do as he bad them, without resisting their enemies. When he had giuen this straight order, he went againe and did sacrifice, when the horsmen of the enemies were at hand, and that their arrowes flew amongst the thickest of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and did hurt diuerse of them, and specially poore Callicrates among the rest, that was one of the goodliest men in all the GRECIANS hoast and armie. He hauing his deaths wound with an arrow, before he gaue vp the ghost, sayd, his death did not grieue him, because he came out of his country to die for the defence of GRECE: but it grieued him to die so cowardly, hauing giuen the enemy neuer a blow. His death was maruellous lamentable, and the constancie of the SPARTANS wonderfull: for they neuer stirred out of their places, nor made any countenance to defend themselues against their enemies that came vpon them, but suffered themselues to be thrust through with arrowes, and slaine in the field, looking for the houre the gods would appoint them, and that their captaine would command them to fight. Some write also, that as Pausanias was at his prayers, and doing sacrifice vnto the gods a litle behind the battell, certaine of the LYDIANS came vpon him, and ouerthrew and tooke away all his sacrifice: and how Pausanias, and those that were about him (hauing no other weapons in their hands) draue them away with force of staues and whips. In memorie whereof, they say there is a solemne procession kept at SPARTA on that day, which they call the LYDIANS procession, where they whip and beate yong boyes about the altar. Then was Pausanias in great distresse, to see the priests offer sacrifice vpon sacrifice, and that not one of them pleased the gods: at the last he turned his eyes to the temple of Iuno, and wept, and holding vp his hands, besought Iuno Cithæron, and all the other gods (patrons and protectours of the countrey of the PLATÆIANS) that if it were not the will of the gods the GRECIANS should haue the victorie, yet that the conquerors at the least should buy their deaths dearely, and that they should find they fought against valiant men and worthie souldiers. Pausanias had no sooner ended his prayer, but the sacrifices fell out very fauourable, in so much as the Priests and Soothsayers came to promise him victorie. Thereupon, he straight gaue commaundement to march toward the enemie, which flew from man to man inconninently how they should march. So as he that had seene the squadron of the LACEDÆMONIANS, would haue sayd it had bene like the body of a fierce beast raising vp the bristles, preparing to fight. Then the barbarous people saw they should haue a hote battell, and that they should meete with men that would fight it out to the death: wherefore they couered their bodies with great targets after the PERSIAN fashion, and bestowed their arrowes lustily vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS. But they keeping close together, and couering themselues with their shields, marched on still vpon them, vntill they came to ioyne with the enemie so lustily, that they made their targets flie out of their hands, with the terrible thrusts and blowes of their pikes and speares vpon their breasts, and ouerthwart their faces, that they slue many of them, & laid them on the ground. For all that, they died not cowardly, but tooke the LACEDÆMONIANS pikes and speares in their bare hands, and brake them in two by strength of their armes: and then they quickly pluckt out their cimiters and axes, and lustily layd about them, and wrong the LACEDÆMONIANS shields out of their hands by force, and fought it out with them a great while hand to hand. Now, whilest the LACEDÆMONIANS were busily fighting with the barbarous people, the ATHENIANS stood still imbattelled farre off, and kept their ground. But when they saw the LACEDÆMONIANS tary so long, and that they came not, and heard a maruellous noise of men as though they were fighting, and besides that there came a speedy messenger vnto them sent from Pausanias, to let them vnderstand they were fighting: then they marched with all speed they could to helpe them. But as they were comming on a great pace ouer the plaine, vnto that part where they heard the noise: the GRECIANS that were on Mardonius side came against them. Aristides seeing them comming towards them, went a good way before his company, and cried out as loud as he could for life, and coniured the GRECIANS in the name of the gods, the protectors of GRECE, to leaue off these warres, and not to trouble the ATHENIANS that were going to helpe them that ventured their liues, to defend the commonwealth and safety of all GRECE. But when he saw they would needs fight for any request and coniuration he could vse, and that they came still vpon him, bending themselues to giue charge: then he stayed his going to relieue the LACEDÆMONIANS, and was compelled to make head against those that set vpon him and his companie, they being about fiftie thousand men, of the which, the most part notwithstanding went their waies, and left the army, specially when they vnderstood the PERSIANS were ouerthrowne and fled. The furie of the battell, and cruellest fight (as they say) was where the THEBANS were: because cause the nobility and chiefest men of the country fought very earnestly for the PERSIANS, but the people refused, being led by a small number of the nobility that commanded them. So they fought that day in two places, the LACEDÆMONIANS being the first that ouerthrew the PERSIANS, and made them flie: & they slue Mardonius the kings lieutenant, with a blow of a stone one Arimnestus a SPARTAN gaue him vpon his head, rightly as the Oracle of Amphiaraus had propheciedbefore vnto him. For Mardonius before the battell had sent thither a LYDIAN, and a CARIAN vnto the Oracle of Trophonius, of the which the prophet made answer vnto the CARIAN, in the CARIAN tongue: and the man of LYDIA lay within the sanctuary of Amphiaraus, where he thought in his dreame that one of the priests of the temple willed him to go out of the place he was in, and he denying it, the priest tooke vp a great stone and threw it at his head, and so thought he was slaine with the blow. And thus it is written. And furthermore, the LACEDÆMONIANS did chase the PERSIANS flying into their fortification they had in a wood: and the ATHENIANS also shortly after ouerthrew the THEBANS, whereof they slue in the field, a three hundred of the noblest and chiefest of them. For euen as the THEBANS began to turne taile, newes came vnto the ATHENIANS, that the PERSIANS had intrenched themselues within their fort & strength in the wood, where the LACEDÆMONIANS did besiege them. The ATHENIANS suffered the GRECIANS that fled to saue themselues, and they went to helpe the LACEDÆMONIANS, to take the fort of the barbarous people: who went before but slenderly about it, because they had no experience to make an assault, nor force vpon a wall: But so soone as the ATHENIANS came in to them, they straight tooke it by assault, and made great slaughter of the PERSIANS and barbarous people. For of three hundred thousand fighting men that Mardonius had in his campe, there were saued onely but fortie thousand led vnder Artabazus: and of the GRECIANS side, there were not slaine aboue thirteene hundred and threescore in all, amongst which also there were two and fiftie ATHENIANS, all of the tribe of Æantides, the which had done more valiantly that day, then any other tribe, as Clidemus writeth. And this is the cause why the Æantides made a solemne sacrifice vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, at the common charge, according to the order giuen them by the Oracle of Apollo, to giue them thankes for this victorie. Of the LACEDÆMONIANS there died fourescore and eleuen: and of the TEGEATES sixteene. But I maruell Herodotus saith, that none but these people onely fought in that iourney against the barbarous nation, and no other GRECIANS besides: for the number of the dead bodies, and their graues also do shew, that it was a generall victorie and exploite of all the GRECIANS together. And moreouer, if there had bene but these three people only that had fought against them, and that all the rest had stood and looked on, and done nothing: sure there had bene no such epigram as this, engrauen vpon the altar or tombe that was set vp in the place of the battell:

Mardonius slaine by Arimnestus a Spartan with a blow of a stone.

Two hundred and threescore thousand Persians slaine.

A thousand three hundred and threescore Grecians slaine.

When the victorious Greekes, had driuen out of their land
the Persians by force of armes, which long did them withstand, they built to mighty Ioue, this holy altar here, and made it common for all Greece, as plainely may appeare:
in guerdon of the good, which he did them restore,
in guerdon of their liberty, which lik'd them euermore.

This battell was fought the fourth day of the moneth which the ATHENIANS call Bædromion, that is, about the moneth of Iuly, or after the BOEOTIANS account, the sixe and twentieth of the moneth they call Panemus, on which day there is kept a common assembly of the estates of GRECE, in the citie of PLATÆES, where the PLATÆIANS make a solemne sacrifice vnto Iupiter, protector of their liberty, to giue him thankes alwayes for this victorie. It is no maruell that there was such difference then betwixt the moneths and dayes, considering that euen now when Astronomie is more perfectly vnderstood, then it was then: some do yet beginne and end their moneths at one day, and some at another. After this great battell and ouerthrow of the barbarous people, there rose a great strife betwixt the ATHENIANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS, touching the reward and honour of the victorie. For the ATHENIANS would not giue place vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor suffer them to set vp anie tokens or signes of triumph. Whereupon the GRECIANS running to armes in mutinie together, by this occasion they had almost spoiled one another: had not Aristides through his wisdome and wise perswasions, staied, and quieted the other captaines his companions, and specially one Leocrates and Myronides, whom he wan with such discreet and gentle words, that they were contented to referre it wholly vnto the arbiterment and iudgement of the other people of GRECE. So the GRECIANS met in the same place together, purposely to decide their controuersie. In this counsell holden there, Theogiton a captaine of the MEGARIANS, sayd for his opinion, that to auoide the ciuill warre might grow betweene the GRECIANS vpon this quarrell: he thought it very requisite, to appoint ouer the reward and honour of this victorie, vnto some other city, then to any of the two that fell out about it. After him rose vp Cleocritus CORINTHIAN, seeming to euery man there that he would haue requested this honour for the city of CORINTH, being indeed the third city in estimation of all GRECE, next vnto SPARTA and ATHENS: howbeit he made an oration in commendation of the PLATÆIANS, which was maruellously liked, and well thought of of euerie man: for his opinion went flatly with the PLATÆIANS, that to end this strife, they should giue the honour of this victorie vnto the city of PLATÆES, and so would neither of both parties be angrie that they should be honoured. Vpon his words, Aristides first agreed on the ATHENIANS behalfe, and then Pausanias for the LACEDÆMONIANS, that the PLATÆIANS should haue the reward. Now they both being agreed, before the spoile was deuided betweene them, they set aside foure score talents that were giuen to the PLATÆIANS, with the which they built a temple vnto Minerua, and gaue her an image, and set out all her temple with pictures that remaine whole vntill this day: and the LACEDÆMONIANS notwithstanding, did set vp their tokens of victorie by themselues, and the ATHENIANS theirs also by themselues. So, they sending vnto the Oracle of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES, to know vnto what gods, and how they should do sacrifice: Apollo answered them that they should build vp an altar vnto Iupiter, protectour of their liberty, howbeit that they should put no sacrifice vpon it, vntill they had first put out all the fire through the whole countrey, because it had bene polluted and defiled by the barbarous people: and then, that they should fetch pure and cleane fire at the common altar, whereon they do sacrifice vnto Apollo Pythias, in the citie of DELPHES. This aunswere being deliuered, the great Lords and officers of GRECE went through all the countrey, to put out the fire euerie where. And there was a man of the same city of PLATÆES at that time called Euchidas, that came and offered himselfe, and promised he would bring them fire from the temple of Apollo Pythias, with all possible speede that might be. So when he came to the citie of DELPHES, after he had sprinkled and purified his bodie with cleane water, he put a crowne of laurell vpon his head, and went in that manner to take fire from the altar of Apollo. When he had done, he hied him againe as fast as he could runne for life, vnto the city of PLATÆES, and came thither before the Sunne was set, hauing come and gone that day a thousand furlongs. But after he had saluted his citizens, and deliuered them the fire he brought: he fell downe dead at their feete, and gaue vp the ghost. The PLATÆIANS lift him vp starke dead, and buried him in the temple of Diana Euclia, to say, of good renowme: and caused afterwards this Epitaph following to be grauen vpon his tombe:

Engraued here doth lye, Euchidas speedie man, who in one day both too and fro, to Delphes lightly ranne:
Euen from this selfe same place, which thou doest here behold, such haste, post haste, he swiftly made, thereof thou maist be bold.

Many thinke that this goddesse Euclia is Diana, and so they call her. But other hold opinion she was the daughter of Hercules, and of Myrto the Nymph, Menætius daughter, and Patroclus sister, that died a virgin, and was honored afterwards as a goddesse of the BOEOTIANS, and of the LOCRIANS. For in all their cities and townes in open places, they find an altar and image dedicated vnto her: and all that are maried, do sacrifice to her vpon that altar. Afterwards there was a generall counsell holden by all the GRECIANS, in the which Aristides made a motion, that all the cities of GRECE should yearely sent their deputies at a certaine day appointed, vnto the citie of PLATÆES, there to make their prayers and sacrifices vnto the gods: and that from fiue yeares, to fiue yeares, they should celebrate common games, that should be called the games of liberty: and that they should also leauie through all the prouinces of GRECE, for maintenance of the warres against the PERSIANS and barbarous people, ten thousand footemen, a thousand horsemen, and a fleete of a hundred saile. Also that the PLATÆIANS thencefoorth should be taken for deuoute and holy men, and that no man should be so hardie as to hurt or offend them, and that they should onely tend the sacrifices vnto the gods, for the health health and prosperity of GRECE. All which articles were enacted in forme and manner aforesaid, and the PLATÆIANS bound themselues yearely to keepe solemne sacrifices and anniuersaries for the soules of the GRECIANS that were slaine in their territories, fighting for defence of the liberty of the GRECIANS. And this they obserue yet vnto this day in this sort. The sixteenth day of the moneth of Mæmacterion (which the BOEOTIANS call Alalcomenies, and is about the moneth of Ianuary) they go a procession, and before the procession there goeth a trumpetor that soundeth the alarum. Then there follow certaine chariots loden with branches of firre-tree, and with nosegayes and garlands of triumph: then a blacke bull, and certaine yong gentlemen noble men sonnes, that cary great cawdrons with two eares full of wine and milke, such as they vse to powre vpon the graues of dead men for propitiatory oblations, and other young boyes free borne, that carie oiles, perfumes, and other sweete odours in viall glasses: for no seruant or bondman may lawfully be admitted to haue any office about this mysterie, for that they whose memory they honor, died all fighting for defence of the liberty of GRECE. After all this shew, followeth the prouost of the PLATÆIANS for that time being, last of all: who may not all the rest of the yeare besides so much as touch any iron, nor weare any other coloured gowne but white. Howbeit then he weareth on a purple coloured coate, and holdeth a funerall pot in one of his hands, which he taketh in the towne-house, and a naked sword in the other hand, and so goeth through the city in this sort after all the pompe aforesayd, vnto the Church-yard where all their graues be that were slaine at that battell. So when he commeth thither, he draweth water out of a well that is there, and with the same he washeth the foure square pillars and images that stand vpon those tombes, and then annointeth them with oyles and sweete sauours: afterwards, he sacrificeth a bull, and layeth him vpon a heape of wood hard by him, as they do when they burne the bodies of dead men, and making certaine prayers and petitions vnto Iupiter and Mercurie, gods of the earth, he doth solemnly inuite the soules of those valiant men that died fighting for the liberty of GRECE, vnto the feast of the funerall sacrifice. Then he taketh a cup full of wine in his hand, and spilling it all vpon their tombes, he speaketh these words aloud: I drinke to the worthy and valiant men, that died sometime in defence of the liberty of GRECE. This solemne ceremony and anniuersarie, the PLATÆIANS do duely obserue vnto this present day. Now when the ATHENIANS were returned to ATHENS, Aristides perceiuing the people were bent to stablish a popular state, where the people might beare the whole rule and authority, iudging them well worthy to be considered of, in respect of their noble seruice and valiant courage they had shewed in this warre: and considering also that they would hardly be brought to like of any other gouernement, being yet in armes, and very stout, by reason of the famous victories they had obtained: he caused a law to be made, that all authority of gouernement should runne in equalitie among the citizens, and that thencefoorth all burgesses (as well poore as rich) should be chosen by voices of the people, and promoted to offices within the city. And moreouer, when Themistocles told in open assembly, that he had a thing in his head would be greatly to the profit and commoditie of the state, but yet it was not to be spoken openly for diuerse respects: the people willed him to tell it vnto Aristides onely, and to take his aduice in it, to know whether it was meete to be done, or not. Then Themistocles told him secretly betweene them, that he thought to set the arcenall on fire, where all the GRECIANS ships lay: alledging, that by this meanes the ATHENIANS shold be the greatest men of power in all GRECE. Aristides hearing that, without any more, came presently to the people againe, and told the whole counsell openly, that nothing could be more profitable indeed for the whole commonwealth, and withall more wicked and vniust, then that Themistocles thought good to do. When the people heard Aristides aunswere, they willed Themistocles to let his deuice alone whatsoeuer it were: so great iusticers were the ATHENIANS, and so much did they trust Aristides wisedome and equitie besides. So they made Aristides afterwards Generall of the armie of the ATHENIANS together with Cimon, and sent them to make warre against the barbarous people. Aristides at his comming thither, seeing Pausanias, and the other captaines that were Generals ouer the whole army, dealing hardly, and churlishly with people their confederates, he on the contrary side, spake gently vnto them, and shewed himselfe as courteous and familiar to them as he could possible, making his companion also familiar to all, and iust to euerie body, not oppressing some to ease others in defraying the charges of the warres. Aristides taking this course, it was not noted how by litle and litle he cut off the rule and authoritie of the

The iustice of the Athenians Aristides and Cimon generals of the Athenians against the barbarous people.

Aristides iustice and vertue tooke from the Lacedæmonians all their rule and authority in Greece.

LACEDÆMONIANS in GRECE, not by force of armes, nor by ships, nor by numbers of horses, but onely by his graue and wise gouernement. For if the iustice and vertue of Aristides, and the mildnesse and curtesie of Cimon made the gouernment of the ATHENIANS to be liked of, and accepted of all the other people of GRECE: the couetousnesse, pride and fiercenesse of Pausanias, made it much more to be desired. For Pausanias neuer spake vnto the other captaines of the people, allies, and confederates, but it was euer in choller, and he was too sharpe with them: and for the poore priuate souldiers, he would cause them to be cruelly whipped for euery small offence, or else make them stand a whole day together on their feete, laying a heauy iron anker vpon their shoulders. No man durst go forrage, neither for straw, nor reedes to make them couches of, nor durst water their horse before the SPARTANS: for he had set skouts for them to whip them home, that went out before them. And one day when Aristides thought to haue spoken to him, and to haue told him something, he frowned vpon him, and sayd he had no leisure to speake with him now, and so would not heare him: whereupon the captaines of the other GRECIANS, and specially those of CHIO, of SAMOS, and of LESBOS, did afterwards follow Aristides, and perswaded him to take vpon him the charge and authority to command the other people of GRECE, and to take into his protection the allies and confederates of the same, who long sithence wished to reuolt from the gouernement of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and onely to submit themselues vnto the ATHENIANS. Aristides answered them thus: that they had not onely reason to do that they sayd, but that they were also constrained to do it. Notwithstanding, because the ATHENIANS might haue good ground and assurance of their vndoubted fidelity and good seruice, they should deliuer them manifest testimony and assurance thereof, by some famous act attempted against the LACEDÆMONIANS, whereby their people hereafter durst neuer fall from the league of the ATHENIANS. Vliades SAMIAN, and Antagoras of CHIO hearing him say so, both captaines of galleys confedered together: they went one day to set vpon the Admirall galley of Pausanias, hard by BIZANTIVM, the one of the one side of her, and the other on the other side, as she was rowing before all the fleete. Pausanias seeing them, stood vp straight in a maruellous rage against them, and threatned them that before it were long he would make them know they had bene better to haue assaulted their owne naturall country, then to haue set vpon him as they had done. But they answered him, and bad him get him away quickly if he were wise, and let him thanke fortune hardly, that graunted the GRECIANS victory at the battell of PLATÆES vnder his leading: and that it was nothing else but the onely reuerence and respect of the same, that had made the GRECIANS hold their hands till now, from giuing him that iust punishment his pride and arrogancy had deserued. So the end was, they left the LACEDÆMONIANS, and stacke vnto the ATHENIANS: wherein was easily discerned the great courage, and wonderfull magnanimity of the LACEDÆMONIANS. For when they saw their captaines were marred and corrupted, through the ouer great authority and liberty they had, they willingly gaue vp their commandement ouer the other GRECIANS, and did no more send their captaines to be generals of the whole army of GRECE: thinking it better for their citizens, that they should be obedient, and in euery point obserue the discipline and law of their country, then if they had bene otherwise the onely rulers and Lords ouer the whole country. Now at what time the LACEDÆMONIANS did commaund all GRECE, as Lords, the cities and people of GRECE did pay a certaine sum of mony, towards defraying of the charges of the warres against the barbarous people. But after that their seigniority and rule was taken from them, the GRECIANS were contented a taxe should be leauied, and that euery city should be reasonably sessed, according to their wealth and ability: becausse euery city might know what they should pay. And for this purpose, they prayed the ATHENIANS they would appoint Aristides to take order for it, vnto whom they gaue full power and authority to taxe and sesse euery city indifferently, considering the greatnesse of the territorie, & the reuenues of the same, as euery one was reasonably able to beare it. But if Aristides were poore when he entred into that great charge & office of authority, wherein all GRECE in maner did referre themselues vnto his discretion: he came out of that office more poore, and had made his assessement and taxation not onely iustly and truly, but also so indifferently according vnto euery mans ability, that there was no man could find fault with his doings. And like as the ancient men in old time did celebrate, and sing out the blessednesse of those that liued vnder the raigne of Saturne, which they called the golden age: euen so did the people and confederates of the ATHENIANS afterwards honour the assessement made by Aristides, calling calling it the fortunate and bleſſed time of GRECE, and ſpecially, when ſhortly after it did double, and treble on the ſudden. For the taxe Ariſtides made, came to about foure hundred and three-ſcore talents: and Pericles raiſed it almoſt vnto a third part. For Thucydides writeth, that at the beginning of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, the ATHENIANS leauied ſixe hundred talents yearely vpon their confederates. And after the death of Pericles, the oratours and counſellors for matters of ſtate, did raiſe it vp higher by litle and litle, vntill it mounted vnto the ſumme of thirteene hundred talents. And this was not becauſe the warres did riſe to ſo great a charge, by reaſon of the length of the ſame, and of the loſſes the ATHENIANS had receiued: but for that they did accuſtome the people to make diſtributions of money by hand vnto euery citizen, to make them ſet vp games, and make goodly images, and to build ſumptuous temples. Thus was Ariſtides therefore iuſtly honoured, praiſed and eſteemed aboue all other, for this iuſt impoſition of taxes, ſauing onely of Themiſtocles: who went vp and downe fleering at the matter, ſaying it was no meete praiſe for an honeſt man, but rather for a coffer well barred with iron, where a man might ſafely lay vp his gold and ſiluer. This he ſpake to be euen with Ariſtides, which was nothing like the ſharpe gird Ariſtides gaue him openly, when Themiſtocles talking with him, told him it was an excellent thing for a captaine to be able to know, and to preuent the counſels and doings of the enemies: And ſo is it, ſayd Ariſtides againe, not onely a needfull, but an honeſt thing, and meete for a worthy Generall of an army, to be cleane fingered, without bribery or corruption. So Ariſtides made all the other people of GRECE to ſweare, that they would truly keepe the articles of the alliance, and he himſelfe as Generall of the ATHENIANS, did take their oaths in the name of the ATHENIANS: and ſo pronouncing execrations and curſes againſt them that ſhould breake the league and oath taken, he threw iron wedges red hot into the ſea, and prayed the gods to deſtroy them euen ſo, that did violate their vowed faith. Notwithſtanding, afterwards (in my opinion) when there fell out great alteration in the ſtate, and that the ATHENIANS were forced to rule more ſtraightly then before: Ariſtides then willed the ATHENIANS to let him beare the danger and burthen of periury and execration, and that they ſhould not let for feare thereof to do any thing whatſoeuer they thought meet or neceſſary. To conclude, Theophraſtus writeth, that Ariſtides was not onely a perfect, an honeſt, and iuſt man, in priuate matters betwixt party and party: but in matters of ſtate, and concerning the commonweale, he did many things oftentimes according to the neceſſity of the time, and troubles of the city, wherein violence and iniuſtice was to be vſed. As when the queſtion was asked in open counſell, to know whether they might take away the gold and ſiluer that was left in the Ile of DELOS ſafely layd vp in the temple of Apollo, to beare out the charges of the warres againſt the barbarous people, and to bring it from thence vnto ATHENS, vpon the motion of the SAMIANS, although it was directly againſt the articles of the alliance, made and ſworne among all the GRECIANS, Ariſtides opinion being asked in the ſame, he anſwered: it was not iuſt, but yet profitable. Now, notwithſtanding Ariſtides had brought his city to rule aud command many thouſands of people, yet was he ſtill poore for all that, and vntill his dying day he gloried rather to be praiſed for his pouerty, then for all the famous victories and battels he had won: and that plainly appeareth thus. Callias Ceres torch-bearer, was his neare kinſman, who through enemies came to be accuſed, and ſtood in hazard of life: ſo when the day came that his matter was to be heard before the Iudges, his accuſers very faintly, and to litle purpoſe, vttered the offences whereof they accuſed him, and running into other by-matters, left the chiefeſt matter, and ſpake thus to the Iudges: My Lords, you all know Ariſtides the ſonne of Lyſimachus, and you are not ignorant alſo that his vertue hath made him more eſteemed, then any mans elſe is, or can be, in all GRECE. How thinke ye doth he liue at home: when you ſee him abroad vp and downe the city, in a thred-bare gowne all to tattered? Is it not likely, trow ye, that he is ready to ſtarue at home for lacke of meate and reliefe, whom we all ſee quake for very cold, being ſo ill arrayed and clothed? And yet M. Callias here his coſin germaine the richeſt citizen in all ATHENS, is ſo miſerable, that notwithſtanding Ariſtides hath done much for him, by reaſon of his great credit and authority among you, he ſuffereth him, and his poore wife & children ready to beg, to ſtarue for any helpe he giueth him. Callias perceiuing the Iudges more angry with him for that, then for any matter elſe he was accuſed of: he prayed Ariſtides might be ſent for, and willed him to tell truly whether he had not offered him good round ſums of money, many a time and oft, and intreated him to take it, which he euer refuſed, and anſwered him alwayes, that he could better boaſt of his pouerty, then himſelfe could of his riches:

Ariſtides gloried in his pouerty.

A hard thing to away with pouerty.

(which he sayd many did vse ill, and few could vse them well) and that it was a hard thing to find one man of a noble mind, that could away with pouerty, and that such onely might be ashamed of pouerty, as were poore against their wils. So Aristides confirmed all he spake to be true: and euery man that was at the hearing of this matter, went wholy away with this opinion, that he had rather be poore as Aristides, then rich as Callias. This tale is writtē thus by Æschines the Socratian philosopher: & Plato reporteth of him also, that notwithstanding there were many other famous and notable men of ATHENS, yet he gaue Aristides praise aboue them all. For others, sayd he, (as Themistocles, Cimon, and Pericles) haue beautified the city with stately porches, and sumptuous buildings of gold and siluer, and with store of other fine superfluous deuises: but Aristides was only he, that vertuously disposed himselfe and all his doings, to the furtherance of the state and commonweale. His iustice and good nature appeared plainely in his doings and behauiour towards Themistocles. For though Themistocles was euer against Aristides in all things, and a continuall enemy of his, and that by his meanes and practise he was banished from ATHENS: yet when Themistocles was accused of treason to the state, hauing diuerse sharpe enemies against him, as Cimon, Alcmæon, with diuerse other: Aristides sought not reuenge, when he had him at this aduantage. For he neither spake nor did any thing against him at that time to hurt him: neither did he reioyce to see his enemy in misery, no more then if he had neuer enuied him in his prosperity. And touching Aristides death, some write that he died in the realme of PONTVS, being sent thither about matters of the state: and other thinke he died an old man in the city of ATHENS, greatly honoured and beloued of all the citizens. But Craterus the MACEDONIAN writeth of his death in this sort: After that Themistocles (saith he) was fled, the people of ATHENS became very stubborne and insolent: wherupon, many lewd men grew to be cōmon appeachers and accusers of the noble men and chiefest citizens, and to stirre vp the malice and ill will of the common people against them, who were waxen proud by reason of their prosperity, and dominion that was enlarged. Among the rest, Aristides was condemned for extortion and ill behauiour in the common wealth, vpon one Diophantes accusation, of the village of AMPHITROPE: who burthened him, that he tooke mony of the IONIANS, to make the annuall tribute cease which they payed vnto ATHENS: and so Craterus saith, that because Aristides was not able to pay the fine they set vpon his head (which was fiue Minas) he was driuen to forsake ATHENS, and to get him into IONIA where he died. Yet doth not Craterus bring forth any probable matter to proue this true he writeth: as his pleading, his sentence and condemnation, or any decree passed against him, although he vsed great diligence else in collecting all such matters, and vouching his authors. Furthermore, all other writers that haue specially noted the faults and offences committed by the people of ATHENS in former times against their captaines and gouernours: they do declare Themistocles exile, Miltiades captiuity that died in prison, Pericles fine wherein he was condemned, and Paches death that slue himselfe in the pulpit for orations, when he saw he was condemned: and tell diuerse such stories, adding too also Aristides banishment: but yet they make no maner of mention of the condemnation which Craterus speaketh of. Moreouer, Aristides tombe is to be seene at this day vpon the hauen of PHALERVS, which was set vp for him at the charge of the commonwealth, as it is reported, because he died so poore a man, as they found nothing in his house to bury him with. Other go further, and say that his daughters were maried by decree of the people, at the charge of the commonwealth, and that the city gaue euery one of them three thousand Drachmas: and his sonne Lysimachus, a hundred Minas of siluer, and a hundred Iugera, and at Alcibiades request, who was the author of the decree, they gaue him foure Drachmas a day besides, of ordinary allowance. Furthermore, when this Lysimachus died, he left aliue one onely daughter called Polycrite, whom the people appointed, as Callisthenes writeth, as much prouision to liue withal, as they gaue to any that wan the Olympian games. And sithence, Demetrius PHAIERIAN, Hieronymus RHODIAN, Aristoxenus the Musitian, and Aristotle the Philosopher, at the least if the booke intituled of Nobility by any of Aristotles workes: all these agree together, that one Myrto, Aristides daughters daughter, was maried to the wife Socrates, who tooke her to his wife (hauing a wife already) because she was a poore widow, and could not be maried for her pouerty, hauing much a do to liue. Yet Panætius doth write against him, in his booke of Socrates life. But Demetrius PHALERIAN writeth in his booke he intituled Socrates, that he could remember very well he had seene one Lysimachus, Aristides sonnes sonne, or his daughters sonne, that was very poore, and liued of that he could get to interpret dreames, by

It is very true that the ſelfe ſame Demetrius PHALERIAN, when he reformed the ſtate of ATHENS, ordained that his mother and ſiſter ſhould haue each of them a Drachma by the day to find them withall, out of the common chamber of the city. And it is no new, nor ſtrange thing, that the people of ATHENS were ſo carefull to helpe and to relieue the women that dwelt in the city: conſidering that in times paſt, Ariſtogiton hauing a litle daughter in the Ile of LEMNOS, in very hard and poore ſtate, and that could not be beſtowed in mariage for her pouerty, they cauſed her to be brought to ATHENS, and maried her in one of the nobleſt houſes of the city, and made her a ioynter beſides in the village of POTAMOS. Which great curteſie and humanity of theirs, hath euer deſerued great fame and commendation, and yet continueth euen vntill this day, in that noble city of ATHENS, in the mouth of euery man there.

THE LIFE OF
Marcus Cato the Cenſor.

MARCVS Cato and his anceſtors, were (as they ſay) of the city of THVSCVLVM: but before he went vnto the warres, and dealt in matters of the common wealth, he dwelt and liued in the countrey of the SABYNES, vpon certaine land his father left him. And though to many his anceſtors were knowne to haue bene obſcure: yet he himſelfe did highly commend his father Marcus, by bearing his name, and ſaying he was a ſouldier, and had ſerued valiantly in the field. And he telleth alſo of another Cato that was his greatgrandfather, who for his valiant ſeruice had bene oft rewarded of the Generals, with ſuch honorable gifts, as the ROMAINES did vſe to giue vnto them, that had done ſome famous act in any battell: and how that he hauing loſt fiue horſes of ſeruice in the warres, the value of the ſame was reſtored to him againe in mony of the common treaſure, becauſe he had ſhewed himſelfe truſty and valiant for the common-wealth. And where they had a common ſpeech at ROME to call them vpſtarts, that were no gentlemen borne, but did riſe by vertue: it fortuned Cato to be called one of them. And for his part he did confeſſe it, that he was of the firſt of the houſe that Cato called an vpſtart.

euer had honour, and office of ſtate: but by reaſon of the noble acts and good ſeruice of his anceſtors, he maintained he was very ancient. He was called at the beginning after his third name, Priſcus: but afterwards by reaſon of his great wiſedome and experience, he was ſurnamed Cato, becauſe the ROMAINES call a wiſe man, and him that hath ſeene much, Cato. He was ſomewhat giuen to be red-faced, and had a paire of ſtaring eyes in his head, as this man telleth vs, that for ill will wrote theſe verſes of him after his death:

The diſinition of this vvord Cato.

Pluto (the god) which rules the furies infernall, will not receiue the damned ghoſt, of Porcius in his hall:
his ſawcy coppered noſe, and fierie ſtaring eyes, his common ſlaunderous tales, which he did in this world deuiſe, made Pluto ſtand in dread, that he would brawle in hell, although his bones were drie and dead, on earth he was ſo fell.

Catoes maners and life.

Furthermore, touching the diſpoſition of his body, he was maruellous ſtrong and luſtie, and all becauſe he did vſe to labour and toile euen from his youth, and to liue ſparingly, as one that was euer brought vp in the warres from his youth: ſo that he was of a very good conſtitution, both for ſtrength of body, and for health alſo. As for vtterance, he eſteemed it as a ſecond body, and moſt neceſſary gift, not onely to make men honeſt, but alſo as a thing very requiſit for a man that ſhould beare ſway and authority in the common wealth. He practiſed to ſpeake well in litle villages neare home, whither he went many times to pleade mens cauſes in courts iudiciall, that would retaine him of counſell: ſo as in ſhort time he became a perfect pleader, and had tongue at will, and in proceſſe of time became an excellent Orator. After he was thus well knowne, they that were familiar with him, began to perceiue a graue manner and behauiour in his life, and a certaine noble mind in him, worthie to be employed in matters of ſtate and great importance, and to be called into the common wealth. For he did not onely refuſe to take fees for his pleading, and following the cauſes he maintained: but furthermore made no reckoning of the eſtimation he wan by that manner and practiſe, as though that was not the onely marke he ſhot at. But his deſire reached further, rather to win himſelfe fame by ſeruice in the warres, and by valiant fighting with his enemy: then with ſuch a quiet and pleaſing manner of life. Inſomuch as when he was but a young ſtripling in manner, he had many cuts vpon his breſt, which he had receiued in diuerſe battels and encounters againſt the enemies. For he himſelfe writeth, that he was but ſeuenteene yeares old, when he went firſt vnto the warres, which was about the time of Hannibals chiefe proſperity, when he ſpoiled and deſtroyed all ITALY. So when he came to fight, he would ſtrike luſtily, and neuer ſtirre foote nor giue backe, and would looke cruelly vpon his enemie, and threaten him with a fearefull and terrible voice, which he vſed himſelfe, and wiſely taught other alſo to vſe the like: for ſuch countenances, ſayd he, many times do feare the enemies more, then the ſword ye offer them. When he went any iourney, he euer marched on foote, and caried his armor vpon his backe, and had a man waiting on him that caried his victuals with him, with whom he was neuer angry (as they ſay) for any thing he had prepared for his dinner or ſupper, but did helpe to dreſſe it himſelfe for the moſt part, if he had any leiſure, when he had done the dutie of a priuate ſouldier in fortifying the campe, or ſuch other needfull buſineſſe. All the while he was abroad in ſeruice in the warres, he neuer dranke other then cleane water, vnleſſe it were when he found he was not well, and then he would take a litle vineger: but if he ſaw he were weake, he wold then drinke a litle wine. Now it fortuned that Manius Curius the ROMAINE, who had triumphed thriſe, had a prety houſe and land hard by Cato, where he kept in times paſt, which Cato for a while would viſite oft. And he conſidering how litle land he had to his houſe, & what a litle houſe he had withall, and how poorely it was built, wondered with himſelfe what manner of man Curius had bene, that hauing bene the greateſt man of ROME in his time, and hauing ſubdued the mightieſt nations and people of all ITALY, and driuen king Pyrrus alſo out of the ſame: yet himſelfe with his owne hands did manure that litle patch of ground, and dwell in ſo poore and ſmall a farme. Whither notwithſtanding, after his three triumphs, the SAMNYTES ſent their Ambaſſadors to viſite him, who found him by the fires ſide ſeething of parſeneps, and preſented him a maruellous deale of gold from their ſtate and communalty. But Curius returned them againe with their gold, and told them, that ſuch as were contented with that ſupper, had no need of gold nor ſiluer: and that for his part, he thought it greater honor to command them that had gold, then to haue it himſelfe. Cato remembring theſe things to himſelfe, went home againe, and began to thinke vpon his houſe, of his liuing, of his familie and ſeruants, and alſo of his expences, and to cut off all ſuperfluous charges, and fell himſelfe to labour with his owne hands, more then euer he had done before. Furthermore, when Fabius Maximus tooke the city of TARENTVM againe, Cato ſerued vnder him being very young, where he fell into familiar acquaintance with Nearchus the PYTHAGORIAN Philoſopher, in whom he tooke maruellous delight to heare him talke of Philoſophy. Which Nearchus held the ſame opinion of pleaſure, that Plato did, by calling it the ſweete poyſon and chiefeſt baite to allure men to ill: and ſaying that the bodie was the firſt plague vnto the ſoule, and that her onely health, remedie, and purgation ſtood vpon rules of reaſon, good examples and contemplations, that driue ſinfull thoughts and carnall pleaſures of the body, farre off from her. Cato moreouer gaue himſelfe much to ſobrietie and temperance, and framed himſelfe to be contented with litle. They ſay he fell in his very old age to the ſtudie of the Greeke tongue, and to reade Greeke bookes, and that he profited ſomewhat by Thucydides, but much more by Demoſthenes, to frame his matter, and alſo to be eloquent: which plainely appeareth, in all his bookes and writings, full of authorities, examples, and ſtories taken out of Greeke authors: and many of his ſentences and morals, his adages and quicke anſwers, are tranſlated out of the ſame word for word. Now there was a noble man of ROME at that time, one of great authority, and a deepe wiſe man beſides, who could eaſily diſcerne buds of vertue ſprowting out of any towardly youth, who was of a good and honourable diſpoſition to helpe forward, and to aduance ſuch: his name was Valerius Flaccus, a neere neighbour vnto Cato, who was informed by his ſeruāts of Catoes ſtrange life, how he wold be doing in his ground with his owne hands: and how he would be gone euery day betimes in the morning to litle villages thereabout, to pleade mens cauſes that prayed his counſell, and that when he had done, he would come home againe: and if it were in winter, that he would but caſt a litle coat on his ſhoulders, and being ſommer he would go out bare-necked to the waſt, to worke in his ground among his ſeruants and other workmen: and would beſides, ſit & eate with them together at one boord, and drinke as they did. Moreouer, they told him alſo a world of ſuch maners and faſhions he vſed, that ſhewed him to be a maruellous plaine man, without pride, & of a good nature. Then they told him what notable wiſe ſayings and graue ſentences they heard him ſpeake. Valerius Flaccus hearing this report of him, willed his men one day to pray him to come to ſupper to him. Who falling in acquaintance with Cato, and perceiuing he was of a very good nature, and well giuen, and that he was a good griffe to be ſet in a better ground, he perſwaded him to come to ROME, and to practiſe there in the aſſembly of the people, in the common cauſes and affaires of the commonweale. Cato followed his counſell, who hauing bin no long practiſer among them, did grow ſtraight into great eſtimation, and wan him many friends, by reaſon of the cauſes he tooke in hand to defend: and was the better preferred and taken alſo, by meanes of the ſpeciall fauour and countenance Valerius Flaccus gaue him. For firſt of all, by voice of the people he was choſen Tribune of the ſouldiers (to ſay, colonell of a thouſand footmen) and afterwards was made treaſurer: and ſo went forwards, and grew to ſo great credit and authority, as he became Valerius Flaccus companion in the chiefeſt offices of ſtate, being choſen Conſull with him, and then Cenſor. But to begin withall, Cato made choiſe of Quintus Fabius Maximus, aboue all the Senators of ROME, and gaue himſelfe to follow him altogether: and not ſo much for the credit & eſtimation Fabius Maximus was of (who therein exceeded all the ROMAINES of that time) as for the modeſty and diſcreet gouernment he ſaw in him, whom he determined to follow, as a worthy mirrour and example. At which time Cato paſſed not for the malice and euill will of Scipio the great, who did ſtriue at that preſent being but a yong man, with the authority and greatneſſe of Fabius Maximus, as one that ſeemed to enuy his riſing & greatneſſe. For Cato being ſent treaſurer with Scipio, when he vndertooke the iourny into AFRIKE, and perceiuing Scipioes bountifull nature & diſpoſition to large gifts without meane to the ſouldiers: he told him plainely one day, that he did not ſo much hurt the commonwealth in waſting their treaſure, as he did great harme in changing the ancient manner of their auncеſtours: who vſed their ſouldiers to be contented with litle, but he taught them to ſpend their ſuperfluous mony (all neceſſaries prouided for) in vaine toies & trifles to ſerue their pleaſure. Scipio made him anſwer, he would haue no treaſurer ſhould controll him in that ſort, nor that ſhould looke ſo narrowly to his expences: for his intent was to go to the wars, with full ſailes as it were, and that he would (and did alſo determine) to make the ſtate priuie to all his doings, but not to the mony he ſpent. Cato hearing this anſwer, returned with ſpeed out of SICILE vnto ROME, crying out with Fabius Maximus in open Senate, that Scipio spent infinitely, and that he tended playes, comedies, and wrestlings, as if he had not bene sent to make warres, inuasions, and attempts vpon their enemies. Vpon this complaint the Senate appointed certaine Tribunes of the people, to go and see if their informations were true: and finding them so, that they should bring him backe againe to ROME. But Scipio shewed farre otherwise to the commissioners that came thither, and made them see apparant victorie, through the necessarie preparation and prouision he had made for the warres: and he confessed also, that when he had dispatched his great businesse, and was at any leisure, he would be priuately merie with his friends: and though he was liberall to his souldiers, yet that made him not negligent of his duty and charge in any matter of importance. So Scipio tooke shipping, and sailed towards AFRICKE, whither he was sent to make warre. Now to returne to Cato. He daily increased still in authoritie and credit by meanes of his eloquence, so that diuerse called him the Demosthenes of ROME: howbeit the manner of his life was in more estimation then his eloquence. For all the youth of ROME did seeke to attaine to his eloquence and commendation of words, and one enuied another which of them should come neerest: but few of them would file their hands with any labour as their forefathers did, and make a light supper and dinner, without fire or prouision, or would be content with a meane gowne, and a poore lodging, and finally would thinke it more honourable to defie fansies and pleasures, then to haue and enioy them. Because the state was waxen now of such power and wealth, as it could no more retaine the ancient discipline, and former austerity and straightnesse of life it vsed: but by reason of the largenesse of their dominion & seigniority, and the numbers of people and nations that were become their subiects, it was euen forced to receiue a medley of sundry countrey fashions, examples, and maners. This was a cause, why in reason men did so greatly wonder at Catoes vertue, when they saw other straight wearied with paines and labour, tenderly brought vp like pulers: and Cato on the other side neuer ouercomen, either with the one or with the other, no not in his youth, when he most coueted honor, nor in his age also when he was gray headed and bald, after his Consulship and triumph: but like a conquerour that had gotten the maistery, he would neuer giue ouer labor euen vnto his dying day. For he writeth himselfe, that there neuer came gowne on his backe that cost him aboue 100 pence, and that his hinds and workemen alwayes drunke no worse wine, when he was Consull and Generall of the army, then he did himselfe: and that his cater neuer bestowed in meate for his supper, aboue thirty Asses of ROMAINE money, and yet he sayd it was, because he might be the stronger, and apter to do seruice in the wars for his country and the commonwealth. He sayd furthermore, that being heire to one of his friends that died, he had a peece of tapestry by him with a deepe border, which they called then the BABYLONIAN border, and he caused it straight to be sold: and that of all his houses he had abroad in the country, he had not one wall plastered, nor rough cast. Moreouer he would say, he neuer bought bondman or slaue dearer, then a thousand fiue hundred pence, as one that sought not for fine made men, and goodly personages, but strong fellowes that could away with paines, as carters, horse-keepers, neatheards, and such like: and againe he would sell them when they were old, because he would not keepe them when they could do no seruice. To conclude, he was of opinion, that a man bought any thing deare, that was for litle purpose: yea, though he gaue but a farthing for it, he thought it too much to bestow so litle, for that which needed not. He wold haue men purchase houses, that had more store of arable land and pasture, then of fine hortyards or gardeins. Some say, he did thus for very misery and couetousnesse: other thinke, and tooke it that he liued so sparingly, to moue others by his example to cut off all superfluity and wast. Neuertheless, to sell slaues in that sort, or to turne them out of doores when you haue had the seruice of all their youth, & that they are growne old, as you vse brute beasts that haue serued whilest they may for age: me thinkes that must needes proceed of too seuere and greedy a nature, that hath no longer regard or consideration of humanity, then whilest one is able to do another good. For we see, gentlenesse goeth further then iustice. For nature teacheth vs to vse iustice onely vnto men, but gentlenesse sometimes is shewed vnto bruite beasts: and that commeth from the very fountaine and spring of all curtesie and humanity, which should neuer dry vp in any man liuing. For to say truly, to keepe cast horses spoiled in our seruice, and dogs also, not only when they are whelpes, but when they be old: be euen tokens of loue and kindnes. As the ATHENIANS made a law, when they builded their temple called Hecatompedon: that they should suffer the moyles and mulets that did seruice in their cariages about about the building of the ſame, to graze euery where, without let or trouble of any man. And they ſay, there was one of their moiles thus turned at liberty, that came her ſelfe to the place to labour, going before all the other draught beaſts, that drew vp carts loden towards the caſtell, and kept them company, as though ſhe ſeemed to encourage the reſt to draw: which the people liked ſo well in the poore beaſt, that they appointed ſhe ſhould be kept whilſt ſhe liued, at the charge of the town. And yet at this preſent are the graues of Cimons mares to be ſeene, that wan him thrice together the prize of the horſe race at the games Olympian, and they are hard by the graue of Cimon himſelfe. We heare of diuerſe alſo that had buried their dogs they brought vp in their houſe, or that waited on them: as among other, old Xanthippus buried his dogge in the top of a cliffe, which is called the dogs pit till this day. For when the people of ATHENS did forſake their city at the comming downe of king Xerxes, this dogge followed his maiſter, ſwimming in the ſea by his galleys ſide, from the firme land, vnto the Iſle of SALAMINA. And there is no reaſon, to vſe liuing and ſenſible things, as we would vſe an old ſhoo or a rag, to caſt it out vpon the dung-hill when we haue worn it, and can ſerue vs no longer. For if it were for no reſpect elſe, but to vſe vs alwaies to humanitie: we muſt euer ſhew our ſelues kind and gentle, euen in ſuch ſmall points of pitie. And as for me, I could neuer find in my heart to ſell my draught Oxe that had ploughed my land a long time, becauſe he could plough no longer for age: and much leſſe my ſlaue, to ſell him for a litle money, out of the countrey where he had dwelt a long time, to plucke him from his old trade of life wherewith he was beſt acquainted, and then ſpecially, when he ſhall be as vnprofitable for the buyer, as alſo for the ſeller. But Cato on the other ſide gloried, that he left his horſe in SPAINE he had ſerued on in the warres during his Conſulſhip, becauſe he would not put the common wealth to the charge of bringing him home by ſea into ITALIE. Now a queſtion might be made of this, and probable reaſon of either ſide, whether this was noblenеſſe or a niggardlineſſe in him: but otherwiſe to ſay truly, he was a man of a wonderfull abſtinence. For when he was Generall of the army, he neuer tooke allowance but after three buſhels of wheate a moneth of the commonwealth, for himſelfe and his whole family: and but a buſhell and halfe of barley a day, to keepe his horſe and other beaſts for his cariage. On a time when he was Prætor, the gouernement of the Iſle of SARDINIA fell to his lot: and where the other Prætors before him had put the countrey to exceeding great charge, to furniſh them with tents, bedding, clothes, and ſuch like ſtuffe, and burthened them alſo with a maruellous traine of ſeruants and their friends that waited on them, putting them to great expence in feaſting and banquetting of them: Cato in contrarie manner brought downe all that exceſſe and ſuperfluitie, vnto a maruellous neare and vncredible ſauing. For when he went to viſite the cities, he came on foote to them, and did not put them to a peny charge for himſelfe: and had onely one officer or bailiffe of the ſtate that wayted on him, and caryed his gowne and a cuppe with him, to offer vp wine to the gods in his ſacrifices. But though he came thus ſimply to the ſubiects, and eaſed them of their former charges, yet he ſhewed himſelfe ſeuere and bitter to them in matters concerning iuſtice: and ſpared no man, in any commaundement of ſeruice for the ſtate and commonwealth: for he was therein ſo preciſe, that he would not beare with any litle fault. So by this meanes, he brought the SARDINIANS vnder his gouernement, both to loue and feare the Empire of ROME, more then euer they did before: as appeareth plainely by the manner both of his ſpeaking and writing: becauſe it was pleaſant and yet graue: ſweete and fearefull: merry and ſeuere: ſententious, and yet familiar, ſuch as is meete to be ſpoken. And he was to be compared vnto Socrates: who (as Plato ſaid) at the firſt ſight ſeemed a plaine ſimple man to them that knew him but outwardly, or elſe a pleaſant taunter or mocker: but when they did looke into him, and ſound him throughly, they ſaw he was full of graue ſentences, goodly examples, and wiſe perſwaſions, that he could make men water their plants that heard him, and leade them as he would by the eare. Therefore I cannot ſee any reaſon that moues men to ſay, Cato had Lyſias grace and vtterance. Notwithſtanding, let vs referre it to their iudgements that make profeſſion to diſcerne Oratours graces and ſtiles: for my part I ſhall content my ſelfe to write at this preſent, only certaine of his notable ſayings and ſentences, perſwading my ſelfe that mens manners are better diſcerned by their words, then by their lookes, and ſo do many thinke. On a time ſeeking to diſſwade the people of ROME, which would needes make a thankefull diſtribution of corne vnto euery citizen, to no purpoſe, he beganne to make an oration with this preface. It is a hard thing (my Lordes of ROME) to bring the belly by perſwaſion to reaſon, that hath no eares.

Catoes ſayings.

And another time, reprouing the ill gouernment of the city of Rome, he ſaid: it was a hard thing to keepe vp that ſtate, where a litle fiſh was ſold dearer then an Oxe. He ſaid alſo that the Romaines were like a flocke of ſheepe: for ſaith he, as euery Weather when he is alone, doth not obey the ſhepheard, but when they are all together they one follow another for loue of the foremoſt: euen ſo are you, for when you are together, you are all contented to be led by the noſes by ſuch, whoſe counſell not a man alone of you would vſe in any priuate cauſe of your owne. And talking another time of the authoritie the women of Rome had ouer their husbands, he ſaid: other men commaund their wiues, and we commaund men, and our wiues commaund vs. But this laſt of all he borrowed of Themiſtocles pleaſant ſayings. For his ſonne making him do many things by meanes of his mother, he told his wife one day: The Athenians commaund all Greece, I commaund the Athenians, you commaund me, and your ſonne ruleth you. I pray you therefore bid him vſe the liberty he hath with ſome better diſcretion, foole and aſſe as he is, ſithence he can do more by that power and authoritie, then all the Grecians beſides. He ſaid alſo that the people of Rome did not onely delight in diuerſe ſorts of purple, but likewiſe in diuerſe ſorts of exerciſes. For ſaid he, as diuerſe commonly die that colour they ſee beſt eſteemed and is moſt pleaſant to the eye: euen ſo the luſty youthes of Rome do frame themſelues to ſuch exerciſe, as they ſee your ſelues moſt like and beſt eſteeme. He continually aduiſed the Romaines, that if their power and greatneſſe came by their vertue and temperance, they ſhould take heed they became no chaungelings, nor waxe worſe: and if they came to that greatneſſe by vice and violence, that then they ſhould chaunge to better, for by that means he knew very well they had attained to great honour and dignity. Againe he told them, that ſuch as ſued ambitiouſly to beare offices in the common-wealth, and were common ſuters for them: did ſeeme to be afraid to loſe their way, and therefore would be ſure to haue vſhers and ſergeants before them, to ſhew them the way, leſt they ſhould loſe themſelues in the city. He did reproue them alſo, that often choſe one man to continue one office ſtill: for it ſeemeth, ſaith he, either that you paſſe not much for your officers, or that you haue not many choiſe men you thinke worthy for the office. There was an enemy of his that led a maruellous wicked and an abhominable life, of whom he was wont to ſay, that when his mother prayed vnto the gods that ſhe might leaue her ſonne behind her, ſhe did not thinke to pray, but to curſe: meaning to haue him liue for a plague to the world. And to another alſo that had vnthriftily ſold his lands which his father had left him, lying vpon the ſea ſide, he pointed vnto them with his finger, and made as though he wondred how he came to be ſo great a man, that he was ſtronger then the ſea: for that which the ſea hardly conſumeth and eateth out by litle and litle a long time, he had conſumed it all at a clappe. Another time, when king Eumenes was come to Rome, the Senate entertained him maruellous honourably, and the nobleſt citizens did ſtriue, enuying one another, who ſhould welcome him beſt. But Cato in contrary maner ſhewed plainely, that he did ſuſpect all this feaſting and entertainement, and would not come at it. When one of his familiar friends told him, I maruell why you flie from king Eumenes company, that is ſo good a Prince, and loues the Romaines ſo well. Yea, ſaid he, let it be ſo, but for all that, a king is no better then a rauening beaſt that liues of the pray: neither was there euer any king ſo happie, that deſerued to be compared to Epaminondas, to Pericles, to Themiſtocles, nor to Manius Curius, or to Hannylcar, ſurnamed Barca. They ſay his enemies did malice him, becauſe he vſed commonly to riſe before day, and did forget his owne buſineſſe to follow matters of ſtate. And he affirmed, that he had rather loſe the reward of his well doing, then not to be puniſhed for doing of euill: and that he would beare with all other offending ignorantly, but not with himſelfe. The Romaines hauing choſen on a time three Ambaſſadours to ſend into the Realme of Bythinia, one of them hauing the goute in his feet, the other his head full of cuts and great gaſhes, and the third being but a foole: Cato laughing, ſaid, the Romaines ſent an Ambaſſade that had neither feet, head nor * hart. Scipio ſued once to Cato at Polybius requeſt, about thoſe that were baniſhed from Achaia. The matter was argued afterwards in the Senate, and there fell out diuerſe opinions about it. Some would haue had them reſtored to their countrey and goods againe: other were wholly againſt it. So Cato riſing vp at the laſt, ſaid vnto them: It ſeemes we haue litle elſe to do, when we ſtand beating of our braines all day, diſputing about theſe old Grecians, whether the Romaines or the Achaians ſhall burie them. In the end, the Senate tooke order they ſhould be reſtored vnto their country againe. Whereupon Polybius thought to make petition againe vnto the Senate, that the baniſhed banished men whom they had restored by their order, might enioy their former estates and honours in ACHAIA, they had at the time of their banishment: but before he would moue the sute vnto the Senate, he would feele Catoes opinion first, what he thought of it. Who answered him, smiling: me thinkes Polybius thou art like Vlysses, that when he had scaped out of Cyclops caue the giant, he would needes go thither againe, to fetch his hat and girdle he had left behind him there. He said also, that wise men did learne and profite more by fooles, then fooles did by wise men. For wise men said he, do see the faults fooles commit, and can wisely auoide them: but fooles neuer studie to follow the example of wise mens doings. He said also that he euer liked young men better that blushed, then those that looked euer whitely: and that he would not haue him for a souldier, that wagges his hand as he goeth, remoues his feet when he fighteth, and rowteth and snorteth lowder in his sleepe, then when he cryeth out to his enemy. Another time when he would taunt a maruellous fat man: See, said he, what good can such a bodie do to the commonwealth, that from his chinne to his codpeece is nothing but belly? And to another man that was giuen to pleasure, and desired to be great with him: My friend, said Cato, as refusing his acquaintance: I cannot liue with him that hath better iudgement in the pallate of his mouth, then in his heart. This was also his saying, that the soule of a louer, liued in anothers bodie: and that in all his life time he repented him of three things. The first was, if that he euer told secret to any woman: the second, that euer he went by water, when he might haue gone by land: the third, that he had bene idle a whole day, and had done nothing. Also when he saw a vicious old man, he would say, to reproue him: O gray beard, age bringeth many deformities with it, helpe it not besides with your vice. And to a seditious Tribune of the people that was suspected to be a poisoner, and would needes passe some wicked law by voyce of the people, he would say: O young man, I know not which of these two be worse, to drinke the drugges thou giuest, or to receiue the lawes thou offerest. Another time, being reuiled by one that led a lewd & naughtie life: go thy way, said he, I am no man to scold with thee: for thou art so vsed to reuile, and to be reuiled, that it is not dainty to thee: but for my self, I neuer vse to heare scolding, and much lesse delight to scold. These be his wise sayings we find written of him, whereby we may the easilier coniecture his maners and nature. Now when he was chosen Consul with his friend Valerius Flaccus, the gouernment of SPAINE fell to his lot, that is on this side of the riuer of BÆTIS. So Cato hauing subdued many people by force of armes, and won others also by friendly meanes: sodainly there came a maruellous great army of the barbarous people against him, & had enuironed him so, as he was in maruellous danger, either shamefully to be taken prisoner, or to be slaine in the field. Wherefore he sent presently vnto the CELTIBERIANS, to pray aide of them, who were next neighbours vnto the marches where he was. These CELTIBERIANS did aske him two hundred talents to come and help him: but the ROMAINES that were about him, could not abide to hire the barbarous people to defend them. Then Cato told them straight, there was no hurt in it, nor any dishonor vnto them. For said he, if the field be ours, then we shall pay their wages we promised, with the spoile and money of our enemies: and if we lose it, then our selues and they lye by it, being left neither man to pay, nor yet any to aske it. In the end he wanne the battell, after a sore conflict, and after that time he had maruellous good fortune. For Polybius writeth, that all the walles of the cities that were on this side the riuer of BÆTIS, were by his commandement razed in one day, which were many and full of good souldiers. Himself writeth, that he tooke mo cities in SPAINE, then he remained there daies: and it is no vaine boast, if it be true that is written, that there were foure hundred cities of them. Now, though the souldiers vnder him had gotten well in this iourney, and were rich, yet he caused a pound waight of siluer to be giuen to euery souldier besides: saying, he liked it better that many should returne home with siluer in their purses, then a few of them with gold onely. But for himselfe he affirmed: that of all the spoile gotten of the enemies, he neuer had any thing, sauing that which he tooke in meate and drinke. And yet, saith he, I speake it not to reproue them that grow rich by such spoiles: but because I would contend in vertue rather with the best, then in money with the richest, or in couetousnesse with the most auaritious. For not onely he himselfe was cleare from bribes and extortion, but his Officers also vnder him kept the same course. In this Spanish iourney, he had fiue of his seruants with him, whereof one of them called Paccus, bought three young boyes that were taken in the warres, when the spoile was sold to them that would giue most. So Cato knew it. But Paccus being affraid to come neare his maister, hanged himselfe: and then Catoes abſtinence from ſpoile and briberie.

Cato ſold the boyes againe, and put the money made of them into the treaſurie cheſtes of ſauing at ROME. Now while Cato was in SPAINE, Scipio the Great that was his enemie, and ſought to hinder the courſe of his proſperitie, and to haue the honour of conquering all the reſt of SPAINE, he made all the friends he could to the people, to be choſen in Catoes place. He was no ſooner entred into his charge, but he made all the poſſible ſpeede he could to be gone, that he might make Catoes authoritie ceaſe the ſooner. Cato hearing of his haſtie comming, tooke onely fiue enſignes of footemen, and fiue hundred horſemen to attend vpon him home: with the which, in his iourney homeward, he ouercame a people in SPAINE called the LACETANIANS, and tooke ſixe hundred traitours alſo that were fled from the ROMAINES campe to their enemies, and did put to death euery mothers child of them. Scipio ſtorming at that, ſaid Cato did him wrong. But Cato to mocke him finely, ſaid: it was the right way to bring ROME to flouriſh, when noble borne citizens would not ſuffer meane borne men, and vpſtarts as himſelfe was, to go before them in honour: and on the other ſide when meane borne men would contend in vertue, with thoſe that were of nobleſt race, and farre aboue them in calling. For all that, when Cato came to ROME, the Senate commaunded that nothing ſhould be chaunged nor altered otherwiſe, then Cato had appointed it, whileſt he was in his office. So that the gouernement for which Scipio made ſuch earneſt ſute in SPAINE, was a greater diſgrace vnto him, then it was vnto Cato: becauſe he paſſed all his time and office in peace, hauing no occaſion offered him to do any notable ſeruice worthie memorie. Furthermore, Cato after he had bene Conſull, and had graunted to him the honour to triumph, did not as many others do, that ſeek not after vertue, but onely for worldly honour and dignitie: who, when they haue bene called to the higheſt offices of ſtate, as to be Conſuls, and haue alſo graunted them the honour to triumph: do then leaue to deale any more in matters of ſtate, and diſpoſe themſelues to liue merily and quietly at home, and not to trouble themſelues any more. Now Cato, farre otherwiſe behaued himſelfe: for he would neuer leaue to exerciſe vertue, but began afreſh, as if he had bene a young nouice in the world, and as one greedy of honour and reputation, and to take as much paines and more then he did before. For, to pleaſure his friends or any other citizen, he would come to the market place, and pleade their cauſes for them that required his counſell, and go with his friends alſo into the warres: as he went with Tiberius Sempronius the Conſull, and was one of his Lieutenants at the conqueſt of the countrey of THRACE, and vnto the prouinces adioyning to the riuer of DANVEY vpon thoſe marches. After that, he was in GRECE alſo, Colonell of a thouſand footemen, vnder Manius Aquilius, againſt king Antiochus ſurnamed the Great, who made the ROMAINES ſo much affraid of him, as euer they were of enemie, but Hannibal. For, when he had conquered all the regions and prouinces of ASIA, which Seleucus Nicanor enioyed before, and had ſubdued many barbarous and warlike nations: he was ſo proud harted, as he would needs haue wars with the ROMAINES, whom he knew to be the only worthy men, and beſt able to fight with him. So he made ſome honeſt ſhew and pretence of wars, ſaying: it was to ſet the GRECIANS at liberty, who had no cauſe thereof, conſidering they liued after their owne lawes, and were but lately deliuered from the bondage of king Philip, and of the MACEDONIANS, through the goodnes of the ROMAINES. Notwithſtanding, he came out of ASIA into GRECE with a maruellous great army, and all GRECE was ſtraight in armes and in wonderfull daunger, becauſe of the great promiſes and large hopes the gouernours of diuerſe cities (whom the king had wonne and corrupted with money) did make vnto him. Whereupon Manius diſpatched Ambaſſadours vnto the citie, and ſent Titus Quintus Flamininus among others, who kept the greateſt part of the people from rebelling (that were eaſily drawn to giue eare to this innouation) as we haue expreſſed more amply in his life: and Cato being ſent Ambaſſadour alſo, perſwaded the CORINTHIANS, thoſe of PATRAS, and the ÆGIANS, and made them ſticke ſtill to the ROMAINES, and continued a long time at ATHENS. Some ſay they find an oration of his written in the Greeke tongue, which he made before the ATHENIANS, in commendation of their auncеſtours: wherein he ſaid, he tooke great pleaſure to ſee ATHENS, for the beautie and ſtatelineſſe of the citie. But this is falſe: for he ſpake vnto the ATHENIANS by an interpreter, though he could haue vttered his oration in the Greeke toung if he had bene diſpoſed: but he did like the lawes and cuſtomes of his owne countrey, and the ROMAINE tong ſo well, that he laughed at them that would praiſe and commend the Greeke tongue. As he did once mock Poſthumius Albinus, who wrote an hiſtorie in the Greeke toung, praying the readers in in his preface to beare with him, if they found any imperfection in the tongue: marrie, said Cato, he had deserued pardon indeede, if he had bene forced to haue written his storie in the Greeke tongue, by order of the states of GRECE, called the counsell of the Amphictyons. They say the ATHENIANS wondred to heare his readie tongue. For what he had vttered quickely in few words vnto the interpreter: the interpreter was driuen to deliuer them againe with great circumstances and many words. So that he left them of this opinion, that the GRECIANS words lay all in their lippes, and the ROMAINES words in their heades. Now king Antiochus kept all the straites and narrow passages of the mountaines called THERMOPYLES (being the ordinarie way and entrie into GRECE) and had fortified them aswell with an armie that camped at the foote of the mountaine, as also with walles and trenches he had made by hand, besides the naturall strength and fortification of the mount it selfe in sundry places: and so he determined to remaine there, trusting to his owne strength and fortifications aforesaid, and to turne the force of the warres some other way. The ROMAINES also, they dispaired vtterly they should be able any way to charge him before. But Cato remembring with himselfe the compasse the PERSIANS had fetched about before time likewise to enter into GRECE: he departed one night from the campe with part of the army: to proue if he could find the very compasse about, the barbarous people had made before. But as they climed vp the mountaine, their guide that was one of the prisoners taken in the countrey, lost his way, and made them wander vp and downe in maruellous steepe rockes and crooked wayes, that the poore souldiers were in maruellous ill taking. Cato seeing the daunger they were brought into by this lewd guide, commaunded all his souldiers not to stir a foote from thence, and to tarrie him there: and in the meane time he went himselfe alone, and Lucius Manlius with him (a lustie man, and nimble to clime vpon the rockes) and so went forward at aduenture, taking extreame and vncredible paine, and in much daunger of his life, grabbing all night in the darke without moone light, through wild Oliue trees, and high rockes (that let them they could not see before them, neither could tell whither they went) vntill they stumbled at the length vpon a litle path way, which went as they thought directly to the foote of the mountaine, where the campe of the enemies lay. So they set vp certaine markes and tokens, vpon the highest toppes of the rockes they could choose, by view of eye to be discerned furthest off vpon the mountaine called Callidromus. And when they had done that, they returned backe againe to fetch the souldiers, whom they led towards the markes they had set vp: vntill at the length they found their path-way againe, where they put their souldiers in order to march. Now they went not farre in this path they found, but the way failed them straight, and brought them to a bogge: but then they were in worse case then before, and in greater feare, not knowing they were so neare their enemies, as indeede they were. The day beganne to breake a litle, and one of them that marched foremost, thought he heard a noise, and that he saw the GREEKES campe at the foote of the rockes, and certaine souldiers that kept watch there. Whereupon Cato made them stay, and willed onely the FIRMANIANS to come vnto him, and none but them, because he had found them faithfull before, and very ready to obey his commaundement. They were with him at a trice to know his pleasure: so Cato said vnto them: My fellowes, I must haue some of our enemies taken prisoners, that I may know of them who they be that keepe that passage, what number they be, what order they keepe, how they are camped and armed, and after what sort they determine to fight with vs. The way to worke this feate standeth vpon swiftnesse and hardinesse to runne vpon them sodainely, as Lions do, which being naked feare not to runne into the middest of any heard of fearefull beastes. He had no sooner spoken these wordes, but the FIRMANIAN souldiers beganne to runne downe the mountaines as they were, vpon those that kept the watch: and so setting vpon them, they being out of order, made them flie, and tooke an armed man prisoner. When they had him, they straight brought him vnto Cato, who by oth of the prisoner, was aduertised how that the strength of their enemies armie was lodged about the person of the King, within the straight and valley of the said mountaine: and that the souldiers they saw, were sixe hundred ÆTOLIANS, all braue souldiers, whom they had chosen and appointed to keepe the toppe of the rockes ouer king Antiochus campe. When Cato had heard him, making small account of the matter, as well for their small number, as also for the ill order they kept: he made the trumpets sound straight, and his souldiers to march in battell with great cryes, himselfe being the foremost man of all his troupe, with a sword drawne in his hand. But when the ÆTOLIANS sawe them comming downe the rockes towards them, they began to flie for life vnto their great campe, which they filled full of feare, trouble, and all disorder. Now Manius at the same present also, gaue an assault vnto the walles and fortifications the king had made ouerthwart the vallies and straights of the mountaines: at which assault king Antiochus selfe had a blow on the face with a stone, that strake some of his teeth out of his mouth, so that for very paine and anguish he felt, he turned his horse back, and got him behind the presse. And then there were none of his army that made any more resistance, or that could abide the fiercenesse of the ROMAINES. But notwithstanding that the places were very ill for flying, because it was vnpossible for them to scatter and straggle, being holden in with high rockes on the one side of them, and with bogges and deepe marishes on the other side, which they must needes fall into if their feete slipped, or were thrust forward by any: yet they fell one vpon another in the straights, and ran so in heapes together, that they cast themselues away, for feare of the ROMAINES swords that lighted vpon them in euery corner. And there Marcus Cato, that neuer made ceremonie or niceneſſe to praise himselfe openly, nor reckened it any shame to do it: did take a present occasion for it, as falleth out vpon all victorie and famous exploites: and so did set it out with all the ostentation and braue words he could giue. For he wrote with his owne hands, and such as saw him chase and lay vpon his flying enemies that day, were driuen to say, that Cato was not bound to the ROMAINES, but the ROMAINES bound vnto Cato. And then Manius the Consull selfe, being in a great heat with the furie of the battell, embraced Cato a great while, that was also hote with chasing of the enemie, and spake aloude with great ioy before them all, that neither he, nor the people of ROME could recompence Cato for his valiant seruice that day. After this battell, the Consull Manius sent Cato to ROME, to be the messenger himselfe to report the newes of the victorie. So he imbarked incontinently, and had such a faire wind, that he passed ouer the seas to BRINDES without any daunger, and went from thence vnto TARENTYM in one day, and from TARENTVM in foure daies more to ROME. And so he came to ROME in fiue dayes after his landing in ITALY, and made such speed that himselfe was indeed the first messenger that brought newes of the victorie. Whereupon he filled all ROME with ioye and sacrifices, and made the ROMAINES so proud, that euer after they thought themselues able men to conquer the world both by sea and land. And these be all the martiall deedes and noble acts Cato did. But for his doings in ciuill pollicie and state, he seemed to be of this opinion: that to accuse and pursue the wicked, he thought it was the best thing an honest man and good gouernour of the common-wealth could employ himselfe vnto: for he accused many, and subscribed many other accusations which they preferred. And to be short, he did alwaies stirre vp some accuser, as he did Petilius against Scipio. But Scipio, by reason of his nobilitie, the greatnesse of his house, and the magnanimity of his mind, passed not for any accusation they could lay against him: being out of all feare, they should be able to condemne him: and so he let fall the accusation he had against him. Notwithstanding, he ioyned with other that accused Lucius Scipio, his owne brother, and followed the matter so sore against him, that he caused him to be condemned in a great summe of money to the common-wealth: who being vnable to pay the fine, had gone to prison, and hardly scaped it, had not the Tribunes of the people reuoked his condemnation. It is said that Cato comming through the market place one day, and meeting with a young man by the way that had ouerthrown his aduersarie in sute, and put one of his late fathers greatest enemies to open shame and foile before the people, he embraced him with a good countenance, and said vnto him: Oh my sonne, sacrifices that good children should offer to their fathers soule, be not lambes nor kiddes, but the teares and condemnations of their enemies. But as he vexed other, so he scaped not free himselfe from daunger, in administration of the common-wealth. For if they could catch the least vantage in the world of him, his enemies straight accused him: so as they say he was accused almost fiftie times, and at the last time of his accusation, he was about the age of foure score yeares. And then he spake a thing openly that was noted: that it was a harder thing to giue vp an account of his life before men in any other world, then in this amongst whome he liued. And yet was not this the last sute he followed: for foure yeares after, when he was foure score and tenne yeares of age, he accused Seruius Galba. And thus he liued as Nestor, in manner three ages of man, alwaies in continuall sute and action. For when he wrestled with the first Scipio the AFRICAN about matters of state and common-wealth, he went on vnto the time of the second, that was adopted by the first Scipioes sonne, the naturall sonne of Paulus Æmylius, who ouercame Perseus, king of MACEDON.

Further-

Furthermore, Marcus Cato ten yeares after his Conſulſhip, ſued to be Cenſor, which was in ROME the greateſt office of dignitie that any citizen of ROME could attaine vnto: and as a man may ſay, the roome of all glory and honour of their common wealth. For among other authorities, the Cenſor had power to examine mens liues and manners, and to puniſh euery offendor. For the ROMAINES were of that mind, that they would not haue men marry, beget children, liue priuately by themſelues, and make feaſts and bankets at their pleaſure, but that they ſhould ſtand in feare to be reproued and enquired of by the magiſtrate: and that it was not good to giue euery body libertie, to do what they would, following his owne luſt and fancie. And they iudging that mens naturall diſpoſitions do appeare more in ſuch things, then in all other things that are openly done at noone dayes, and in the ſight of the world: vſed to chooſe two Cenſors, that were two Surueyors of maners, to ſee that euery man behaued himſelfe vertuouſly, and gaue not themſelues to pleaſure, nor to breake the lawes and cuſtomes of the common wealth. Theſe officers were called in their toung, Cenſores, and alwaies of cuſtome, one of them was a PATRICIAN, and the other a commoner. Theſe two had power and authoritie to diſgrade a Knight, by taking away his horſe, and to put any off the Senate, whom they ſaw liue diſſolutely and diſorderly. It was their office alſo, to ceſſe and rate euery citizen according to the eſtimation of their goods, to note the age, genealogie, and degrees of euery man, and to keep bookes of them, beſides many other prerogatiues they had belonging to their office. Therfore when Cato came to ſue for this office among other, the chiefeſt Senatours were all bent againſt him. Some of them for very enuie, thinking it ſhame and diſhonor to the Nobilitie, to ſuffer men that were meanely borne, and vpſtarts (the firſt of their houſe and name, that euer came to beare office in the ſtate) to be called and preferred vnto the higheſt offices of ſtate in all their common wealth. Other alſo that were ill liuers, and knowing that they had offended the lawes of their country: they feared his crueltie too much, imagining he would ſpare no man, nor pardon any offence, hauing the law in his owne hands. So when they had conſulted together about it, they did ſet vp ſeuen competitors againſt him, who flattered the people with many faire words and promiſes, as though they had need of magiſtrates to vſe them gently, and to do things for to pleaſe them. But Cato contrariwiſe, ſhewing no countenance that he would vſe them gently in the office, but openly in the pulpit for orations, threatning thoſe that had liued naughtily and wickedly, he cried out: that they muſt reforme their citie, and perſwaded the people not to chooſe the gentleſt, but the ſharpeſt Phiſitions: and that himſelfe was ſuch a one as they needed, and among the PATRICIANS Valerius Flaccus another, in whoſe company he hoped (they two being choſen Cenſors) to do great good vnto the common wealth, by burning and cutting off (like Hydraes heads) all vanitie and voluptuous pleaſures, that were crept in amongſt them: and that he ſaw well inough, how all the other ſuters ſought the office by diſhoneſt means, fearing ſuch officers as they knew would deale iuſtly and vprightly. Then did the people of ROME ſhew themſelues nobly minded, and worthy of noble gouernours. For they refuſed not the ſowerneſſe or ſeueritie of Cato, but reiected thoſe meale-mouthed men, that ſeemed readie to pleaſe the people in all things: and thereupon choſe Marcus Cato Cenſor, and Valerius Flaccus to be his fellow, and they did obey him, as if he had bene preſent officer, and no ſuter for the office, being in themſelues to giue it to whom they thought good. The firſt thing he did after he was ſtalled in his Cenſorſhip, was that he named Lucius Valerius Flaccus his friend and fellow Cenſor with him, prince of the Senate: and among many other alſo whom he thruſt out of the Senate, he put Lucius Quintius Flaminius off the Senate, that had bene Conſull ſeuen yeares before, and was brother alſo vnto Titus Quintius Flaminius, that ouercame Philip King of MACEDON in battell, which was greater glorie to him, then that he had bene Conſull. But the cauſe why he put him off the Senate, was this: This Lucius Quintius caried euer with him a young boy to the warres, whom he gaue as good countenance and credite vnto, as to any of his beſt familiar friends he had about him. It fortuned on a time whileſt Lucius Quintius was Conſull and gouernour of a prouince, that he made a feaſt, and this boy being ſet at his table, hard by him, as his maner was, he began to flatter him, knowing how to handle him when he was pretily merrie: and ſoothing him, told him he loued him ſo dearely, that vpon his departing from ROME, when the ſword-players were ready to fight for life and death with vnrebated ſwords, to ſhew the people paſtime, he came his way, and left the ſight of that he neuer ſaw, that was very deſirous to haue ſeen a man killed. Thē this Lucius Quintius, to make him ſee the like, ſaid: care not for the ſight thou haſt loſt, boy, for I will let thee ſee as much,

The cauſe why Cato put Quintius off the Senate.

Lucius Quintius Flaminius wickednesse and cruelnesse.

And when he had spoken these wordes, he commaunded a prisoner condemned to die, to be fetched and brought into his hall before him, and the hang-man with his axe: which was forthwith done according to his commaundement. Then asked he the boy, if he would straight see the man killed: yea sir, said the boy: and with that he bad the hang man strike off his head. Most writers report this matter thus. And Ciccro to confirme it also, wrote in his booke de Senectute, that the same was written in an oration Cato made before the people of ROME. Now Lucius Quintius being thus shamefully put off the Senate by Cato, his brother Titus being offended withall, could not tell what to do, but besought the people that they would commaund Cato to declare the cause, why he brought such shame vnto his house. Whereupon Cato openly before the people, made recitall of all this feast. And when Lucius denied it, affirming it was not so: Cato would haue him sworne before them all, that it was not true they had burdened him withall. But Lucius prayed them to pardon him, who sayed he would not sweare: whereupon the people iudged straight that he deserued well that shame. So not long after, certaine games being shewed in the Theater, Lucius came thither, and passing beyond the ordinary place that was appointed for those that had bene Consuls, he went to sit aloofe off amongst the multitude. The people tooke pitie on him, and made such a do about him, as they forced him to rise, and to go sit among the other Senators that had bene Consuls: saluing the best they could, the shame and dishonour happened vnto so noble a house. Cato put out of the Senate also, one Manlius, who was in great towardnesse to haue bene made Consull the next yeare following, onely becausse he kissed his wife too louingly in the day time, and before his daughter: and reproouing him for it, he told him, his wife neuer kissed him, but when it thundered. So when he was disposed to be merrie, he would say it was happie with him when Iupiter thundered. He tooke away Lucius Scipioes horse from him, that had triumphed for the victories he had wonne of the great King Antiochus: which wanne him much ill will, becausse it appeared to the world he did it of purpose, for the malice he did beare Scipio the AFRICAN, that was dead. But the thing that most grieued the people, of all other extremities he vsed, was his putting downe of all feasts and vaine expences. For a man to take it cleane away, and to be openly seene in it, it was vnpossible, becausse it was so common a thing, and euery man was giuen so to it. Therefore Cato to fetch it about indirectly, did praise euery citizens goods, and rated their apparell, their coaches, their litters, their wiues chaines and iewels, and all other moueables and housshold stuffe, that had cost aboue a thousand fiue hundred Drachmes a peece, at ten times as much as they were worth: to the end that such as had bestowed their mony in those curious trifles, should pay so much more subsidie to the maintenance of the common wealth, as their goods were ouer valued at. Moreouer, he ordained for euery thousand Asses that those trifling things were praised at, the owners thereof should pay three thousand Asses to the common treasurie: to the end that they who were grieued with this taxe, and saw other pay lesse subsidie (that were as much worth as themselues, by liuing without such toyes) might call home themselues againe, and lay aside such fooliish brauerie and fineneesse. Notwithstanding Cato, was enuied euery way. First, of them that were contented to pay the taxe imposed, rather then they would leaue their vanitie: and next, of them also, that would rather reforme themselues, then pay the taxe. And some thinke that this law was deuised rather to take away their goods, then to let them to make any shew of them: and they haue a fond opinion besides, that their riches are better seene in superfluous things, then in necessary. Whereat they say Aristotle the Philosopher did wonder more, then at any other thing: how men could thinke them more rich and happie, that had many curious and superfluous things, then those that had necessary and profitable things. And Scopas the THESSALIAN, when one of his familiar friends asked him, I know not what trifling thing, and to make him graunt it the sooner, told him it was a thing he might well spare, and did him no good: mary said he, all the goods I haue, are in such toyes as do me no good. So this couetous desire we haue to be rich, commeth of no necessary desire in nature, but is bred in vs by a false opinion from the common sort. Now Cato caring least of all for the exclamations they made against him, grew to be more straight and seuere. For he cut off the pipes and quils priuate men had made to conuey water into their houses and gardens, robbing the city of the water that came from their common conduit heads, and did plucke downe also mens porches that were made before their doores into the streete, and brought downe the prises of common workes in the city, and moreouer raised the common farmes and customes of the city, as high as he could:

all which things together made him greatly hated and enuied of moſt men. Wherefore, Titus Flaminius, and certaine other being bent againſt him in open Senate, cauſed all Catoes couenants and bargaines made with the maiſter worke-man, for repairing and mending of the common buildings and holy places, to be made voyd, as things greatly preiudiciall to the common wealth. And they did alſo ſtirre vp the boldeſt and raſheſt of the Tribunes of the people againſt him, becauſe they ſhould accuſe him vnto the people, and make requeſt he might be condemned in the ſumme of two talents. They did maruellouſly hinder alſo the building of the pallace he built at the charge of the common wealth, looking into the market place vnder the Senate houſe: which pallace was finiſhed notwithſtanding, and called after his name, Baſilica Porcia: as who would ſay, the pallace Porcius the Cenſor built. Howbeit it ſeemed the people of Rome did greatly like and commend his gouernement in the Cenſorſhip: for they ſet vp a ſtatue of him in the temple of the goddeſſe of Health, whereunder they wrote not his victories nor triumph, but only ingraued this inſcription word for word, to this effect by tranſlation: For the honour of Marcus Cato the Cenſor: becauſe he reformed the diſcipline of the common wealth of Rome (that was farre out of order, and giuen to licentious life) by his wiſe precepts, good manners, and holy inſtitutions. Indeed, before this image was ſet vp for him, he was wont to mocke at them that delighted, and were deſirous of ſuch things: ſaying, they did not conſider how they bragged in founders, painters, and image-makers, but nothing of their vertues: and that for himſelfe, the people did alwayes carie liuely images of him in their hearts, meaning the memorie of his life and doings. When ſome wondred why diuers meane men and vnknowne perſons had images ſet vp of them, and there were none of him, he gaue them this anſwer: I had rather men ſhould aske why Cato had no image ſet vp for him, then why he had any. In the end, he would haue no honeſt man abide to be praiſed, vnleſſe his praiſe turned to the benefit of the common wealth: and yet was he one of them that would moſt praiſe himſelfe. So that if any had done a fault, or ſtept awrie, and that men had gone about to reproue them, he would ſay they were not to be blamed, for they were no Catoes that did offend. And ſuch as counterfeited to follow any of his doings, and came ſhort of his manner, he called them left handed Catoes. He would ſay that in moſt daungerous times the Senate vſed to caſt their eyes vpon him, as paſſengers on the ſea do looke vpon the maiſter of the ſhip in a ſtorme: and that many times when he was abſent, the Senate would put ouer matters of importance, vntill he might come among them. And this is confirmed to be true, as well by other as by himſelfe. His authoritie was great in matters of ſtate, for his wiſedome, his eloquence, and great experience. Beſides this commendation, they praiſed him for a good father to his children, a good husband to his wife, and a good ſauer for his profit: for he was neuer careleſſe of them, as things to be lightly paſſed on. And therefore me thinkes I muſt needes tell you by the way ſome part of his well doing, to follow our declaration of him. Firſt of all he married a gentlewoman more noble then rich, knowing that either of both ſhould make her proud and ſtout enough: but yet he thought the nobler borne, would be the more aſhamed of diſhoneſtie, then the meaner borne: and therefore they would be more obedient to their husbands, in all honeſt manner and reaſonable things. Furthermore, he ſayd: that he that bet his wife or his child, did commit as great a ſacriledge, as if he polluted or ſpoyled the holieſt things of the world: and he thought it a greater praiſe for a man to be a good husband then a good Senatour. And therefore he thought nothing more commendable in the life of old Socrates, then his patience, in vſing his wife well, that was ſuch a ſhrew, and his children that were ſo hare-brained. After Catoes wife had brought him a ſonne, he could not haue ſo earneſt buſineſſe in hand, if it had not touched the common wealth, but he would let all alone, to go home to his houſe, about the time his wife did vnſwadle the young boy to waſh and ſhift him: for ſhe gaue it ſucke with her owne breaſts, and many times would let the ſlaues children ſucke of her alſo, becauſe they might haue a naturall loue towards her ſonne, hauing ſucked one milke, and bene brought vp together. When his ſonne was come to age of diſcretion, and that he was able to learne any thing, Cato himſelfe did teach him, notwithſtanding he had a ſlaue in his houſe called Chilo (a very honeſt man, and a good Grammarian) who did alſo teach many other: but as he ſayed himſelfe, he did not like a ſlaue ſhould rebuke his ſonne, nor pull him by the eares, when peraduenture he was not apt to take very ſodainely that was taught him: neither would he haue his ſonne bound to a ſlaue for ſo great a matter as that, as to haue his learning of him. Wherefore he himſelfe taught him his grammer, the law.

and to exercise his body, not onely to throw a dart, to play at the sword, to vawt, to ride a horse, and to handle all sorts of weapons, but also to fight with fistes, to abide cold and heate, and to swim ouer a swift running riuer. He said moreouer, that he wrote goodly histories in great letters with his owne hand, because his sonne might learne in his fathers house the vertues of good men in times past, that he taking example by their doings, should frame his life to excell them. He said also, that he tooke as great heed of speaking any foule or vncomely words before his sonne, as he would haue done if he had bene before the Vestall Nunnes. He neuer was in the hote house with his sonne: for it was a common vse with the ROMAINES at that time, that the sonnes in law did not bathe themselues with their fathers in law, but were ashamed to see one another naked. But afterwards they hauing learned of the GREEKES to wash themselues naked with men, it taught them also to be naked in the bathe euen with their wiues. There lacked no towardlinesse, nor good disposition in Catoes sonne, to frame himselfe vertuous: for he was of so good a nature, that he shewed himselfe willing to follow whatsoeuer his father had taught him. Howbeit he was such a weake puling, that he could not away with much hardnesse, and therefore his father was contented not to bind him to that straight and painefull life, which himselfe had kept. Yet he be-

became valiant in the warres. For he fought maruellous stoutly in the battell, in which Perseus King of MACEDON was ouerthrowne by Paulus AEmylius: where his sword being striken out of his hand, with a great blow that lighted on it, and by reason his hand was somewhat sweatie besides, he fell into a great fury, and prayed some of his friends to help him to recouer it. So they all together ranne vpon the enemies in that place where his sword fell out of his hand, and came in so fiercely on them, that they made a lane through them, and clearing the place, found it in the end, but with much a do, being vnder such a heape of dead bodies and other weapons as well ROMAINES as MACEDONIANS, one lying on another. Paulus AEmylius the Generall hearing of this act of his, did highly commend the yong man. And at this day there is a letter extant from Cato to his sonne, in the which he praiseth this worthy fact and toile of his, for the recouering of his sword againe. Afterwards, this Cato the yonger maried Tertia, one of Paulus AEmylius daughters, and sister vnto Scipio the second, and so was matched in this noble house, not only for his owne vertues sake, but for respect of his fathers dignitie and authoritie: whereby the great care, paines, and study that Cato the father tooke in bringing vp his sonne, in vertue and learning, was honourably rewarded in the happie bestowing of his sonne. He euer had a great number of young litle slaues which he bought, when any would sell their prisoners in the warres. He did chuse them thus young, because they were apt yet to learne any thing he would traine them vnto, and that a man might breake them like young coltes, or litle whelpes. But none of them all, how many soeuer he had, did euer go to any mans house, but when himselfe or his wife did send them. If any man asked them what Cato did: they answered, they could not tell. And when they were within, either they must needs be occupied about somewhat, or else they must sleepe: for he loued them well that were sleepy, holding opinion that slaues that loued sleep were more tractable, and willing to do any thing a man would set them to, then those that were waking. And because he thought that nothing did more prouoke slaues to mischiefe and naughtinesse, then lust and desire of women: he was contented his slaues might company with his bondwomen in his house, for a peece of mony he appointed them to pay, but with straight commaundement besides, that none of them should deale with any other woman abroade. At the first when he gaue himselfe to follow the warres, and was not greatly rich, he neuer was angry for any fault his seruants did about his person: saying that it was a foule thing for a gentleman or nobleman, to fall out with his seruants for his belly. Afterwards, as he rose to better state, and grew to be wealthier, if he had made a dinner or supper for any of his friends and familiars, they were no sooner gone, but he would scourge thē with whips & leather thongs, that had not waited as they should haue done at the boord, or had forgottē any thing he would haue had done. He would euer craftily make one of them fall out with another: for he could not abide they should be friends, being euer iealous of that. If any of them had done a fault that deserued death, he would declare his offence before them all: and then if they condemned him to die, he would put him to death before them all. Howbeit in his latter time he grew greedy, and gaue vp his tillage, saying that it was more pleasant then profitable. Therefore because he would lay out his mony surely, and bring a certaine reuenue to his purse, he bestowed it vpon ponds, and naturall hote bathes, places fit for fullers craft, vpon meadowes and pastures, vpon copises and young wood: and of all these he

he made a great and a more quiet reuenue yearely, which he would say, Iupiter himselfe could not diminish. Furthermore he was a great vsurer, both by land and by sea: and the vsurie he tooke by sea, was most extreame of all other, for he vsed it in this sort. He would haue them to whom he lent his money vnto, that trafficked by sea, to haue many partners, to the number of fiftie: and that they should haue so many ships. Then he would venture among them for a part onely, whereof Quintius his slaue whom he had manumissed, was made his factor, and vsed to saile and trafficke with the merchants, to whom he had lent his mony out to vsurie. And thus he did not venture all the money he lent, but a litle peece onely for his part, and got maruellous riches by his vsurie. Moreouer he lent money to any of his slaues, that would therewith buy other yong slaues, whom they taught and brought vp to do seruice, at Catoes charge and cost: and then they sold them againe at the yeares end, and some of them Cato kept for his owne seruice, and gaue his slaues as much for them as any other offered. Therefore to allure his sonne in like maner to make profit of his mony, he told him it was no wise mans part to diminish his substance, but rather the part of a widow. Yet this was a token of a most greedy couetous mind, that he durst affirme him to be diuine, and worthy immortall praise, that increased his wealth and patrimonie more then his father left him. Furthermore, when Cato was growne very old, Carneades the ACADEMICK, and Diogenes the STOICKE, were sent from ATHENS as Ambassadours to ROME, to sue for a release of a fine of fiue hundred talents which they had imposed on the ATHENIANS vpon a condemnation passed against them for a contempt of appearance, by the sentence of the SICYONIANS, at the sute of the OROPIANS. Immediatly when these two philosophers were arriued in the citie of ROME, the yong gentlemen that were giuen to their bookes, did visit and welcome them, and gaue great reuerence to them after they had heard them speake, and specially to Carneades: whose grace in speaking, and force of perswading was no lesse then the fame ranne of him, and specially when he was to speake in so great an audience, and before such a state, as would not suppresse his praise. ROME straight was full, as if a wind had blowne this rumor into euery mans eare: that there was a GRECIAN arriued, a famous learned man, who with his eloquence would leade a man as he list. There was no other talke a while through the whole citie, he had so inflamed the yong gentlemens minds with loue and desire to be learned: that all other pleasures and delights were set aside, and they disposed themselues to no other exercise, but to the studie of Philosophie, as if some secret and diuine inspiration from aboue had procured them to it. Whereof the Lords and Senators of ROME were glad, and reioyced much to see their youth so well giuen to knowledge, and to the studie of the Greeke tongue, and to delight in the companie of these two great and excellent learned men. But Marcus Cato, euen from the beginning that yong men began to studie the Greeke tongue, and that it grew in estimation in ROME, did dislike of it: fearing least the youth of ROME that were desirous of learning and eloquence, would vtterly giue ouer the honour and glory of armes. Furthermore, when he saw the estimation and fame of these two personages did increase more and more, and in such sort that Caius Aquilius, one of the chiefest of the Senate made sute to be their interpreter: he determined then to conuey them out of the citie by some honest meane and colour. So he openly found fault one day in the Senate, that the Ambassadours were long there, and had no dispatch: considering also they were cunning men, and could easily perswade what they would. And if there were no other respect, this onely might perswade them to determine some answer for them, and so to send them home againe to their schooles, to teach their children of GREECE, and to let alone the children of ROME, that they might learne to obey the lawes and the Senate, as they had done before. Now he spake this to the Senate, not of any priuate ill will or malice he bare to Carneades, as some men thought: but because he generally hated Philosophie, and of ambition despised the muses and knowledge of the Greeke tongue. Which was the more suspected, because he had sayd, the ancient Socrates was but a busie man, and a stirrer vp of sedition, and sought by all meanes possible to vsurp tyranny, and rule in his country: by peruerting and changing the manners and customes of the same, and alluring the subiects thereof to a disliking of their lawes and auncient customes. And he laughed at Socrates schoole, that taught the art of Eloquence: saying his schollers waxed old, and were still so long in learning, that they meant to vse their eloquence and pleade causes in another world, before Minos when they were dead. Therefore to plucke his sonne from the studie of the Greeke tongue, he sayd to him with a strained voice, and in a bigger sound then he was wont to do: (as if he had spoken to him by way of prophecie or inspiration)

Cato a great vsurer. He tooke extreame vsury by sea.

Carneades and Diogenes Philosophers sent Ambassadors to Rome.

Cato misliked the Greeke tongue.

that so long as the ROMAINES disposed themselues to studie the Greeke tongue, so long would they marre and bring all to naught. And yet time hath proued his vaine words false and vntrue. For the citie of ROME did neuer flourish so much, nor the ROMAINE Empire was euer so great, as at that time, when learning and the Greeke tongue most flourished. Howbeit Cato did not onely hate the Philosophers of GREECE, but did mislike them also that professed phisicke in ROME. For he had either heard or read the answer Hippocrates made, when the King of PERSIA sent for him, and offered him a great summe of gold and siluer, if he would come and serue him: who sware he would neuer serue the barbarous people, that were naturall enemies to the GRECIANS. So Cato affirmed, it was an oath that all other Phisitions sware euer after: wherefore he commaunded his sonne to flie from them all alike, and sayed he had written a litle booke of phisicke, with the which he did heale those of his house when they were sicke, and did keepe them in health when they were whole. He neuer forbad them to eate, but did alwayes bring them vp with hearbs, and certaine light meates, as mallard, ringdoues and hares: for such meates, said he, are good for the sick, and light of digestion, sauing that they make them dreame and snort that eate them. He boasted also how with this maner of phisicke, he did alwayes keepe himselfe in health, and his family from sickenesse. Yet for all that, I take it, he did not all that he bragged of: for he buried both his wife and his sonne also. But he himselfe was of a strong nature, and a lustie bodie, ful of strength, and health, and liued long without sickenesse: so that when he was a very old man, and past mariage, he loued women well, and maried a young maiden for that cause onely. After his first wife was dead, he maried his sonne vnto Paulus AEmylius daughter, the sister of Scipio, the second AFRICAN. Cato himselfe being a widower, tooke paines with a prety yong maide that waited in his house, and came by stealth to his chamber: howbeit this haunt could not long continue secret in his house, and specially where there was a young gentlewoman maried, but needs must be spied. So, one day when this yong maide went somewhat boldly by the chamber of yong Cato, to go in to his father, the yong man said neuer a word at it: yet his father perceiued that he was somewhat ashamed, and gaue the maide no good countenance. Wherefore finding that his sonne and daughter in law were angry with the matter, saying nothing to them of it, nor shewing them any ill countenance: he went one morning to the market place (as his maner was) with a traine that followed him, amongst whom was one Salonius that had bene his clearke, and waited vpon him as the rest did. Cato calling him out aloud by his name, asked him if he had not yet bestowed his daughter. Salonius answered him, he had not yet bestowed her, nor would not before he made him priuy to it. Then Cato told him againe: I haue found out a husband for her, and a sonne in law for thee, and it will be no ill match for her, vnlesse she mislike the age of the man, for in deed he is very old, but otherwise there is no fault in him. Salonius told him againe, that for that matter, he referred all to him, and his daughter also, praying him euen to make what match he thought good for her: for she was his humble seruant, and relyed wholly vpon him, standing in need of his fauour and furtherance. Then Cato began to discouer, and told him plainely he would willingly marrie her himselfe. Salonius therewith was abashed, because he thought Cato was too old to marrie then, and himselfe was no fit man to match in any honourable house, specially with a Consull, and one that had triumphed: howbeit in the end, when he saw Cato meant good earnest, he was very glad of the match, and so with this talke they went on together to the market place, and agreed then vpon the mariage. Now while they went about this matter, Cato the sonne taking some of his kinne and friends with him, went vnto his father, to aske him if he had offended him in any thing, that for spite he should bring him a steppe-mother into his house. Then his father cried out, and sayd: O my sonne, I pray thee say not so, I like well all thou doest, and I find no cause to complaine of thee: but I do it, because I desire to haue many children, and to leaue many such like citizens as thou art, in the common wealth. Some say that Pisistratus the tyrant of ATHENS, made such a like answer vnto the children of his first wife, which were men growne when he maried his second wife Timonassa, of the towne of ARGOS, of whom he had (as it is reported) Iophon, and Thessalus. But to returne againe to Cato, he had a sonne by his second wife, whom he named after her name, Cato SALONIAN: and his eldest sonne died in his office being Prætor, of whom he often speaketh in diuers of his bookes, commending him for a very honest man. And they say, he tooke the death of him very patiently, and like a graue wise man, not leauing therfore to do any seruice or busines for the state, otherwise then he did before.

And

And therein he did not as Lucius Lucullus, and Metellus surnamed Pius, did afterwards: who gaue vp medling any more with matters of gouernement and state, after they were waxen old. For he thought it a charge and dutie, whereunto euery honest man whilest he liued was bound in all pietie. Nor as Scipio AFRICAN had done before him, who perceiuing that the glorie and fame of his doings did purchase him the ill will of the citizens, he changed the rest of his life into quietnesse, and forsooke the citie and all dealings in commonwealth, and went and dwelt in the countrey. But as there was one that told Dionysius the tyrant of SYRACVSA, as it is written, that he could not dye more honorably, then to be buried in the tyrannie: euen so did Cato thinke, that he could not waxe more honestly old, then in seruing of the commonwealth vnto his dying day. So at vacant times, when Cato was desirous a litle to recreate and refresh himselfe, he passed his time away in making of bookes, and looking vpon his husbandry in the countrey. This is the cause why he wrote so many kinds of bookes and stories. But his tillage and husbandry in the countrey, he did tend and follow in his youth, for his profit. For he said he had but two sorts of reuenue, tillage, and sparing: but in age, whatsoeuer he did in the countrey, it was all for pleasure, and to learne something euer of nature. For he hath written a booke of the country life, and of tillage, in the which he sheweth how to make tartes and cakes, and how to keepe fruites: he would needes shew such singularitie and skill in all things. When he was in his house in the country, he fared a litle better then he did in other places, and would oftentimes bid his neighbours, and such as had land lying about him, to come and suppe with him, and he would be merry with them: so that his company was not onely pleasant, and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but also to the younger sort. For he had seene much, and had experience in many things, and vsed much pleasant talke profitable for the hearers. He thought the boord one of the chiefest meanes to breed loue amongst men, and at his owne table would alwaies praise good men and vertuous citizens, but would suffer no talke of euill men, neither in their praise nor dispraise. Now it is thought the last notable act and seruice he did in the common wealth, was the ouerthrow of CARTHAGE: for indeed he that wan it and razed it vtterly, was Scipio the second, but it was chiefly through Catoes counsell and aduice, that the last warre was taken in hand against the CARTHAGINIANS, and chanced vpon this occasion. Cato was sent into AFRICKE to vnderstand the cause and controuersie that was betweene the CARTHAGINIANS and Massiniſſa, king of NVMIDIA, which were at great warres together. And he was sent thither because king Massiniſſa had euer bene a friend vnto the ROMAINES, and for that the CARTHAGINIANS were become their confederates since the last warres, in the which they were ouerthrowne by Scipio the first, who tooke for a fine of them a great part of their Empire, and imposed vpon them besides, a great yearely tribute. Now when he was come into that country, he found not the citie of CARTHAGE in miserie, beggerie, and out of heart, as the ROMAINS supposed: but full of lusty youths very rich and wealthy, and great store of armour and munition in it for the wars, so that by reason of the wealth thereof, CARTHAGE caried a high saile, and stouped not for a litle. Wherefore he thought that it was more then time for the ROMAINES to leaue to vnderstand the controuersies betwixt the CARTHAGINIANS and Massiniſſa, and rather to prouide betimes to destroy CARTHAGE, that had euer bene an auncient enemie to the ROMAINES, and euer sought to be reuenged of that they had suffered at their hands before, and that they were now growne to that greatnes and courage in so short time, as in manner it was incredible: so as it was likely they would fall into as great enmitie with the ROMAINES, as euer they did before. Therfore so soone as he returned to ROME, he plainely told the Senate, that the losses and harmes the CARTHAGINIANS had receiued by the last wars they had with them, had not so much diminished their power and strength, as the same had shewed their owne folly and lacke of wisedome: for it was to be feared much, lest their late troubles had made them more skilfull, then weakened them for the wars. And that they made warres now with the MVMIDIANS, to exercise them only, meaning afterwards to warre with themselues: and that the peace they had made with them, was but an intermission and stay of warres, onely expecting time and oportunitie to breake with them againe. They say moreouer, that besides the perswasions he vsed, he brought with him of purpose AFRICKE figs in his long sleeues, which he shooke out amongst them in the Senate: & when the Senatours maruelled to see so goodly faire greene figges, he said: The country that beareth them, is not aboue three daies sailing from ROME. But yet this is more straunge which they report of him besides: that he neuer declared his opinion in any matter in the Senate after that, but this was euer the one end of his tale: me thinketh ſtill CARTHAGE would be vtterly deſtroyed. Publius Scipio Naſica, vſed euer in like maner the contrarie ſpeech: that he thought it meete CARTHAGE ſhould ſtand. This Publius Scipio ſaw, in my opinion, that the ROMAINES through their pride and inſolencie were full of abſurdities, and caried themſelues very high, by reaſon of their happy ſucceſſe and victories, and were ſo loftie minded, that the Senate could hardly rule them: and that by reaſon of their great authoritie, they imagined they might bring their citie to what height they would. Therefore he ſpake it that the feare of CARTHAGE might alwaies continue as a bridle, to raine in the inſolencie of the people of ROME, who knew well enough, that the CARTHAGINIANS were of no ſufficient power to make wars with the ROMAINES, nor yet to ouercome them: and euen ſo were they not wholly to be deſpiſed, and not to be feared at all. Cato ſtill replied to the contrary, that therin conſiſted the greateſt daunger of all: that a city which was euer of great force and power, and had bene puniſhed by former warres and miſerie, would alwaies haue an eye of reuenge to their enemies, and be much like a horſe that had broken his haltar, that being vnbridled, would run vpon his rider. And therefore he thought it no good nor ſound aduice, ſo to ſuffer the CARTHAGINIANS to recouer their ſtrength, but rather they ought altogether to take away all outward daunger, and the feare they ſtood in to loſe their conqueſt: and ſpecially, when they left meanes within the citie ſelfe to fall ſtill againe to their former rebellion. And this is the cauſe why they ſuppoſe Cato was the occaſion of the third and laſt war the ROMAINES had againſt the CARTHAGINIANS. But now when the warre was begun, Cato died, and before his death he prophecied, as a man would ſay, who it ſhould be that ſhould end thoſe wars. And it was Scipio the ſecond, who being a young man at that time, had charge only as a Colonel ouer a thouſand footmen: but in all battels, and whereſoeuer there was wars, he ſhewed himſelfe euer valiant and wiſe. Inſomuch as newes being brought thereof continually vnto ROME, and Cato hearing them, ſpake (as they ſay) theſe two verſes of Homer:

This only man right wiſe reputed is to be,

Which prophecie Scipio ſoone after confirmed true by his doings. Moreouer, the iſſue Cato left behind him, was a ſonne he had by his ſecond wife: who was called (as we ſaid before) Cato SALONIAN, by reaſon of his mother, and a litle boy of his eldeſt ſon that died before him. This Cato SALONIAN died being Prætor, but he left a ſon behind him that came to be Conſull, and was grandfather vnto Cato the Philoſopher, one of the moſt vertuous men of his time.

THE COMPARISON OF Aristides with Marcus Cato.

NOW that we haue set downe in writing, these notable and worthie things of memorie: if we will conferre the life of the one, with the life of the other, perhappes the difference betweene the one and the other will not easily be discerned, seeing there be so many similitudes and resemblances one of another. But if we come to compare them in euery particularitie, as we would do Poets workes, or pictures drawne in tables: first, in this we shall find them much a like, that hauing had nothing else to preferre and commend them, but their onely vertue and wisedome, they haue bene both gouernours in their common wealth, and haue thereby atchieued to great honour and estimation. But me thinkes when Aristides came to deale in matters of state, the Commonwealth and Seigniorie of ATHENS being then of no great power, it was easie for him to aduaunce himselfe, because the other Gouernours and Captaines of his time, and that were competitors with him, were not very rich, nor of great authoritie. For the taxe of the richest persons then at ATHENS in reuenue, was but at fiue hundred bushels of corne and vpwards, and therefore were such called Pentacosiomedimni. The second taxe was but at three hundred bushels, and they were called knights. The third and last was at two hundred bushels, and they called them Zeugitæ. Where Marcus Cato comming out of a litle village from a rude countrey life, went at the first dash (as it were) to plunge himselfe into a bottomlesse sea of gouernment in the common wealth of ROME: which was not ruled then by such gouernours and captaines, as Curius, Fabricius, and Ostilius were in old time. For the people of ROME did no more bestow their offices vpon such meane labouring men, as came but lately from the plough and the mattocke: but they would looke now vpon the nobilitie of their houses, and vpon their riches that gaue them most money, or sued earnestly to them for the offices. And by reason of their great power and authoritie, they would be waited vpon and sued vnto, by those that sought to beare the honourable offices of the state and commonwealth. And it was no like match nor comparison, to haue Themistocles an aduersarie and competitor, being neither of noble house, nor greatly rich (for they say, that all the goods his father left him, were not worth aboue foure or fiue hundred talents, when he began to deale in state) in respect as to contend for the chiefest place of honour and authoritie against Scipio AFRICAN, Seruilius Galba, or Quintius Flaminius, hauing no other maintenance, nor helpe to trust vnto, but a toung speaking boldly with reason and all vprightnesse. Moreouer, Aristides at the battels of MARATHON, and of PLATÆES, was but one of the ten captains of the ATHENIANS: where Cato was chosen one of two Consuls among many other noble and great competitors, and one of the two Censors, before seuen other that made sute for it, which were all men of great reputation in the citie, and yet was Cato preferred before them all. Furthermore, Aristides was neuer

the chiefeſt in any victorie. For at the battell of MARATHON, Miltiades was the Generall: and at the battell of SALAMINA, Themiſtocles: and at the iourney of PLATÆES, king Pauſanias, as Herodotus ſaith, who writeth that he had a maruellous victory there. And there were that ſtriued with Ariſtides for the ſecond place, as Sophanes, Amynias, Callimachus, and Cynegirus, euery one of the which did notable valiant ſeruice at thoſe battels. Now Cato was generall himſelfe, and chiefe of all his army in worthineſſe and counſell, during the warre he made in SPAINE while he was Conſull. Afterwards alſo in the iourney where king Antiochus was ouerthrowne in the countrey of THERMOPYLES, Cato being but a Colonell of a thouſand footmen, and ſeruing vnder another that was Conſull, wanne the honour of the victory, when he did ſuddenly ſet vpon Antiochus behind, whereas he looked only to defend himſelfe before. And that victorie without all doubt was one of the chiefeſt acts that euer Cato did, who draue ASIA out of GRECE, and opened the way vnto Lucius Scipio to paſſe afterwards into ASIA. So then for the wars, neither the one nor the other of them was euer ouercome in battell: but in peace and ciuill gouernment, Ariſtides was ſupplanted by Themiſtocles, who by practiſe got him to be baniſhed ATHENS for a time. Whereas Cato had in manner all the greateſt and nobleſt men of ROME that were in his time ſworne enemies vnto him, and hauing alwaies contended with them euen to his laſt houre, he euer kept himſelfe on ſound ground, like a ſtout champion, and neuer tooke fall nor foile. For he hauing accuſed many before the people, and many alſo accuſing him, himſelfe was neuer once condemned, but alwaies his toung was the buckler and defence of his life and innocencie. Which was to him ſo neceſſarie a weapon, and with it he could helpe himſelfe in ſo great matters, that (in my opinion) it was the only cauſe why he neuer receiued diſhonor, nor was vniuſtly condemned: rather then for any thing elſe he was beholding to fortune, or to any other that did protect him. And truely, eloquence is a ſingular gift, as Antipater witneſſeth, in that he wrote of Ariſtotle the Philoſopher after his death: ſaying, that amongſt many other ſingular graces and perfections in him, he had this rare gift, that he could perſwade what he liſted. Now there is a rule confeſſed of all the world, that no man can attaine any greater vertue or knowledge, then to know how to gouerne a multitude of men, or a citie: a part whereof is Oeconomia, commonly called houſe-rule, conſidering that a citie is no other, then an aſſembly of many houſholds and houſes together, and then is the city commonly ſtrong and of power, when as the townes men and citizens are wiſe and wealthy. Therefore Lycurgus that baniſhed gold and ſiluer from LACEDÆMON, and coyned them money of iron, that would be marred with fire and vineger when it was hote, did not forbid his citizens to be good husbands: but like a good law-maker, exceeding all other that euer went before him, he did not onely cut off all ſuperfluous expences that commonly waite vpon riches, but did alſo prouide that his people ſhould lack nothing neceſſarie to liue withall, fearing more to ſee a begger and needie perſon dwelling in his citie, and enioy the priuiledges of the ſame, then a proud man by reaſon of his riches. Some thinkes, Cato was as good a father to his houſhold, as he was a good gouernour to the commonwealth: for he did honeſtly increaſe his goods, and did teach other alſo to do the ſame, by ſauing, and knowledge of good husbandry, whereof in his booke he wrote ſundry good rules and precepts. Ariſtides contrariwiſe, made iuſtice odious and ſlaunderous by his pouerty, and as a thing that made men poore, and was more profitable to other, then to a mans ſelfe that vſed iuſtice. And yet Heſiodus the Poet, that commendeth iuſtice ſo much, doth wiſh vs withall to be good husbands, reprouing ſlouth and idleneſſe, as the roote and originall of all iniuſtice. And therefore me thinkes Homer ſpake wiſely when he ſaid:

In times paſt, neither did I labour carke nor care for buſineſſe, for family, for food, nor yet for fare:
but rather did delight, with ſhips the ſeas to ſaile,
to draw a bow, to fling a dart in wars, and to preuaile.

As giuing vs to vnderſtand, that iuſtice and husbandry are two relatiues, and neceſſarily linked one to the other: & that a man who hath no care of his owne things, nor houſe, doth liue vniuſtly, and taketh from other men. For iuſtice is not like oyle, which Phiſitions ſay is very wholſome for mans body, if it be applyed outwardly: and in contrary maner very ill, if a man drinke it: neither ought a iuſt man to profit ſtrangers, and in the end not to care for himſelfe nor his. Therfore me thinkes this gouerning vertue of Ariſtides had a fault in this reſpect, if it be true that moſt authours write of him: that he had no care nor forecaſt with him to leaue ſo much, as to marrie his his daughters withall, nor therewith to burie himselfe. Where those of the house of Cato, continued Prætors and Consuls of Rome, euen vnto the fourth descent. For his sons sonnes, and yet lower, his sonnes sons sons came to the greatest offices of dignitie in Rome. And Aristides, who was in his time the chiefest man of Greece, left his posterity in so great pouerty, that some were compelled to become soothsayers (that interpret dreames, and tell mens fortune) to get their liuing, and other to aske almes: and left no meane to any of them, to do any great thing worthy of him. But to contrary this, it might be said, pouerty of it self is neither ill nor dishonest: but where it groweth by idlenesse, careless life, vanity, and folly, it is to be reproued. For when it lighteth vpon any man that is honest, and liueth well, that taketh paines, is very diligent, iust, valiant, wise, and gouerneth a common wealth well: then it is a great signe of a noble mind: for it is vnpossible that man should do any great things, that had such a base mind as to thinke alwaies vpon trifles: and that he should releeue the poore greatly, that lacketh himselfe reliefe in many things. And sure, riches is not so necessarie for an honest man that will deale truely in the commonwealth, and gouernment, as is sufficiencie: which being a contentation in it selfe, and desirous of no superfluous thing, it neuer withdraweth a man from following his businesse in the common wealth, that enioyeth the same. For God is he alone, who simply and absolutely hath no need of any thing at all: wherefore the chiefest vertue that can be in man, and that commeth neerest vnto God, ought to be esteemed that, which maketh man to haue need of least things. For like as a lustie body, and well complexioned, hath no need of superfluous fare and curious apparell: euen so a cleane life, and sound house, is kept with a litle charge: and so should the goods also be proportioned, according to vse and necessitie. For he that gathereth much, and spendeth litle, hath neuer enough. But admit he hath no desire to spend much, then he is a foole to trauell to get more then he needeth: and if he do desire it, and dare not for niggardlinesse spend part of that he laboureth for, then is he miserable. Now wold I aske Cato with a goodwill, if riches be made but to vse thē, why doyou boast then you haue gotten much together, when a litle doth suffice you? And if it be a commendable thing (as in truth it is) to be contented with the bread you find, to drinke of the same tappe workemen and labourers do, not to care for purple dyed gownes, nor for houses with plastered walles: it followeth then that neither Aristides, nor Epaminondas, not Manius Curius, nor Caius Fabricius, haue forgotten any part of their duties, when they cared not for getting of that which they would not vse nor occupie. For it was to no purpose for a man that esteemed rootes and parsenips to be one of the best dishes in the world, and that did seeth them himselfe in his chimney, whilest his wife did bake his bread, to talke so much of an Asse, & to take paines to write, by what art and industrie a man might quicely enrich himselfe. For it is true, that sufficiencie and to be contented with a litle, is a good and commendable thing: but it is becaus it taketh from vs all desire of vnnecessarie things, and maketh vs not to passe for them. And therefore we find that Aristides said, when rich Callias case was pleaded, that such as were poore against their willes, might well be ashamed of their pouerty: but such as were willingly poore, had good cause and might iustly reioyce at it. For it were a mad part to thinke that Aristides pouerty proceeded of a base mind and slouthfulnes, since he might quickly haue made himselfe rich without any dishonestie at all, by taking only the spoile of some one of the barbarous people whom he had ouercome, or any one of their tents. But enough for this matter. Furthermore, touching the victorie and battels Cato had won, they did in manner litle helpe to increase the Empire of Rome: for it was alreadie so great, as it could almost be no greater. But Aristides victories are the greatest conquests and noblest acts that the Grecians euer did in any wars: as the iourney of Marathon, the battell of Salamina, and the battel of Platees. And yet there is no reason to compare king Antiochus with king Xerxes, nor the walles of the city of Spaine which Cato ouerthrew and razed, vnto so many thousands of barbarous people, which were thē ouerthrowne and put to the sword by the Grecians, aswell by land as by sea. In all which seruices, Aristides was the chiefest before all other, as touching his valiantnesse in fighting: notwithstanding he gaue other the glory of it, that desired it more then himselfe, as he did easily leaue the gold & siluer vnto those, that had more need of it then himself. Wherin he shewed himselfe of a nobler mind then al they did. Furthermore, for my part, I will not reproue Catoes maner, to commend & extoll himself so highly aboue all other, since he himself saith in an oratiō he made, that to praise himself is as much folly, as also to dispraise himselfe: but this I thinke, his vertue is more perfect, that desireth other should not praise him, then he that commonly doth vse to praise himselfe. For, not to be ambitious, is a great shew of humanitie, and necessarie for him that will liue amongst men of gouernment: and euen so, ambition is hatefull, and procureth great enuie vnto him, that is infected withall. Of the which Aristides was cleare, and Cato farre gone in it. For Aristides did helpe Themistocles his chiefest enemie, in all his noblest acts, and did serue him (as a man would say) like a priuate souldier that guarded his person, when Themistocles was General, being the onely instrument and meane of his glory: which was indeed the onely cause that the city of ATHENS was saued, and restored againe to her former good state. Cato contrariwise, crossing Scipio in all his enterprises, thought to hinder his voyage and iourney vnto CARTHAGE, in the which he ouercame Hanniball, who vntill that time was euer inuincible: and so in the end, continuing him still in iealousie with the state, and euer accusing of him, he neuer left him till he had driuen him out of the citie, and caused his brother Lucius Scipio to be shamefully condemned for theft, and ill behauiour in his charge. Furthermore, for temperance and modesty, which Cato did euer commend so highly: Aristides truly kept them most sincerely. But Catoes second wife, who maried a maid (that was neither fit for his dignitie and calling, nor agreeable for his age) made him to be thought a lecherous man, and not without manifest cause. For he cannot be excused with honestie, that being a man past mariage, brought his sonne that was maried, and his faire daughter in law, a step-mother into his house, and but a Clerks daughter, whose father did write for money, for any man that would hire him. Take it Cato maried her to satisfie his lust, or else for spite to be reuenged of his son, because his son could not abide his young filth he had before: either of these turneth still to his shame, as well the effect as also the cause. Againe, the excuse he made to his sonne why he maried, was also a lye. For if he had grounded his desire indeed, to haue gotten either children, as he said, that might be as honest men as his eldest sonne: then surely he had done well after the death of his first wife, if he had sought him another wife soone after, that had bene of an honest house, and not to haue lyen with a young harlatrie filth, till his sonne had spied him, and then when he saw it was knowne, to go and marie her, and to make alliance with him, not because it was honourable for him to do it, but easiest to be obtained.

Cato reproued for his second wife.

THE LIFE OF Philopœmen.

IN the citie of MANTINEA, there was a citizen in old time called Caſſander, one that was as nobly borne and of as great authoritie in gouernment there, as any man of his time whatſoeuer. Notwithſtanding, fortune frowned on him in the end, in ſomuch as he was driuen out of his country, & went to lie in the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, only for the loue he bare vnto Crauſis, Philopœmens father, a rare man, and nobly giuen in all things, and one that loued him alſo very well. Now ſo long as Crauſis liued, Caſſander was ſo well vſed at his hands, that he could lack nothing: and when he was departed this world, Caſſander, to requite the loue Crauſis bare him in his life time, tooke his ſonne into his charge, being an orphane, and taught him, as Homer ſaid Achilles was brought vp by the old Phœnix. So this child Philopœmen grew to haue noble conditions, and increaſed alwayes from good to better. Afterwards, when he came to grow to mans ſtate, Ecdemus and Demophanes, both MEGALIPOLITANS, tooke him into their gouernement. They were two Philoſophers that had bene hearers of Arceſilaus, in the ſchoole of Academia, and afterwards employed all the Philoſophie they had learned, vpon their gouerning of the common wealth, and dealing in matters of ſtate, as much or more, then any other men of their time. For they deliuered their citie from the tyrannie of Ariſtodemus, who kept it in ſubiection, by corrupting thoſe that killed him. And they did helpe Aratus alſo to driue the tyrant Nicocles, out of SICYONE. At the requeſt of the CYRENIANS, that were troubled with ciuil diſſention and factions among them, they went vnto CYRENA, where they did reforme the ſtate of the common wealth, and ſtabliſhed good lawes for them. But for themſelues, they reckoned the education and bringing vp of Philopœmen, the chiefeſt act that euer they did: iudging that they had procured an vniuerſall good vnto all GREECE, to bring vp a man of ſo noble a nature, in the rules and precepts of Philoſophie. And to ſay truly, GREECE did loue him paſſingly well, as the laſt valiant man ſhe brought forth in her age, after ſo many great and famous auncient captaines: and did alwayes increaſe his power and authoritie, as his glorie did alſo riſe. Whereupon there was a ROMAINE, who to praiſe him the more, called him the laſt of the GRECIANS: meaning that after him, GRECE neuer brought forth any worthy perſon, deſeruing the name of a GRECIAN. And now concerning his perſon, he had no ill face, as many ſuppoſe he had: for his whole image is yet to be ſeene in the citie of DELPHES, excellently well done, as if he were aliue.

Philopœmen taken for a seruing man.

And for that they report of his hostesse in the citie of MEGARA, who tooke him for a seruing man: that was by reason of his curtesie, not standing vpon his reputation, and because he went plainly besides. For she vnderstanding that the Generall of the ACHAIANS came to Inne there all night, she bestirred her, and was very busie preparing for his supper, her huband peraduenture being from home at that time: and in the meane season came Philopœmen into the Inne, with a poore cloke on his backe. The simple woman seeing him no better apparelled, took him for one of his men that came before to prouide his lodging, and so praied him to lend her his hand in the kitchin. He straight cast off his cloke, and began to fall to hew wood. So, as Philopœmen was busie about it, in commeth her husband, and finding him riuing of wood: Ha ha ha, said he, my Lord Philopœmen, why what meaneth this? Truly nothing else, said he in his DORICAN tongue, but that I am punished, because I am neither faire boy, nor goodly man. It is true that Titus Quintius Flaminius said one day vnto him, seeming to mocke him for his personage: O Philopœmen, thou hast faire hands, and good legs, but thou hast no belly, for he was fine in the waste, and small bodied. Notwithstanding, I take it this iesting tended rather to the proportion of his army, then of his bodie: because he had both good horsemen and footemen, but he was often without money to pay them. These ieasts, schollers haue taken vp in schooles, of Philopœmen. But now to descend to his nature and conditions: it seemeth that the ambition and desire he had to win honour in his doings, was not without some heate and wilfulnesse. For, because he would altogether follow Epaminondas steps, he shewed his hardinesse to enterprise any thing, his wisedome to execute all great matters, and his integritie also, in that no mony could corrupt him: but in ciuill matters and controuersies, he could hardly otherwhiles keep himself within the bounds of modestie, patience, and curtesie, but would often burst out into choller, and wilfulnesse. Wherefore it seemeth, that he was a better captaine for warres, then a wise gouernour for peace. And indeed, euen from his youth he euer loued souldiers, & armes, and delighted maruellously in all marshall exercises: as in handling of his weapon well, riding of horses gallantly, and in vawting nimbly. And because he seemed to haue a naturall gift in wrestling, certaine of his friends, and such as were careful of him, did wish him to giue himselfe most vnto that exercise. Then he asked them, if their life that made such profession, would be no hinderance to their martial exercises. Answer was made him againe, that the disposition of the person, and maner of life that wrestlers vsed, and such as followed like exercises, was altogether contrary to the life and discipline of a souldier, and specially touching life and limme. For wrestlers studied altogether to keepe themselues in good plight, by much sleeping, eating, and drinking; by labouring, and taking their ease at certaine houres, by not missing a iot of their exercises: and besides, were in hazard to loose the force and strength of their bodie, if they did surfeit neuer so litle, or passed their ordinary course and rule of diet: where souldiers contrariwise are vsed to all chaunge and diuersitie of life, and specially be taught from their youth, to away with all hardnesse and scarcitie, and to watch in the night without sleepe.

Philopœmen, hastie and wilfull.

Philopœmen did reproue wrestling.

Philopœmen hearing this, did not onely forsake those exercises, and scorned them, but afterwards being Generall of an army, he sought by all infamous meanes he could to put downe all wrestling, and such kind of exercise, which made mens bodies vnmeete to take paines, and to become souldiers to fight in defence of their countrey, that otherwise would haue bene very able and handsome for the same. When he first left his booke and schoolemaisters, and began to weare armour in inuasions the MANTINEIANS vsed to make vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, to get some spoile on a sodaine, or to destroy a part of their countrey: Philopœmen then would euer be the formost to go out, and the hindermost to come in. When he had leisure, he vsed much hunting in time of peace, all to acquaint his body with toile and trauell, or else he would be digging of his grounds. For he had a faire mannor, not passing twentie furlongs out of the citie, whither he would walke cõmonly after dinner or supper: and then when night came that it was bed time, he would lie vpon some ill fauored mattresse, as the meanest labourer he had, and in the morning by breake of the day, he went out either with his vine-men to labour in his vineyard, or else with his plough-men to follow the plough, and sometimes returned againe to the citie, and followed matters of the common wealth, with his friends and other officers of the same. Whatsoeuer he could spare and get in the wars, he spent it in buying of goodly horses, in making of faire armors, or paying his poore countrymens ransome, that were taken prisoners in the warres: but for his goods and reuenue, he sought onely to increase them, by the profit of tillage, which he esteemed the iu[illegible]est and best way of getting of goods. For he did not trifle therin, but employed his whole

care and ſtudie vpon it,as one that thought it fit for euery noble man and gentleman ſo to trauel, gouerne,and increaſe his owne,that he ſhould haue no occaſion to couet or vſurp another mans. He tooke no pleaſure to heare all kind of matters, nor to reade all ſorts of bookes of Philoſophie: but thoſe onely that would teach him moſt to become vertuous. Neither did he much care to reade Homers workes,ſauing thoſe places only that ſtirred vp mens hearts moſt vnto valiantneſſe. But of all other ſtories, he ſpecially delighted to reade Euangelus bookes, which treated of the diſcipline of warres, how to ſet battels, and declared the acts and geſts of Alexander the great: ſaying, that men ſhould euer bring words vnto deedes, vnleſſe they would take them for vaine ſtories,and things ſpoken,but not to profit by. For in his bookes of the feates of warre,and how battels ſhould be ordered,he was not onely contented to ſee them drawne and ſet out in charts & maps,but would alſo put them in execution,in the places themſelues as they were ſet out. And therfore when the armie marched in order of battell in the field,he would conſider & ſtudie with himſelfe, the ſodaine euents and approches of the enemies, that might light vpon them, when they comming downe to the valley, or going out of a plaine, were to paſſe a riuer or a ditch, or through ſome ſtraight: alſo when he ſhould ſpread out his armie, or elſe gather it narrow: and this he did not onely forecaſt by himſelfe, but would alſo argue the ſame with the captaines that were about him. For Philopæmen doubtleſſe was one of the odde men of the world, that moſt eſteemed the diſcipline of warre,(and ſometime peraduenture more then he needed)as the moſt large field & moſt fruitfull ground,that valiantneſſe could be exerciſed in: ſo that he deſpiſed and contemned all that were no ſouldiers,as men good for nothing. Whē he was come now to thirty yeares of age, Cleomenes King of LACEDÆMON, came one night vpon the ſodaine, and gaue an aſſault to the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, ſo luſtily, that he draue backe the watch and got into the market place,and wanne it. Philopæmen hearing of it,ranne immediatly to the reſcue. Neuertheleſſe, though he fought very valiantly, and did like a noble ſouldier, yet he could not repulſe the enemies,nor driue them out of the citie: but by this meanes he got his citizens leiſure, and ſome time to get them out of the town to ſaue themſelues,ſtaying thoſe that followed them: and made Cleomenes ſtill waite vpon him, ſo that in the end he had much a do to ſaue himſelfe being the laſt man,and very ſore hurt,and his horſe alſo ſlain vnder him. Shortly after,Cleomenes being aduertiſed that the MEGALIPOLITANS were gotte into the citie of MESSINA,he ſent vnto them to let them vnderſtand,that he was ready to deliuer them their citie,lands,and goods againe. But Philopæmen ſeeing his countrymen very glad of theſe newes, and that euery man prepared to returne againe in haſte: he ſtaid them with theſe perſwaſions, ſhewing them that Cleomenes deuice was not to redeliuer them their citie, but rather to take them together with their citie: foreſeeing well inough,that he could not continue long there,to keep naked walles and emptie houſes, and that himſelfe in the end ſhould be compelled to go his way. This perſwaſion ſtaid the MEGALIPOLITANS, but withall it gaue Cleomenes occaſion to burne and plucke downe a great part of the citie, and to carie away a great ſumme of money and a great ſpoile. Afterwards,when king Antigonus was come to aide the ACHAIANS againſt Cleomenes, and that Cleomenes kept on the top of the mountaines of SELLASIA, and kept all the paſſages, and wayes vnto them out of all thoſe quarters: King Antigonus ſet his armie in battell hard by him, determining to ſet vpon him, and to driue him thence if he could poſſibly. Philopæmen was at that time amongſt the horſmen with his citizens,who had the ILLYRIANS on the ſide of them,being a great number of footmen and excellent good ſouldiers,which did ſhut in the taile of all the armie. So they were commaunded to ſtand ſtill,and to keep their place,vntil ſuch time as they did ſhew them a red coate of armes on the top of a pike, from the other wing of the battell, where the King himſelfe ſtood in perſon. Notwithſtanding this ſtraight commandement,the captaines of the ILLYRIANS would abide no longer,but went to ſee if they could force the LACEDÆMONIANS that kept on the top of the mountaines. The ACHAIANS contrariwiſe, kept their place and order,as they were commaunded. Euclidas,Cleomenes brother,perceiuing how their enemies footmen were ſeuered from their horſemen,ſodainely ſent the lighteſt armed ſouldiers and luſtieſt fellowes he had in his bands,to giue a charge vpon the ILLYRIANS behind, to proue if they could make them turne their faces on them, becauſe they had no horſemen for their guard. This was done, and theſe light armed men did maruellouſly trouble and diſorder the ILLYRIANS. Philopæmen perceiuing that, and conſidering how theſe light armed men would be eaſily broken and driuen back, ſince occaſion ſelfe inforced them to it: he went to tell the Kings Captaines of it, that led his men of armes.

Philopæmens noble fact in the battell againſt King Cleomenes.

But when he ſaw he could not make them vnderſtand it, and that they made no reckoning of his reaſons, but tooke him of no skill, becauſe he had not yet attained any credit or eſtimation to be iudged a man that could inuent or execute any ſtratageme of warre, he went thither himſelfe, and tooke his citizens with him: and at his firſt comming, he ſo troubled theſe light armed men, that he made them flie, and ſlue a number of them. Moreouer, to encourage the better king Antigonus men, and to make them giue a luſtie charge vpon the enemies, whileſt they were thus troubled and out of order, he left his horſe, and marched a foote vp hill and downe hill, in rough and ſtonie wayes, full of ſprings and quauemires, being heauily armed at all peeces as a man at armes, and fighting in this ſort very painefully and vneaſily, he had both his thighes paſt through with a dart, hauing a leather thong on the middeſt of it. And though the blow did not take much hold of the fleſh, yet was it a ſtrong blow, for it pierced both thighes through and through, that the yron was ſeene on the other ſide. Then was he ſo cumbred with this blow, as if he had bene ſhackled with yrons on his feet, and knew not what to do: for the leather faſtened in the middeſt of the dart, did grieue him maruellouſly, when they thought to haue pulled the dart out of the place where it entred in, ſo as neuer a man about him durſt ſet his hands to it. Philopœmen on the other ſide, ſeeing the fight terrible on either ſide, and would ſoone be ended: it ſpited him to the guts, he would ſo faine haue bene among them. So at the length he made ſuch ſtrugling, putting backe one thigh, and ſetting forward another, that he knapped the ſtaffe of the dart aſunder, and made them pull out the two truncheons, the one on this ſide, and the other on the other ſide. Then when he ſaw he was at libertie againe, he took his ſword in his hand, and ran through the middeſt of them that fought, vnto the foremoſt rankes, to meete with the enemie: ſo that he gaue his men a new courage, and did ſet them on fire with enuy, to follow his valiantneſſe. After the battel was wonne, Antigonus asked the MACEDONIAN captaines, to proue them: who moued the horſemen to deuide themſelues, and giue the charge, before the ſigne that was commaunded. They anſwered him, that they were forced to do it againſt their wils, becauſe a young MEGALIPOLITAN gentleman gaue a charge with his companie, before the ſigne was giuen. Then Antigonus laughing, told them: the young gentleman played the part of a wiſe and valiant captaine. This exploit, together with Antigonus teſtimonie, gaue great reputation vnto Philopœmen, as we may eaſily imagine. So King Antigonus maruellouſly intreated him he would ſerue with him, and offered him a band of men at armes, and great entertainement, if he would go with him. But Philopœmen refuſed his offer, and chiefly becauſe he knew his own nature, that he could hardly abide to be commanded by any. Notwithſtanding, becauſe he could not be idle, he tooke ſea, and went into CRETA, where he knew there was warres, only to continue himſelfe in exerciſe thereof. So when he had ſerued a long time with the CRETANS, which were valiant ſoldiers, and very expert in all policies and feates of war, and moreouer were men of a moderate and ſpare diet: he returned home again to ACHAIA, with ſo great credit and reputation of euery one, that he was preſently choſen Generall of all the horſemen. So when he entred into his charge, he found many horſemen very il horſed, vpon litle iades, ſuch as might be gotten cheapeſt, and how they vſed not to go themſelues in perſon to the warres, but did ſend other in their ſtead: and to be ſhort, how they neither had hearts, nor experience of the warres, and all becauſe the Generals and Captaines of the people of the ACHAIANS that ſerued before him, did take no heed to thoſe matters, as fearing to offend any, becauſe they had the greateſt authoritie in their hands, to puniſh or reward whom they thought good. Philopœmen fearing none of all theſe things, would leaue no part of his charge and dutie vndone, but went himſelfe in perſon to all the cities, to perſwade and encourage the young gentlemen, to be well horſed, and well armed, that they might win honour in the field, be able to defend themſelues, and ouerthrow their enemies. And where perſwaſion could do no good, there he would ſet fines vpon their heads that ſo refuſed, and did vſe to muſter them oft, and did acquaint them with tilting, turneying, and barriers, and one to fight with another, and at ſuch times and places ſpecially, as he knew there would be multitudes of people to giue them the looking on: that in ſhort ſpace he made them very forward, proper, and readie horſemen, whoſe chiefeſt propertie is, to keepe their order and rankes in the battell. So as when neceſſitie ſerued for the whole companie of horſemen to turne together, halfe turne, or whole turne, or elſe euery man by himſelf: they were ſo throughly trained in it, that al the whole troupe ſet in battell ray, did ſeeme as it were to be but one body, they remoued ſo together, and withall ſo eaſily, and at all times, and ſo oft, as they ſhould turne, on the one ſide, or on the other.

Philopœmen hurt in fight.

Antigonus ſaying of Philopœmens skill of a ſouldier.

Now

Now in a great battel the ACHAIANS had with the ÆTOLIANS and the ELIANS, by the riuer of Lariſſus, Demophantus Generall of the horſemen of the ÆTOLIANS, came from his company to fight with Philopœmen, who alſo made towards him, & gaue him firſt ſuch a blow with his ſpeare, that he ſtrake him ſtarke dead. When Demophantus fel to the ground, his ſouldiers fled by and by vpon it. This wan Philopœmen great honour, who gaue no place to the yongeſt men in fighting moſt valiantly with his own hands: nor to the oldeſt men in wiſdome, for the wiſe leading of his armie. Indeed the firſt man that made the people of ACHAIA grow in power and greatneſſe, was Aratus: for before his time ACHAIA was of ſmal reckning, becauſe the cities of the ſame ſtood deuided betweene themſelues, & Aratus was the firſt man that made them ioyne together, and ſtabliſhed among them an honeſt ciuil gouernment. Whereby it happened, that as we ſee in brooks and riuers where any litle thing ſtoppeth and falleth to the bottome, which the courſe of the water bringeth downe the ſtreame, there the reſt that followeth doth vſe to ſtay, and go no further: euen ſo in the cities of GREECE that were in hard ſtate, and ſore weakened, by faction one againſt another, the ACHAIANS were the firſt that ſtaid themſelues, and grew in amitie one with the other, and afterwards drew on the reſt of the cities into league with them, as good neighbours and confederates. Some by helping & deliuering them from the oppreſſion of tyrants, and winning other alſo by their peaceable gouernement and good concord: they had a meaning in this wiſe to bring all the country of PELOPONNESVS into one body and league. Neuertheleſſe, while Aratus liued, they depended moſt vpon the ſtrength and power of the MACEDONIANS: firſt with ſticking vnto king Ptolomy, and then vnto Antigonus, and laſt to Philip, who ruled in maner all the ſtate of GREECE. But when Philopœmen came to gouerne, and to be the chiefeſt man, the ACHAIANS being ſtrong inough to reſiſt the ſtrongeſt, would march then no more vnder any other bodies enſigne, nor would ſuffer any more ſtrange gouernours or captaines ouer them. For Aratus (as it ſeemed) was ſomewhat too ſoft and cold for the wars, and therfore the moſt things he did, were by gentle intreaties, by intelligences, and by the kings friendſhips with whom he was great, as we haue at large declared in his life. But Philopœmen being a man of execution, hardie and valiant of perſon, and of very good fortune, in the firſt battell that euer he made, did maruellouſly increaſe the courage and hearts of the ACHAIANS: becauſe vnder his charge they euer foiled their enemies, and alwayes had the vpper hand of them. The firſt thing Philopœmon began withal at his coming, he changed the maner of ſetting of their tables, & their faſhion of arming themſelues: for before they caried litle light targets, which becauſe they were thin and narrow, did not couer half their bodies, & vſed ſpeares far ſhorter then pikes, by reaſon wherof they were very light, & good to skirmiſh and fight a far off: but when they came to ioyne battell, their enemies then had great vantage of them. As for the order of their battels, they knew not what it meant, nor to caſt themſelues into a ſnaile or ring, but onely vſed the ſquare battell, nor yet gaue it any ſuch front where the pikes of many rankes might puſh together, and where the ſouldiers might ſtand ſo cloſe, that their targets ſhould touch one another, as they do in the ſquadron of the battell of the MACEDONIANS: by reaſon whereof, they were ſoone broken and ouerthrowne. Philopœmen reformed all this, perſwading them to vſe the pike and ſhield, in ſtead of their litle target, ſpeare, or bore-ſtaffe, and to put good morrians or burganets on their heads, corſelets on their bodies, and good taſſes and greaues to couer their thighes and legges, that they might fight it out manfully, not giuing a foote of ground, as light armed men that runne to and fro in a skirmiſh. And thus hauing perſwaded and taught the young men to arme themſelues throughly, firſt he made them the bolder and more couragious to fight, as if they had bene men that could not haue bene ouercome: then he turned all their vaine ſuperfluous charge, into neceſſarie and honeſt expences. But he could not poſſibly bring them altogether from their vaine and rich apparell they had of long time taken vp, the one to exceed another: nor from their ſumptuous furniture of houſes, as in beds, hangings, curious ſeruice at the table, and delicate kind of diſhes. But to begin to withdraw this deſire in them which they had, to be fine and delicate, in all ſuperfluous and vnneceſſarie things, and to like of things neceſſarie and profitable: he wiſhed them to looke more nearely to their ordinarie charge about themſelues, taking order as well for their apparell, as alſo for their diet, and to ſpare in them, to come honourably armed to the field, for defence of their countrey. Thereupon, if you had looked into the gold-ſmithes ſhoppes, ye ſhould haue ſeene nothing elſe in their hands, but breaking and battering of pots of gold and ſiluer, to be caſt and molten downe againe, and then gilding of armours and targets, and ſiluering of bits.

Aratus a ſoft man in wars.

Philopœmen turned all curioſitie and daintie fare, into braue and rich armours.

In the ſhew places for the running of horſes, there was managing and breaking of young horſes, and young men exerciſing armes. Womens hands alſo were full of morians and head peeces, whereto they tied goodly braue plumes of feathers of ſundrie colours, and were alſo full of imbrodered arming coates and caſſockes, with curious and very rich workes. The ſight of which brauerie did heaue vp their hearts, and made them gallant and liuely: ſo as enuy bred ſtraight in them who ſhould do beſt ſeruice, and no way ſpare for the warres. Indeed, ſumptuouſneſſe and brauerie in other ſights, doth ſecretly carie mens minds away, and allure them to ſeeke after vanities, which makes them tender bodied, and womaniſh perſons: becauſe this ſweete tickling, and intiſing of the outward ſenſe that is delighted therewith, doth ſtraight melt and ſoften the ſtrength and courage of the mind. But againe, the ſumptuous coſt beſtowed vpon warlike furniture, doth encourage and make great a noble heart. Euen as Homer ſaith it did Achilles, when his mother brought him new armour and weapons ſhe had cauſed Vulcan to make for him, and layed them at his feete: who ſeeing them, could not tarie, but was ſtraight ſet on fire with deſire to occupie them. So when Philopœmen had brought the youth of ACHAIA to this good paſſe, to come thus brauely armed and furniſhed into the field, he began then to exerciſe them continually in armes: wherein they did not onely ſhew themſelues obedient to him, but did moreouer ſtriue one to excell another, and to do better then their fellowes. For they liked maruellous well the ordering of the battell he had taught them, becauſe that ſtanding ſo cloſe together as they did, they thought ſurely they could hardly be ouerthrowne. Thus by continuance of time, being much vſed to weare their armour, they found them a great deale eaſier and lighter then before, beſide the pleaſure they tooke to ſee their armour ſo braue, and ſo rich: inſomuch as they longed for ſome occaſion to trie them ſtraight vpon their enemies. Now the ACHAIANS at that time were at warres with Machanidas, the tyrant of LACEDÆMON, who ſought by all deuiſe he could with a great armie, to become chiefe Lord of all the PELOPONNESIANS. When newes was brought that Machanidas was come into the countrey of the MANTINEANS, Philopœmen ſtraight marched towards him with his armie: ſo they met both not farre from the citie of MANTINEA, where by and by they put themſelues in order of battell. They both had entertained in pay a great number of ſtrangers to ſerue them, beſides the whole force of their countrey: and when they came to ioyne battell, Machanidas with his ſtrangers gaue ſuch a luſtie charge vpon certaine ſlingers and archers being the forlorne hope whom Philopœmen had put before the battell of the ACHAIANS to begin the skirmiſh, that he ouerthrew them, and made them flie withall. But where he ſhould haue gone on directly againſt the ACHAIANS that were ranged in battell ray, to haue proued if he could haue broken them, he was very buſie, and earneſt ſtill, to follow the chaſe of them that firſt fled, and ſo came hard by the ACHAIANS that ſtood ſtil in their battell, and kept their rankes. This great ouerthrow fortuning at the beginning, many men thought the ACHAIANS were but caſt away. But Philopœmen made as though it had bene nothing, and that he ſet light by it, and ſpying the great fault his enemies made, following the forlorne hope on the ſpurre, whom they had ouerthrowne, and ſtraying ſo farre from the battell of their footmen, whom they had left naked, and the field open vpon them: he did not make towards them to ſtay them, nor did ſtriue to ſtop them that they ſhould not follow thoſe that fled, but ſuffered them to take their courſe. And when he ſaw that they were gone a good way from their footemen, he made his men march vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, whoſe ſides were naked, hauing no horſemen to gard them: and ſo did ſet vpon them on the one ſide, and ranne ſo haſtily on them to win one of their flankes, that he made them flie, and ſlue withall a great number of them. For it is ſaid, there were foure thouſand LACEDÆMONIANS ſlaine in the field, becauſe they had no man to leade them. And moreouer, they ſay they did not looke to fight, but ſuppoſed rather they had wonne the field, when they ſaw Machanidas chaſing ſtil thoſe vpon the ſpurre, whom he had ouerthrowne. After this Philopœmen retired to meete Machanidas, who came backe from the chaſe with his ſtrangers. But by chaunce there was a great broade ditch betweene them, ſo as both of them rode vpon the bankes ſide of the ſame, a great while together, one againſt another of them: the one ſide ſeeking ſome conuenient place to get ouer and flie, and the other ſide ſeeking meanes to keepe them from ſtarting away. So to ſee the one before the other in this ſort, it appeared as they had bene wild beaſts brought to an extremitie, to defend themſelues by force, from ſo fierce a hunter as Philopœmen was. But whileſt they were ſtriuing thus, the tyrants horſe that was luſtie and couragious, and felt the force of his maiſters ſpurres pricking pricking in his ſides, that the bloud followed after, did venter to leape the ditch, comming to the bankes ſide, ſtood vpon his hindmoſt legs, and aduanced forward with his foremoſt feete, to reach to the other ſide. Then Simmias & Polyænus, who were about Philopœmen when he fought, ran thither ſtraight to keepe him in with their boreſtaues that he ſhould not leape the ditch. But Philopœmen who was there before them, perceiuing that the tyrants horſe by lifting vp his head ſo high, did couer all his maiſters bodie: forſooke by and by his horſe, and took his ſpeare in both his hands, and thruſt at the tyrant with ſo good a will, that he ſlue him in the ditch. In memorie whereof, the ACHAIANS that did highly eſteeme this valiant act of his, and his wiſedome alſo in leading of the battell, did ſet vp his image in braſſe, in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, in the forme he ſlue the tyrant. They ſay, that at the aſſembly of the common games called Nemea, (which they ſolemnize in honour of Hercules, not farre from the citie of ARGOS) and not long after he had won this battell of MANTINEA, being made generall the ſecond time of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, & being at good leaſure alſo by reaſon of the feaſt, he firſt ſhewed al the GRECIANS that were come thither to ſee the games and paſtimes, his armie ranged in order of battell, & made them ſee how eaſily they remoued their places euery way, as neceſſitie and occaſion of fight required, without troubling or confounding their rankes, and that with a maruellous force and readineſſe. When he had done this, he went into the Theater to heare the Muſitians play, & ſing to their inſtruments, who ſhould win the beſt game, being accompanied with luſtie young gentlemen apparelled in purple cloakes, & in skarlet coates and caſſocks they ware vpon their armor, being all in the flower of their youth, and well giuen & diſpoſed: who did greatly honor & reuerence their Captaine, & beſides that, ſhewed themſelues inwardly of noble hearts, being incouraged by many notable battels they had fought, in which they had euer attained the victorie, & gotten the vpper hand of their enemies. And by chance, as they were entred into the Theater, Pylades the Muſitian, ſinging certaine poems of Timotheus, called the Perſes, fell into theſe verſes:

Philopœmen ſlue Machanidas.

O Greekes, it is euen he, which your proſperitie
Hath giuen to you: and therewithall a noble libertie.

When he had ſweetly ſong out aloud theſe noble verſes, paſſingly well made, the whole aſſembly of the GRECIANS in the Theater, that were gathered thither to ſee the games, caſt all their eyes ſtraight vpon Philopœmen, and clapped their hands one to another for ioy, becauſe of the great hope they had in him, that through him they ſhould ſoone recouer their auncient reputation: and ſo imagined they poſſeſſed already the noble and worthy minds of their auncestours. And as young horſes that do alwaies looke to be ridden by their ordinarie riders, if any ſtraunger get vp on their backes, do ſtraight waxe ſtraunge to be handled, and make great ado: euen ſo when the ACHAIANS came to any daungerous battell, their hearts were euen done, if they had any other Generall or leader then Philopœmen, on whom ſtill they depended and looked. And when they ſaw him, euer the whole army reioyced, and deſired ſtraight to be at it, they had ſuch confidence in his valiantneſſe and good fortune: and truely not without cauſe. For of all men, their enemies did feare him moſt, and durſt not ſtand before him: becauſe they were afraid to heare his name onely, as it ſeemed by their doings. For Philip king of MACEDON (imagining that if he could find meanes to diſpatch Philopœmen out of the way, howſoeuer it were, the ACHAIANS would ſtraight take part againe with him) ſent men ſecretly into the city of ARGOS, to kill him by treaſon: howbeit the practiſe was diſcouered, and the king euer after was mortally hated of all the GRECIANS generally, and taken for a cowardly and wicked Prince. It fortuned one day when the BOEOTIANS layd ſiege to the city of MEGARA, and thought certainely to haue won it at the firſt aſſault, there roſe a rumor ſuddenly amongſt them, that Philopœmen came to aide the citie, and was not farre from it with his army. But it was a falſe report. Notwithſtanding, the BOEOTIANS were ſo ſcared, that for feare they left their ſcaling ladders behind them, which they had ſet againſt the walles, to haue ſcaled the towne, and fled ſtraight to ſaue themſelues. Another time, when Nabis the tyrant of LACEDÆMON, that ſucceeded Machanidas, had taken the city of MESSINA vpon a ſudden: Philopœmen being then a priuate man, and hauing no charge of ſouldiers, went vnto Lyſippus generall of the ACHAIANS that yeare, to perſwade him that he would ſend preſent aide vnto them of MESSINA. Lyſippus told him, it was too late now to go thither, and that it was but a loſt towne, not to be holpen: conſidering the enemies were in it already. Philopœmen perceiuing he could not procure him to go, went thither himſelfe with the force of MESSINA onely, not ſtaying for the aſſembly of the MEGALIPOLITANS, that were in counſell about it, to giue him commiſſion by voyces of the people to take them with him: but they all willingly followed him, as if he had bene their continuall generall, and the man that by nature was worthieſt of all other to commaund them. Now when he came neare vnto MESSINA, Nabis hearing of his comming, durſt not tarie him, though he had his army within the city, but ſtole out at another gate, and marched away in all the haſt he could, thinking himſelfe a happy man if he could ſo ſcape his hands, and retire with ſafetie, as indeed he did. And thus was MESSINA by his meanes deliuered from captiuitie. All that we haue written hitherto concerning Philopœmen, falleth out doubtleſſe to his great honour and glory: but afterwards he was greatly diſpraiſed for a iourny he made into CRETA, at the requeſt of the GORTYNIANS, who ſent to pray him to be their captaine, being ſore troubled with warres at that time. Becauſe Philopœmen went then to ſerue the GORTYNIANS, when the tyrant Nabis had greateſt warres with the MEGALIPOLITANS in their owne countrey: they laid it to his charge, either that he did it to flie the wars, or elſe that he ſought honour out of ſeaſon with forraine nations, when his poore citizens the MEGALIPOLITANS were in ſuch diſtreſſe, that their countrey being loſt and deſtroyed, they were driuen to keepe them within their city, and to ſow all their void grounds and ſtreetes in the ſame with corne, to ſuſtaine them withall, when their enemies were encamped almoſt hard at their towne gates. And the rather, becauſe himſelfe making wars with the CRETANS, and ſeruing ſtraungers beyond the ſea in the meane time, gaue his enemies occaſion to ſlander him that he fled, that he would not tarrie to fight for defence of his own country. Againe, there were that ſaid, becauſe the ACHAIANS did chuſe other for their generall, that he being a priuate man and without charge, was the rather contented to be Generall of the GORTYNIANS, who had marueilouſly intreated him to take the charge: for he was a man that could not abide to liue idlely, and that deſired ſpecially aboue all things to ſerue continually in the wars, and to put in practiſe his skill and diſcipline in the leading of an army. The words he ſpake one day of king Ptolomie do witneſſe as much: for when there were ſome that praiſed king Ptolomie highly, ſaying that he trayned his army well, and that he ſtill continued his perſon in exerciſe of armes: It is not commendable for a king (ſaid he) of his yeares, to delight in training his men to exerciſe armes, but to do ſome act himſelfe in perſon. Well, in the end, the MEGALIPOLITANS tooke his abſence in ſuch euill part, that they thought it a peece of treaſon, and would needs haue baniſhed him, & put him from the freedome of the city: had not the ACHAIANS ſent their Generall Ariſtænetus vnto them, who would not ſuffer the ſentence of baniſhment to paſſe againſt him, although otherwiſe there was euer contention betweene them about matters of the commonwealth. Afterwards, Philopœmen perceiuing his countrymen made no more account of him, to ſpite them withall, he made diuerſe ſmall villages and cities rebell againſt them, and taught them to ſay, & to giue it out, that they were not their ſubiects, neither paid them tribute frō the beginning: and he made them ſtand to it openly, and maintaine their ſedition againſt the city of MEGALIPOLIS, before the counſell of the ACHAIANS. Theſe things hapned ſhortly after. But whileſt he made wars in CRETA for the GORTYNIANS, he ſhewed not himſelfe a PELOPONNESIAN, nor like a man borne in ARCADIA, to make plaine and open wars: but he had learned the maner of the CRETANS, to vſe their owne pollicies, fine deuices, and ambuſhes againſt thēſelues. And made them know alſo, that all their crafts, were but childiſh ſports as it were, in reſpect of thoſe that were deuiſed, and put in execution, by a wiſe experienced captaine, and skilfull to fight a battell. So Philopœmen, hauing won great fame by his acts done in CRETA, returned againe to PELOPONNESSYS, where he found, that Philip king of MACEDON had bin ouercome in battel, by T. Q. Flaminius: & that the ACHAIANS ioyning with the ROMAINS, did make war againſt the tyrant Nabis, againſt whom he was made generall immediatly vpon his returne, & gaue him battell by ſea. In the which it ſeemed he fel into like misfortune, as Epaminōdas did: the euent of this battell falling out much worſe with him, then was looked for, in reſpect of his former courage & valiantnes. But as for Epaminōdas, ſome ſay he returned willingly out of ASIA, & the Iles, without any exploit don, becauſe he wold not haue his cuntrimē fleſhed with ſpoile by ſea, as fearing leſt of valiant ſoldiers by land, they would by litle & litle (as Plato ſaid) become diſſolute mariners by ſea. But Philopœmen cōtrariwiſe, preſuming on the skill he had to ſet the battell in good order by lād, wold needs take vpon him to do the ſame by ſea. But he was taught to his coſt, to know what exerciſe & experience meant, & how ſtrong it maketh thē that are practiſed in things. For he loſt not only the battell by ſea, being vnskilfull of that ſeruice: but he cōmitted beſides a fouler error.

For he cauſed an old ſhip to be rigged, which had bin very good of ſeruice before, but not occupied in 40 yeres together, & embarked his country men into the ſame, which were al likely to periſh, becauſe the ſhip had diuerſe leakes, by fault of good calking. This ouerthrow made his enemies deſpiſe him vtterly, perſwading thēſelues he was fled for altogether, and had giuen them ſea roome: whereupon they laid ſiege to the city of GYTHIVM. Philopœmen being aduertiſed thereof, imbarked his men ſuddenly, and ſet vpon his enemies ere they wiſt it, or had any thought of his comming: and found them ſtragling vp and downe, without watch or guard, by reaſon of the victorie they had lately won. So he landed his men cloſely by night, and went and ſet fire vpon his enemies campe, and burnt it euery whit: and in this feare and hurly burly, ſlue a great number of them. Shortly after this ſtealing vpon them, the tyrant Nabis alſo ſtole vpon him againe vnwares, as he was to go through a maruellous ill and daungerous way: which made the ACHAIANS amazed at the firſt, thinking it vnpoſſible for them that they could euer ſcape that danger, conſidering their enemies kept all the wayes thereabouts. But Philopœmen bethinking himſelfe, and conſidering the nature and ſituation of the place: after he had viewed it well, he ſhewed them plainely then, that the chiefeſt point of a good ſouldier and man of warre, was to know how to put an army in battell, according to the time and ſituation of the place. For he did but alter the forme of his battell a litle, and ſorted it according to the ſituation of the place, wherin he was compaſſed: and by doing this without trouble or buſineſſe, he tooke away all feare of danger, and gaue a charge vpon his enemies in ſuch fierce wiſe, that in a ſhort time he put them all to flight. And when he perceiued that they did not flie all in troupes together towards the city, but ſcattering wiſe, abroad in the fields in euery place, he cauſed the trumpet to ſound the retraite. Then he commaunded the chaſe to be followed no further, for that all the country thereabout was full of thicke woods and groues, very ill for horſemen: and alſo becauſe there were many brookes, vallies and quauemires, which they ſhould paſſe ouer, he encamped himſelf preſently, being yet broad day. And ſo, fearing leſt his enemies would in the night time draw vnto the city, one after another, and by couples: he ſent a great number of ACHAIANS, and laid them in ambuſh amongſt the brookes and hils neare about it, which made great ſlaughter of Nabis ſouldiers, becauſe they came not all together in troopes, but ſcatteringly one after another as they fled, one here, another there, and ſo fell into their enemies hands, as birds into the fowlers net. Theſe acts made Philopœmen ſingularly beloued of the GRECIANS, and they did him great honour in all their Theaters & cōmon aſſemblies. Wherat T. Q. Flaminius, of nature very ambitious & couetous of honor: did much repine, & was enuious at the matter, thinking that a Conſul of ROME ſhold haue place & honor among the ACHAIANS, before a mean gentleman of ARCADIA. And he imagined he had deſerued better of all GRECE, then Philopœmen had: cōſidering how by the only proclamatiō of an herald, he had reſtored GRECE again to her ancient liberty, which before his coming was ſubiect to king Philip, & vnto the MACEDONIANS. Afterwards, T. Quintius made peace with the tyrant Nabis, who was ſhortly after very traiterouſly ſlaine by the ÆTOLIANS. Wherupon the city of SPARTA grew to a tumult, and Philopœmen ſtraight taking the occaſiō, went thither with his army, & handled the matter ſo wiſely, that partly for loue, & partly by force, he wan the city, & ioyned it vnto the tribe of the ACHAIANS. So was he maruellouſly cōmended & eſteemed of the ACHAIANS for this notable victorie, to haue won their tribe & cōmunalty ſo famous a city, and of ſo great eſtimation. For the city of SPARTA was no ſmal increaſe of their power, being ioyned as a member of ACHAIA. Moreouer hewan by this meanes the loue & goodwil of all the honeſt men of LACEDÆMON, for the hope they had to find him a protector and defender of their liberty. Wherefore, when the tyrant Nabis houſe and goods were ſold, as forfeited to the ſtate: they reſolued in their counſell to make him a preſent of the money therof, which amounted to the ſum of ſixe ſcore talents, and ſent ambaſſadours purpoſely vnto him, to offer it him. Then Philopœmen ſhewed himſelfe plainely to be no counterfeit honeſt man, but a good man indeed. For firſt of all, there was not one of all the LACEDÆMONIANS that durſt preſume to offer him this mony, but euery man was afraid to tell him of it: and euery body that was appointed to do it, made ſome excuſe or other for themſelues. Notwithſtanding, in the end they made one Timolaus to take the matter vpon him, who was his familiar friend, and alſo his hoſt. And yet the ſame Timolaus when he came vnto MEGALIPOLIS, and was lodged and entertained in Philopœmens houſe, did ſo much reuerence him for his wiſe talke and conuerſation, for his moderate diet, & iuſt dealing with all men: that he ſaw there was no likely poſſibility to corrupt him with money, ſo as he durſt not once open his mouth to ſpeake to him of the preſent he had brought him, but found ſome other occaſion to excuſe the cauſe of his comming vnto him. And being ſent vnto him again the ſecond time, he did euen as much as at the firſt time. And making a third proofe, he ventured at the laſt to open the matter vnto him, and told him the good-will the city of SPARTA did beare him. Philopœmen became a glad man to heare it: and when he had heard all he had to ſay to him, he went himſelfe vnto the city of SPARTA. There he declared vnto the counſell, that it was not honeſt men, and their good friends, they ſhould ſeeke to winne and corrupt with money, conſidering they might commaund their vertue vpon any occaſion, without coſt vnto them: but that they ſhould ſeeke to bribe naughty men with mony, and ſuch as by ſeditious orations in counſell did mutine, and put a whole city in vprore: to the end that hauing their mouths ſtopped with gifts, they ſhould trouble them the leſſe in the cõmon wealth. For, ſaid he, it is more neceſſary to ſtop your enemies mouths, and to ſow vp their lips from liberty of ſpeaking: then it is to keepe your friends from it. So noble a man was Philopœmen againſt all couetouſneſſe of mony. Shortly after, the LACEDÆMONIANS beginning to ſtir againe, Diophanes (who was then generall of the ACHAIANS) being aduertiſed of it, began to prepare to puniſh thẽ. The LACEDÆMONIANS on the other ſide preparing for the wars, did ſet all the country of PELOPONNESVS in armes. Hereupon Philopœmen ſought to pacifie Diophanes anger, declaring vnto him, that king Antiochus, and the ROMAINES, being at wars together at that preſent time, and they both hauing puiſſant armies one againſt another in the middeſt of GREECE, it was meete for a good generall and wiſe gouernor, to haue an eye to their doings, to be carefull of the ſame, and to beware that he did not trouble or alter any thing within his country at that inſtant, but then rather to diſſemble it, & not to ſeeme to heare any fault whatſoeuer they did. Diophanes wold not be perſwaded, but entred the territories of LACEDÆMON with a great army, and T. Quintius Flaminius with him: and they together marched directly towards the city of SPARTA. Philopœmen was ſo mad with their doings, that he tooke vpon him an enterpriſe not very lawfull, nor altogether iuſt: neuertheles, his attempt proceeded of a noble mind & great courage. For he got into the city of SPARTA, and being but a priuate perſon, kept out the generall of the ACHAIANS, and the Conſull of the ROMAINS for entring the city: & when he had pacified all troubles and ſeditions in the ſame, he deliuered it vp againe as it was before, into the hands of the communalty of the ACHAIANS. Neuertheles, himſelfe being afterwards generall of the ACHAIANS, did compel the LACEDÆMONIANS to receiue thoſe home again whom they had baniſhed for certaine faults, & did put 80 naturall born citizens of SPARTA vnto death, as Polybius writeth: or 350, as Ariſtocrates another hiſtoriographer reciteth. Then he pulled downe the walles of the city, and razed them to the ground, and tooke away the moſt part of their territories, and gaue them to the MEGALIPOLITANS. All thoſe whom the tyrants had made free denizens of SPARTA, he compelled them to depart the countrey of LACEDÆMON, and forced them to dwell in ACHAIA, three thouſand onely excepted, who would not obey his commandement: all thoſe he ſold for ſlaues, and with the money he made of them (to ſpite them the more) he built a goodly faire walke within the citie of MEGALIPOLIS. Yet furthermore, to do the LACEDÆMONIANS all the miſchiefe he could, and as it were, to treade them vnder the feete in their moſt grieuous miſerie, he did a moſt cruell and vniuſt act toward them. For he compelled them to leaue the diſcipline and manner of education of their children, which Lycurgus had of old time inſtituted: and made them to follow the maner the ACHAIANS vſed, in lieu of their old grounded country cuſtome, becauſe he ſaw they would neuer be humble minded, ſo long as they kept Lycurgus order and inſtitution. Thus were they driuen to put their heads in the choller, by the miſerable miſhap that befell them: and in all deſpite, to ſuffer Philopœmen in this manner to cut aſunder (as it were) the ſinewes of their commonwealth. But afterwards they made ſute to the ROMAINS, that they might be ſuffered to enioy their ancient diſcipline againe, which being granted them, they ſtraight left the maner of the ACHAIANS, and did ſet vp againe as much as was poſſible (after ſo great miſerie and corruption of their maners) their old ancient cuſtomes and orders of their country. Now about the time the wars began in GREECE betweene the ROMAINES and king Antiochus, Philopœmen was then a priuate man, and without any authority. He ſeeing that king Antiochus lay ſtill in the city of CHALCIS, and did nothing but feaſt and loue, and had maried a young maide farre vnmeete for his years: and perceiuing that his SYRIAN ſoldiers wandred vp & downe the townes in great diſorder, playing many lewde parts without guide of Captaines, he was very ſorie he was not at that time generall of the ACHAIANS, and told the ROMAINES, that he enuied their victorie, hauing warres with enemies that were ſo eaſily to be ouercome. For (ſaid he) if fortune fauoured me that I were generall of the ACHAIANS at this preſent, I would haue killed them euery man in the cellers and tippling houſes. Now when the ROMAINES had ouercome Antiochus, they began to haue ſurer footing in GREECE, and to compaſſe in the ACHAIANS on all ſides, and ſpecially, by reaſon the heads and gouernours of the cities about them did yeeld to the ROMAINES, to win their fauour. And now their greatneſſe grew in haſt, by the fauour of the gods, ſo as they were become the monarch of the whole world, who brought them now to the end that fortune had determined. Philopœmen in the meane time did like a good pylot, reſiſting againſt the billowes and roughneſſe of their waues: and though for the time he was forced to giue place, and to let things paſſe, yet for all that he was againſt the ROMAINS, and did withſtand them in the moſt part of their proceedings, by ſeeking euer to defend the liberty of thoſe, who by their eloquence and well doing caried great authoritie among the ACHAIANS. And when Ariſtænetus MEGALIPOLITAN, (a man of great authoritie among the ACHAIANS, and one that euer bare great deuotion to the ROMAINES) ſaid in open Senate among the ACHAIANS, that they ſhould deny the ROMAINES nothing, nor ſhew themſelues vnthankfull to them: Philopœmen hearing what he ſaid, held his peace awhile, and ſuffered him to ſpeake (though it boiled in his heart, he was ſo angry with him) and in the end, breaking all patience, and as one ouercome with choler, he ſaid: O Ariſtænetus, why haue you ſuch haſt to ſee the vnfortunate end of GREECE? Another time, when Manius Conſull of ROME (after he had conquered king Antiochus) did make requeſt to the counſell of the ACHAIANS, that ſuch as were baniſhed from LACEDÆMON, might return home into their country againe, and that Titus Quintius Flaminius alſo did earneſtly intreat them: Philopœmen was againſt it, not for any hatred he bare vnto the baniſhed men, but becauſe he would haue done it by his owne meane, and the only grace of the ACHAIANS, to the end they ſhold not be beholding for ſo good a turne, neither vnto Titus, nor yet to the ROMAINES. Afterwards he himſelfe, being Generall of the ACHAIANS, did reſtore them wholly to their owne againe. Thus was Philopœmen ſomtime a litle too bold & quarrellous, by reaſon of his great ſtomack: and ſpecially when any man ſought for to haue things by authority. Laſtly, being three ſcore and ten yeres of age, he was the eight time choſen general of the ACHAIANS, and hoped well, not onely to paſſe the yeare of his charge in peace and quietneſſe, but alſo all the reſt of his life without any ſtirre of new wars, he ſaw the affaires of GREECE take ſo good ſucceſſe. For like as the force and ſtrength of ſickneſſe declineth, as the naturall ſtrength of the ſickly body impaireth: ſo through all the cities & people of GREECE, the deſire of quarrell & of wars ſurceaſed, as their power diminiſhed. Neuertheles, in the end of his yeres gouernment, the gods diuine (who iuſtly puniſh all inſolent words and deedes) threw him to the ground, as they ſuffer a rider vnfortunately to take a fall off his horſe, being come almoſt to the end of his cariere. For they write, that he being in a place on a time amongſt good companie, where one was maruellouſly praiſed for a good captaine, ſaid vnto them: Why maiſters, can ye commend him that was contented to be taken priſoner aliue of his enemies? Shortly after came newes that Dinocrates MESSINIAN (a priuate enemie of Philopœmens for certaine controuerſies paſt betweene them, and a man generally hated beſides of all honourable and vertuous men, for his licentious wicked life) had withdrawne the city of MESSINA from the deuotion of the ACHAIANS: and moreouer, that he came with an army to take a towne called COLONIDE. Philopœmen was at that time in the city of ARGOS, ſicke of an ague, and yet hearing theſe newes, tooke his iorney towards MEGALIPOLIS, making all the haſt he could poſſible, for that he came aboue 4. hundred furlongs that day. Straight he departed thence toward MESSINA, and taried not, but tooke with him a company of men at armes of the luſtieſt and wealthieſt MEGALIPOLITANS: who were all young noble men of the city, and willingly offered themſelues to go with him for the good will they bare him, and for the deſire they had to follow his valiantnes. Thus went they on their way towards the city of MESSINA, and marched ſo long, that they came neare to the hill of Euander, where they met with Dinocrates and his company, and gaue ſo fierce an onſet on the that they made them all turne taile: howbeit in the meane while, there came a releeſe of 500 men to Dinocrates, which he had left to keepe the countrey of MESSINA. The flying men that were ſcattered here and there, ſeeing this ſupply, gathered themſelues againe together, and ſhewed vpon the hils. Philopœmen fearing to be enuironed, and being deſirous to bring his men ſafe home againe, who most of loue had followed him: began to march away through narrow bushie places, himself being in the rereward, and turned oftentimes vpon his enemies, and skirmished with them, onely to driue them away from following of the rest of his company, and not a man that durst once set vpon him: for they did but cry out aloofe, and wheele as it were about him. Howbeit Philopœmen sundry times venturing farre from his company, to giue these young noble men leasure to saue themselues one after another: tooke no heede to himselfe that he was alone, enuironed on euery side with a great number of enemies. Notwithstanding, of all his enemies there was not a man that durst come to handstrokes with him, but still slinging and shooting at at him a farre off, they draue him in the end amongst stony places between hewne rockes, where he had much a do to guide his horse, although he had spurred him that he was al of a gore bloud. And as for his age, that did not let him but he might haue saued himselfe, for he was strong and lustie by the continuall exercise he tooke: but by cursed happe his body being weake with sickenesse, and wearie with the long iourney he had made that day, he found himselfe very heauie and ill disposed, that his horse stumbling with him, threw him to the ground. His fall was very great, and brused all his head, that he lay for dead in the place a great while, and neuer stirred nor spake: so that his enemies thinking he had bene dead, came to turne his body to strip him. But when they saw him lift vp his head and open his eyes, then many of them fell all at once vpon him and tooke him, and bound both his hands behind him, and did all the villany and mischiefe they could vnto him, and such, as one would litle haue thought Dinocrates would haue vsed in that sort, or that he could haue had such an ill thought towards him. So they that taried behind in the city of MESSINA, were maruellous glad when they heard these newes, and ran all to the gates of the city to see him brought in. When they saw him thus shamefully bound and pinioned, against the dignity of so many honours as he had receiued, and of so many triumphs and victories as he had passed: the most part of them wept for pity, to consider the mishap and ill fortune of mans nature, where there is so litle certaintie, as in manner it is nothing. Then beganne there some curteous speech to run in the mouths of the people by litle & litle, that they shold remember the great good he had done them in times past, and the liberty he had restored them vnto, when he expulsed the tyrant Nabis out of MESSINA. But there were other againe (howbeit very few) that to please Dinocrates, said they should hang him on a gibbet, and put him to death as a dangerous enemy, and that would neuer forgiue man that had once offended him: and the rather, because he would be more terrible to Dinocrates, then euer he was before, if he escaped his hands, receiuing such open shame by him. Neuertheless, in the end they caried him into a certaine dungeon vnder the ground, called the Treasurie, (which had neither light nor aire at all into it, nor doore, nor halfe doore, but a great stone rolled on the mouth of the dungeon) and so they did let him downe the same, and stopped the hole againe with the stone, and watched it with armed men for to keepe him. Now when these young noble ACHAIAN horsemen had fled vpon the spurre a great way from the enemy, they remembred themselues, and looked round about for Philopœmen: and finding him not in sight, they supposed straight he had bene slaine. Thereupon they staid a great while, and called for him by name, and perceiuing he answered not, they began to say among themselues, they were beasts and cowards to fly in that sort: and how they were dishonoured for euer so to haue forsaken their Captain, to saue themselues, who had not spared his owne life to deliuer them from daunger. Hereupon riding on their way, and enquiring still for him, they were in the end aduertised how he was taken. And then they went and caried those newes through all the townes and cities of ACHAIA, which were very sory for him, and tooke it as a signe of great ill fortune toward them. Wherupon they agreed to send ambassadors forthwith to the MESSINIANS, to demaund him: and in the meane time euery man should prepare to arme themselues to go thither, and get him either by force or loue. When the ACHAIANS had thus sent, Dinocrates feared nothing so much, as that delay of time might saue Philopœmens life: wherefore to preuent it, as soone as night came, and that the people were at rest, he straight caused the stone to be rolled from the mouth of the dungeon, and willed the hangman to be let down to Philopœmen with a cup of poison to offer him, who was commanded also not to go from him, vntill he had drunke it. When the hangman was come downe, he found Philopœmen laid on the ground vpon a litle cloke, hauing no list to sleepe, he was so grieuously troubled in his mind. Who when he saw light, and the man standing by him, holding a cup in his hand with this poison, he sate vpright vpon his couch, howbeit with great paine he was so weak:

and taking the cup in his hand, asked the hangman if he heard any newes of the horsemen that came with him, and specially of Lycortas. The hangman made him answer, that the most of them were saued. Then he cast his hands a litle ouer his head, and looking merrily on him, he said: It is well, seeing we are not all vnfortunate. Therewith speaking no mo words, nor making other ado, he drunke vp all the poison, and laid him downe as before. So nature straue not much withall, his body being brought so low, and thereupon the poison wrought his effect, and rid him straight out of his paine. The newes of his death ran presently through all ACHAIA, which generally from high to low was lamented. Wherupon all the ACHAIAN youth and counsellers of their cities and townes, assembled themselues in the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, where they all agreed without delay to reuenge his death. They made Lycortas their Generall, vnder whose conduct they inuaded the MESSINIANS, with force and violence, putting all to the fire and sword: so as the MESSINIANS were so feared with this mercilesse furie, that they yeelded themselues, and wholly consented to receiue the ACHAIANS into their citie. But Dinocrates would not giue them leisure to execute him by iustice, for he killed himselfe: and so did all the rest make themselues away, who gaue aduice that Philopœmen should be put to death. But those that would haue had Philopœmen hanged on a gibbet, Lycortas caused them to be taken, which afterwards were put to death with al kind of torments. That done, they burnt Philopœmens body, and did put his ashes into a pot. Then they straight departed from MESSINA, not in disorder, one vpon anothers neck as euery man listed: but in such an order and ray, that in the middest of the funerals, they did make a triumph of victory. For the souldiers were all crowned with garlands of laurell in token of victory, notwithstanding, the teares ranne downe their cheekes in token of sorow, and they led their enemies prisoners, shackled and chained. The funerall-pot in the which were Philopœmens ashes, was so couered with garlands of flowers, nosegayes, and laces, that it could scant be seene or discerned, and was caried by one Polybius a young man, the son of Lycortas, that was Generall at that time to the ACHAIANS: about whom there marched all the noblest and chiefest of the ACHAIANS, and after them also followed all the souldiers armed, and their horses very well furnished. The rest, they were not so sorrowfull in their countenance, as they are commonly which haue great cause of sorow: nor yet so ioyful, as those that came conquerors from so great a victory. Those of the cities, townes, and villages in their way as they past, came and presented themselues vnto them, to touch the funerall-pot of his ashes, euen as they were wont to take him by the hand, and to make much of him when he was returned from the warres: and did accompany his conuoy vnto the city of MEGALIPOLIS: at the gates whereof, were old men, women, and children, which thrusting themselues amongst the souldiers, did renew the teares, sorrowes, and lamentations of all the miserable and vnfortunate citie: who took it that they had lost with their citizens, the first and chiefest place of honour among the ACHAIANS. So he was buried very honourably as appertained vnto him: and the other prisoners of MESSINA, were all stoned to death, about his sepulcher. All the other cities of ACHAIA, besides many other honours they did vnto him, did set vp statues, as like to him as could be counterfeited. Afterwards in the vnfortunate time of GREECE, when the citie of CORINTH was burnt & destroied by the ROMAINES, there was a malicious ROMAINE that did what he could to haue the same pulled downe againe, by burdning and accusing Philopœmen (as if he had bene yet aliue) that he was alwayes enemie to the ROMAINES, and enuied much their prosperitie and victories. But after Polybius had aunswered him: neither the Consull Mummius, nor his counsellers, nor lieutenants, would suffer them to deface and take away the honours done in memory of so famous and worthy a man, although he had many wayes done much hurt vnto Titus Quintius Flaminius, and vnto Manius. So, these good men then made a difference betweene dutie and profit: and did thinke honestie and profit two distinct things, and so separated one from the other, according to reason and iustice. Moreouer they were perswaded, that like as men receiue curtesie and goodnesse of any, so are they bound to requite them againe, with kindnesse and dutie. And as men vse to acknowledge the same: euen so ought men to honour and reuerence vertue.

THE LIFE OF
Titus Quintius Flaminius.

IT is easie to see Titus Quintius Flaminins forme and stature, by Philopœmens statue of brasse, to whom we compare him: the which is now set vp at Rome, neare to great Apollo that was brought from Carthage, and is placed right against the comming into the shew place, vnder which there is an inscription in Greeke letters. But for his nature and conditions, they say of him thus: he would quickly be angrie, and yet very readie to pleasure men againe. For, if he did punish any man that had angred him, he would do it gently, but his anger did not long continue with him. He did good also to many, and euer loued them whom he had once pleasured, as if he had done him some pleasure: and was readie to do for them still whom he found thankfull, because he would euer make them beholding to him, and thought that as honourable a thing, as he could purchase to himselfe. Because he greatly sought honour aboue all things, when any notable seruice was to be done, he would do it himselfe, and no man should take it out of his hand. He would euer be rather with them that needed his helpe, then with those that could help him, or do him good. For, the first he esteemed as a meane to exercise his vertue with: the other, he tooke them as his fellowes and followers of honor with him. He came to mans state, when the citie of Rome had greatest warres and trouble. At that time all the youth of Rome, which were of age to carie weapon, were sent to the warre to learne to traile the pike, and how to become good captaines. Thus was he entred into marshall affaires, and the first charge he tooke, was in the warre against Hanniball of Carthage, where he was made Colonell of a thousand footemen, vnder Marcellus the Consull: who being slaine by an ambush Hanniball had layed for him betweene the cities of Bancia and Venusa, then they did chuse Titus Quintius Flaminius gouernour of the prouince and citie of Tarentvm, which was now taken againe the second time. In this gouernement of his, he wanne the reputation as much of a good and iust man, as he did of an expert and skilfull captaine. By reason whereof, when the Romaines were requested to send men to inhabite the cities of Narnia and Cossa, he was appointed the chiefe leader of them, which chiefly gaue him heart and courage to aspire at the first to the Consulship, passing ouer all other meane offices, as to be Ædile, Tribune, or Prætor, by which (as by degrees) other yong men were wont to attaine the Consulship. Therefore when the
